"Whereas speculators are taking advantage of the conditions and have raised the prices on the necessities of life and are now fixing the prices of future supplies so high as to place a real burden upon the wage earners and in many instances deprive them of the necessities of life; Therefore be it

"Resolved by the citizens of Athens, McMinn County, in a mass meeting—

"First. That we most earnestly request our Congressman, Hon. JOHN A. MOON, and our United States Senators from Tennessee, Hon. J. K. SHIELDS and Hon. K. D. MCKELLAR, to vote for and use their influence for the passage of a bill regulating immediately the prices of the necessities of life.

"Second. That we earnestly request their very best efforts for the passage of a bill prohibiting the distillation of all grains so much needed at the present time to supply our people with food and avoid the real suffering which must follow the diverting of more than 600,000,000 bushels of grain into worse than useless channels."

ELBERT WILSON,
J. H. JARVIS,
W. T. ROBERTS,
Prof. GRANNIS,
Committee.

Mr. MCKELLAR presented a petition of the Christian Endeavor Society of the McLemore Avenue Christian Church, at Memphis, Tenn., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Buchanan, Tenn., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the manufacture of food products into intoxicating liquors, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. MCLEAN presented petitions of the Men's Bible Class of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Milford; the congregation of the King's Highway Congregational Church, of Bridgeport; of Norden Lodge, No. 37, International Order of Good Temperance, of New Britain; the Christian Endeavor Society of the United Church of New Haven; of O. B. North & Co., of New Haven; the Pastors' Union, of New Haven; the Temperance Society East Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the State of Connecticut; and of the Bilton Machine Tool Co., of Bridgeport, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the New Haven County Medical Society of Connecticut, praying for the abrogation of the patents on salvarsan and its closely related products, which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Bridgeport, Conn., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 79, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, of New Haven, Conn., praying for the levying of income taxes for the purpose of paying war indebtedness and other obligations of the Government, and for the enactment of legislation to prevent the sale of necessaries of life during the war at excessive profits, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of Lodge No. 30, International Association of Machinists, of Bridgeport, Conn., praying for Government control of food during the war, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. WEEKS presented petitions of the congregations of the Old South Church, of Worcester; the First Baptist Church of Malden; the Central Congregational Church, of Newtonville; the Methodist Episcopal Church of Newton Center; the Emanuel Primitive Methodist Church, of Methuen; the First Baptist Church of Northboro; the First Congregational Church of Woburn; the Second Congregational Church of Attleboro; the First Unitarian Society of Hudson; of Pomona Grange, No. 184, Patrons of Husbandry, of Topsfield; of the Men's Club of the Church of the Good Shepherd, of Waban; of the Massachusetts State Baptist Missionary Society; of the Public Safety Committee of Harvard; of Pomona Grange, No. 314, Patrons of Husbandry, of Dighton; of the Old Colony Association of the Congregational Churches of Mattapoisett; of the Bay View Club, of Milford; and of Pomona Grange, No. 106, Patrons of Husbandry, of West Boylston, all in the State of Massachusetts, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I present a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE, STATE OF MICHIGAN,
Lansing, May 3, 1917.

Mr. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am directed to forward to you the accompanying resolution, which has been adopted by the two houses of the Michigan Legislature.

Very respectfully,
D. E. ALWARD,
Secretary of the Senate.

Senate concurrent resolution 24.

Whereas there now exists a state of war between the United States and Germany; and

Whereas the experience of the nations now engaged in war demonstrates beyond any question the necessity of husbanding every resource in this great struggle, to the end that the interests of our people may be preserved to them; and

Whereas the liquor traffic as we know it to-day is a burden economically and industrially; 25 States, among which is our own beloved State of Michigan, recognizing this great truth, have outlawed it; most of the great nations now engaged in the greatest war of the ages have as a war measure either absolutely abolished it or very materially reduced its activities, and are considering further reduction thereof; and this has all been done in order to insure the full strength of these nations against their enemies, unhampered by this gigantic evil; and

Whereas the liquor traffic is to-day withdrawing from legitimate lines of industry and commerce of the United States upward of $2,000,000,000 annually, and in addition to this awful economic waste is using enormous quantities of fuel, foodstuffs, and other useful commodities that will be needed by the Nation in order to prosecute successfully the struggle in which we are now engaged, and if deprived of such commodities the people will suffer serious inconvenience and distress and the Nation will be handicapped in the prosecution of the war: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, requested to enact, as a war measure, such legislation as will be effective to immediately stop the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors within the borders of the Nation; and that Congress be further asked to submit at once to the several States for ratification a resolution providing for an amendment to the Constitution providing for national constitutional prohibition of the liquor traffic; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the President of the Senate of the Congress of the United States, and to each Member of the Senate and House of Representatives of this State in Congress.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented petitions of the Rotary Club of Battle Creek; of Richmond Grange, No. 878, Patrons of Husbandry, of Reed City; of the Michigan State Conference of the Evangelical Association, held at Elkton; of the Brotherhood of the Presbyterian Church of Ypsilanti; of the president and faculty of the University of Michigan, of Ann Arbor; of sundry citizens of Big Rapids; and the congregations of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Hesperia, the Methodist Episcopal Church of Gwinn, the Methodist Episcopal Church of Amasa, the Methodist Episcopal Church of Stambaugh, and the First Methodist Episcopal Church of Hermansville, all in the State of Michigan, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Local Union, No. 252, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, of Ann Arbor, Mich., praying for the payment of the war debt by means of the income tax and for the purchase of war supplies at a reasonable profit, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GALLINGER presented the petition of W. K. Robbins, of Manchester, N. H., praying that new units of engineering troops be organized and maintained by one central department, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Orange Judd Co., of Springfield, Mass., and a memorial of the Phelps Publishing Co., of Springfield, Mass., remonstrating against an increase of second-class postage, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. JAMES. I present resolutions of Latonia Lodge, No. 107, Knights of Pythias, of Covington, Ky., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COVINGTON, KY., April 16, 1917.

Whereas our country is now facing a crisis which demands not the undivided loyalty of all its citizens but the unanimous and outspoken support to those directing the affairs of our Government as well; and

Whereas from the very foundation of this order the Knights of Pythias are under a binding obligation to assist in the furtherance of American patriotism: Therefore be it

Resolved at a regular meeting of Latonia Lodge, No. 107, Knights of Pythias, held April 16, 1917, at Covington, Ky., That this lodge fully indorses the patient and determined course of our President, Woodrow Wilson, in seeking to preserve the American rights by peaceful means, and the possibilities of negotiations having failed, that we further indorse each and every step that he has taken or may take to protect those rights; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President, the Senators from Kentucky, and Congressman ROUSE, from this district.

ABROGATION OF FOREIGN PATENTS ON DRUGS.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I have here a petition from the Mayo Bros. and the physicians of the Mayo Clinic and also from the Mayo Foundation for Medical Education and Research, earnestly requesting Congress to abrogate the patents upon various medicines, particularly upon salvarsan, which are greatly needed in the United States in the treatment of diseases.

These patents are held by certain citizens of Germany; the price of them has been very greatly and exorbitantly raised in the last few months, and the petition states the reasons why this action should be taken. I ask that they be printed in the RECORD for the information of the Senate.

There being no objection, the petitions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAYO CLINIC,
Rochester, Minn., May 4, 1917.

Senator OLLIE JAMES,
Chairman of the Committee on Patents,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR JAMES: I have the honor to submit to you herewith a statement of the position of the staff of the Mayo Clinic with respect to the question of abrogation by Congress of foreign patents on drugs essential to public health, especially salvarsan.

Respectfully, yours, JOHN H. STOKES, M. D.,
Chief Section of Dermatology and Syphilology.

We, the undersigned members of the medical staff of the Mayo Clinic and of the faculty of the Mayo Foundation for Medical Education and Research, desire to direct your attention to the condition now prevailing in this country with respect to the supply of certain widely used and extremely important drugs used by the medical profession in the treatment of disease. Chief among these drugs is salvarsan, a preparation upon which depends much of the modern treatment of syphilis, and upon which also the control of the contagiousness of this particular disease must largely rest. The sale of salvarsan in this country is controlled absolutely, both as regards name and methods of manufacture, by patents owned in Germany and controlled in this country by the Farbwerke-Hoechst Co., of New York City, of which one H. A. Metz is president. We believe that the patents on salvarsan in particular should be immediately abrogated by Congress and desire to urge the following considerations as ground for asking you to do all in your power to bring about such action:

During the course of the European war the supply of salvarsan in this country has been insufficient and precarious. The drug has been manufactured in Germany, imported when circumstances permitted, and doled out to the medical profession at prices which have largely prevented its use to the extent or in the type of cases which the interest of the public health demands.

Salvarsan has been successfully manufactured in this country under the direction of the dermatological research laboratories of the Philadelphia Polyclinic, of which Prof. J. Frank Schamberg is director. During a part of the time that the supply of salvarsan from Germany was cut off Prof. Schamberg was permitted to market the product of his manufacture under sufferance of the patentees and at a price dictated by their conception of commercial expediency. The clinical experience of many physicians throughout the country at this time agreed in regarding the American product as at least equal to the German in its therapeutic effect on syphilis and distinctly superior to it on the score of a lower toxicity and fewer unfavorable by-effects. As soon as the supply of salvarsan from Germany could be renewed the patentees stopped the manufacture of the American product.

The price of salvarsan as regulated by the Farbwerke-Hoechst Co. is a glaring example of a commercial monopoly reaping enormous profits at the expense of sickness and misfortune. It has been repeatedly stated by Prof. Schamberg that the drug can be placed on the market profitably and under appropriate governmental control at $1 a dose instead of $4.50, the price fixed by the holders of the patent rights. The surplus profits go to enrich not the inventor of the drug nor his estate, which has long since been generously provided for, but the private fortunes of the gentlemen who control the rights for this country. The prices which they maintain are prohibitive for a large body of the sick and will effectually throttle a public campaign against syphilis as a disease until such time as the patents expire or are abrogated by Congress.

We respectfully submit that even in time of peace the propriety and wisdom of a public policy which permits private monopoly to control and seriously limit the use of remedial agents whose availability is vital to the public health may well be questioned. There is no doubt in the minds of the medical profession of this country that the control of syphilis as a scourge of the public health is seriously hampered by the price set upon the drug by gentlemen who seem to see in it only a means of increasing their already large private fortunes. The abrogation of patent rights, with the consequent reduction in price which would follow upon the home manufacture of the drug, would not only work no real injustice to the persons concerned in the distribution and control of salvarsan, but would place at the disposal of millions of persons now deprived of it by their misfortune and their poverty a remedy which in its own field has all the beneficent and saving qualities of antitoxin in diphtheria and of vaccine in smallpox.

We submit further that if it is unwise to permit commercial control of the public health in time of peace, it is doubly unwise to permit it at a time when the country is bending its energies to prepare for and successfully wage war. The protection of the Army and Navy from the ravages of this disease, which has long been recognized by physicians and laymen as a more serious menace to the manhood of a nation than many of the devices of an enemy, demands an abundant and cheap supply of this drug available not merely to governmental agencies but to all physicians, for use both among mobilized troops and in the civil population. The prevention of a devastating epidemic of syphilis during and after the war demands that from the first moment of mobilization until at least some years after the discharge of the last man at the close of the war the medical profession of this country be able to employ salvarsan in treatment in amounts unlimited by any consideration of cost as dictated by the ideas of private monopolists representing alien interests in control of the supply of the drug. The belligerent countries of Europe have recognized that private rights must be waived in the face of such considerations, and preparations similar to salvarsan are being made in Canada, England, and France with governmental sanction.

In view of these considerations, and in view of the fact that salvarsan has been successfully manufactured in this country, and can be marketed at a price which will make it available for a public health campaign, we beg to urge upon you that you use every influence which you can bring to bear in favor of an immediate abrogation by Congress of the patent rights on this drug and incidentally on other drugs necessary to the public health whose usefulness is curtailed by German patents. We urge that such an abrogation shall not be merely for the duration of the war, but shall be permanent, and that, furthermore, there shall ultimately be a radical revision of our patent law, looking to the prevention of private monopoly of remedial agents indispensable to the public health.

MOBILIZATION OF AGRICULTURAL RESOURCES.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a document by David Lubin, the American delegate to the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, on the subject of food supply and the mobilization of our agricultural resources.

There being no objection, the document was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL CHAMBER OF AGRICULTURE.

The half-yearly report on cereals by the International Institute of Agriculture shows that bad as was the situation in 1916, it has grown even worse in 1917. Instead of a reserve, there is now a deficit of cereals for all the countries open to trade. This deficit amounts to 35,000,000 quintals less than normal requirements.

A WAR MEASURE MOBILIZING OUR AGRICULTURAL RESOURCES—FACTS AND DEDUCTIONS SHOWING THE NEED FOR THE PASSAGE OF SENATE BILL 5973 (64TH CONG., 1ST SESS.).

[By David Lubin, delegate of the United States, International Institute of Agriculture.]

INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF AGRICULTURE,
Rome, April 11, 1917.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: In recent letters from yourself and Senator SHEPPARD it is stated that the bill for a national chamber of agriculture (S. 5973, 64th Cong., 1st sess.) would be reintroduced at the next session of Congress, and sooner if an extra session were held. As the extra session is now sitting, and in view of the war situation and recent developments in the world's supply of cereals as shown by the institute's latest report, I have sent you the following cable:

"War situation bearing on economic conditions and grave additional world cereal shortage render mobilization of agriculture imperative. Strongly advise you with committee of Senate and House to consult President on immediate passage of bill for the national chamber of agriculture."

The following are some further facts and deductions which have a decided bearing on this matter.

Yours, very sincerely, DAVID LUBIN,
Delegate of the United States,
International Institute of Agriculture, Rome, Italy.

A WAR MEASURE MOBILIZING OUR AGRICULTURAL RESOURCES UNDER SENATE BILL 5973.

(64th Cong., 1st sess.)

The mobilization of our agricultural resources comes right next in importance as a war measure to the proper handling of the Army and the Navy.

Mr. Bonar Law, the leader of the House of Commons, says: "It is still the considered view of the cabinet that the production of food is at least as important, if not even more important, than getting men into the army."

The handling of the food question in England is, therefore, treated as an important war measure. But is its importance confined to production? By no means; the chief question is one of distribution (see addenda); distribution is the paramount issue, not merely in England but in each and all of the belligerent countries of Europe.

And the same will hold good here; surely so now that the war is on. Yes; and even more so here than elsewhere, for, as is well known, there is more manipulation in the distribution of food products in the United States than in the other belligerent countries. To permit such manipulation to have free play in war time would be to court defeat; it would be nothing short of criminal imbecility.

The first thing to be done, therefore, is to choke off the possibility of such manipulation through effective organization, organization which shall mobilize this industry. But how can this be effected?

On this head the Secretary of Agriculture says:

"Where the food supply is located, who owns it, what may be the difficulties of securing it, whether the local market conditions are due to car shortage, whether there is artificial manipulation or control, no one can state with certainty. It is essential that we have the facts * * * they are a prerequisite for the working out of a permanent, just, and economical system of marketing." (Price Current Grain Reporter, Mar. 7, 1917.)

As matters stand to-day, under present conditions, the Secretary is entirely right; the facts are not known, and yet it is essential that they should be known. How can this be done?

Senate bill 5973 (64th Cong., 1st sess.) provides the way.

Under Federal Government charter it establishes an organization of the farmers in each township; these elect their delegates to the county chamber of agriculture; these county chambers elect delegates to their State chamber of agriculture; and the State chambers elect the national chamber of agriculture. We thus have a pyramid, as it were, working from the township up to the county, from the county up to the State, and from the State up to the Nation; all for the purpose of promoting the equitable distribution and advantageous marketing of farm products.

Let me quote from section 23 of the bill:

"Whenever a local unit or chamber or any member thereof desires to offer for sale or to purchase any agricultural products, or desires information relating to said products, said chamber or said member may communicate such desire to the secretary of the local chamber, whose duty it shall be, in case he can not meet the needs of the applicant, to certify and forward the application to the secretary of the county unit or chamber. If the secretary of the county unit or chamber can not meet the needs of the applicant, he shall certify and forward the application to the secretary of the State unit or chamber. If the secretary of the State unit or chamber can not meet the needs of the applicant, he shall certify and forward the application to the secretary of the national chamber, whose duty it shall be to act at once upon the application."

Thus, as I stated to the Chief of the Diplomatic Bureau in my hearing before the State Department on June 21, 1915, each producer would be enabled to see how best to market his products, not merely with his own eyes, as at present, but with the help of four or five millions of his fellow workers' eyes.

And now, to continue with the quotation from the bill; these local, county, State, and national chambers of agriculture shall—

"provide for the employment of the card index, the telephone, the telegraph, and other means of accurate and rapid communication to and from the units or chambers. They shall also have power to provide such street markets, salesrooms, and exchanges as may be deemed necessary and expedient along the line of promoting the equitable distribution of farm products."

But why should this proposed organization be semiofficial? Why should it not be unofficial; a mere union of agricultural organizations, if you please?

It should not be unofficial because any mere union of present farm organizations would be inadequate for the purpose, as these organizations have been mainly on social lines; therefore but few of their leaders have had the requisite trend of thought for the serious business in hand. Moreover, by far the greater number of the farmers of the country are not members of these organizations at all.

Well, then, why should not the organization be official? Why should not the Government itself perform this task?

Because it would be as impracticable to have Government employees distribute our agricultural products to economic advantage as it would be to have them do this with our dry goods, boots, shoes, metal goods, furniture, etc. Government could no more do this for the farmer than it could for the manufacturer or the merchant, although, of course, we all know that the Government bureaus can be of material help to the farmers in carrying out this work.

The semiofficial organization provided for under the measure we are considering (S. 5973, 64th Cong., 1st sess.) would be all-embracing. It would cover the farmers of the Nation and would permit of the freest action by each unit of the membership consistent with the welfare of the whole. At the same time it would afford the means for ready and prompt response to Government guidance and direction. Such semiofficial organizations have been proven effective by years of experience in the central European countries.

But the question arises, Would it not take a long time to start this system? No; for section 3 of the bill provides that at the start "the members of the national chamber of agriculture shall be appointed by the President as soon after the passage of this act as possible," and there is nothing to prevent these members from going ahead with the work immediately after their appointment.

At this moment, while I am writing, the news of the declaration of war has been flashed this way. The war is on; we should at once mobilize our agricultural industry; we should at once place the distribution of the products of agriculture on a war footing, whether we go to war independently of any alliance with the present belligerents or not.

If we go to war independently it will, of course, be quite a different matter to joining the alliance. If we join the alliance our war is likely to be over when the war with the alliance ceases. But if we do not join, there will be nothing to prevent our war continuing after that of the allies has ceased. In that event we shall have some four or five thousand miles of sea front to defend against an enemy navy as large and perhaps larger than our own, an enemy with a veteran army of some several million men, and it would be quite problematic whether in that event the British Navy would stand behind us as it does now.

We have now the choice of one of two methods of procedure: We may either drift toward a series of coercive and restrictive measures, such as those shown in the addenda to this paper, or else we must adopt a measure of mobilization which shall place the distribution of agricultural products on the soundest war footing consistent with rational business methods.

Such a measure of mobilization is provided for under the bill we are now considering (S. 5973).

The semiofficial institution which this bill would establish would effectively mobilize agriculture. With its several million units of membership, with its ramifications extending to every nook and corner of the United States, centralized under Government charter, it would respond to Government guidance and direction as readily as an automobile responds to the slightest turn of the wheel.

SOME FACTS SHOWING THE NEED FOR THE PASSAGE OF SENATE BILL 5973—THE FOOD SITUATION—A DEFICIT.

This morning (Apr. 7, 1917) in a conversation with the chief of the Statistical Bureau of the International Institute of Agriculture I put to him the following questions:

Q. Did not the report for the available world supplies of cereals issued in your statistical notes for October, 1916, show a decidedly lesser amount than the normal?—A. Yes; decidedly so.

Q. How is it in the report you are just now issuing?—A. The situation is still worse than it was in last October. Take wheat, for instance, in the Northern Hemisphere. The situation is worse than as shown last October. It was bad enough then, when it showed 75.5 per cent of the previous year's production, but now it only shows 73.9 per cent.

Q. And how about the Southern Hemisphere's crops?—A. Although they are good in Australia, they are so very bad in Argentina that that Government has prohibited exportation, as the crop is about one-third of the normal. On the whole, the outlook is very bad, decidedly worse than in last October, as the total world's yield this year available for international trade is only 72 per cent of last year's and 83 per cent of a five years average.

Q. But you speak only about wheat. Will not the other cereals make up for the deficiencies in the wheat crop?—A. Unfortunately, no; the most alarming fact is that these other cereals do not make up for the deficiency in wheat at all, for the total of all the cereals bulked together still shows that this year's crop is only 80 per cent of last year's.

Q. Everyone knows that the 1915 crop was a bumper crop. Will not the carry over from that crop make up for the deficiency on this year's production?—A. No; the yield of that bumper crop, which exceeded the yield of any of the 10 previous years, is proven to be insufficient to make up for the deficit of the 1916–17 crop; in fact, normal requirements can not possibly be satisfied this year.

Q. While I know that it is rather early to ask this question, yet can you give any idea of what the prospects are for the 1917 crop?—A. Prospects are shown to be not at all favorable, for acreage is not perceptibly larger than last year's, whereas all the world over weather has been exceedingly unfavorable for the last several months, impeding sowings in a great number of countries.

ADDENDA.

[From the International Institute of Agriculture's Statistical Notes on Cereals, April, 1917.]

RESTRICTIVE AND COERCIVE FOOD MEASURES.

The following quotations are from the proof sheets of the institute's half-yearly statistical report on cereals for April, 1917, pages 20–23:

NOTE.—The difficulties in Germany can not be traced to defects in its distributive system. They are due to the stoppage of food imports owing to the blockade.

Germany: A decree of October 28, 1914, forbids the use of wheat and rye for feeding live stock. In January, 1915, this interdiction was extended to oats, except in the case of horses, whose ration was fixed at 1½ kilograms per day.

On January 25, 1915, a decree was issued requisitioning all stocks of wheat and rye, and rye, barley, and oat meal.

By a decree of June, 1916, the wheat and rye crops of 1916 and all supplies of flour were requisitioned, and on July 24 this measure was extended to barley and oats.

On March 1, 1917, the Imperial Bureau of Cereals ordered that 94 pounds of flour were to be obtained from every 100 pounds of wheat, and 84 pounds from every 100 pounds of rye.

A decree of October 24, 1914, ordered that wheat bread was to contain at least 10 per cent of rye flour, and rye bread at least 5 per cent of potato flour. On January 5, 1915, the order was to mix 30 per cent of rye flour in wheat bread and 10 to 30 per cent of potato flour in rye bread.

The daily ration of bread was fixed in January, 1916, at 200 grams per head.

A decree of June 26, 1916, requires all townships of more than 40,000 inhabitants to collect all the kitchen waste and remainders from meals, such as broken bread, relics of vegetables, fruit, meat, fish, soup, sauce, potatoes, including skins, and to keep them in special boxes. A penalty of six months' imprisonment or 1,500 francs fine is provided for those who fail to collect broken victuals, or who steal them from the boxes provided for that purpose.

Austria: A decree of January 30, 1915, provides that the flour used in making bread must consist half of wheat or rye flour and half of other farinaceous stuffs.

A decree of February 21, 1915, requisitioned all stocks of cereals and flours; a decree of June 21, 1915, requisitioned all the 1915 crops; and a decree of June 11, 1916, requisitioned all the crops of 1916.

A decree of March 26, 1915, fixed the ration of bread and flour per inhabitant at 200 grams per day, and introduced bread and flour cards.

Hungary: A decree of September 8, 1916, requisitioned all stocks of wheat, rye, barley, and oats, and on the 29th of September, 1916, this measure was extended to include maize.

A decree of February 16, 1915, ordered that 50 per cent of maize flour or 25 per cent of potato flour was to be used in bread making.

France: A ministerial decree closed all confectioners' shops on Tuesdays and Wednesdays. A decree of February 9, 1917, forbids the sale of new bread.

Italy: A decree of February 21, 1917, orders that 90 pounds of flour shall be obtained from every 100 pounds of wheat.

A decree of December 12, 1916, enacts restrictions on the consumption of food in hotels, pensions, restaurants, cafés, dairy shops, etc., and forbids certain foods on certain days, limits the number of dishes which may be served, etc. A decree of March 10, 1917, forbids the sale of all cakes and confectionery.

The following countries have fixed maximum prices for wheat: Germany, Austria, Hungary, Belgium, France, Italy, Spain, Switzerland, Sweden, Russia, and Tunis.

Great Britain and Ireland: A government commission has the monopoly of importing and distributing in Great Britain and Ireland all foreign wheat, maize, and rice.

Bread can only be sold when it is 1-day old. It is forbidden to use milk and sugar in baking bread. The food controller has fixed the ration of bread and flour at 4 pounds per inhabitant per week.

From an editorial in the London Times, March 24, 1917:

"For the first time since the Crimean War the price of bread in this country is to be raised to a shilling for a 4-pound loaf.

"The country was led to concentrate its attention upon meatless days and potatoless days, and up till now has paid very insufficient attention to the even more pressing question of bread. * * * If it is necessary to prescribe the number of ounces of meat which may be consumed at a meal in an hotel, as undoubtedly it is, why not rigidly limit the bread also? * * * The tea shop requires scrutiny just as much as the restaurant. * * * Three meals a day and nothing between ought now to be the extreme limit for everybody in the land. We shall be lucky if we do not in the end get down to two meals a day.

"Possibly domiciliary search for food hoards has become necessary. * * * The food controller's suggested order touches every householder in the land, and might easily become a cause of widespread irritation.

"A further reduction of the sugar ration is about to be promulgated."

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I was waited on by a committee of young colored men from Howard University, in this city, who submitted to me a memorandum concerning a training camp for negro officers. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRAINING CAMP FOR NEGRO OFFICERS.

Our country faces the greatest crisis in its history. The negro, as ever, loyal and patriotic, is anxious to do his full share in the defense and support of his country in its fight for democracy. The negro welcomes the opportunity of contributing his full quota to the Federal Army now being organized. He feels very strongly that these negro troops should be officered by their own men. The following statement presents the facts upon which we base our request for an officers' training camp for negroes:

1. (a) Fourteen officers' training camps are to be opened on May 14, 1917, to provide officers for the new Federal Army.

(b) No officers are to be commissioned unless they receive training in one of these 14 training camps.

(c) The War Department has stated that it is impracticable to admit negroes to the 14 established camps.

2. (a) The negro is to furnish his proporationate quota in this Army.

(b) It seems just that the competent and intelligent negroes should have the opportunity to lead these troops.

(c) One thousand negro college students and graduates have already pledged themselves to enter such a training camp immediately.

(d) In addition, men in the medical profession desire to qualify for service in the Medical Corps, and there are other competent men ready to qualify for other specialized corps provided for.

(e) Records of negro officers and troops warrant the provision for negro officers to lead negro troops—Lieut. Col. Young, Capt. Davis, Maj. Walker, Maj. Loving.

3. Therefore the negro race requests the establishment of an officers' reserve training camp for negroes.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 2161) to increase the utility of the postal savings bank, to encourage savings among the people, and to secure the largest returns for such savings consistent with adequate security; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. McLEAN:

A bill (S. 2162) for the relief of Charles Yarrington (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 2163) granting an increase of pension to John M. Jones; to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO PENDING BILL.

Mr. ASHURST submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I desire to have the Chair inform me what business is before the Senate at the present time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business, which is Senate bill No. 2.

Mr. McCUMBER. I object to any other business until we dispose of that unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. MARTIN I move that the doors be closed, that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of legislative business in secret session.

Mr. OVERMAN. I second the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

The Senate thereupon proceeded to deliberate with closed doors. After 4 hours and 55 minutes the doors were reopened.

While the doors were closed,

On motion of Mr. LODGE, the Journal entries of the proceedings were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and the entries are as follows:

On motion by Mr. MARTIN, the vote agreeing to the reported amendment, on page 25, line 16, to page 27, line 7, inclusive, inserting a new section in Chapter VII was reconsidered.

On motion by Mr. MARTIN, to reconsider the vote of the Senate agreeing to the amendment of Mr. SMITH of Georgia to the reported committee amendment, to strike out all of section 1 and insert the following:

Whenever during the present war the President shall find that exports to a particular country are being used directly or indirectly to supply an enemy country, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export any article or articles from the United States to such country, except under such regulations and orders and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, until otherwise ordered by the President or by the Congress.

After debate, it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia, by unanimous consent, withdrew his proposed amendment; and

The reported amendment having been further amended, on motion by Mr. OVERMAN, viz, in line 18 to strike out the words "the United States is at war and" and insert "during the present war,"

On motion of Mr. GALLINGER, the doors were reopened.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the Senator from Georgia has withdrawn his amendment, and the question now is on the adoption of the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The amendment which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] offered the other day having been reconsidered and withdrawn and section 1 of Chapter VII having been amended behind closed doors, I ask the Secretary to read to the Senate that section as it has already been amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The section as amended will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SECTION 1. Whenever during the present war the President shall find that the public safety shall so require, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export any article or articles from the United States, except at such time or times and under such regulations and orders and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress: Provided, however, That no preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to the peculiar way in which this section is written. I really think it does not embody the wishes of the Senator or the wishes of the committee. As written, the President is to find that the public safety requires an embargo, an embargo on something, an embargo somewhere, and thereupon he issues his proclamation. What is the effect of that proclamation? It is to put an embargo upon the shipment of everything and anything out of the United States. It stops everything from leaving the United States, although the embargo might be limited to one single country. The President might perhaps have found that some neutral country contiguous to Germany was permitting our food shipments to go on through to Germany, and the embargo might be intended to be limited to that country to prevent the shipments to Germany, and yet under this section, as it is drawn, the moment the proclamation is made no shipment of anything can go from the United States except under regulations by the President.

Mr. OVERMAN. And subject to the limitations that he shall prescribe.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Precisely; but it applies it to everything, it puts the embargo on everything, though the purpose of the President may be to limit it to one country and one product. We might desire to prevent coal from going to some country, and we might desire to put an embargo on coal to that country, yet under the provisions of this section the proclamation covers all products anywhere and everywhere.

I submit, Mr. President, that it should be modified so as to permit the embargo to be levied as a result of the proclamation applying it to a single country or a single commodity. A broader latitude in the nature of the embargo ought to be covered by the section and the proclamation ought to cover the particular embargo which the section intends to cover.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I think there is much in the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia. Let me ask if the idea he has in mind would not be met by inserting the word "particular" after "any," the words "commodity or commodities" after "articles," and the words "to any or all countries" after the words "from the United States," so that it will read:

It shall be unlawful to export any particular article or articles, commodity or commodities from the United States to any or all countries.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What I would like, Mr. President, would be to have the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who have been the special champions of the provision, and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], representing the other side, take the section to-night and rewrite it, embodying more clearly just what we all wish.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator allow me to suggest to him that if we add, on line 21, after the word "articles," the words "mentioned in such proclamation," we will have met the objections urged by the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Secretary will report the language embodying the two suggestions, I think perhaps we have what I was seeking to suggest.

Mr. McCUMBER. I suggest, after the word "articles," in line 21, to insert the words "mentioned in such proclamation."

Mr. GALLINGER. On page 26?

Mr. McCUMBER. On page 25 of this print.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On line 21, page 25, after the word "articles," insert the words "mentioned in such proclamation."

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be agreed to without objection.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to suggest, further, that the words should be added "to the country or countries named in such proclamation." Both should be covered by it, because the proclamation should be permitted to limit the exports both as to articles and as to countries.

Mr. NELSON. I suggest to the Senator that we utilize the word "to" in the clause "from such place or places" by striking out the word "from" and inserting the word "to," so as to read "and to such place or places." I think that would meet the objection.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; that is excluding the shipments "from such place or places."

Mr. NELSON. No; it would then read, "except at such time or times and to such place or places."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The suggestion I made a few moments ago I believe is the best. If the Senator from North Carolina, the Senator from Montana, the Senator from Florida, and the Senator from Minnesota would take the section to-night and rewrite it, they will be likely to bring us exactly what we want in the morning.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the amendment which the Senator from Montana offered along that line will cover that case.

Mr. WALSH. I believe the language suggested by the Senator from North Dakota accomplishes the purpose I had in mind in the first part of my amendment, and that suggested by the Senator from Georgia accomplishes what I proposed in the second part of my amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask that the Secretary may read the section as now amended.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let it be read as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The section as it is now amended will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

SECTION 1. Whenever during the present war the President shall find that the public safety shall so require, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export any article or articles mentioned in such proclamation from the United States, except at such time or times and under such regulations and orders, and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress: Provided, however, That no preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that in the interest of clarity we make line 21 read:

It shall be unlawful to export from the United States any article or articles mentioned in such proclamation.

It now reads "to export any article or articles mentioned in such proclamation from the United States." I suggest that we put the words "from the United States" after the word "export."

Mr. OVERMAN. I see no objection to that, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be agreed to, without objection.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, after the word "export," I ask to add "to any country named in said proclamation."

Mr. WALSH. I suggest that the Senator put in those words after the words "United States."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. "From the United States to any country named in such proclamation." That is satisfactory.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be agreed to, without objection.

Mr. STONE. I now ask that it be read.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, what portion of this bill is now before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Chapter VII, section 1, is now under consideration.

Mr. McCUMBER. Have we adopted the amendment known as section 1 of Chapter VII?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not as amended. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 1. Whenever during the present war the President shall find that the public safety shall so require, and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export from the United States to any country named in such proclamation any article or articles mentioned in such proclamation, except at such time or times, and under such regulations and orders, and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President shall prescribe, until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress: Provided, however, That no preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senate to the fact that the language "and from such place or places" has been taken from the provision, and that the proviso suggested by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has been added to it. The suggestion of the Senator from Minnesota was that this language be left in the bill, but that the proviso be added to it, so that any provision should not run counter to the Constitution. I suggested a little while ago that it would be wise to leave in the bill the language "from such place or places," putting it at the end of the proviso; and for this reason: The Constitution, as I then stated, does not forbid that a preference be given to one port over another, but it forbids that a preference be given to the ports of one State over the ports of another State. If the rule is just exactly the same with reference to all the States then the regulation would not offend the Constitution.

I suggested that it might be advisable to provide, for instance, that the exports should take place only from one port in each State, because it may become necessary to convoy the ships that leave our ports, and it will be necessary to assemble them at a certain particular port in each State in order that they may carry on their work.

I do not think anybody would object to the language "from such place or places," except as it was felt that it might contravene the Constitution; but I believe that with the clause which we have in it and the proviso suggested by the Senator from Minnesota we may well leave this language in the bill. Accordingly, Mr. President, I move that the vote be reconsidered by which those words were eliminated.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I hope that will not be done. I think the words "and from such place or places" ought to be left out. They can have no effect on the power to enforce the law. I think it opens a dangerous constitutional question, but, whether it does or not, I do not think the power ought to be given to discriminate between ports and States. If we need to put an embargo upon any article, put it on, but make it a general one; we ought not to shut it off at one place and let it out at another.

Mr. WALSH. I imagine that perhaps the Senator from Massachusetts did not hear me. I am not particular about this. I am not going to insist upon it at all, but there is a reason for it. I repeat, perhaps the Senator from Massachusetts did not hear what I said. Under the Constitution it would be impossible to discriminate or to give any preference to the ports of one State over the ports of another; you have got to give the same privileges to the ports of each State; but it may be desirable to confine exports to one port in each State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana to reconsider the vote by which the amendment to the amendment, to which he has referred, was agreed to. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it. The noes have it. The question now is on the section as amended.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the RECORD will show that the vote of Friday adopting amended section 7 has been reconsidered, and that the provision which the Senate then adopted giving the President power to place an embargo upon all goods going out from the United States which find their way, directly or indirectly, into an enemy country through a neutral country has been withdrawn. The reasons for such reversal, however, the RECORD will not disclose. They were given in secret session.

I find myself in a position where I can not support this amendment. I have been perfectly willing at all times, and I am still willing, to confer upon the President all the power which he ought to possess, or which could be reasonably asked for him, in order that he may successfully prosecute the war. I am not willing, however, to copy any of the barbarous methods of Germany, which we have condemned and which have led up to this war. My understanding is now that this section will not be used for the purpose of protecting the American consumer, no matter what the needs of our people may be; that it will not be invoked for the purpose of conserving food or reducing the cost to the American people; but that it may be used for the purpose of coercing neutral countries into a participation in this war.

Mr. President, I can not vote for such a measure as that. We have stood for neutrality; the President has invoked it; he has asked all of the nations of the world to join with us in preserving it. Now, that we ourselves are engaged in the war we ought not to attempt to coerce neutral countries into violating their neutrality. I do not believe that that kind of a war can result in good to the world.

It is stated that we are fighting this war for the cause of democracy and that the weaker nations of the world shall be secure in their rights; that they shall be protected in their national ideals in the governments which they have set up for themselves. What a mockery of that profession this proposed action makes! If it is true that the real force and effect of this proposition is to coerce weaker nations into doing things that they would not otherwise do, into an abandonment of free, independent governmental action, then we depart from the high ideals that we held aloft as the reason for our entering into this world conflict.

I do not wish to be placed in a position where I shall be considered as antagonizing the President of the United States or the Government of the United States in the prosecution of this war. I will not antagonize him or it. But my own judgment is that the course you propose to take now is going to intensify that war, is going to line up against us people who up to this time have been friendly. So believing, I can not, even though it may subject me to criticism, vote for a measure which I believe at once to be unjust and unwise. Instead of creating allies it may multiply our enemies.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am tempted to ask the Senator from Michigan this question: Suppose it were suggested now that, in order to fight the war successfully, the United States should use its submarines against neutral shipping in the same way that Germany has used her submarines. Would the Senator from Michigan think that the United States ought to use that weapon in that way in order to win?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not. I have condemned the use of submarines, because such warfare is inhuman and uncivilized. We must meet it, and I am willing to use any proper means to defeat its awful efficiency; but, Mr. President, I am not willing to vote to force upon any neutral country in this world, and especially upon a little country that can be coerced by the great United States, methods which we have ourselves condemned. It may be necessary to our success, but I doubt it. We invoke Jehovah to aid our arms at this time. Can we expect such aid when we employ methods such as this measure contemplates? We ought to fight this war honorably. If we are going to use these unusual means, let us use them against our enemies, not against our friends. Let us not force upon neutral countries the methods which we have condemned in others, and because of the use of which by Germany we are now in war.

Mr. President, I have felt like explaining the vote which I am to cast on this question, inasmuch as its merits were discussed in secret session, and I want my people to know my reasons. I feel very deeply about it. I would vote for the provision if I were confident that that was the only way that democracy could be preserved; but believing, as I do, that it may be used as an instrument for the destruction of democracy, believing that the power as it is proposed to be used is unfair, unjust, and uncivilized, I must protest against granting it.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask the Senator this question: The United States is now a belligerent power, not a neutral power. Certain countries, numerous countries, are still neutral, and, so far as I know, all of them are in a state of friendly relationship with the United States. If we were still neutral, I would join very readily with the Senator in opposing any such legislation as this, but we are not now neutral; we are belligerent.

Now, on that premise, I ask if it be true that any neutral nation, for example some neutral nation contiguous to Germany, which is now our enemy in war, was supplying Germany with food and munitions or other matériel of war out of its own production, and then coming to the United States to purchase here and transport there a sufficient quantity of things that they had sold and delivered to Germany to replace the supply furnished Germany, does not the Senator think that the United States would be absolutely within its belligerent rights to say to that neutral country that it—that is, the United States—would not consent that that neutral country should furnish the enemy of the United States with supplies and then come here into our ports and markets to replace what they had sold to our enemy?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, to prevent the transaction suggested by the Senator from Missouri is not the object of this section as it now stands. That is not the question involved. The Senate the other day provided against just exactly that emergency, and that action is what the Senator voted this afternoon to reconsider. The Smith amendment, which was adopted by the Senate, provided that the President could exercise the power of embargo upon goods going to a neutral country with ultimate destination, either directly or indirectly to the enemy. That is not the question here now. I voted for that proposition and am willing to support it, but it was withdrawn. It is true, as the Senator from Missouri says, that we are no longer a neutral Nation, and now you do not propose that any other nation that we are strong enough to coerce shall be neutral. That is the proposition involved, as I understand it, that we, now in war, claim the right to force all other nations into war, and compel them to abandon their neutrality against their will under the possible pains of starvation inflicted upon them by our boasted Christian Government.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Yes.

Mr. REED. I do not wish to ask the Senator a question or to seem to criticize the Senator, but we had a session here all day long in secret, and I can not any longer see the purpose of it if Senators are to proceed with this line of discussion. I suggest that to the Senator.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I am not discussing what occurred in secret session. The immediate discussion was induced by the question of the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], and I am very glad he asked it, because it gives me an opportunity to explode that thin excuse for the position of Senators who voted for the so-called Smith amendment and afterwards abandoned it. But, Mr. President, I have spoken as long as I intended to speak, and I have said all I care to say. I realize that my words will be ineffectual in modifying this section, but some day, possibly in the near future, but when too late for reversal, we shall recognize our dreadful mistake in passing this provision. My only hope is that the President will not enforce it, as he now thinks he will and as its proponents expect him to do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to come in at the end of the section. I ask to have it read and printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the section, the following:

Provided further, That the power herein conferred upon the President shall in no case be used to withhold any product from any neutral nation for its own use and consumption, unless such product, in the opinion of the President, be required for domestic consumption, or to interfere with the neutral rights of any neutral nation, or to coerce any such nation by commercial pressure or otherwise, directly or indirectly, to engage in or to participate in the existing war.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, it is evident that we can not finish the bill to-night. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m., Monday, May 7, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 8, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate May 7 (legislative day of May 2), 1917.

CONSUL GENERAL.

CLASS 5.

James C. McNally, of Pennsylvania, to be a consul general of class 5 of the United States of America.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 7, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our heavenly Father, we bless Thee for the beautiful world in which Thou hast placed us, with its opportunities to develop our minds and souls unto the perfect man. But if there are obstacles in the way to be overcome, they do but strengthen us for the larger life. To-day we are facing a world-wide struggle for supremacy; on the one side is liberty, on the other is limitation; on the one side freedom of thought and action, on the other subjection to the will of others. Shall it be popular government or monarchical domination, right or might? God speed the right and throttle the wrong; that men may live and grow all that is purest and best in them; and thus dwell together in peace, joy, and happiness; each for all and all for each. In the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER, MORRISON, MINN.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 1006) authorizing the county of Morrison, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in said county.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, it has been the understanding with the committees, as I take it, that they were not to report bills except such as were necessary for the purpose of prosecuting the war or closely related to that particular subject. I have noticed not only these bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, but other bills reported from different committees and placed on the calendar. I do not know what the emergency connected with these bills may be, but it seems to me that if it is to be the policy to report all kinds of bills then the membership of the House and the members of the committee who have many bills referred to them ought to know it. I feel that it is a duty to object to these bills unless there is some particular urgent reason why they should be considered. I ask the gentleman from Georgia what the emergency is in connection with this bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Illinois has called my attention to the fact that several bridge bills had found their way to the calendar. I explained to the House and I explained to him that the author of each of these bills assured me that the bill was an actual emergency; that during the war some regiment might have to march across the bridge, and they were in a hurry to get it built.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think that is a sufficient reason.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not wish to do violence to the understanding. I am opposed to reporting anything except necessary war measures. I think we ought to adjourn and go home as soon as we have arranged to whip Germany. I do not wish to violate any understanding, but this was precipitated on the House without any intention of mine. I did not place the bills on the calendar or expect them to be called. If it is not the wish of the House to consider these bills, it will receive the unanimous sanction of the committee.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of pressure being brought to bear on every committee to report bills. If one committee keeps faith, all ought to keep faith. I notice that there are eight bills reported from the gentleman's committee. We have had several bills which are said to be very important referred to the Indian Committee, but we have not called our committee for the reason that the Democratic caucus passed a resolution instructing us to report no bills out, except in pursuance of the war plans of the President.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will state that every bill reported out from our committee, except the little bridge bills, are administration measures that were presented to the committee as war measures.

Mr. MANN. And some have been pending for a year.

Mr. ADAMSON. They probably were apprehending war and believed in preparedness.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I shall be obliged to object.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I will reserve my objection.

Mr. MANN. Bridge bills are of a different character from almost every other bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. I was trying to say that.

Mr. MANN. We could leave to the War Department absolutely the control over bridge bills, and under ordinary cases, where some one wants to construct a bridge over a navigable stream, they have proceeded to a point where they are ready to do it before they find out that they have to have an act of Congress. We have passed bridge bills as a matter of course without controversy where there was nothing unusual involved in them. Here is a county that wants to build a bridge. It does not come within the class of general legislation that applies to anything else. I do not think there ought to be any objection. In previous Congresses at special sessions, where nothing else was done except to consider revenue measures, we still passed bridge bills by unanimous consent, and in some cases the committees had not been appointed at all.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman will withhold his objection, I would like to say that I have no bridge bill myself. Other gentlemen have these bills. As the gentleman from Illinois remarked, Members say there is an emergency in the locality of these bridges and it is important to them. At previous extra sessions, when nothing else practically was done, these little bridge bills were passed by the House. I would like to accommodate these gentlemen if the House is willing to do it. Every one we have reported has been with the understanding that they would not be called up if it was in violation of the wishes of the House.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. I understood that the caucus decided that bills were not to be reported at all, and there was no understanding that they were to be reported and not to be called up. If it is to be the policy of the House to report bills and not call them up in the House, we ought to know it right now.

Mr. MANN. The result of the caucus action has been that several gentlemen on the Democratic side of the House have been asking me if I would object, or if anybody in the House would object, to passing some bills by unanimous consent without having them reported by the committees.

Mr. FOSTER. They probably will not get a chance at that.

Mr. MANN. I am not anxious for the session to continue any longer than necessary.

Mr. ADAMSON. While we have not reported a single bridge bill without the statement that it was for an emergency. I would like to have it decided by the House if they do not wish to consider these bills.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. Reserving the right to object, I notice that there are 10 bills on the Union Calendar, 8 on the House Calendar, 1 on the Private Calendar, and 4 on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. Now, everybody in this House very well understands what unanimous consent means and what running the gantlet of unanimous consent means. I do not think the calendar ought to be cluttered up with any bills while this agreement is on and while this war business is on, and for the present I object to bridge bills or any other bills.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

Mr. MANN. I do not care anything about this, but if gentlemen on that side of the House are going to attempt to determine in the caucus what shall come up I shall object to everything by unanimous consent. Proceed with your caucus action. There will be no more unanimous consents.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma objects, and the Clerk will call the next bill.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT BEMIDJI, MINN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 1007) authorizing the city of Bemidji, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near that place.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

CAR SERVICE IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 328) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce, as amended, in respect to car service, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar. The Chair is informed that that is the last bill on the calendar.

STEAM YACHT "OWERA."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the objections that have been made, on the Private Calendar there is a bill (S. 1845) to authorize PETER GOELET GERRY to enter into a contract with the Secretary of the Navy, in behalf of the United States for the use of the steam yacht Owera, which bill has been reported by the Naval Committee. I desire to ask unanimous consent for its consideration. It is to allow Senator GERRY to present to the Government the use of his yacht for war purposes. There is a statute which prohibits a Member of Congress from entering into any agreement or contract with the Government, and this is to waive that and to allow him to turn over to the Government, without compensation, the use of his boat.

The SPEAKER. A special order was made Saturday to consider Senate joint resolution 42.

Mr. PADGETT. This would not take a minute, if the gentleman from Missouri would yield to me.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I do not know anything that would not take more than a minute. It would be hazarding much to say that it would not take more than a minute. Senate joint resolution 42 was made the special order to-day by unanimous consent, and while I am in favor of the bill presented by the gentleman from Tennessee, that is simply a bill permitting a private citizen to turn over his yacht for the use of the Government, whereas Senate joint resolution 42 is a resolution authorizing the President to take over the German ships interned in American waters—a matter of infinitely more importance.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that if anyone makes an inquiry I shall withdraw my request.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that I desire to make an inquiry suggested by the letter from the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. MANN. That has not been passed upon by the Democratic caucus, and I think I should have to object in view of what has taken place, and to all other requests for unanimous consent.

INTERNED GERMAN SHIPS.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration Senate joint resolution 42, authorizing the President to take over for the United States the possession and title of any vessel within its jurisdiction, which at the time of coming therein was owned in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen, or subject of any nation with which the United States may be at war, or was under register of any such nation, and for other purposes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the gentleman has to move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate joint resolution 42, and pending that motion I would like to have some agreement about the time of general debate. I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to an hour, to be confined to the subject matter of the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, personally with two or three other gentlemen who have spoken to me, I desire two hours and a half.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have requests for considerable time on this side.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker. I think we had better let general debate run along temporarily for a while.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate joint resolution 42, with Mr. BOOHER in the chair.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the resolution be dispensed with.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to object to that. We do not know yet what the Senate resolution is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to take over to the United States the immediate possession and title of any vessel within the jurisdiction thereof, including the Canal Zone and all territories and insular possessions of the United States except the American Virgin Islands, which at the time of coming into such jurisdiction was owned in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen, or subject of any nation with which the United States may be at war when such vessel shall be taken, or was flying the flag of or was under register of any such nation or any political subdivision or municipality thereof; and, through the United States Shipping Board, or any department or agency of the Government, to operate, lease, charter, and equip such vesssel in any service of the United States, or in any commerce, foreign or coastwise.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint, subject to the approval of the President, a board of survey, whose duty it shall be to ascertain the actual value of the vesssel, its equipment, appurtenances, and all property contained therein, at the time of its taking, and to make a written report of their findings to the Secretary of the Navy, who shall preserve such report with the records of his department. These findings shall be considered as competent evidence in all proceedings on any claim for compensation.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] introduced House joint resolution 62, which was referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries and was reported back to the House on the 1st day of May. As reported to the House, the text of House joint resolution 62 is the same as the text of Senate joint resolution 42 as it passed the Senate. Mr. Polk, at the first hearing before the House committee, was present and made a statement, and Mr. Woolsey, representing the Department of State, and Attorney General Gregory were before the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries at the second hearing. After hearing the statements made by these gentlemen, the committee agreed to strike out all of the subject matter of House joint resolution 62 and substitute, by way of amendment, the provisions in Senate joint resolution 42 as it passed the Senate. House joint resolution 62 as amended comes to the House with the unanimous approval of the committee. There are two propositions contained in the resolution.

First—

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to take over to the United States the immediate possession and title of any vessel within the jurisdiction thereof, including the Canal Zone and all Territories and insular possessions of the United States except the American Virgin Islands, which at the time of coming into such jurisdiction was owned in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen, or subject of any nation with which the United States may be at war when such vessel shall be taken, or was flying the flag or was under register of any such nation or any political subdivision or municipality thereof; and through the United States Shipping Board, or any department or agency of the Government, to operate, lease, charter, and equip such vessel in any service of the United States or in any commerce, foreign or coastwise.

The second proposition is this:

That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint, subject to the approval of the President, a board of survey, whose duty it shall be to ascertain the actual value of the vessel, its equipment, appurtenances, and all property contained therein at the time of its taking, and to make a written report of their findings to the Secretary of the Navy, who shall preserve such report with the records of his department. These findings shall be considered as competent evidence in all proceedings on any claim for compensation.

This resolution is intended to give the President authority to take over the immediate possession and title of the German refugee ships. These ships sought refuge in the harbors of the United States and of our insular possessions following the outbreak of the war in Europe, and are now within the jurisdiction of the United States.

Mr. RUSSELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would prefer to make a short statement first.

Mr. RUSSELL. Then after the gentleman gets through.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Between 600,000 and 700,000 tons of these ships, many of them very fine passenger ships and others freight ships, are in our harbors. They sought refuge in our harbors at the beginning of the war in Europe, and they were still in our harbors at the time we became parties to the war against Germany. They did not dare leave our ports for fear of capture by British and French cruisers hovering along our coasts. Many ships were more or less damaged by their officers and crews following our declaration of armed neutrality, presumably by order of the Imperial German Government. A survey of the vessels has been made, and repairs are proceeding with a view to their use in service of the United States at the earliest practical moment. They are now in the possession of the collectors of the ports in the several ports where they are now docked under orders issued by the Secretary of the Treasury.

It has been said that the President might have taken over possession of these vessels, seized them, confiscated them on behalf of the United States without action by Congress. I question whether it would have been proper for him to do so. I think the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States sustain the contrary view and that Congress should authorize that to be done.

That we have the right to take over the title to these vessels, to seize them, to confiscate them, I think is beyond question. It is not my purpose to discuss this matter at length, but I will call attention to the case of Brown against United States, Eighth Cranch, page 121, and particularly to the statement by Chief Justice Marshall as regards the right of the Government to seize or confiscate enemy ships:

Respecting the power of the Government no doubt is entertained. That war gives to the sovereign full right to take the persons and confiscate the property of the enemy wherever found is conceded. The mitigations of this rigid rule, which the humane and wise policy of modern times has introduced into practice, will more or less affect the exercise of this right, but can not impair the right itself. That remains undiminished, and when the sovereign authority shall choose to bring it into operation, the judicial department must give effect to its will. But until that will shall be expressed, no power of condemnation can exist in the court.

This is a case involving the title to a cargo of logs in which it was sought to condemn them, and the decision refers to that particular case.

Now, as to the right of the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy to exercise the war powers bestowed on him under the Constitution of the United States to take over these ships without the authority conferred by this joint resolution, I will call attention to this further statement in the same decision, page 125——

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly give us the citation and report?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is Brown against The United States, Eighth Cranch, page 125:

If we look to the Constitution itself, we find this general reasoning much strengthened by the words of that instrument. That the declaration of war has only the effect of placing the two nations in a state of hostility, of producing a state of war, of giving those rights which war confers; but not of operating by its own force any of those results, such as a transfer of property, which are usually produced by ulterior measures of government, is fairly deducible from the enumeration of powers which accompanies that of declaring war. "Congress shall have power to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water." It would be restraining this clause within narrower limits than the words themselves import to say that the power to make rules concerning captures on land and water is to be confined to captures which are ultra-territorial. If it extends to rules respecting enemy property found within the territory, then we perceive an express grant to Congress of the power in question, as an independent substantive power, not included in that of declaring war.

And again, quoting from the same decision:

The acts of Congress furnish many instances of an opinion that the declaration of war does not, of itself, authorize proceedings against the persons or property of the enemy found at the time within the territory. War gives an equal right over persons and property; and if its declaration is not considered as prescribing a law respecting the person of an enemy found in our country, neither does it prescribe a law for his property. The act concerning alien enemies which confers on the President very great discretionary powers respecting their persons, affords a strong implication that he did not possess those powers by virtue of the declaration of war.

Of course, we have solemnly declared that a condition of war exists between the United States and Germany.

Chief Justice Marshall further says:

The "act for the safe keeping and accommodation of prisoners of war," is of the same character. The act prohibiting trade with the enemy contains this clause: "And be it further enacted, that the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to give, at any time within six months after the passage of this act, passports for the safe transportation of any ship or other property belonging to British subjects, and which is now within the limits of the United States." This phraseology of this law shows that the property of a British subject was not considered by the legislature as being vested in the United States by the declaration of war; and the authority which the act confers on the President is manifestly considered as one which he did not previously possess.

This opinion of the Supreme Court in Brown against The United States is recognized and restated with approval by Henry Wheaton in Elements of International Law, fourth English edition, by J. B. Atlay, 1904, pages 425 and 428.

Section 303. During the war between the United States and Great Britain, which commenced in 1812, it was determined by the Supreme Court, that the enemy's property, found within the territory of the United States on the declaration of war, could not be seized and condemned as prize of war without some legislative act expressly authorizing its confiscation. The court held that the law of Congress declaring war was not such an act. That declaration did not, by its own operation, so vest the property of the enemy in the Government as to support judicial proceedings for its seizure and confiscation. It vested only a right to confiscate, the assertion of which depended on the will of the sovereign power.

The acts of Congress furnished many instances of an opinion that the declaration of war does not of itself authorize proceedings against the persons or property of the enemy found at the time within the territory.

* * * * * * *

The act prohibiting trade with the enemy contained this clause: "That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to give, at any time within six months after the passage of this act, passports for the safe transportation of any ship or other property belonging to British subjects, and which is now within the limits of the United States." (2 Stat., 780, sec. 6.)

In the light of these authorities the proposition that the declaration of war does not of itself vest the property of the enemy in the Government is entirely free from doubt. It is clear that it is necessary to pass this joint resolution in order to confer this power on the President of the United States to take over to the United States the possession and title of the vessels covered thereby.

Mr. FESS. Would it interrupt the gentleman if I should ask him a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will yield.

Mr. FESS. These ships are not owned by the German Government but by corporations of German citizens, as I understand it?

Mr. ALEXANDER. They belong in the most part to the Hamburg-American Steamship Co., which is a German corporation, and to the North German Lloyd Steamship Co., which is a German corporation, one I think of Hamburg and the other of Bremen.

Mr. FESS. As I understand it, there would be a difference if these ships were German property rather than the property of German citizens?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is, if they belonged to the Government; yes. I think seven of the ships that took refuge in our ports were of that character; that is, were German naval auxiliaries. They have already been seized and taken over by the Government, as I am informed, without awaiting the action of the Congress.

Mr. FESS. I want to ask the chairman this question: Can we assume that the destruction of the machinery in the ships was by order of the German Government?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Well, I do not know whether we will be warranted in that assumption or not, nor do I know how many ships were injured in that way. The effort to injure or destroy them may have been inspired by a determination on the part of their officers and crews not to let the ships fall into our hands in condition for use against their country. I understand generally—and my information is not very full and accurate, as I got it in an informal way—that some of these ships were not injured at all, except by the damage and depreciation by lying in the harbor and by becoming foul.

Mr. FESS. I think it is very clear in international law that if there was an attempt by the authority of the German Government to destroy the ships there would be no question of the President's right to take them over immediately without an act of Congress.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would be inclined to that view.

Now, the question has been raised as to whether or not we will violate any of our treaties with Germany in taking over these ships. It is a very serious question whether or not the treaties of 1785, 1799, and 1828, or any of the provisions of those treaties, are in force. Most of the provisions of those treaties relate to the duty of one nation to the other if one is involved in war, not with the other, but with some other nation.

Mr. FESS. That is right.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And I have read all the provisions of those treaties, and I would say that they have been violated in letter and in spirit by the German Government during the progress of this war, and the Imperial German Government could not consistently insist that the provisions of those treaties are now in force, as they have repeatedly violated them. But assuming that they are in full force and effect, which I might concede for the purpose of this argument, there is only one provision in those treaties that even remotely might be regarded as having a bearing upon this question, and that is article 23 of the treaty of 1799, which reads:

> If war should arise between the two contracting parties, the merchants of either country then residing in the other shall be allowed to remain nine months to collect their debts and settle their affairs and may depart freely, carrying off all their effects without molestation or hindrance. And all women and children, scholars of every faculty, cultivators of the earth, artisans, manufacturers, and fishermen, unarmed and inhabiting unfortified towns, villages, or places, and in general all others whose occupations are for the common subsistence and benefit of mankind shall be allowed to continue their respective employments and shall not be molested in their persons, nor shall their houses or goods be burnt or otherwise destroyed, nor their fields wasted by the armed force of the enemy into whose power by the events of war they may happen to fall; but if anything is necessary to be taken from them for the use of such armed force the same shall be paid for at a reasonable price.

That is the only provision of the treaty between Germany and ourselves that might even remotely refer to the status of enemies residing in the United States, and would not apply, in my opinion, to enemy property, such as the vessels in controversy, belonging to the enemy citizens resident in Germany.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will yield.

Mr. McKENZIE. The gentleman has stated that the German Imperial Government has violated, both in letter and in spirit, some of the sections of the treaties we have with the Imperial German Government. Now, to the end that the Members of the House and the country may have that information, will the gentleman cite one or more instances showing such violation?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Well, if the gentleman will read the provisions of the treaties I think the information will occur to him at once.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. But if the gentleman will pardon me, I am not seeking for my own information.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The treaties were drawn on broad and humane lines, as you will see by reading them. It is my purpose to incorporate those provisions relating to Germany's duty toward us as a neutral as part of my remarks.

Mr. TOWNER. If the gentleman will yield——

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would like to finish my statement in reference to these treaties, if the gentleman will pardon me.

Now, when Mr. Polk was before the committee he was asked which treaty, if any, applied to the facts in this case. In other words, if to take over these ships as proposed by this joint resolution it would violate any of the provisions of our treaties with Germany. I will read part of the letter which the Secretary of State wrote to the President on that subject, as follows:

> It may be argued that the treaties of 1828, 1799, and 1785 would be violated by requisitioning the German refugee vessels. The only stipulation of those treaties bearing on this point is article 23 of the treaty of 1799, providing in case of war "the merchants of either country then residing in the other shall be allowed to remain nine months to collect their debts and settle their affairs and may depart freely, carrying off all their effects, without molestation or hindrance." As most of the German vessels are owned by nonresident German corporations, with only operating agents here, only two or three vessels lying in our insular ports being possibly owned by Germans residing there, it would seem that this stipulation of the treaty would as a practical matter have little application to vessels in the United States ports.

Now I will answer the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. I was just going to say that certainly there is very high authority in international law for the proposition that when there is a declaration of war as between two governments that have an existing treaty the declaration of war itself is an abrogation of the treaty. Certainly in this case, if there were treaty provisions existing of the nature and character referred to here, it could not take away from this country the rights which she would otherwise have under international law of taking over the vessels, and, of course, being responsible for such obligations arising therefrom at the end of the war as international law would recognize.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Well, I would say that if we had a treaty with another nation making provision for the rights of our respective citizens in the event of war, and war should ensue, that would not abrogate the provisions of that treaty; else it would be a work of supererogation to enter into these treaty stipulations.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. With reference to the statement of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], would anybody claim that where you make a treaty which itself by language expressly provides that it is made mainly to be in effect in time of war, that treaty would be abrogated by war?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I should think not.

Mr. MANN. That is the case with this treaty. It expressly says it is not to be abrogated by war, because it was made mainly to be in effect in time of war if war should come.

Mr. TOWNER. I did not say that that was my contention. I said there was very high authority in international law on the proposition. This was the proposition: That if there was a provision which by implication might take away from us the right to exercise what otherwise we would have the right to exercise under this international law, certainly we would not hesitate to exercise our general rights under general law at this time.

Mr. MANN. That is an academic proposition upon which we would probably all agree, but it has nothing to do with this case.

Mr. TOWNER. That may be true.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield.

Mr. HICKS. Did it come to your notice, or to the notice of the committee, whether or not any large financial institutions of this country had loaned money on any of these ships?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Not directly. I think it was Mr. Polk, counselor for the State Department, who stated before the committee that he had information to the effect that some trust company in New York had advanced about $2,000,000, I think, to the Hamburg-American Line to defray necessary expenses, including upkeep, since the vessels were interned in the port of New York.

Mr. HICKS. Since they were interned?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. About $2,000,000?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; and perhaps this sum was secured by chattel mortgage or some other form of lien against these vessels.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield.

Mr. MANN. The press at various times had indicated or stated that some of these interned ships have been sold to American citizens. Does the gentleman know whether or not that that is the case?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not.

Mr. MANN. The press has stated that not only some of them had been sold but that some of them when sold had been seized by the British Government, but I suppose they are not now in the territorial waters of the United States. Does the gentleman believe that, if in good faith American citizens have purchased some of these interned ships, the Government now ought to seize them and take them away from those owners without making compensation?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think it was Mr. Polk also who made the statement that four or five of these vessels, as he understood, had been sold to the Atlas Co. The Atlas Co. is an American corporation, but I think he stated that the stock in the company is owned by German citizens or subjects.

Mr. MANN. Well, stock in the New York Central Railroad is owned by German citizens, too.

Mr. ALEXANDER. How?

Mr. MANN. And stock in the United States Steel Corporation is also owned by German citizens.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The stock is owned in Germany, as I understand it, and to all intents and purposes the status of the vessels is not changed.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Government of the United States is now going to seize the stock of companies in this country owned by German citizens? If not, I do not see what the remark of the gentleman has to do with it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; the Government is not going to seize the stock but the vessels. This resolution applies to the status of these vessels that have come into our ports under the German flag and are within our jurisdiction.

Now, as regards the equities and liens of these companies for advances, and these other questions involved, this resolution does not undertake to treat of those questions at all.

Mr. MANN. No; but it takes the ships and title without compensation.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; and we have the right to take the ships and title without compensation, too.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is a constitutional question. I do not agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If they have any equities, they must be adjusted hereafter, just like the equities of the German owners, if we pursue the time-honored policy of our Government on the conclusion of the war, or later.

Mr. MANN. Yes; "later" is well said.

Mr. ALEXANDER. We could compensate the Hamburg-American and the North German Lloyd Steamship Companies for these ships; if we pursue our policy in the future as in the past we will compensate these owners for these vessels, but at this time, early in the war, and with conditions changing from day to day, the equities shifting, it will be time enough, in the view of the Senate and in the view of the administration and in the view of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to adjust these equities after peace has been declared, because in the meantime we will no doubt have property destroyed; we will have counter claims against Germany; and it will be time enough to do so then.

Mr. MANN. What I want to get at is the question of fact, whether it is the intention under this bill to seize possession and title without making present compensation of vessels which have been sold by their German owners to American citizens?

Mr. ALEXANDER. There was not a particle of evidence before the committee that any vessels had been sold.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether there have been any sold. I know that the newspapers have constantly made that statement.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Polk said he had heard that, too.

Mr. MANN. What would Mr. Polk know about it? Who is Mr. Polk, by the way?

Mr. ALEXANDER. He is counselor for the State Department. Well, it was none of our business to have the parties at interest come before our committee, and there was no evidence before the committee to that effect, and we did not think it was our business to go out and look for it.

Mr. MANN. Why do you put a provision in the bill that permits that to be done? Why not except such a case? Unless the gentleman intends deliberately to seize vessels now belonging to American citizens, acquired in good faith, why not have the bill so state?

Mr. ALEXANDER. There was not a particle of evidence before the committee that they belonged to American citizens or that they had been purchased by them.

Mr. MANN. I do not suppose there was much evidence at all before the committee.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Hence there was no reason to put any such thing in the bill. Mr. Sickel, American agent of the Hamburg-American Line, called on me and wanted to know what provision would be made to pay the Hamburg-American Co. for these vessels. He never stated that anybody had purchased any of these ships.

Mr. MANN. Probably he had not sold any of them.

Mr. ALEXANDER. He did not state that any American citizen was the owner of any of these ships. He should know.

Mr. MANN. He was not the only pebble on the beach.

Mr. ALEXANDER. These are Hamburg-American ships that the newspapers are talking about.

Mr. MANN. I think not. That is not my recollection of it. However, will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Why is the exception made in the case of the Danish West India Islands, or the American Virgin Islands, as they are now properly called?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The Attorney General made a statement about that, and I will ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] to recall it, if he can.

Mr. WEBB. I understand that our State Department had a special arrangement with the Danish Government——

Mr. MANN. What is the special arrangement?

Mr. WEBB. That none of these vessels which were at the Virgin Islands should be confiscated or taken.

Mr. MANN. How was that arrangement made?

Mr. WEBB. That was not stated before the committee, but the substance of the statement was what I have repeated.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman think we are entitled to know how it was made? It is not in the treaty, as far as I can find.

Mr. WEBB. That was the statement before the committee of which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] is chairman—that when those islands were taken over an exemption was made as to these ships that were in the harbor. There are very few of them—only two or three small ships. The matter involved, so far as these ships are concerned, amounts to very little.

Mr. MANN. Another case of acting without knowledge or information.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I just want to say in this connection that the lists of German ships in American waters does not include any in the Danish West Indies.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield first to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. With reference to possible American ownership of these ships, I would like to ask the gentleman whether it is not true that if these vessels are still of enemy register, still flying the German flag, American ownership can not in the least affect our right to take them over.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think that is correct.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand from the gentleman's statement, these ships were seized by the United States, and have been in the possession of the United States from that time to the present, and if there was any contract made with some third party, I want to ask the gentleman, did possession follow that contract?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It did not.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me that if it was a mere contract, and if possession did not follow, it could not constitute a sale as against the rights of the United States.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think the gentleman is correct. In the first place these vessels were taken over by the collector of the port under the orders of the Treasury Department, and have been in the possession of the Government ever since the declaration of war.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Since what time?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Since the declaration of war.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Since our declaration of war a few weeks ago?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But previous to that they were simply here as guests.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Simply for their own protection.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They were not seized or taken possession of at all?

Mr. ALEXANDER. They were simply interned, or made our ports places of refuge.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY. In the line of the last suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]; that is, as to the exception in regard to the American Virgin Islands, that exception is in conformity with the terms of an agreement, as I understand it, with the Government formerly owning the Virgin Islands, and that agreement was made when they transferred those islands to our Government?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That was the explanation made by the Attorney General.

Mr. MADDEN. Was that agreement outside of the treaty?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not know as to that. The treaty will show for itself about that.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan for a question.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I simply want to ask the gentleman, as bearing upon the treaty provisions relating to these ships which are said to be at the American Virgin Islands, would it not be possible before action is taken upon this bill to get from the Attorney General a statement in writing, so as to clear up all question in that behalf?

Mr. ALEXANDER. This bill does not affect the vessels in those islands.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. They are excepted, and the question has been asked why they are excepted, and the gentleman has made a statement in relation to it and has turned also to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] for an answer to the inquiry; and I was simply asking whether it might not be possible before the debate is concluded to have a statement from the Attorney General setting forth the reasons why the committee takes the action it does. Otherwise we shall not know what the information of the Attorney General is.

Mr. WEBB. My recollection is that the agreement between the United States and Denmark in taking over the Virgin Islands provided that all ships that were then in the harbor should remain the property and in the possession of the then owners. That is why this exception is put in. This was agreed upon by our State Department and the Danish Government.

Mr. MANN. Where is that in the treaty?

Mr. WEBB. That was the statement of the Attorney General, who said that that was the agreement between the two Governments.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman has never undertaken to look at the treaty?

Mr. WEBB. I think there are but three vessels, and I do not think they are worth very much.

Mr. MANN. That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The gentleman states that this was not a treaty provision, as I understand?

Mr. WEBB. It was the understanding when the islands were turned over to the United States.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. But it was not incorporated in the treaty?

Mr. WEBB. Not that I know of. It was so stated by the State Department, that that was the understanding.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. It is an agreement separate from the treaty, and the gentleman does not know whether that was in writing or not.

Mr. WEBB. I do not know; but I understand that it was agreed by letter between the two Governments, and without such agreement the deal or sale might have been blocked by Germany and Denmark greatly embarrassed.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that the list of German vessels is given in the report; the vessels in the Danish West India Islands were not in our possession, and I would think the status of the vessels in those islands would be fixed in our treaty with Denmark.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SABATH. I desire to ask the gentleman, in view of the statements made by my colleague from Illinois, if it is not a fact that from the beginning of the war, and a good many months thereafter, Great Britain refused to sanction the sale of any of these vessels belonging to Germany and Austria, and later on Germany forbade its subjects to transfer or sell any of the vessels belonging to her citizens, and consequently none of them could have been sold?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I can not state what the fact is about that.

Mr. MANN. We can not sell anything without the permission of Great Britain.

Mr. SABATH. Great Britain would not have recognized the sale, and for that reason there was no one to buy and no one to sell, because later the German Government refused to sanction the sale of any of the vessels.

Mr. ALEXANDER. All that is quite apart from the issue here. We are at war with Germany and these are German ships in American ports. We have a right to seize them and confiscate them if we wish to do so. The equities as between us and private owners can be left to be adjusted hereafter.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is my understanding, and I want to know if my view is confirmed by the gentleman from Missouri, who is better informed than I am—with reference to German vessels in the Virgin Islands, and the question that has arisen out of that—is it not true that they sought refuge in the Virgin Islands while those islands were a part of the sovereignty of the King of Denmark, and we assumed morally an obligation that they had protected these people who came there under the custom of nations, and that that moral obligation passed to us when the islands were sold?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I understand that to be true, and I understand that to be the view of the department which prompted the exception in this resolution.

Mr. SLAYDEN. An international courtesy to recognize the obligation which rested on the islands at the time we took them over?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; if they were not covered by treaty. There are only two or three vessels of small value, as I understand.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have seen it stated in the paper that there were two or three vessels.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is my understanding. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied 19 minutes.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman answer a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. ROBBINS. What is the probable liability of the United States for these ships so seized?

Mr. ALEXANDER. None at all.

Mr. ROBBINS. If we answer later in damages, what is the liability?

Mr. ALEXANDER. None at all.

Mr. ROBBINS. Then the gentleman thinks we never will be called upon to pay for these ships?

Mr. ALEXANDER. If we do it will not be a legal liability, but on account of the policy of the Government in the past to recognize claims of private parties.

Mr. ROBBINS. The gentleman stated that a part of these ships were owned by corporations organized by Germans in the United States.

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; I stated just the contrary; they are owned by German corporations incorporated in Germany.

Mr. ROBBINS. I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE], a while ago, called my attention to my statement that the German Imperial Government had violated both the letter and spirit of our treaties with Germany and asked me to cite instances.

I assume that he did not mean to assert that my statement is not accurate, or fully supported by the events occurring since August, 1914, when the war in Europe began.

It is beyond controversy that vessels under the American flag have been sunk and their cargoes lost, and, what is of infinitely greater concern, the lives of hundreds of Americans have been taken in the ruthless submarine warfare carried on by the Kaiser's Government indiscriminately against the merchant vessels of belligerents and neutrals alike. I need not enter into particulars; they are known—well known to all.

A casual reading of the provisions of our treaties of 1785, 1799, and 1828 with Prussia, and the terms and obligations of which the Imperial German Government had recognized and was bound to observe and keep, will bear out and confirm in the broadest and fullest sense the accuracy of my statement.

That the Congress and the country may have their attention called to the provisions of the treaties to which I refer, I will incorporate them in my remarks. They are as follows:

ARTICLES IN TREATIES BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND GERMANY RELATING TO WAR AND NEUTRALITY.

TREATY OF 1785 WITH PRUSSIA.

(The articles quoted from these treaties were revived by Article XII of the treaty of 1828.)

ARTICLE XII. If one of the contracting parties should be engaged in war with any other power, the free intercourse and commerce of the subjects or citizens of the party remaining neutral with the belligerent powers shall not be interrupted. On the contrary, in that case, as in full peace, the vessels of the neutral party may navigate freely to and from the ports and on the coasts of the belligerent parties, free vessels making free goods, insomuch that all things shall be adjudged free which shall be on board any vessel belonging to the neutral party, although such things belong to an enemy of the other; and the same freedom shall be extended to persons who shall be on board a free vessel although they should be enemies of the other party, unless they be soldiers in actual service of such enemy.

TREATY OF 1799 WITH PRUSSIA.

(The articles quoted from these treaties were revived by Article XII of the treaty of 1828.)

ARTICLE XIII. And in the same case of one of the contracting parties being engaged in war with any other power, to prevent all the difficulties and misunderstandings that usually arise respecting merchandise of contraband, such as arms, ammunition, and military stores of every kind, no such articles carried in the vessels or by the subjects or citizens of either party to the enemies of the other shall be deemed contraband so as to induce confiscation or condemnation and a loss of property to individuals. Nevertheless it shall be lawful to stop such vessels and articles and to detain them for such length of time as the captors may think necessary to prevent the inconvenience or damage that might ensue from their proceeding, paying, however, a reasonable compensation for the loss such arrest shall occasion to the proprietors; and it shall further be allowed to use in the service of the captors the whole or any part of the military stores so detained, paying the owners the full value of the same, to be ascertained by the current price at the place of its destination. But in the case supposed of a vessel stopped for articles of contraband, if the master of the vessel stopped will deliver out the goods supposed to be of contraband nature, he shall be admitted to do it, and the vessel shall not in that case be carried into any port nor further detained, but shall be allowed to proceed on her voyage.

All cannons, mortars, firearms, pistols, bombs, grenades, bullets, balls, muskets, flints, matches, powder, saltpeter, sulphur, cuirasses, pikes, swords, belts, cartouch boxes, saddles and bridles, beyond the quantity necessary for the use of the ship or beyond that which every man serving on board the vessel, or passenger, ought to have, and, in general, whatever is comprised under the denomination of arms and military stores, of what description soever, shall be deemed objects of contraband.

ARTICLE XIV. To insure to the vessels of the two contracting parties the advantage of being readily and certainly known in time of war, it is agreed that they shall be provided with the sea letters and documents hereafter specified:

1. A passport, expressing the name, the property, and the burthen of the vessel, as also the name and dwelling of the master, which passport shall be made out in good and due form, shall be renewed as often as the vessel shall return into port, and shall be exhibited whensoever required, as well in the open sea as in port. But if the vessel be under convoy of one or more vessels of war belonging to the neutral party, the simple declaration of the officer commanding the convoy that the said vessel belongs to the party of which he is shall be considered as establishing the fact and shall relieve both parties from the trouble of further examination.

2. A charter party; that is to say, the contract passed for the freight of the whole vessel, or the bills of lading given for the cargo in detail.

3. The list of the ship's company, containing an indication by name and in detail of the persons composing the crew of the vessel. These documents shall always be authenticated according to the forms established at the place from which the vessel shall have sailed.

As their production ought to be exacted only when one of the contracting parties shall be at war, and as their exhibition ought to have no other object than to prove the neutrality of the vessel, its cargo, and company, they shall not be deemed absolutely necessary on board such vessels belonging to the neutral party as shall have sailed from its ports before or within three months after the Government shall have been informed of the state of war in which the belligerent party shall be engaged. In the interval, in default of these specific documents, the neutrality of the vessel may be established by such other evidence as the tribunals authorized to judge of the case may deem sufficient.

ART. XV. And to prevent entirely all disorder and violence in such cases it is stipulated that, when the vessels of the neutral party, sailing without convoy, shall be met by any vessels of war, public or private, of the other party, such vessel of war shall not send more than two or three men in their boat on board the said neutral vessel to examine her passports and documents. And all persons belonging to any vessel of war, public or private, who shall molest or insult in any manner whatever the people, vessels, or effects of the other party shall be responsible in their persons and property for damages and interest, sufficient security for which shall be given by all commanders of private armed vessels before they are commissioned.

ART. XVI. In times of war, or in cases of urgent necessity, when either of the contracting parties shall be obliged to lay a general embargo, either in all its ports or in certain particular places, the vessels of the other party shall be subject to this measure, upon the same footing as those of the most favored nations, but without having the right to claim the exemption in their favor stipulated in the sixteenth article of the former treaty of 1785. But, on the other hand, the proprietors of the vessels which shall have been detained, whether for some military expedition or for what other use soever, shall obtain from the Government that shall have employed them an equitable indemnity, as well for the freight as for the loss occasioned by the delay. And furthermore, in all cases of seizure, detention, or arrest, for debts contracted or offenses committed by any citizen or subject of the one party within the jurisdiction of the other, the same shall be made and prosecuted by order and authority of law only, and according to the regular course of proceedings usual in such cases.

Mr. Chairman, attention has been called to the fact that the joint resolution under consideration does not make any provision for payment for the vessels, the possession and title of which the President is authorized to take over to the United States. The failure of the committee to do so was not the result of oversight. In section 2 of the joint resolution we do make provision for the survey and valuation of the vessels. The rights of the owners and all intervening equities are left for the consideration of the Congress at some future time.

The ruthless destruction of our merchant shipping and the loss of American lives by the German submarines still goes on and will, no doubt, continue until the end of the war. We have just claims against the German Imperial Government for sinking our vessels and the loss of American lives in disregard of our treaty rights and in disregard of our well-established rights under international laws. More than 100 lives of American citizens were lost when the Lusitania was sunk by a German submarine in utter disregard of every principle of international law, and in my opinion it will be time enough when the present deplorable conflict shall have ended, and in the consideration and adjustment of the equities between our Government and the German Imperial Government, and between our citizens and the citizens and subjects of the German Imperial Government to adjust all the claims growing out of the war.

I would not entertain the thought for one moment that we will depart from time-honored and enlightened righteous policy that has marked our intercourse with other nations, and their citizens and subjects. And in this connection, as it illustrates what I have in mind, it may be well to call attention to The Hague Convention of 1907, and the reasons assigned by the delegates of the United States for not signing it:

THE HAGUE CONVENTION VI (1907) RELATING TO THE RIGHTS OF ENEMY MERCHANT SHIPS AT THE OUTBREAK OF HOSTILITIES AND REPORT OF THE DELEGATES OF THE UNITED STATES GIVING THE REASONS FOR NOT SIGNING IT.

(Signed Oct. 18, 1907.)

NOTE.—The United States delegates did not sign this convention. The reasons for this are given in the appended report.

His Majesty the German Emperor, King of Prussia [etc.]:

Anxious to ensure the security of international commerce against the surprises of war, and wishing, in accordance with modern practice, to protect as far as possible operations undertaken in good faith and in process of being carried out before the outbreak of hostilities, have resolved to conclude a convention to this effect, and have appointed the following persons as their plenipotentiaries:

[Here follow the names of plenipotentiaries.]

Who, after having deposited their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed upon the following provisions:

ARTICLE 1.

When a merchant ship belonging to one of the belligerent powers is at the commencement of hostilities in an enemy port, it is desirable that it should be allowed to depart freely, either immediately or after a reasonable number of days of grace, and to proceed, after being furnished with a pass, direct to its port of destination or any other port indicated.

The same rule should apply in the case of a ship which has left its last port of departure before the commencement of the war and entered a port belonging to the enemy while still ignorant that hostilities had broken out.

ARTICLE 2.

A merchant ship unable, owing to circumstances of force majeure, to leave the enemy port within the period contemplated in the above article or which was not allowed to leave, can not be confiscated.

The belligerent may only detain it, without payment of compensation, but subject to the obligation of restoring it after the war or requisition it on payment of compensation.

ARTICLE 3.

(For reservations of Germany and Russia, see below.)

Enemy merchant ships which left their last port of departure before the commencement of the war and are encountered on the high seas while still ignorant of the outbreak of hostilities can not be confiscated. They are only liable to detention on the understanding that they shall be restored after the war without compensation, or to be requisitioned, or even destroyed, on payment of compensation, but in such cases provision must be made for the safety of the persons on board as well as the security of the ship's papers.

After touching at a port in their own country or at a neutral port, these ships are subject to the laws and customs of maritime war.

Enemy cargo on board the vessels referred to in articles 1 and 2 is likewise liable to be detained and restored after the termination of the war without payment of compensation, or to be requisitioned on payment of compensation, with or without the ship.

The same rule applies in the case of cargo on board the vessels referred to in article 3. (For reservations of Germany and Russia, see below.)

ARTICLE 5.

The present convention does not affect merchant ships whose build shows that they are intended for conversion into warships.

ARTICLE 6.

The provisions of the present convention do not apply except between contracting powers, and then only if all the belligerents are parties to the convention.

EXTRACT FROM REPORT OF THE DELEGATES OF THE UNITED STATES.

(60th Cong., 1st sess. S. Doc. No. 444, pp. 38–40.)

VI.—CONVENTION REGARDING THE ENEMY'S SHIPS OF COMMERCE AT THE BEGINNING OF HOSTILITIES.

The uninterrupted practice of belligerent powers since the outbreak of the Crimean War has been to allow enemy merchant vessels in their ports at the outbreak of hostilities to depart on their return voyages. The same privilege has been accorded to enemy merchant vessels which sailed before the outbreak of hostilities to enter and depart from a belligerent port without molestation on the homeward voyage. It was therefore the view of the American delegation that the privilege had acquired such international force as to place it in the category of obligations. Such, indeed, was the view of a majority of the conference; but as the delegation of Great Britain adhered to the opinion that such free entry and departure was a matter of grace or favor, and not one of strict right, the articles regard it as a delay by way of favor and refer to the practice as desirable.

In support of the American view, the case of the Buena Ventura is in point. This case was decided in 1899, and in his opinion Justice Peckham says:

"It being plain that merchant vessels of the enemy carrying on innocent commercial enterprises at the time or just prior to the time when hostilities between the two countries broke out would, in accordance with the later practice of civilized nations, be the subject of liberal treatment by the Executive, it is necessary when his proclamation has been issued which lays down rules for treatment of merchant vessels to put upon the words used therein the most liberal and extensive interpretation of which they are capable; and where there are two or more interpretations which possibly might be put upon the language, the one that will be most favorable to the belligerent party, in whose favor the proclamation is issued, ought to be adopted.

"This is the doctrine of the English courts, as exemplified in The Phœnix (Spink's Prize Cases, 1, 5) and The Argo (Id., p. 52). It is the doctrine which this court believes to be proper and correct. The Buena Ventura" (175 U. S., 388).

At the first reading, the convention seems to confer a privilege upon enemy ships at the outbreak of war. Free entry and departure are provided for, ships are not to be molested on their return voyages, and a general immunity from capture is granted to vessels from their last port of departure, whether hostile or neutral. But all these immunities are conditioned upon ignorance of the existence of hostilities on the part of the ship. This condition forms no part of the existing practice, and it was the opinion of the delegation that it substantially neutralized the apparent benefits of the treaty and puts merchant shipping in a much less favorable situation than is accorded to it by the international practice of the last 50 years.

An enemy merchant vessel approaching a hostile port which is notified by an armed cruiser, or which obtains the information under circumstances calculated to charge it with knowledge of the fact that hostilities exist, forfeits the immunities conferred by the treaty and becomes eo instante, liable to capture. As the freight trade of the world is carried on in steamers which habitually carry only enough coal to reach their destination, the operation of the treaty is to render them instantly liable to capture, the alternative being to continue to the hostile destination and surrender.

The convention operates powerfully in favor of a State having a predominant naval force and possessed of numerous ports throughout the world, so situated that a merchant vessel carrying its flag may take refuge in such ports on being notified that hostilities exist. All other powers would be placed in a position of great disadvantage, and their merchant marine would suffer incalculable injury as the result of its adoption.

The effects upon the practice of marine insurance are also important. The ordinary contract does not cover a war risk. The operation of a war risk is simply because its conditions and incidents are fully known. But a policy calculated to cover the contingency of capture, the risk of depending upon the chance or possibility of notification would introduce an element of uncertainty into marine risks which, in view of the interests at stake, should not be encouraged.

The convention also presents an undesirable alternative in the treatment of enemy merchant ships, in that it provides that in certain cases they may be seized "subject to restoration after the war without indemnity" or to "immediate requisition with indemnity." As merchant-marine commerce is carried on it is obvious that the condition of the cargo which is detained in indifferent or inefficient custodianship during the ordinary duration of war would approach confiscation. It would also be substantially impossible to make such a risk the subject of a practicable contract of insurance.

The foregoing convention was not signed by the delegation, and its acceptance as a conventional obligation is not recommended.

Mr. Chairman, as the questions involved are of the greatest interest at this time I beg to call attention to extracts from international-law authorities as regards the status of enemy merchant ships in port at outbreak of war.

I would not be understood, however, as taking the position that these principles may be applied to the German and Austrian ships which have taken refuge in our ports since the outbreak of the war in Europe. Their status is somewhat peculiar.

At the time they came into our ports we were a neutral nation. They sought our ports for protection from the British and French fleets. So far as we are concerned, the German and Austrian merchant vessels were free to depart and, for that matter, return at will, but they did not dare do so, for fear of capture by the British and French fleets.

They might have departed immediately following our declaration that a state of war existed between our Nation and Germany, but did not undertake to do so, and no doubt for the reasons stated, and for the added reason that immediately upon our declaration in February last that we would pursue a policy of armed neutrality, many of these vessels were disabled to the extent that they were no longer in a seaworthy condition.

In determining the status of these ships and the rights of the German corporations understood to be their owners to claim compensation for them, if taken over by our Government, it may be important to inquire whether or not the attempted destruction and damage done to these vessels by their officers and crews was by order of the German Imperial Government, but these are questions for future consideration.

ENEMY MERCHANT VESSELS IN PORT AT OUTBREAK OF WAR—EXTRACTS FROM INTERNATIONAL-LAW AUTHORITIES.

(See also Moore's Digest of International Law, vol. 7, pp. 453–456, 459; Scott, James Brown, The Hague peace conference of 1899 and 1907, vol. 1, pp. 556–568.)

1. THE STATUS OF ENEMY MERCHANT SHIPS AT OUTBREAK OF HOSTILITIES.

When no distinction was made in theory and practice between the status of private property of the enemy upon land and upon sea, it necessarily followed that such property was liable to seizure and confiscation wherever found. If upon land, it would naturally fall prey to an invading army and be appropriated to a public use or claimed as the booty of the commander or camp follower. If the private property of the enemy were within the jurisdiction or control of the other belligerent, it could easily be confiscated by actual seizure or legislative enactment. The gradual immunity extended to private property of the enemy upon land, reserving always the right to subject it to requisition or to contribution, creates a distinction between the rights of capture and confiscation unless the principle of immunity be equally extended to unoffending private property of the enemy upon the high seas. As the immunity in the latter case, however acceptable in theory, has not been recognized in practice, it follows that, whether logical or illogical, the distinction exists and must be borne in mind in discussing the status of the enemy and enemy property.

It may be stated that international law recognizes as a general principle that private property of the enemy upon land is, within certain limitations, not necessary for the present discussion, exempt from capture and confiscation. It is equally true that private property of the enemy upon the high seas is subject to capture, and the determination of the situation of the property determines at once its liability to or its exemption from capture. An enemy merchant ship is therefore liable to capture if found within the zone of naval operations, unless special rules and regulations exempt it from the treatment recognized and permitted by international law. The situation of the merchant vessel would seem in theory to be unimportant, because the right of capture is recognized, but, as a matter of fact, custom, which is the very life of the law, treats differently property situated in an enemy port at the outbreak of hostilities and private property of the enemy upon the high seas. Therefore it is advisable in discussing the general subject to consider, first, the status of enemy merchant vessels found in port upon the breaking out of hostilities, and, second, to discuss the status of enemy merchant vessels found upon the high seas upon the breaking out of war.

If an enemy merchant vessel moored to the wharf or found within the territorial waters of the other belligerent were regarded not only within the jurisdiction of the belligerent but as thoroughly subject to his jurisdiction as other private property of the enemy found upon the land, there could be in theory no rational distinction between the property and the treatment to be accorded to it. Merchant ships of the enemy are not, however, assimilated to private property upon land, but the tendency of custom is to give to them greater rights and privileges than other property found elsewhere upon the outbreak of hostilities. In former times enemy merchant vessels found in the harbor or within the territorial waters were subject to capture, and when hostilities seemed imminent an embargo was placed upon such property, so that departure would be illegal and would subject it to seizure or confiscation. The result would be that upon the outbreak of war the property would be seized and passed before a court as legitimate prize. The older law is briefly stated in the case of Lindo v. Rodney (1781 Douglas, 615), in which Lord Mansfield said:

"Ships not knowing of hostilities come in by mistake; upon the declaration of war or hostilities, all the ships of the enemy are detained in our ports, to be confiscated as the property of the enemy, if no reciprocal agreement is made."

The policy and reasoning by which it was sought to support seizure and confiscation are set forth in the case of the Boedes Lust (1803, 5 C.; Robinson, 245), tried and condemned before the great Lord Stowell, when Sir William Scott. A Dutch ship on a voyage from Demerara to Batavia, embargoed at the Cape of Good Hope by a British squadron before the actual declaration of war against Holland in 1803, was afterwards condemned as enemy's property. In passing judgment Lord Stowell said:

"This was the state of the first seizure. It was at first equivocal; and if the matter in dispute had terminated in reconciliation, the seizure would have been converted into a mere civil embargo. That would have been the retroactive effect of that course of circumstances. On the contrary, if the transactions end in hostility, the retroactive effect is directly the other way. It impressed the hostile character upon the original seizure. It is declared to be no embargo; it is no longer an equivocal act, subject to two interpretations; there is a declaration of the animus, by which it was done, that it was done hostili animo, and is to be considered as an hostile measure ab initio. The property taken is liable to be used as the property of persons, trespassers ab initio, and guilty of injuries, which they have refused to redeem by any amicable alteration of their measures. This is the necessary course, if no particular compact intervenes for the restitution of such property taken before a formal declaration of hostilities. No such convention is set up on either side, and the State, by directing proceedings against this property for condemnation, has signified a contrary intention. Accordingly the general mass of Dutch property has been condemned on this retroactive effect; and this property stands upon the same footing."

However artificial, illogical, or unjust we may consider the reasons advanced by Lord Stowell, the case of the Boedes Lust was unquestioned law and actual practice. As late as 1854 Dr. Lushington could say:

"With regard to an enemy's property coming to any part of the Kingdom, or being found there, being seizable, I confess I am astonished that doubt should exist on the subject. I apprehend the law has been this, that it is competent for any person to take possesion of such property, unless it had any protection by license or by some declaration emanating by the authority of the Crown, and to assist the Crown to proceed against it to adjudication." (Johanna Emilie, Spinks, 14, 1854.)

As Prof. John Bassett Moore says in his monumental International Law Digest:

"It was formerly the practice not only to seize enemy vessels in port at the outbreak of war, but also to lay an embargo upon them in expectation of war, so that if war should come they might be confiscated. A rule of precisely the opposite effect has been enforced in recent wars." (Moore, Digest of International Law, Vol. VII, sec. 1196, p. 453.)

The innovation came from a quarter in which it was least expected, for on October 4, 1853, Turkey said, in its declaration of war against Russia:

"The sublime porte does not consider it just that, agreeable to ancient usage, an embargo should be laid upon Russian merchant vessels. Accordingly they will be warned to proceed within a period to be fixed hereafter to the Black Sea or to the Mediterranean, as they choose."

The Christian governments did not lag behind the followers of Mahomet. The Russian Government granted full liberty to Turkish vessels in its ports to return to their destination till the 10th (22d) of November. On March 27, 1854, France issued the following declaration:

"ARTICLE 1. Six weeks from the present date are granted to Russian ships of commerce to quit the ports of France. Those Russian ships which are not actually in our ports, or which may have left the ports of Russia previously to the declaration of war, may enter into French ports and remain there for the completion of their cargoes until the 9th of May, inclusive."

Great Britain issued a similar declaration on March 29, 1854. Further indulgences were afterward allowed to Russian vessels which had sailed for English and French ports prior to May 15, 1854, and Russia on its part allowed English and French vessels six weeks from April 25, 1854, to load their cargoes and sail from Russian ports in the Black Sea, the Sea of Azof, and the Baltic, and six weeks from the opening of navigation to leave the ports of the White Sea. (Halleck, International Law (3d ed., by Baker), Vol. I, 552, 553, Note.)

We thus see that the right of capture and confiscation was recognized in the Crimean War, but following the initiative of the Turkish Government, the great maritime States of Great Britain, France, and Russia, while recognizing the right, limited it in such a way as to free from capture and confiscation enemy merchant ships found in their respective ports, and to give them a certain time within which to unload their cargo and proceed to their ports of destination. Capture is always a harsh measure, but it seems peculiarly harsh to capture and confiscate merchant vessels whose owners did not or could not know of the outbreak of wars, and who in no way, either directly or remotely, influenced or were concerned in the outbreak of war. An enemy vessel found upon the high seas or in an enemy port after such warning or after the various dates prescribed might be treated as having voluntarily assumed the risk of capture, and therefore properly exposed to it. The precedent of 1854 was followed in the Prussian-Austrian War of 1866. For example, the Prussian ministerial declaration, June 21, 1866, provided that:

"Austrian merchant vessels which are now in Prussian ports, or whose masters, unaware of the breaking out of the war, may enter Prussian ports, shall, on condition of reciprocity, have six weeks reckoned from the day of their entry into port to land their cargo and to go away with a new cargo, contraband of war excepted. On the expiration of this term they must leave port. Austrian merchant vessels whose masters are aware of the breaking out of the war are not permitted to enter a Prussian port." (Moore, Inter. Law Digest, Vol. VII, sec. 1196, p. 454.)

In the great war of 1870, France granted a leave of 30 days, as appears from the following passage from a work of authority:

"Merchant vessels belonging to the enemy which were actually in the French ports, or which entered the ports in ignorance of the war, were allowed a delay of 30 days for leaving, and safe conducts were given them to return to their port of dispatch or of destination. Vessels which took in cargoes for France, or on French account, in enemies or neutral ports before the declaration of war, were not subject to capture, but were allowed to disembark their freights in the French ports, and afterwards received safe-conduct to return to their ports of dispatch." (Halleck, Inter. Law (3d ed., by Baker), Vol. I, 532, note.)

These European precedents were followed by the United States in the Spanish-American War of 1898. In the President's proclamation, dated April 25, 1898, for the government of the officers of the United States during the war with Spain the fourth rule read, as follows:

"4. Spanish merchant vessels, in any ports or places within the United States, shall be allowed till May 21, 1898, inclusive, for loading their cargoes and departing from such ports or places; and such Spanish merchant vessels, if met at sea by any United States ship, shall be permited to continue their voyage if, on examination of their papers, it shall appear that their cargoes were taken on board before the expiration of the above term: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall apply to Spanish vessels having on board any officer in the military or naval service of the enemy, or any coal (except such as may be necessary for their voyage), or any other article prohibited or contraband of war, or any dispatch of or to the Spanish Government."

The Spanish Government issued a royal decree, dated April 23, 1898, which permitted, five days from the date of publication, the departure of American ships from Spanish ports. It was not so liberal as the American proclamation, for the Spanish decree did not in terms prohibit the capture of the American merchantment after their departure nor did it provide for the entrance and discharge of American ships sailing for Spanish ports before the war. As no captures were made by Spain, the exact nature and extent of the immunity were not tested before a prize court. The President's proclamation, however, was passed upon by the courts of the United States, and the interpretation thereof was liberal, in accordance with its spirit. The leading case on the subject is the Buena Ventura (1899, 175 U. S., 384).

The vessel in question was a Spanish merchant ship captured on the morning of April 22, 1898, some 8 or 9 miles off the Florida coast. At the time of capture the vessel was on a voyage from Ship Island, Miss., to Rotterdam, by way of Norfolk, Va., with a cargo of lumber. She arrived at Ship Island March 31, 1898, and sailed for Rotterdam April 19, with a permit, obtained in accordance with the laws of the United States, to call at Norfolk for supply of bunker coal. When captured on April 22 she made no resistance, had on board no military or naval officer, and carried no arms or munitions of war. The question at issue was therefore whether the vessel could be brought within the exemption of the fourth rule of the proclamation of 1898 as to "Spanish merchant vessels in any ports or places within the United States." In delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court, Mr. Justice Peckham observed, to quote the language of Prof. Moore (Digest of Inter. Law, vol. 7, sec. 1196, pp. 455–456), "that the vessel in question, as a merchant vessel of the enemy carrying on an innocent commercial enterprise at or just prior to the time when hostilities began, belonged to a class which the United States had always desired to treat with great liberality, and which civilized nations had in their later practice in fact so treated. The President's proclamation should therefore receive 'the most liberal and extensive interpretation' of which it was capable, and where two or more interpretations were possible the one most favorable to the belligerent in favor of whom the proclamation was issued. The provision that 'Spanish merchant vessels in any ports or places within the United States shall be allowed until May 21, 1898, inclusive, for loading their cargoes and departing' might, said the learned justice, be held to include (1) only vessels in port on the day when the proclamation was issued, namely, April 26, or (2) those in port on April 21, the day on which war was declared by Congress to have begun, or (3) not only those then in port but also any that had sailed therefrom on or before May 21, whether before or after the commencement of the war or the issuing of the proclamation. The court adopted the last interpretation. While the proclamation did not in so many words include vessels which had sailed from the United States before the commencement of the war, such vessels were, said Mr. Justice Peckham, clearly within its 'intention,' under the liberal construction which the court felt bound to give it. In view of the fact, however, that at the time of the capture the proclamation of April 26, without which the vessel would have been liable to condemnation, had not been issued, restitution was awarded without damages or costs."

The recent Russo-Japanese War likewise followed the enlightened practice dating from the Crimean War. For example, the Imperial Japanese ordinance of February 9, 1904, provides that—

"ARTICLE 1.

"Russian merchant ships which happen to be moored in any Japanese port at the time of the issue of the present rules may discharge or load their cargo and leave the country not later than February 16.

"ARTICLE 2.

"Russian merchant ships which have left Japan in accordance with the foregoing article, and which are provided with a special certificate from the Japanese authorities, shall not be captured if they can prove that they are steaming back direct to the nearest Russian port or a leased port or to their original destination. This measure shall, however, not apply in case such Russian merchant ships have once touched at a Russian port or a leased port."

And the Imperial Russian order of February 14, 1904, provides that—

"Japanese trading vessels which were in Russian ports or havens at the time of the declaration of the war are authorized to remain in such ports before putting out to sea with goods which do not constitute articles of contraband during the delay required in proportion to the cargo of the vessel, but which in any case must not exceed 48 hours from the time of the publication of the present declaration by the local authorities."

It is thus seen that in no less than five great wars of the last 50 years an exemption was made in favor of enemy merchant vessels in port at the outbreak of hostilities, and that a longer or shorter period was fixed within which such vessels might safely leave their ports and proceed to their destination. Although the custom is modern, it can not be said to be limited to any particular quarter of the world, for the States generally have recognized the exemption in their recent wars not only in Europe and America but also in Asia. Such a custom, however recent it may be, may rightly claim to form a part of the law of nations. It is therefore a source of regret that the second peace conference refused to recognize it as a right but simply as a privilege, a délai de faveur, which may be accorded or refused at the option of the belligerent, and that the privilege was unaccompanied by any recommendation of a period of time within which the privilege in question should be accorded. The exact wording of the first two articles of the convention follows:

"SECTION 1.

"When a merchant ship belonging to one of the belligerent powers is, at the commencement of hostilities, in an enemy port, it is desirable that it should be allowed to depart freely, either immediately or after a reasonable number of days of grace, and to proceed, after being furnished with a pass, direct to its port of destination or any other port indicated.

"The same rule should apply in the case of a ship which has left its last port of departure before the commencement of the war and entered a port belonging to the enemy while still ignorant that hostilities had broken out.

"SECTION 2.

"A merchant ship unable, owing to circumstances of force majeure, to leave the enemy port within the period contemplated in the above article, or which was not allowed to leave, can not be confiscated.

"The belligerent may only detain it, without payment or compensation, but subject to the obligation of restoring it after the war, or requisition it on payment of compensation."

It may be said that the expression "it is desirable" that the vessels should be allowed to depart freely amounts in reality to a command, and that the practice of the future will recognize the custom as freely as it has done in the past, thus establishing as a right what the conference modestly denominates a privilege. If such be the case the opposition of Great Britain to the recognition of the right will be as futile in practice as it was unreasonable at the conference.

Passing to the second branch of the question, namely, the treatment accorded to enemy merchant ships which prior to the outbreak of war had left port destined to any port or place of the other belligerent, the enlightened policy of the European States in their recent wars of 1854, 1866, and 1870 has been stated in the extracts already quoted from their respective declarations. The more recent practice will be briefly set forth. The fifth rule of the presidential proclamation of April 26, 1898, provided that:

"Any Spanish merchant vessel which, prior to April 21, 1898, shall have sailed from any foreign port bound for any port or place in the United States shall be permitted to enter such port or place and to discharge her cargo, and afterwards forthwith to depart without molestation; and any such vessel, if met at sea by any United States ship, shall be permitted to continue her voyage to any port not blockaded."

It has previously been observed that the Spanish decree did not provide for the entrance and discharge of American ships sailing for Spanish ports before the war, but, as no captures were made by Spain, the less liberal provisions of the Spanish decree did not affect American commerce. Rule 5 of the American proclamation was judicially interpreted in the case of the Pedro (175 U. S., 354). This vessel, sailing under the Spanish flag and officered and manned by Spaniards, was loaded in Antwerp for Cuba, and on March 18, 1898, was chartered by an American firm to proceed to Pensacola, Fla., or Ship Island, Miss., for a cargo of lumber for Rotterdam or Antwerp. Shortly after this date the Pedro sailed from Antwerp with a cargo of merchandise for Habana and Cienfuegos. She arrived at Habana on April 17, and, after discharging her cargo, sailed, on the 22d, for Santiago, Cuba, with a small quantity of general merchandise taken at Habana. While pursuing the voyage from Habana to Santiago, Cuba, she was captured on the same day, April 22, a few miles from Habana by the United States blockading fleet. In delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court, Chief Justice Fuller held that the Pedro did not fall within the exemption contained in rule 5; that she lay at Habana from the 17th of April to the 22d; that she cleared from Habana April 22, a day after the war began; that she had then no cargo for any port of the United States, but only for an enemy port, namely, Santiago and Cienfuegos. It could not, therefore, be said that she had left a foreign port in ignorance of the "perilous condition of affairs"; that it must be assumed that she either knew of hostilities or had been advised that hostilities were imminent. She was not bringing a cargo to the United States for the increase of its resources and the convenience of its citizens, but she was an enemy vessel trading with an enemy port.

The Supreme Court therefore affirmed the condemnation of the district court and held squarely that the contract to proceed ultimately to a port of the United States did not bring the vessel within the exemption of the fifth rule. The decision of the Supreme Court is technically correct, but it seems illiberal, both in its interpretation and application of the exemption meant to be conferred by the fifth rule, as was pointed out by Mr. Justice White in a strong dissenting opinion, in which Justices Brewer, Shiras, and Peckham concurred. While it is true that a statute in derogation of the common law should be strictly construed, this principle clearly should not apply to an exception in the common law of nations made in the interest of innocent enemy subjects engaged in innocent commerce.

In the recent Russo-Japanese war an immunity of a like nature was extended by article 3 of the Imperial Japanese ordinance of February 9, 1904, the exact text of which is as follows:

"Russian steamers which may have left for a Japanese port before February 16 may enter our ports, discharge their cargoes at once, and leave the country. The Russian steamers coming under the above category shall be treated in accordance with article 2."

It will be seen, therefore, that recent enlightened practice permits enemy merchant ships which have left their last port of departure before the commencement of the war, or within a certain fixed period, to continue their journey unmolested to the port or place within the territory of the other belligerent, to unload their cargoes, and to return to the home port without danger of capture during the voyage. The convention concerning the status of enemy merchant ships unfortunately is less liberal than recent practice. Article 3 is as follows:

"Enemy merchant ships which left their last port of departure before the commencement of the war and are encountered on the high seas while still ignorant of the outbreak of hostilities can not be confiscated. They are only liable to detention on the understanding that they shall be restored after the war without compensation, or to be requisitioned, or even destroyed, on payment of compensation, but in such case provision must be made for the safety of the persons on board, as well as the security of the ship's papers.

"After touching at a port in their own country, or at a neutral port, these ships are subject to the laws and customs of maritime war."

The seeming exemption is rather illusory, for the exemption from capture is based upon the fact that at the time of seizure the enemy merchant ships were still ignorant of the outbreak of hostilities. If they had been informed of the existence of hostilities they would seem to be liable to capture, for the merchant vessels of to-day have discarded canvas for steam, and it rarely happens that a vessel is provided on the outbound voyage with sufficient coal for the return. It would seem, therefore, that the vessel is exposed to capture, because it could not safely continue its voyage to the belligerent port; and if it seeks to return to the home port, the vessel is liable to capture, with little chance of escape by reason of the lack of means to continue its voyage. If the merchant vessel is ignorant of the outbreak of hostilities it may not be captured, but it may be detained subject to restoration at the end of the war without compensation. The value of the vessel may be seriously depreciated in case of a long war. If requisitioned, it is unlikely that the transaction will be profitable to the original owner, and if destroyed it is improbable that the compensation will at all be adequate. The article in question, therefore, can not be considered an advance; it is a distinct limitation of customary rights. Article 4 of the convention is as follows:

"Enemy cargo on board the vessels referred to in articles 1 and 2 is likewise liable to be detained and restored after the termination of the war without payment of compensation or to be requisitioned on payment of compensation with or without the ship."

The same rule applies in the case of cargo on board the vessels referred to in article 3.

The provisions depending upon articles 1 and 3, already quoted, would seem to require no special explanation or comment.

The convention as a whole was a compromise between those who believed in the existence of a right and those who refused to recognize the legal validity of the custom which has grown up in recent years. As in most compromises, the result is unsatisfactory. The convention can not be called progressive, for it questions a custom which seems generally established, and its adoption would seem to sanction less liberal and enlightened practice. The United States delegation, therefore, refused to sign the convention, and its acceptance has not been recommended by the Department of State.

ENEMY VESSELS AT OUTBREAK OF WAR—DAYS OF GRACE.

Interference before war: The diplomatic correspondence between Great Britain and Germany seems to show that there was some interference with shipping even before war was declared, though the reason given was "that mines were being laid and other precautions being taken."

Review of regulations: The British orders in council of August 4, 1914, referring to VI Hague Convention, 1907, showed a disposition to establish with Germany by reciprocal agreement 10 "days of grace." The correspondence seems to indicate a willingness on the part of both belligerents to adopt this period, but through a misunderstanding this was not adopted.

With Austria-Hungary, however, a satisfactory agreement was made by Great Britain, and 10 days were allowed from the declaration of hostilities.

Great Britain, considering that Turkey was not a party to The Hague convention relative to the status of enemy merchant vessels at the outbreak of war, did not extend to Turkish vessels the advantages of the order in council of August 4, 1914.

The same position was assumed by Great Britain in regard to Bulgaria.

The declaration of war between Germany and France, August 3, 1914, contained a proposal for a reciprocal agreement in regard to days of grace. These two States allowed a seven days' period of grace.

France and Austria reached a similar reciprocal agreement.

Italy decreed the sequestration of enemy merchant vessels unless apparently intended for conversion into vessels of war. Vessels of the latter class were to be captured and placed in the prize court. The proceeds of sale or use of vessels which had been sequestrated might be used to pay indemnity in case the enemy acted contrary to "the principles of the rights of war generally recognized and admitted."

Naval War College proposal, 1906: In general, the principle of reciprocity has received approval since July, 1914, and the practice in many instances has been similar to that proposed by the United States Naval War College in 1906 in the following words:

"1. Each State entering upon a war shall announce a date before which enemy vessels bound for or within its ports at the outbreak of war shall under ordinary conditions be allowed to enter to discharge cargo, to load cargo, and to depart without liability to capture while sailing directly to a permitted destination. If one belligerent State allows a shorter period than the other, the other State may, as a matter of right, reduce its period to correspond therewith.

"2. Each belligerent State may make such regulations in regard to sojourn, conduct, cargo, destination, and movements after departure of the innocent enemy vessels as may be deemed necessary to protect its military interests.

"3. A private vessel suitable for warlike use, belonging to one belligerent and bound for or within the port of the other belligerent at the outbreak of war, is liable to be detained unless the Government of the vessel's flag makes a satisfactory agreement that it shall not be put to any warlike use, in which case it may be accorded the same treatment as innocent enemy vessels."

THE AMERICAN POLICY.

The President stated on February 8 that this Government "will scrupulously respect all private rights of its own citizens and the subjects of foreign states."

On April 2 he stated that we should "observe with proud punctilio the principles of right and fair play we profess to be fighting for."

This doctrine had its origin in the fundamental opinions of Chief Justice Marshall. Writing of the power to confiscate enemy property, he said:

The mitigations of this rigid rule which the humane and wise policy of modern times has introduced into practice will more or less affect the exercise of this right, but can not impair the right itself.

Referring to an English judge whose opinions uphold the confiscation of privately owned ships of the enemy, he said:

It is impossible to consider them attentively, without perceiving that his mind leans strongly in favor of captors.

In a great maritime country, depending on its navy for its glory and safety, the national bias is perhaps so entirely in this direction that the judge, without being conscious of the fact, must feel its influence. However this may be it is a fact of which I am fully convinced, and on this account it appears to me to be the more proper to investigate rigidly the principles on which his decisions have been made, and not to extend them where such extension may produce injustice.

This humane doctrine has been expressly extended by our courts to ships.

In the case of Wagner v. The Juanita (28 Federal Cases, 1331), the court, reaffirming the principle stated by Chief Justice Marshall, writes:

In respect to the vessel herself, now in the port of New Orleans, I consider the reasoning of the court equally strong against the claim of the libellant; she is to all intents and purposes property as much infra-territorial, within the limits of the United States, as the cargo placed in store a few hundred yards from the shore where she is moored, and she can with no more reason be said to be beyond the territorial limits of the United States than the river upon whose waters she is now floating.

The sixth convention of The Hague Peace Conference of 1907 provides as follows:

ART. 2. A merchant ship unable, owing to circumstances of force majeure, to leave the enemy port within the period contemplated in the above article, or which was not allowed to leave, can not be confiscated. The belligerent may only detain it, without payment of compensation, but subject to the obligation of restoring it after the war, or requisition it on payment of compensation.

While the United States did not ratify this convention, the reason for its refusal is thus stated by Oppenheim (International Law, 2d ed., p. 141, note 1):

The United States of America refused to sign the convention because she considers its stipulations retrogressive, as they are less liberal than the practice which has prevailed since 1854.

On February 8, 1917, a statement was issued by the State Department, with the authority of the President, as follows:

The Government of the United States will in no circumstances take advantage of a state of war to take possession of property to which international understandings and the recognized law of the land give it no just claim or title. It will scrupulously respect all private rights alike of its own citizens and the subjects of foreign States.

In his address to Congress delivered on April 2, the President said:

Just because we fight without rancor and without selfish object, seeking nothing for ourselves but what we wish to share with all free peoples, we shall, I feel confident, conduct our operations as belligerents without passion and ourselves observe with proud punctilio the principles of right and of fair play we profess to be fighting for.

It should be evident to all mankind that our Government in the conduct of the present war will be governed by those broad principles of humanity and justice that have given luster to our flag.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, it is now nearly three years since Germany declared war on France and Russia and invaded Belgium. That invasion horrified the world and made Prussian militarism the synonym of unspeakable cruelty everywhere. I say Prussian militarism, because by the adjustment of suffrage in Germany Prussia controls Parliament, and a few rich men control Prussia.

In the history of this war the amazing, cynical, openly avowed doctrine of the Prussian military system that might makes right has finally forced itself upon the reluctant realization of mankind.

That doctrine, as elaborated by German historians, philosophers, ethical writers, and military writers involved, first, the assumption that Germany is the most highly civilized power on earth; second, that it is the duty of Germany to impose her scheme of civilization upon Europe and ultimately upon the world; and, third, that what Germany believes to be politically right is right.

It follows, therefore, as explained by German writers, that, first, military weakness is a sin; second, that a nation makes its own morality and should disregard every law except that which is for its own advantage; third, that it is immoral if a State does not extend its power if such extension is required by its expanding population; fourth, that a nation should never allow itself to be bound by its treaty obligations when they are not to its advantage; fifth, that war is not only a biological law, but a moral obligation; and, sixth, that the Kaiser rules by divine right and is above the moral obligations of other men. He himself declares, "We Hohenzollerns take our crown from God alone and to God alone we are responsible."

In simple words, his doctrine means, if you need more room, kill your neighbor.

If you have signed a contract which hampers you, disregard it as a scrap of paper.

At the outset of this war the Emperor addressed his army in these words:

Remember that the German people are the chosen of God.
On me as German Emperor, the Spirit of God has descended. I am His weapon, His sword, His vice regent.
Woe to the disobedient; death to cowards and unbelievers.

No such profane, colossal megalomania has ever had such an instrument with which to work its will as the German military power, to which the whole development of the State has been made tributary.

In the execution of the Prussian military policy four facts stand out which have influenced the judgment and the sympathy of the world.

And the first fact that stands out is Germany's violation of Belgium's neutrality, notwithstanding her agreement to uphold it.

If any man is disposed to deny this violation of Belgium's neutrality let him read the speech of the German chancellor in the Reichstag August 4, 1914, in which he said:

Our troops have occupied Luxemburg and perhaps are already on Belgium soil. Gentlemen, that is contrary to the dictates of international law.
* * * Necessity knows no law. We were compelled to override the just protests of the Luxemburg and Belgian Governments.

Germany commenced her war, then, as a confessed breaker of the law of nations, and she has continued it as a barbarian among nations.

The second fact that stands out in the execution of the Prussian military policy by the self-proclaimed vicegerent of God on earth is the commission by his army, drawn from "the chosen of God," of crimes in Belgium which it would be a slander of brutes to call brutal.

This self-proclaimed weapon, sword, and vicegerent of God on earth, by his army, invaded a peaceful, neutral nation and deliberately entered upon a policy of "frightfulness" which spared neither age, womanhood, nor childhood; which ravished, mutilated, and bayoneted women and girls; which compelled the living to dig the graves of their murdered dead; which burned its helpless victims alive in the flames of their burning homes.

If any man is disposed to deny this, let him read the notebooks of the captured German soldiers.

The third fact that stands out in the execution of the Prussian military policy by the self-proclaimed weapon, sword, and vicegerent of God on earth is the separation of families and the making of little children homeless and fatherless in the bitter cold of winter by the deportation of thousands of Belgians into slavery.

If any man is disposed to deny this, let him read the official report of Brand Whitlock, American minister to Belgium, in which he describes the circumstances of this horror as "so cruel that German soldiers are said to have wept in its execution, and so monstrous that German officers were said to be ashamed."

Gentlemen, eternity is not long enough for the expiation of these crimes. Nothing can drown the cries of fatherless, homeless little children or wipe away the blood and tears of outraged Belgium. [Applause.]

The fourth fact that stands out in the execution of the Prussian military policy by the self-proclaimed weapon, sword, and vicegerent of God on earth is the deliberate murder of American men, women, and children at sea without warning, without mercy, and without compunction.

We were slow to wrath. We did not want war. We did not threaten war even after the Lusitania was sunk and 137 American men, women, and children were drowned in the sea.

Seven times Germany promised to observe the rights of American neutrals and seven times she broke her promises, but when at last she openly proclaimed her purpose to go on killing our people, we declared war.

But some people have said we ought to declare war on England also, because England mined the North Sea and proclaimed a "military area" there.

And she did, but she did not kill our people. On the contrary, she notified the world of lanes of safety across the sea.

Both Germany and England mined the North Sea, and Germany not only mined the North Sea but she mined the ports of England and the trade routes of the open sea with intent to kill without notice and without discrimination.

But we did not propose to go to war on account of m es.

Some people have said we ought to declare war on England because she tried to blockade the ports of Germany and halted our commerce with neutral ports on the ground that it was of ultimate enemy destination.

And she did; but she did not sink our ships or kill our people, and we did not propose to go to war on account of an attempted blockade or on account of ships and cargoes.

But Germany not only sunk our ships and sunk their cargoes but she killed our people, and she not only killed our people but she gave notice that she proposed to go on killing our people.

We were slow to wrath. Seven times Germany promised to stop killing American men, women, and children, but she broke her promises; and when at least she extended her dead line to surround 2,000,000 square miles of land and sea and notified us of her determination to go on killing our people we declared war.

The whole structure of the German Government is autocratic, and her purpose is war and conquest. In a speech in the Reichstag, April 27 last, Dr. Diedrich Hahn, of the Agrarian-Junker Party, said, "Let us keep Bismarck's policy. Germany's future is a future of battle and conquest."

Our war is not against the German people, except as they are forced to war by Germany's autocracy.

We have never struck a blow except for liberty, and we have never struck our colors. [Applause.]

Our war is not for territory, not for conquest, not for aggression.

Our banner has upon it no beast or bird of prey, but its stripes are red with the blood of patriots, shed that its stars might shine together for liberty and to uplift the oppressed. [Applause.]

We fight under the banner of the average man, and we fight for the average man. [Applause.]

As a nation organized out of a dream of human equality, which for 141 years we have been trying to make come true, we sympathize with the oppressed, and we fight their battles.

We were slow to wrath—no American has wanted war.

We would be glad to help the German people, not to fight them, but there is no help for the German people until they have thrown off the yoke of Prussian militarism.

If you ask me where my sympathies are, I tell you frankly they are with the victims, even in her own ranks, of Germany's unholy war. This tells the story:

There was an eager gentleman, who ranted by my side,
And much he prated of the war, and then at last he cried,
When he had talked his breath away, and so at last was through:
"And now, I prithee, tell me, friend, upon what side are you?"
Said I, "It may surprise you, but I really sympathize
With the boyish wounded Austrian, who lost his legs and eyes;
I'm siding with the Russian, who left a girlish bride;
I'm siding with a German lad, who, shrapnel-shattered, died.
"I'm siding with a Frenchman, who in his trench has stood
Half frozen till they shot him, and he said that death was good;
I'm with the English officer, whose little newborn son
Will never see his face because his father's work is done.

"I'm with the Belgian father, whose baby starved last week;
I'm with the hordes of men mowed down each time the cannons speak;
I'm with those pallid women who are mothers, sweethearts, wives,
Those wives who anguish o'er their dead and nourish unborn lives.

"I'm with each man who's in a trench, each boy who's lost a limb;
Each fighter, who is starved and cold; I'm very strong for him.
It's useless quite your argument adown my throat to cram;
I've told you very frankly now upon whose side I am."

[Applause.]

Gentlemen make a mistake who fear the votes of recently enfranchised citizens of foreign birth or foreign extraction.

They know better than you what imperialism means, and they came here to escape it.

They know better than you what it is to be subjects where class controls all the avenues upward, and they came here to escape it.

They know better than you that the Stars and Stripes mean democracy of opportunity and the breath of a new life. [Applause.]

But votes or no votes, I know that no man here will let votes affect his duty to his country.

Out of the dim, heroic past comes the muffled beat of the drums of 1776, drowned for a time by the hum of peace.

Louder and louder it sounds, closer and closer it comes—and now it is here!

Along the street there comes
A blare of bugles, a ruffle of drums,
A flash of color beneath the sky.
Hats off! The Flag is passing by.

Blue and crimson and white it shines
Over the steel-tipped, ordered lines,
Hats off! the colors before us fly;
But more than the Flag is passing by.

Sea fights and land fights, grim and great,
Fought to make and to save the State;
Weary marches and sinking ships,
Cheers of victory on dying lips.

Days of plenty and years of peace,
March of a strong land's swift increase;
Equal justice, right, and law,
Stately honor and reverent awe.

Sign of a nation great and strong,
To ward her people from foreign wrong,
Pride and glory and honor, all.
Live in the colors to stand or fall;
Hats off! The Flag is passing by.

[Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield my hour to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, perhaps it is presumptuous in me to attempt to instruct this House. I do not hope to be able to do that except in some slight measure, and that more by way of ocular demonstration than by any statement that I may make to you. Since this Congress convened we have been passing bills one after another appropriating huge sums of money for the purpose of carrying on the war. Much of it has been for the purchase of arms, ammunition, and other war matériel. It has occurred to me that it would be suggestive, and possibly prove helpful, for me to bring before you a few of the most necessary and essential weapons used in warfare, and for which we are now spending, and shall hereafter expend, very large sums of money.

Modern warfare is a contest of metals more than men. At the time our first militia law was passed, in 1792, it was a different proposition altogether. If you will read that law, keeping in mind the state of the arts at that time, you will see that the law then enacted was entirely reasonable and adequate. It provided for universal military service. That is what we started out with in this country. Each man was compelled to be enrolled throughout the different States, and he also had to provide himself with arms and ammunition. Such a provision sounds ridiculous now, but it was a simple thing to require of him in those days. His arms consisted principally in a firelock, a flintlock rifle. His ammunition factory he carried with him—a bullet mold, a bar of lead, and a powderhorn. With this equipment he was ready to mold his own bullets from the lead which he carried. The powder from the horn he put into the gun himself. It was no inconvenience or embarrassment for men to have different kinds of guns. Each man being required to provide his own gun, there were all kinds of guns; but the arrangement was not as bad as it sounds. If we had an army now going forth with all kinds of guns, it would be a mob; but it was different in those days, because, as I say, each man carried his own arsenal and made his own ammunition from day to day. As firearms developed, a type of rifle was adopted and changed from time to time until now we have what I think is the best rifle in the world. Connected with another possible change is quite a problem of which I will speak a little later. In what I have to say I hope that Members of the House will feel at perfect liberty to ask me questions at any time, and just as many questions as they please.

I do not promise to answer them all, but I shall do my best. The only request I make in this connection is that when I take up one subject—for instance, the rifle—all questions be directed to the rifle, and when I take up the machine gun or artillery ammunition that questions be directed to those things. I ask this so as to be allowed to present what I have to say, as far as possible, in logical order, although I realize that I can not make it entirely so.

The first I shall take up, and the most important, is the rifle.

The rifle is the arm which determines in the first place the size of your army, and in the next place it determines the final victory. In the last analysis there is only one thing that will finally decide a battle, and that is the shock of cold steel. The bayonet is the weapon that finally decides the battle. You can not shoot a man out of a hole with any kind of an arm that has yet been invented that you can carry in your hand or on your shoulder. Therefore the bayonet is a very important part of the rifle. At one time military men thought of dispensing with the bayonet. The bayonet adopted was a small rod affair, not very effective, but by experience it was found that the larger bayonet was necessary, and so we have adopted the bayonet, which you see here on this board, [indicating], which is a decidedly dangerous weapon.

One of the problems now confronting us, and a very important one, is in regard to the kind of rifle we shall use in the present war. We have developed what we think is the best rifle in the world, namely, the Springfield service rifle—I hold one in my hand. I wish to assure all of you once and for all that there is no danger, inasmuch as it is not only not loaded, but no cartridge that I have brought into the building has any charge in it whatever. So there is no danger. We have developed this rifle and it is now being manufactured in two of our arsenals, at Springfield, Mass., our larger factory, and at Rock Island. We have been manufacturing that rifle, called the 1903 model, for a number of years. We have gradually accumulated the tools and fixtures in these two arsenals sufficient to manufacture a little over 200,000 a year, with a single shift working eight hours a day. If we should speed up to the limit and run both our factories 24 hours a day, with three shifts, we could probably manufacture close up to half a million rifles in a year.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. TILSON. I yield.

Mr. WINGO. What is the number that we have accumulated?

Mr. TILSON. We have accumulated 800,000 of these rifles.

Mr. WINGO. Is that in addition to those that are in the hands of the troops?

Mr. TILSON. No.

Mr. WINGO. That includes those in the service?

Mr. TILSON. That includes all in the hands of the troops, Regulars, National Guard, and in reserve. We have, all told, 800,000 of these and a capacity which, used to its fullest extent, can turn out 500,000 in a year. Now, you see the problem we are confronted with at once. If we wish to arm quickly a million of men, we simply can not do it with our present capacity.

Mr. WINGO. Is it possible or practical to manufacture those same guns in any other plants in the United States?

Mr. TILSON. It would be if we had the gauges, jigs, and other necessary tools and fixtures. These are words that I have used in a good many speeches here on this floor.

Mr. WINGO. What do you mean by gauges?

Mr. TILSON. Gauges are special tools like these I have here, used to determine forms, sizes, limits, and dimensions. The gauges I referred to are tools specially made to determine the various sizes, shapes, limits, and dimensions of the rifle. It requires a large number of different gauges to make this rifle. There are something like 150 different parts to it, as you will observe by an examination of this board containing an array of all the parts.

Mr. WINGO. You mean that many different parts to the rifle you hold in your hand?

Mr. TILSON. Yes. This part is the receiver of the rifle, which contains the bolt and the mechanism. To make that one part alone requires 120 gauges. Some of them are elaborately constructed tools and very expensive.

Mr. POU. I have heard that in order to properly equip an army it requires four of those rifles per man. I would like to know of the gentleman whether or not that is correct.

Mr. TILSON. I have heard that, too, but, in my opinion, that is rather extravagant, and the experience on the western front in Europe has not been to that effect. The wastage of rifles is considerable under any conditions, but a man soon falls in love with his rifle and takes great pains with it. He oils it, rubs it, and takes fine care of it. I think a wastage of 50 per cent per annum would be fair. In the Russian Army, at one stage of the war, I think it ran 150 per cent in a year.

Mr. POU. At the request of some of our colleagues, I want to ask what is the range of that rifle?

Mr. TILSON. It is farther than you can see to sight it accurately. It is sighted up to 2,400 yards, and it is effective that far if you should happen to hit somebody, but you can not see that far away. There is no way except with telescope sighting. Some of the sharpshooters and snipers have telescopic sights that they put on their rifles. They manage to see a considerable distance, and the rifle is effective if you can contrive some way of seeing. The point-blank range of the rifle is 547 yards; that is, if you fire it at a target 547 yards away, the path of the ball at any point between the muzzle of the rifle and the target would not be above 6 feet from the ground. In all that distance it would kill a man standing. In 1898 my regiment was armed with the old Springfield rifle. In using that arm the muzzle elevation had to be so great and the loop in the air that the bullet made was so high that it was not dangerous at any place except near the muzzle and at the point where the bullet came down. The danger space was thus made very small. A whole brigade of men could have encamped between the mouth of the rifle and the target without danger. It was not in any sense as effective a rifle as this one.

Mr. CURRY of California. I have heard unofficially, but from an employee of the works, that the Westinghouse people, near Philadelphia, manufactured 1,000,000 rifles for the Russian Government within three months after the contract had been awarded. Now, I do not know what kind of a rifle they manufactured, but if that is true, why is it that it would take us one year to turn out 600,000 Springfields?

Mr. TILSON. Well, in the first place, that is not true. It is absolutely impossible that that could be true. It can not be done. From information gathered from the manufacturers' standpoint, I know that it can not be done. At the outset of the war——

Mr. CURRY of California. I will say that I do not know whether it is true or not, but I was so told.

Mr. TILSON. I was going to give you some facts upon which I have based my statement. Representatives of foreign governments came to this country immediately after the outbreak of the war and placed contracts for rifles. They wanted rifles in the worst possible way. In Great Britain, for instance, they could not put rifles into the hands of 1 out of every 10 men they could enlist. They wanted rifles just as rapidly as possible. They came to people in this country who manufactured rifles, large concerns, who had all the money, all the credit, and all the machinery that was necessary, and they placed contracts. What was the result? There was no concern in this country that could produce a single rifle inside of a year, with every possible facility that peace times could furnish them with—plenty of money, plenty of credit, plenty of skilled mechanics, and all the rest. In fact, it was 18 months before any considerable number of rifles on these hurry-up contracts could be delivered. These are facts that I know of.

Mr. CURRY of California The Westinghouse people, you know, were not manufacturers of rifles, but they changed their plant to a rifle-manufacturing plant. It is very close to Washington, and a telephone message from here to there might possibly give you the information. I understand that those rifles are already on the road to Russia, and that the last rifle was completed a month ago, and that they were loaded on the cars and shipped.

Mr. TILSON. That can not be correct, as the gentleman first stated it in his inquiry.

Mr. CURRY of California. Do you know that it is not correct, or do you just think it is not correct?

Mr. TILSON. I have first-hand information that leads me to believe that it is not correct, and my information is perfectly reliable. The Westinghouse people are manufacturing that rifle [exhibiting a specimen rifle] for Russia. That is the Russian rifle, and they are being turned out now, as I am informed, at the rate of 2,500 rifles a day. I was informed yesterday by a man who had information on the subject that the Russian people were very stiff in their inspection. He said they were very rigid in their inspection, and did not accept them very well. The Westinghouse people believed they could make as many as 5,000 a day, but the Russian inspectors did not believe they could make over 2,500 a day.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield before he leaves that subject of the rifles?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Is it possible to explain to us what rifle is in use in the foreign armies, and in what way it differs from our rifle?

Mr. TILSON. This is the Russian rifle that I was speaking of.

Mr. LITTLE. Will you give us the name in each country—the name of the rifle in use and the difference between them and ours?

Mr. TILSON. This is the three-line rifle of the same caliber as ours, although the cartridge is different. I have some of the Russian cartridges here. In this belt—these are Russian cartridges. They are of the same caliber as ours, and the only difference is that the head has a flange instead of a cannelure. The Russian cartridge has a flange on the end of it the same as the British.

Mr. LITTLE. What is the name?

Mr. TILSON. They call it the "three-line" rifle.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. What is meant by "three-line"?

Mr. TILSON. It means the same as ours. We call it ".30." Ours has a cipher on the end of it, point thirty—.30.

Mr. LITTLE. How about the German rifles?

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman goes from that point, may I interrupt at the point the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] left off?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. As to the difference between our rifle and the British, the Enfield rifle, will the gentleman explain the process of rechambering for our ammunition and the relative output of Springfields, the American service rifle, and the double output of Enfields, the English service rifle? I understand it is possible to make twice as many of the Enfields as ours.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman is modest as to that; several times as many. That is the problem to which I was referring earlier in my remarks—the big problem that is confronting this country. The biggest problem, so far as the use of arms and ammunition is concerned, is the proposition as to whether we shall rechamber this rifle—the Enfield—for our use or whether we shall use it just as it is used by Great Britain.

Mr. LITTLE. What is the name?

Mr. TILSON. This is the Lee-Enfield, the British rifle. It is .303 caliber, slightly larger than ours. It has a flange at the head instead of a cannelure. It is an entirely different cartridge, so that the ammunition is not interchangeable.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Is it not a fact that at the present time there are practically two propositions before the country in the matter of the small rifle—whether or not we shall continue the manufacture for our purposes of the Springfield rifle or whether, due to the fact of the tremendous product, we are now able to turn out in what is known as the Lee-Enfield? Is it not a fact that there are just two practical propositions before us—whether we shall use the Springfield, or the Lee-Enfield, chambered to use our ammunition?

Mr. TILSON. No; we have gone a step further. As I started out to tell you, we can produce at the maximum only half a million of our service rifles in a year.

Mr. McCORMICK. What has been the rate of production since the war broke out?

Mr. TILSON. Not over 200,000; probably much less than that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The other day, during the debate, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, said that a man prominent in the Eddystone Co. said that Pennsylvania could furnish 15,000 rifles a day in the very near future. Now, what rifle was he speaking about?

Mr. TILSON. The rifle that we could come the nearest to doing that with is the Enfield rifle that I have in my hand. If gentlemen will excuse me for just a moment, there is a point there that I ought to clear up before we leave it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. There are some questions that I desire to ask the gentleman.

Mr. TILSON. Let me explain this point before we leave it, because it is important.

I wish to recur to the question of my friend from New York [Mr. SNYDER] as to the problem that is confronting us in regard to the rifle. We can not manufacture the Springfield rifle rapidly enough now to serve our purpose. We can not increase our capacity for its manufacture sufficiently to serve our purposes because of the difficulty of procuring gauges and other special tools. We have waited too long.

Mr. ROBBINS. Does the gentleman think that is good information to make public?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, everybody knows it except ourselves. [Laughter.] All our enemies know it. We need not try to keep it a secret now. We had better meet the situation squarely. We can not increase our capacity because we have not the special tools and fixtures. It takes special tools and fixtures which must be made by skilled mechanics. They are made from designs and it takes a lot of time to make them. We do not count the money now. We would be willing to pay any amount of money if we had these tools, but we have not got them and we can not make them in time to serve our present purpose. If we put all the available toolmakers in the country to work we can not make them in time to save us in this war, so we must discard that plan. We had a conference of the gauge manufacturers of the country assembled here a short time ago. They met over in the House Office Building and they were asked point blank, "How many men can you put to making gauges?" One man said so many hours a week, and another man so many hours a week, and so on around the room until we got a census of all the gauge makers that would be available for Government work. As was told you awhile ago, it takes more gauges for the rifles than for anything else. It takes a large number—120 for that one piece alone, and about 1,400 different ones for the whole rifle. So that it would take us at least a year—we had just as well face that fact—under the most favorable circumstances, if we should turn all the available toolmakers that we have in the country to making gauges for the large scale mass production of that one weapon. We need these toolmakers for something else. We must have artillery ammunition, and we must have gauges for that. It takes 253 of these gauges to make the time fuse on the end of a shrapnel shell, and it takes 58 gauges to make the shell itself; that is, that many different ones. We have only about so many men in the country who can do that sort of thing.

The question was, Should we turn them all over to making the gauges for the rifle, abandoning everything else? Many of these men are tied up with contracts for making gauges for Canada, Russia, and others of our allies. Should we take these toolmakers away from that necessary work and set them to making gauges for the rifles? It was decided that it was best not to attempt to do that. Therefore, in view of the fact that we are making in this country a large number of the British rifles, the Enfield, with the gauges already in the hands of the manufacturers all over the country, so that we can make, as somebody said, at least 15,000 a day, the solution of the problem has been made, and we are to use the Enfield. Necessity has made the solution for us. Instead of going on and attempting to increase our capacity for the manufacture of our own rifle, for the present we shall make the rifle that we can make, and that is the Enfield. The only remaining problem with reference to this matter is, what ammunition shall we use? It is not a very serious matter to change the chamber of the new rifles that we make for American ammunition instead of British. If we are going over to France to fight alongside of the British, there are a great many advantages in using the same ammunition. They have had great difficulty on the western front in having France armed with one rifle, using one kind of ammunition, Great Britain another, the small Portuguese division another, and the Belgians another. The small contingent of Russians who came over to the western front were armed, I believe, with the French rifle outright, so they were put in with the French troops and did not complicate the situation.

Mr. DOWELL. Is the Enfield rifle considered the equal of the Springfield rifle, manufactured by the United States Government?

Mr. TILSON. I do not think it is quite as fine a rifle, if you are going out for target shooting, or for open fighting; but the shooting qualities of a rifle are not of such supreme importance in the present kind of warfare. The rifle is not used so much as a shooting iron now in trench warfare as it is in the open and as it formerly was. Machine guns are very largely used; and finally the bayonet.

Mr. DOWELL. Why is it that we have not got a sufficient number of the Springfield rifles to arm the forces that we are going to have under the present law?

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman asks in effect why we did not provide ourselves with sufficient capacity to manufacture them. If Congress had followed my advice, given freely in speeches here on the floor, beginning nearly two years ago, probably we should have had a great many more than we have now on hand, and would have been ready to manufacture a great many more. The truth is, there was a general feeling that the needs of the country did not call for it, and we did not do it; but we are in the situation now that I have stated to the gentleman. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SISSON. I wanted to ask the gentleman this question: We have had this matter up in connection with the purchase of a great many supplies with military experts. Why is it that we can not use to advantage the Lewis gun?

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman will excuse me, but I would like to finish with the rifle before I come to the machine gun.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to finish the question that I asked. Has there not been appropriated by Congress a sufficient amount, and was not there a year ago appropriated enough to manufacture these rifles at the Government arsenal?

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman heard me when I said we could not manufacture over 500,000 a year if we run night and day, three shifts.

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman just answered that if he had had his way we would have had plenty of Springfield rifles. Is it not a fact that a year ago we appropriated more money for the manufacture of these rifles at the arsenals than was used, and, in fact, the Government did not use the money appropriated for the purpose of manufacturing Springfield rifles?

Mr. TILSON. I do not care to go into that. I do not know that it is a fact as the gentleman states it. I doubt if it would serve any useful purpose to attempt to go into that feature of it. Nothing that I have said or may say is intended as a reflection upon anyone in any department of the Government, unless it be a reflection on ourselves that we were not farsighted enough to sense the situation earlier.

Mr. DOWELL. I wanted to know the reason why we have not Springfield rifles if it is the best rifle. I want to know if Congress has not made appropriations sufficient to manufacture the guns if the money had been used as Congress intended that it should have been used.

Mr. TILSON. We should not have had a sufficient number of rifles now even if we had appropriated money enough for them last year.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not a fact that there was to have been 800,000 more rifles than now exist?

Mr. TILSON. I do not quite follow the gentleman in his figures. I promised to yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I only had in mind, Mr. Chairman, to ask the gentleman when he was discussing the difference between the Enfield and the Springfield rifles if he would not indicate that there was also a considerable advantage in our favor in the character of the ammunition; that our .30 cartridge was considered to be superior to the British .303, and that would be one of the reasons for rechambering.

Mr. TILSON. Yes; that would be one point in favor of rechambering. The gentleman will understand that we can make the British ammunition; we have been making it in large quantities, and it is not such a difficult matter to prepare to make small-arms ammunition. Therefore we can afford to dismiss that part of the problem. We can make either British or American ammunition, and we can produce it in large quantities. I hold in my hand a board which shows all the different operations from the time the shell is stamped out of the brass until it is made into the cartridge and put in the clip. There are something like 75 different operations. Gentlemen will notice that two have been removed. They have invented a tool which will do at one operation what formerly took three. So the manufacture of the small-arms ammunition is a comparatively simple problem, and we can deal with it by making either form of ammunition that may be desired.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Is it anticipated to equip the Regular Army with the Lee-Enfield rifle? I mean the men now using the Springfield—are they going to shift?

Mr. TILSON. The whole question, if the gentleman will permit me, is this: If we are going to fight in France alongside of men armed with the British rifle, chambered for British ammunition, whether or not it would be wiser to use the same ammunition. In other words, whether we should chamber the Enfield rifles that we make here for British ammunition or whether it would be better to chamber them for our own ammunition so that we could use not only the Enfield but also the Springfield.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think we ought to have in mind what the condition of this country will be at the close of the war. What will be the effect when all the men are trained to use ammunition and the gun which we do not use permanently?

Mr. TILSON. I think that trouble, if there is any, would soon disappear.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman made an interesting speech two years ago on this same subject. Did that bear no fruit?

Mr. TILSON. It did, because Congress did authorize the procurement of gauges, special tools, and appliances for small arms and ammunition.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Was it because Congress failed to make the appropriation?

Mr. TILSON. No; Congress made the appropriation, but we found that the toolmakers were tied up making them for somebody else.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NORTON. Can the gentleman tell the committee the number of Springfield rifles that have been manufactured by the Government since the beginning of the war, August, 1914?

Mr. TILSON. No; I can not tell the gentleman. We have increased our total number, but certainly not to the amount of the capacity of our arsenal.

Mr. NORTON. About how many?

Mr. TILSON. We certainly have not been increasing at the rate of 200,000 a year, and we could easily make 200,000 a year.

Mr. NORTON. Have we increased during the last two years, or since August, 1914, 200,000?

Mr. TILSON. I do not believe we have increased 200,000.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will say for the information of the gentleman and the House that I got the exact figures from the War Department, and the entire number of rifles manufactured since the war started is less than 66,000, and since I delivered that speech and so informed the House, I have been informed by Col. Babbitt, in charge of the Ordnance Department, that they have manufactured no new rifles at all.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Since what war started?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. In the three years since the war in Europe began we have manufactured less than 66,000 Springfield rifles, although we had a capacity of making 2,000,000 during that time.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. If it is proper to answer the question that I am going to ask, very well; and if the gentleman deems it is not proper, I hope he will not answer it. I understand that we have 800,000 Springfield rifles on hand?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. How many Krags have we?

Mr. TILSON. We have 350,000 Krags, but they use different ammunition, and we are not prepared to manufacture them in large quantities. I should consider them out of the question. We should not attempt to manufacture any more Krags.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I know the gentleman wants to be accurate. He recalls that Maj. Pierce, speaking for the War Department, stated that the exact number of rifles on hand was 690,000. They have taken off 110,000 since we have gone into the war.

Mr. TILSON. I use the information that I obtained from the Chief of Ordnance in his hearing before the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. That is published in the record; you will find it there—690,000.

Mr. TILSON. Eight hundred thousand was what the Chief of Ordnance gave to us in the committee.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. They have cut off 110,000.

Mr. TILSON. Probably there have been some wasted. If there are no further questions, I would like now to speak about the machine guns.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman leaves that question of the rifles I would like him to yield to me.

Mr. TILSON. Very well.

Mr. BRITTEN. Did I understand the gentleman to say that we have only 690,000 Springfield rifles now?

Mr. TILSON. That is what the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] says his last information is. Gen. Crozier, Chief of the Ordnance Department, in the hearings stated that there were 800,000, and that is the information that I was using.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman also says our capacity was in excess of 200,000 a year?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. The European war has been going on for almost three years. Have we not been making any guns to take care of this emergency?

Mr. TILSON. Sixty-six thousand, it is said.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I will say the capacity is 600,000 a year.

Mr. TILSON. I should say that is a large estimate.

Mr. BRITTEN. And we have been making only 66,000?

Mr. TILSON. I should say 500,000 at the maximum, running day and night.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is not the fact that we have only 700,000 on hand in the gentleman's opinion a disgraceful state of affairs?

Mr. TILSON. I do not know whether you would call it disgraceful. It is unfortunate.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. About what does the best Springfield rifle cost the Government?

Mr. TILSON. There is a tragedy connected with that also. That rifle cost us fourteen or fifteen dollars, at a rough estimate, and now we can not produce it or purchase it for less than about $25. Twenty-one dollars and fifty cents, or something like that, is the least that we can produce it for now.

Mr. FARR. What does the Enfield cost?

Mr. TILSON. The other is practically the same.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Does the gentleman know what the contract price for the Enfield rifle is that they have just contracted for?

Mr. TILSON. No; I do not. I do not know whether that is information that they would care to have published. At any rate, I did not seek that information, but the cost of the rifle is something like $25.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman states that the Springfield rifle costs about fifteen or sixteen dollars. I would like to ask if that cost was based on the manufacture when they were making on the basis of 66,000 in two years and a half, or whether it is based on the calculation of 200,000 per year?

Mr. TILSON. All I have are the figures of the Ordnance Department, and I do not think those figures are too high. I do not think that they can produce them for that now.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Upon this subject the gentleman probably would like to state that there are about 300,000 Krag rifles which the Government owns?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; I referred to that a moment ago.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. If my colleague will simply permit an interruption, I want to ask him a question in connection with the question asked by my colleague from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], in which he stated that the fact that we have not manufactured more rifles than we have is certainly a disgraceful situation, or words to that effect. I desire to ask my colleague upon the committee if Congress has not in the past two or three years appropriated the money to provide for the manufacture of a very large number of rifles?

Mr. TILSON I do not believe there has been any fault on the part of Congress with regard to these appropriations within the last year.

Now, I would like to proceed, if my time is going to expire pretty soon, as I have a number of other things to which I would like to refer. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask at this point whether there will be any probability or possibility of my getting a little further time if I should yield further now? I should like to refer to some other matters here, and I dislike to refuse to yield.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 30 minutes.

Mr. RUCKER. Until he concludes his remarks.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 15 minutes without interruption. [Applause.]

Mr. FARR. I would like to ask the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Connecticut be permitted to proceed for 15 minutes without interruption. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I should object to that.

Mr. MANN. The time of the gentleman is not up yet.

Mr. TILSON. My point is, gentlemen, I have some other things here which are very important. Very interesting questions come up in connection with some of them, though I would like to yield to all if I had the time.

Mr. MANN. We would rather have the gentleman proceed.

Mr. TILSON. Then I will proceed, if I may. Before passing finally from the rifle, I would say that the question of the inter-changeability of the rifle is a very important one. All parts of it should be interchangeable, so that if any part of the rifle is out of order another can be substituted in its place. That means universal interchangeability, so that you can have one part manufactured in one factory and another part in another factory, and then bring them together and they would all fit.

In the case of artillery ammunition that is not so important, because when it is fired from the mouth of the cannon its interchangeability ceases to be a factor. Therefore it is a simpler matter of increasing the output of artillery ammunition than it is of rifles. The interchangeability of ammunition, which I have referred to several times, is important for this reason: On the western front they fight at least three divisions deep—one division at the front, one on the second line, and one further back. When the division in front has taken its turn it retires and another division moves up. If all these divisions are not armed with the same arm it is a very troublesome matter when the ammunition supply at the base or in the ammunition trains get mixed up. It is apt to be embarrassing when you get a wagonload of ammunition and do not know whether it fits your rifle or not. Imagine the situation out on the firing line when your ammunition runs out. Your neighbor has plenty of ammunition, but you can not use it. It has been embarrassing between France and Great Britain, particularly at those parts of the line where they come together. You have noted the fact that France has one part of the line, Great Britain another, and the Belgians another. Where they join each other there is always a problem. If we had an army in France the question of the transportation of ammunition would become a very serious one if we had to see to it that every box of ammunition that left this country went straight through until it reached our contingent of troops on the line. If, on the other hand, we were using the same ammunition that Great Britain, for instance, is using, we could ship so many thousand rounds of ammunition to one point and draw so many thousand rounds at another point, all fitting the rifle. It would simplify immensely the transportation problem. You would be able to take ammunition from your neighbor, you would be able to take ammunition from the dead and the wounded. It is really a very serious problem, and I do not know how it is going to be decided.

Regardless of what the situation is going to be when this war is over, whether it finds us with a large number of British rifles on our hands chambered for British ammunition, I am myself inclined to the opinion that it would be wiser for us to arm the men sent across the water with the rifle using the ammunition of the man whom he would have to fight alongside of. [Applause.]

I have here an exhibit of a French carbine—a light gun with which the light cavalry is armed—picked up on the field of battle. The caliber of the French gun is .315.

Mr. LITTLE. Before the gentleman leaves the question——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. No; go on!

Mr. LITTLE. I am trying to get information; that is what I am here for.

Mr. TILSON. This is a Mauser rifle used by Germany. It was picked up on the battle field in France. It was made in 1915, since the war began. This is a Russian rifle made by the Westinghouse people at Springfield, Mass., of which I spoke awhile ago. This is an Enfield rifle made in this country, of which we are prepared to make a great many.

Mr. FARR. How many total, if the gentleman thinks he should state that?

Mr. TILSON. I do not know that I could give the gentleman the exact information, or that I ought to give it to him if I had it, because this is a vital point; but we are prepared to make a large number of these rifles in this country.

Now, turning to the machine gun—and I wish to say that they use the same ammunition, by the way—I have here six, of various types. The first one on my right is the old light Hotchkiss gun, so called. The French name given to it is the Benet-Mercier gun. It is an air-cooled gun. We have a number of those still in service. France has a number of them, chambered for her own ammunition, of course, and they are still in use and a dangerous weapon.

We have here the Colt gun [indicating]—the Colt automatic, it is called. There have been a great many of these made for use in Russia. It is an air-cooled gun. It feeds from a belt running through here [indicating], 250 cartridges in a belt, the same as a number of the others here. It is a good rifle, but it has this objection, that in order to start the rifle you have to operate this lever first, to load it and start it, and then if the cartridge jams you have got to do that over again. More than that, you must have all of that room where the lever plays, because that lever goes up and down with each shot. That is one of its difficulties. The Marlin people have an improvement on that, and this is a gun of which they have furnished a great many [indicating]. They claim to have furnished 15,000 of those to the allies during the last year. If gentlemen will notice, it has the same lever that I spoke of the Colt automatic having, but they have added a number of improvements. There is this window through which to see if there is a jam, and it is a very useful improvement. It has this string here, so that you will not have to reach out in front in order to start the first cartridge. That is a good gun. They have used a great many of them in Europe and are using them to-day.

Of course, all of these guns are automatic in their action. They are what they call "gas-operated" guns.

Another type of that same gun made by the Marlin people is a still further improvement. They obviate that long lever that comes down. It works by a piston through here and operates the gun without the long lever. That is the gun they are now making for the Navy—for these small boats with which they go out and chase submarines.

Mr. ROWE. What is the range of that?

Mr. TILSON. The same as the Infantry rifle. The machine gun should always have the same ammunition. A great many of them are used on aeroplanes, and as the aeroplanes have a different base it is not so troublesome to use a different ammunition on the aeroplane guns. The Lewis gun, which is the farther one over there [indicating], has been used on aeroplanes probably more than any other, possibly because they had more of them. This one the Marlin people are making for the Navy. The Navy has ordered, I think, 1,600, if I remember correctly, of these guns to shoot submarine periscopes with. It operates by gas, and feeds from a belt the same as the other. It fires 250 shots. All you have to do is to load one shot, pull the trigger, and it does not stop until the 250 have been fired.

Mr. FARR. How rapidly can they prepare them?

Mr. TILSON. I do not know how soon they can be completed. A good part of the gun is the same that they have made many of for the allies. They are prepared to make them on a large scale.

This is the Vickers gun [indicating]. It is a very excellent gun, especially for defensive work. It is heavy. It is a water-cooled gun. This is a jacket [indicating], which is filled with water. It is cooled in that way, and this does not operate by the gas, but by the recoil itself direct. The others are operated by the gas coming down through an opening here [indicating] and operating the mechanism in that way. It has a very fine mechanism and is, in fact, a fine piece of machinery.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Which is the kind that our Army has been using?

Mr. TILSON. That is a kind we have ordered a considerable number of.

Mr. DOWELL. How long do those guns last? What is the life of the gun?

Mr. TILSON. The barrels do wear out rather rapidly when they get too hot. If you use them too long they get hot. Those are taken right out of there and a new barrel inserted. They carry an extra barrel along with it, and it can be put in very quickly.

The last machine gun I shall refer to is the Lewis gun. Perhaps there has been more talk about it than any other. It is fed from that magazine [indicating]. Here is one of the magazines filled with cartridges. You simply cock it once, pull the trigger, and it fires 47 times at the rate of 400 or 500 a minute. No gun can stand fire at that rate, however. It gets so hot in a very few minutes that it is unreliable. To fire it that fast is an impossibility. So it is not so important that you fire 500 shots in a minute. If you have shot 15 or 20 holes through a man it does not matter whether you shoot 15 or 20 more holes through him or not.

Mr. MANN. Which is the Lewis gun?

Mr. TILSON. This one here [indicating]. It is a gas gun, operated by gas, and is operated by a piston that comes back here [indicating]. It is really a very simple machine after all. It operates the machinery, turns the magazine, puts in another cartridge, and does the same thing over again. It is air cooled, too, but it has this difference that the other air-cooled guns I have spoken of do not have. That one [indicating], as you will notice, has a corrugated barrel. This one, the Lewis, has an aluminum jacket around it. The shape of the muzzle is such that when the gun is fired it produces a very great suction, drawing air through here, so that if you put pieces of tissue paper in rear of the gun when you fire it you will drag it out here, showing the great suction of air through the gun.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BOOHER). The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended half an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Connecticut be extended half an hour. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. I will try to get through before that time.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield for just a question?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT I did not want to break in when the gentleman was talking about the rifle.

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT The gentleman emphasized the fact that the British were using one kind of a rifle and the French were using another. That condition has continued during the three years of the war, has it not?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; very much to their regret.

Mr. HULBERT. So that if the United States Government were to discard the Springfield rifle and adopt the Enfield we might be in this position, that if we were fighting alongside the British we might be able to get supplies and ammunition from their men, while, on the other hand, if we were fighting alongside the French we would be at the same disadvantage as we would be at if we had a different rifle?

Mr. TILSON. Yes. We are not prepared to manufacture the French rifle at all, and we are prepared to manufacture the British rifle.

Mr. HULBERT. Have we not a reserve now of the Springfield rifle sufficient to equip the number of men we will be able to call out under the call, pursuant to this draft bill?

Mr. TILSON. Unfortunately, no. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] tells us that the latest information is that we have 690,000.

Mr. HULBERT. Is that the total number, or the reserve?

Mr. TILSON. All that we have.

Mr. HULBERT. Then in all we would discard 690,000, together with 300,000 Krag rifles?

Mr. TILSON. We have already discarded the 300,000 Krags, but we would not discard the Springfields. It would be a useful rifle to train with, and a great many rifles would have to be used in this country in war. We can not increase our output of Springfields, whereas we can make the Enfields quickly.

Mr. HULBERT. There are some gentlemen here who are interested in learning where the Lewis gun is manufactured.

Mr. TILSON. Well, the Lewis gun is manufactured in a number of places. It is being manufactured in large numbers now in Great Britain. It was being manufactured in Belgium. Then there is a large manufactory in this country turning out the Lewis gun, the Savage Arms Co., in the district of my friend from New York [Mr. SNYDER].

Mr. HULBERT. Then Lewis had to go first to Belgium and then to Great Britain in order to get the recognition of the merits of his gun?

Mr. TILSON. Well, unfortunately we were not interested in machine guns at that time. When that gun was first presented to our Government we were not interested in it as we are to-day, in the midst of a great war.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. I have heard it stated that one of the great defects of this new Lee-Enfield rifle is attributable to that spring and the proneness of that rifle to jam. Has the gentleman ever heard of that criticism made of that new Enfield?

Mr. TILSON. I have been told that that rifle would jam, but most rifles do to some extent.

Mr. HOWARD. I understood the gentleman to say that this was his choice of rifles.

Mr. TILSON. Oh, no. My choice is the Springfield.

Mr. HOWARD. Then this is the next best?

Mr. TILSON. No; it is not a case of next best. It is the only thing available.

Mr. HOWARD. This is the rifle that the British are using?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. They tell me it is very susceptible of jamming.

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. If a man were being shot at he would be apt to run before he could get that thing fixed after it jammed in that way.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. How many of these guns are of American invention and American manufacture?

Mr. TILSON. Every one of these machine guns is manufactured here. The only two guns that I have that were manufactured abroad are the French carbine and the German Mauser.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Are they all of American invention?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; I think they are all of American invention.

Mr. LITTLE. How about the supply of Enfields?

Mr. TILSON. Our capacity of manufacture is, at least, 15,000 a day.

Mr. LITTLE. Are there any on hand now?

Mr. TILSON. They are turning them out every day. The British Army is armed with them, and undoubtedly they have a large supply of them.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if I may have but a moment longer before leaving the subject of arms entirely, I want to present some pistols. This is the old Colt automatic and this is the new one. This our service pistol, the automatic pistol. It is a good pistol. It holds 10 cartridges in a magazine, and has three magazines, so that it holds 30 shots.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. How long does it take to load?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, it is loaded very rapidly. That is a good gun, and we are manufacturing them in large quantities, but we can not do it fast enough to equip all the officers that we are now going to take into the service.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Are they more desirable than the others?

Mr. TILSON. It will shoot more. You can get more metal out of the muzzle of that gun.

Mr MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will say, that in the judgment of men who are thoroughly familiar with it, that is the best pistol ever made.

Mr. TILSON. It is a good pistol.

Mr. HELM. Which one can you reload the fastest?

Mr. TILSON. The automatic. They are going to make some of that new model of Colt's, but we are not so hard up for pistols as we are with respect to some other things.

Now, just a few moments in regard to ammunition.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman kindly tell us the prices of these different weapons?

Mr. TILSON. The prices have all been upset by the increased cost of labor and material. The Colt automatic pistol used to cost about as much as the rifle, something like $15; but it costs a good deal more than that to make them now. Prices have all gone awry on pistols and rifles, the same as on many other things.

Now, coming to artillery ammunition, I hold in my hand the most common form of artillery projectile—the shrapnel. This is a 3-inch one. This which I hold in my hand is a sectionalized sample. Here are the 252 bullets incased in rosin. Here is the black powder charge at the base, and here is the time fuse which can be set to any time up to 21 seconds, so it is called the 21-second time fuse. The fire train is set off by the first concussion, when the projectile leaves the mouth of the cannon. That starts the fire train. It burns any number of seconds that it is set to burn, and then explodes. The object of the gunner is to make his shrapnel explode a short distance in front of his target. When this explodes at the base of the shrapnel these bullets leave the shell, expand in a fan-shaped stream, and go forward making a path of death in front of them. They are incased in rosin so that when the rosin burns it makes a little smoke so that you can see where the shell is exploding, whether short or over. The black powder is used in the base of the projectile for the same purpose, so as to help locate the next shot.

Mr. BRITTEN. The shell itself remains intact?

Mr. TILSON. The old shrapnel burst and flew in every direction, but the up-to-date shrapnel remains intact, except that the nose of it is blown off.

Mr. BRITTEN. And the effect is the same as though the shrapnel bullets came out of an auxiliary gun?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; the same as if you could sneak up within 75 yards of your enemy and discharge a short shotgun of that magnitude at him.

Mr. MEEKER. What is the range of that?

Mr. TILSON. This time fuse can be set for about 6,500 yards; but the ideal range, the best range, the range at which you can create the most havoc, is about 2 miles, about 3,500 yards.

Mr. MEEKER. I mean after the shrapnel bullets leave the shell.

Mr. TILSON. After the shrapnel bullets leave the shell they will go a long distance, depending on the distance from the gun where the shell explodes; but the black powder at the base of the shell gives it an additional impetus, as I recall it offhand, something like 200 feet per second additional to the velocity with which it is traveling when it explodes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. These shells are timed up to 21 seconds?

Mr. TILSON. Yes. That is the method of using shrapnel against troops in the open or behind slight defenses. For the deep trench work it is necessary to use high-explosive shells which are fired at a high angle and coming down enter the ground, and detonate after they have entered the ground, blowing up a tremendous crater. Of course, before the infantry can possibly advance you must use enough high-explosive shells to demolish all the wire entanglements, demolish the trenches in which the defenders are protected, and then produce your curtain of fire, by which you arrange to have a hail of these bullets falling from the shrapnel shells along a certain line. They can place them rather accurately, to hold back the defenders until the attackers can make their attack.

Mr. BRITTEN. Do these shells land point first, irrespective of the trajectory?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; they are so balanced that they will land point first, as I understand it.

Mr. BRITTEN. The Navy shell will not do that.

Mr. TILSON. The shrapnel shells are so balanced that they explode point first.

Mr. BRITTEN. Irrespective of the trajectory?

Mr. TILSON. Irrespective of the trajectory. I have here a complete shrapnel, just as it is fired, except that this is made of brass instead of steel, so as not to wear the rifling of the cannon. It is called a drill cartridge. You can use that over and over again without wearing out your rifling.

This large shell which I have just held up for your inspection is a 6-inch armor-piercing shell used by coast artillery guns. It weighs 108 pounds, and has a detonating fuse which delays the explosion until it has pierced the armor of a ship.

These are the things, gentlemen, of which we have to produce the most, and the problem of producing them is more largely dependent on the use of gauges and special tools than anything else. I have brought in here about 30 gauges, which are about one-tenth of the number necessary to make the shrapnel time fuse alone.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman says that after his speech of a year or two ago about these gauges we made an appropriation for their manufacture. Is it a fact that the Ordnance Department have not made any of the gauges then provided for, or have they made a portion of the number appropriated for?

Mr. TILSON. They are making them now. That is, they are contracting for them, and these gauges are being made, especially complete sets of master reference gauges. That is a very important point, that we make a complete set of gauges for all these different things, at least one master reference set, and we should have a set in the Bureau of Standards by which all of the others can be tested.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. We have approximately enough Springfield rifles to arm the Regular Army and the National Guard. If the Springfield factory was put to its utmost capacity, could it not turn out enough to arm the next increment of 500,000 men and then in a year have enough to arm the next 500,000 men?

Mr. TILSON. I have told the gentleman what our capacity is. The best estimate I can make is that it is about 500,000 in a year. That is all we can do, and that does not take anything into account for wastage. If we have 800,000 on hand, and the wastage should be 50 per cent in a year, we would not gain any at all.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. When they were drilling there would not be any wastage.

Mr. TILSON. No; just for drilling purposes the wastage would be very small indeed.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman from Connecticut yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. How do these Springfield rifles compare with the weapons now used by the French and British troops on the western front? Are they of the same caliber and the same kind?

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman was probably busy in his committee and not able to be present when I went over that in the first part of my remarks. What we need to-day more than anything else to increase our capacity for the manufacture of all necessary things so that we can make them by the repetitive process, the same process by which you make Ingersoll watches or anything of that kind; what we lack most are the supplies of the gauges, and these must be made by fine skilled mechanics—toolmakers. We have only a limited number of these men in this country, and they are largely engaged in making these things for others, so that it is a very difficult matter to increase the capacity for the manufacture of these things.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman explain how these gauges are used. They are for inspection, are they not?

Mr. TILSON. For illustration, take these two gauges. One is a maximum and one is a minimum for a certain purpose, in this case to determine the size of this screw. The screw must be so that it will go into one and must not go into the other. The difference between the two is called the tolerance—one is the "go" and the other is the "no go." The difference between some gauges in some classes of work is as small as one five-thousandth of an inch, so small that it is impossible for the natural eye to detect it. And yet these accurate tools must be used in order to make time fuses and other implements function properly.

Mr. SNYDER. The gauges are simply a test to determine when a part is made whether it will fit or not. Now, the complication in manufacturing additional Springfield guns, making them in a larger proportion than we now make them, would be that tools are one thing and gauges another. As the gentleman states, it takes 1,400 tools to turn out the parts of the Springfield gun. It means the tools for each one of the various machines used for the manufacture of the guns. In order to make a large number there must be a great duplication of these tools, a much larger proportion than the average man can conceive of. I simply want to get that clearly in the minds of gentlemen here—that gauges are one thing and tools for making the parts are quite as difficult to make, and have to be made in much larger numbers.

Mr. TILSON. The number of special tools is very important, and there are a number of other things, like jigs. In the manufacture of small-arms ammunition the dies by which you draw out the brass into the proper shape are necessary.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman inform the House as to the cost of the different machine guns he has here?

Mr. TILSON. The Lewis gun, I believe, is $750. The Vickers gun is about $2,700, including a number of extra parts, accessories, and the tripod, as I recall the testimony before our committee.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. And what about the Colt?

Mr. TILSON. I have not the cost of that.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Six hundred and fifty dollars. The Colt people furnish a tripod with their gun, while the Government is paying $250 for the tripod on the Vickers.

Mr. TILSON. They also have an improvement here, by which they can elevate the Vickers gun and use it as an antiaircraft gun.

Mr. MANN. Have we any of the Vickers guns?

Mr. TILSON We have ordered a number of those.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Four thousand.

Mr. TILSON. It is about time that deliveries were being made now. It is a fine type of gun.

Mr. FARR. How rapidly can they be made?

Mr. TILSON. I can not tell what the capacity is.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Where is it made?

Mr. TILSON. In Hartford, Conn. We have most of the Benet-Mercier gun. We bought a lot of the Lewis guns last summer—about 300—chambered for British ammunition. We have those; but I do not know whether we have any Vickers guns yet or not, but deliveries are to begin in this month.

Mr. FARR. When was the order given for the Vickers gun?

Mr. TILSON. It must have been a year ago.

Mr. LITTLE. How many Colts have you got?

Mr. TILSON. I do not know.

Mr. HULBERT. Has the gentleman got the price of the Benet-Mercier gun?

Mr. TILSON. I do not know what the price is; that is a gun that we have had a long time. The fact is that prices have been so upset lately that I did not attempt to provide myself with that information.

Mr. PLATT. Is there not the same difference in the artillery ammunition?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; the difference in caliber in the artillery has caused trouble in Europe, and will be a source of trouble for us. Our caliber is a little different—3 inch where the British is a little more than that.

Mr. PLATT. Are we prepared to make guns which the British are using?

Mr. SABATH. Faster than our own?

Mr. TILSON. I think we are prepared to manufacture them in larger quantities than we are our own.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Can the gentleman give an estimate of the actual cost of these guns and whether or not the value is largely in the patents?

Mr. TILSON. I am not prepared to go into that proposition and I really do not know as to what the principal element of the cost is. We have contracted for some of these guns and I could get the gentleman the contract price; but what enters into it, whether it be profits, patents, or what, I can not say.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Does the Government make any of those guns?

Mr. TILSON. No; the Government is not manufacturing any of these guns, so far as I know.

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman states that there are 4,000 machine guns ordered of that type. Is that correct?

Mr. TILSON. I did not state that. I do not know just how many of the Vickers type have been ordered. I do not think it is as many as that.

Mr. DOWELL. How many will it take to equip an army of half a million?

Mr. TILSON. That has not been determined. At the present time we are using only four machine guns to a regiment of troops. We know that is ridiculously small, and we have got to increase it. Gen. Wood, I believe, thinks we ought to have one machine gun for every 10 men, and we are going to try to get as many machine guns as we can. As I understand it, we are buying all of these different types, practically, that we can get that are workable, in order to supply our troops, so that we may have a sufficient number. So far we have an entirely inadequate supply.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it the idea of the department to have one machine gun for every 10 men in the service?

Mr. TILSON. I did not say that is so. I said that was the recommendation of a high general officer. I do not know what the policy of the department is.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman know what are being used by the French and English and German?

Mr. TILSON. There is no way of telling just how many are being used, but certainly a very great number of them are being used.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Which one of these guns is of the same type as that used so effectively in the defense of Columbus, N. Mex., which jammed?

Mr. TILSON. As I remember, it was the Benet-Mercier.

Mr. DILL. How many men does it take to handle the Vickers gun?

Mr. TILSON. Two men.

Mr. SNYDER. Some gentleman asked how many such guns were in use in England. I can tell the gentleman of one factory that has shipped 12,500 for use on the allied line.

Mr. FARR. From this country?

Mr. SNYDER. From this country.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman whether it is intended to use the Vickers gun for trench warfare or whether they are for defensive purposes?

Mr. TILSON. By and large the Vickers is a defensive gun. It is the heavier type gun and it serves its purpose better for defensive work, whereas the Lewis, the Colt, and the Marlin are better guns on the attack, because one man can take a gun on his shoulder and carry it forward.

Mr. HULBERT. What kind has been decided on by the War Department for a defensive gun?

Mr. TILSON. I will say to the gentleman that so far as I know the War Department is trying to get all of these guns, as many as they can get, different types.

Mr. SNYDER. Is it not a fact that both the Vickers gun and the Savage Arms gun, the Lewis gun, do exactly the same work, and answer exactly the same service, so far as the ammunition and the power of the gun is concerned, only that one is a light, mobile gun, and can be handled by one man, and even shot from the shoulder, whereas the other gun has to be carried into action by mules and handled by more than one man?

Mr. TILSON. And is put on a tripod.

Mr. FARR. Is the ammunition interchangeable?

Mr. TILSON. The ammunition is of the same type. The ammunition for the machine gun and the rifle must be the same.

Mr. FARR. Different machine guns?

Mr. TILSON. All. Mr. Chairman, there is one implement of warfare that I meant to have had here to-day but which I have not, and that is the aerial bomb. I have in my hand here a photograph of an aerial bomb which is a little over 6 feet tall, and weighs 100 pounds. It carries 40 pounds of high explosives, and dropped from any height it explodes about 6½ feet above the ground. In the tests that have been made, 8 out of 10 were perfect, and fired within 6 or 8 feet of the ground. They produce desolation and death for a circle of some 300 feet round about. A man takes one on an aeroplane and carries it over the object that he wishes to strike and drops it. It explodes just a few feet above the ground and literally destroys everything within the circle of its operation, about 300 feet.

Mr. HULBERT. Have we any of them in use?

Mr. TILSON. We have contracted for them; they are being built and have already been tested.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. May I ask the gentleman to say something about grenades and trench mortars?

Mr. TILSON. Yes. I meant to have some grenades here, but I was not able to get them. They are implements that we must make more of than we have already made, and they are under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has again expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have 10 minutes more. I desire to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I ought to ask the question or not, but the gentleman can do as he pleases about answering it. I do not know but what we have already been furnished information here which, if published, would render the gentleman who published it liable to imprisonment in the penitentiary if this espionage bill passes. I heard the other night Gen. Joffre state that if an American Army went over to France, while they might possibly take care of a division, still, if an army of any size was sent, even a corps, it would be necessary to provide from American transportation facilities, including a railroad, locomotives, cars, all ammunition, all supplies. Now, what I would like to ask the gentleman, and he can do as he pleases about answering it, if he knows, is whether we now have, and if we do not now have, how soon we can obtain, the necessary ammunition and guns to provide an army in France and take care of it from America with all that is necessary, not counting on being able to obtain anything whatever either from the English or French Governments?

Mr. TILSON. Well, there are a number of items in addition to those of which I have spoken in particular, the arms and ammunition, that might hinder the carrying out of such a plan. So far as arms and ammunition are concerned, those two things alone, I believe there would be no difficulty in placing three divisions in Europe with arms and ammunition, using our own arms, as the gentleman understands, the arms we now have.

Mr. MANN. Of course, three divisions is less than 100,000?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman speaks rather discouragingly, and it rather discourages, it seems to me, the idea of our being able to use anything over there.

Mr. TILSON. No; I was just telling the gentleman some of the difficulties in the way, some of the problems.

Mr. MANN. I understand. Does the gentleman know whether we will be able to furnish arms and ammunition for a reasonable army if we were to send one over there in the course of a few months, or maybe longer?

Mr. TILSON. I think it is doubtful as to our being able to furnish a sufficient supply; that is, if we are going to fight——

Mr. MANN. If it is doubtful——

Mr. TILSON. If we are going to fight. Of course, if it is sent for drill we have enough arms and ammunition to equip that many men for drilling.

Mr. MANN. If it is doubtful the doubt ought to be removed.

Mr. TILSON. The doubt may be in my mind only. It may be that other people may be clear about it, but in my mind it is quite doubtful.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TILSON. I will.

Mr. GARDNER. Is not the answer to that question that it depends a great deal on whether we go to their calibers or not? I mean to say, in other words, whether we are willing to take their guns which are in process of construction, their rifles rather than our own?

Mr. TILSON. No; for a small force that does not apply, because you see we have, according to the smallest estimate of the gentleman from Nebraska, about 690,000 rifles——

Mr. GARDNER. I know that.

Mr. TILSON. And we have at least 200,000,000 rounds, I know, of small-arms ammunition.

Mr. GARDNER. We had 195,000,000 rounds of ammunition for small arms and machine guns. For the Lewis guns we have got to have the rim cartridges, the English cartridges.

Mr. TILSON. They are prepared to make that gun chambered for our ammunition very soon. They claim it has already been demonstrated to use the American cartridge.

Mr. GARDNER. I know and the gentleman knows there has been so much informal talk lately to the effect that we had to go to their calibers, and I know the gentleman would be able to answer the gentleman's question. You hear around the War Department that we have got to go to their calibers in order to get the arms and ammunition that we will need to fight with.

Mr. TILSON. That is what I stated early in my remarks; that is my opinion.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I would like to yield but——

Mr. HELM. Just one question. The press dispatches indicate that the question of food and food supplies is a very critical one at the present time in all Europe and those supplies are to be drawn largely from the United States. I would like the gentleman to express an opinion, if he has it, whether if we are unable to supply the people in Europe with food, is it desirable to take a million or two Americans over there and run the risk of being able to supply them with food?

Mr. TILSON. That would depend upon how important it was that the million of men should go over there.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. TILSON. Well, if the gentleman will ask his question along the lines on which I have already proceeded I will, but I do not care to enter into any extraneous matters.

Mr. DOWELL. The question of equipping an army and sending it to France would imply the furnishing of machine guns——

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. In sufficient quantities. Does the gentleman know when these machine guns which we have ordered can be delivered, and can the gentleman tell us how soon we can have the number of machine guns necessary to equip such an army?

Mr. TILSON. Well, I have not the accurate information, and if I had the most accurate information the War Department itself has it might be, and would be, liable to be changed, because there are many things entering into the question of manufacture, especially in a time like this, when manufacturers are oftentimes unable to deliver for reasons over which they have no control.

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman would say that the Army should not be sent until it has been properly equipped with the modern guns?

Mr. TILSON. It goes without saying, we should not send an army until it is properly equipped.

Mr. REED. I am deeply grateful to the gentleman for his address on this subject, and I would like to ask him a question. Our serious problem is to get guns to the men on the firing line. Were the American manufacturers working up to their limit, say, a month ago in supplying the foreign trade?

Mr. TILSON. They were working up to their contracts with the foreigners and pretty well finishing their contracts. So far as the manufacture of arms and ammunition is concerned, they are pretty well finished on their contracts with the foreigners.

Mr. REED. Are the European nations getting guns fast enough with our help?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, yes; and they are making them themselves, especially in Great Britain. That country is turning out an immense number of arms.

Mr. FARR. What have we to do then to supply our own needs?

Mr. TILSON. To turn these private manufacturers that have been manufacturing for the foreigners toward the supplying of our own needs as rapidly as possible. In general that is the answer to the question.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Can the gentleman tell the House what percentage of the General Staff, the approximate percentage, is in favor of sending the troops to Europe now?

Mr. TILSON. No; I have no information on that point. I have not attempted to inform myself on that subject at all.

Mr. LONERGAN. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. LONERGAN For the information of the House I want to say that in Hartford, Conn., where the Colt Patent Firearms Co. has its plant, the president thereof informed me the other day that other manufacturers in and about the city of Hartford, for patriotic reasons, had transferred to the Colt Patent Firearms Co. skilled mechanics to the number of some hundred, and it would probably help the situation if manufacturers in other parts of the country would do likewise.

Mr. TILSON. That is correct.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the gentlemen of the House very sincerely for their patient and helpful attention. [Applause.]

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROWE].

Mr. ROWE. Mr. Chairman, when the war broke out between Germany and England a little over two and one-half years ago there were in the harbors of the United States 91 German vessels. The talk which we have just had and which closed with a reference to the difficulty which confronted the people of our country, the difficulty in getting an army over to Europe and then supplying them with ammunition and food is right in line with the joint resolution which is before the House to-day. These 91 vessels are still in our harbors. Part of them, or most of them, were kept in good repair for about two years, until the Germans began to realize that in all probability there would be war some time in the near future between the United States and Germany, when they proceeded to destroy the machinery in many of these vessels.

Now, when war actually broke out between the United States and Germany, the day the bill was passed in this House, somebody issued an order which caused the seizure by the United States Government of all the German vessels in our harbors. They were seized even before the President of the United States had signed the bill. So these vessels to-day are in our control; they are in our possession. Many of them will require a great deal of repairing. Some of them it will take more than four months to put in repair. But there are others of them, and some of the most vital and most necessary for us, are ready at this moment to go to sea. These 91 ships amount to 594,696 gross tons. They are worth more than $100,000,000 to-day. They are worth a great deal more than that to our country, because they are vessels which we can put to use at once in carrying men and provisions between this country and Europe.

Now, a good deal has been said about the condition of these vessels, as to just who owns them and just who has the real interest in them. There was no testimony taken before our committee as to the condition of them. Many have spoken of what they had read in the newspapers and what has been reported since. There is no question as to one fact, I think, and that is that five or six of the smallest of these vessels, all of them freighters, were transferred by one of these German companies to the Atlas Co. That transfer was made at the request of the attorneys for one of the trust companies in New York. That trust company had a claim of $2,000,000 and they asked for security. The first security offered to them was a mortgage on the vessels of the Hamburg-American Line. Their attorney said:

> That is not proper security. We doubt very much whether your agents in this country have the authority to mortgage your property.

This was before war was declared between the United States and Germany. And then the German companies proposed that they be transferred to the Atlas Co. In New York it is generally reported that the Atlas Co., which is an American company, has all the stock subscribed or held by American citizens, but nobody doubts its control. Indeed, the agents of the company say it is controlled by the German company. To this Atlas Co. were transferred these vessels, and then they were mortgaged by this company to the trust company.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROWE. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Do the hearings of the committee show——

Mr. ROWE. The hearings do not. We had only executive sessions. The hearings do not show.

Mr. BORLAND. There are no hearings published?

Mr. ROWE. I should not have brought this up except it has been discussed formerly on the floor here.

Mr. BORLAND. I would like to know, if you could disclose it, the stockholders in this Atlas Co.

Mr. ROWE. Now, it is generally reported both in New York and in Washington that these five vessels are at this time under contract of sale on which there is said to have been paid $200,000 to the Carr Steamship Co., an American company owned and controlled by American citizens. The Carr Co. is under a very large contract to deliver produce and ammunition to Italy, as I am informed by one of my colleagues.

I should say that this contract of sale of these five freighters was said to have been executed on the very day that we passed the resolution declaring war. There has been no attempt, I believe, to complete the transfer of these vessels or to carry out that contract.

Now, if you will look at this bill you will see that it does not direct the President of the United States to take these vessels.

It authorizes the President to do certain things, beginning on the sixth line of the second page. It says:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to take over to the United States the immediate possession and title of any vessel within the jurisdiction thereof, including the Canal Zone and all territories and insular possessions of the United States except the American Virgin Islands, which at the time of coming into such jurisdiction was owned in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen, or subject of any nation with which the United States may be at war when such vessel shall be taken, or was flying the flag of or was under register of any such nation or any political subdivision or municipality thereof; and, through the United States Shipping Board, or any department or agency of the Government, to operate, lease, charter, and equip such vessel in any service of the United States, or in any commerce, foreign or coastwise.

Now something has got to be done to protect American citizens. This bill has already been passed in the form in which it comes to us by the Senate of the United States. If it passes this body it immediately becomes a law, and we take possession of the vessels.

Such seizures are made in most of the States of the Union, and afterwards they settle the bill. We even take real estate in my State and afterwards condemn the property and find the value. It is done when the real estate is wanted and wanted immediately. Here is something that we want. We must have ships that can carry freight and soldiers from this country and Canada to Europe.

There is no man in this House to-day that wants us to take advantage of the private citizens of the United States or the private citizens even of Germany. They must and will be paid. We do hold, however, that no money that is paid for these vessels should be transferred to any German citizen or to the German Government before this war is closed. I personally would like very much if we could settle with all American citizens for every bit of property taken during the war, and settle immediately. That is what I would like. But we have no time to find the value of these vessels. We must have the vessels and have them now. Let us at the proper time find out who really has an interest in these so-called German vessels. There are probably many other claims against some or all of them, for they have been more than two and a half years shut within the harbors of the United States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, one school of publicists holds that treaties are but "scraps of paper," and that they yield to policy in war times. Since the outbreak of the European war we have seen practices in contravention of international law indulged in by both of the belligerent European powers. When the chairman of the committee comes before this House and advocates that the owners of these vessels, whether they are enemy foreign subjects or American citizens, have no right of claim to be reimbursed, I wish to take issue with that position. As I read international law, even though these ships are owned by enemy foreign subjects the latter-day principle of the latest and best writers on international law renders this property exempt from seizure.

I wish to cite in confirmation of that postition what Lawrence says in his recent work on international law. I direct your attention to page 456, in which he uses this language:

The sixth Hague convention of 1907 conferred an incomplete and limited immunity on three classes of merchantmen: Those who are found in an enemy port at the commencement of hostilities—

And I assume that these German vessels are included in that category—

Those who enter such a port ignorant that war has broken out, and having left their last port of departure while peace existed; and those who are encountered on the high seas in the same condition of ignorance, and having sailed before the war began from the last port at which they had previously touched.

On page 458 he summarizes with this postulate of the rule of law that should be applicable in cases of private foreign ships:

In one case, only is confiscation permitted, and that is when detained merchantmen shows by their build that they are meant to be converted into warships.

It is true that the sixth convention of 1907, which was referred to by Lawrence, was not an article that was joined in by the United States. Article 2 of that convention reads as follows:

A merchant ship unable, owing to circumstances of force majeure, to leave the enemy port in the period contemplated in the above article—

Namely, article 1, which provides for days of grace after war is declared—or which was not allowed to leave, can not be confiscated.

Though the United States is not one of the signatory powers to that article, it was not because our representatives at the Hague conference did not approve of all the articles as stated in that convention, but our representatives held that they did not go far enough to protect these foreign private ships in case war was declared.

I fully approve of the policy that is provided for in this bill for the Government to appropriate these foreign interned ships, but I also wish to advocate the duty of the Government to pay those rightful owners, whoever they may be, for the use of those ships.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is so well established in international law that the property of foreign subjects domiciled in this country at the outbreak of war is beyond seizure except for the purposes of the Government, and if taken by the Government they must be compensated for it. That principle is akin to that providing compensation for these interned ships; that being interned here, the owners not having the privilege of leaving port except by rushing into the jaws of destruction, are entitled to have their rights conserved and recognized in the courts of this country. And I make this claim, that if Germany accords to our citizens in their courts the same right to sue the Government as is accorded aliens in the Court of Claims, if she accords them reciprocal rights, then these foreign subjects, upon the seizure of their property, have the right to go into the Court of Claims and prosecute their claim for indemnity or for the return of the property. I shall not take up the time to call the attention of the committee to the clauses under the judicial code that authorize such procedure. In another body when this resolution was suddenly presented for consideration reference was made to the case of United States against Russell, Thirteenth Wallace, page 623, as justifying our action in appropriating these private vessels. I wish to read from that decision, which has been many times referred to approvingly in subsequent decisions of the Supreme Court, and to call attention to the principle which I am enunciating here, that if we confiscate this property for war's ends—and I claim that is the only justification, because of the need at the present time to assist our Government in this war in the transportation of munitions and troops—then we must recognize the rights of property, and the owners are entitled to be reimbursed by our Government.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. As soon as I read this citation. The United States against Russell was a case where the property was not appropriated as is proposed here, but where, during the Civil War, vessels of American registry and owned by Americans were requisitioned; and the Supreme Court, in the decision rendered by Mr. Justice Clifford, upheld the right of the claimant to be reimbursed for the use of the vessels requisitioned during the war by the Army officers. Mr. Justice Clifford uses certain language, to which I wish to call the attention of the House:

And it is equally clear that the taking of such property under such circumstances—

Referring to the emergency of the public service in time of war—

creates an obligation on the part of the Government to reimburse the owner to the full value of the service. Private rights, under such extreme and imperious circumstances, must give way for the time to the public good, but the Government must make full restitution for the sacrifice.

That principle has been approved in subsequent decisions of the Supreme Court. Now I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. I want to ask the gentleman: If we were to take these German ships and employ them in our service, and they were taken over into the danger zone and sunk by a German submarine, would he still contend that we ought to pay for them?

Mr. STAFFORD. There is a distinction made in international law between belligerent public vessels and private vessels owned by foreign subjects. There is no question but what if these ships were public vessels, cruisers, submarines or the like, owned by the German Government, we would have a right to confiscate them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. STAFFORD. Undoubtedly we would have a right to confiscate them if they were public vessels of the enemy, but as these vessels are the private property of subjects of the alien country, we should in conscience reimburse them, just as under international law we are bounden to reimburse Germans or Austrians in this country in case the Government should have need to take for war purposes any of their private property. Why, no one claims that bonds, money, or any other property of foreigners domiciled in this country can be taken by the Government without the owners being compensated. If the Government would appropriate the product of a woolen mill owned by German aliens domiciled here, the Government would certainly be obligated to pay for the property taken. The mere fact that the woolen goods were seized by German warships as contraband would not impair the rights of the original owner to compensation for his property. So with these private vessels, though they are movable, nevertheless they are private personal property. They are the private property of these stockholders, just as bonds owned by enemy aliens in this country are their private property; and if perchance they are destroyed by a submarine attack of the enemy that does not destroy the rights of these alien owners to their rights of property, which are recognized in international law.

Under this resolution, exercising the war powers of Congress, we are appropriating the property of foreign subjects, but I contend that we should compensate them for that property. And no matter what consequences may befall the use of that property, we are appropriating it for the use of the Government, and their private rights can not be affected by a use over which it has no control.

Mr. BORLAND. No; but the act that I am speaking of is the act of the Government of Germany. Suppose, when we send these ships over to the other side, Germany should sink them?

Mr. STAFFORD. If the ships were our enemy's property, public ships, well and good; but the rights of private property are secure, and the owners of these ships are not assenting to the action of this Government. If the property of these private owners is sunk, it will be directly due to the action of our Government in taking the property and using it for its own needs.

Mr. BRITTEN. Putting it into the war zone.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman stated awhile ago that the declaration of The Hague was his authority for the position that these vessels should not be confiscated. Is it not a fact that The Hague declaration was followed by the declaration of London, concurred in by both the United States and Germany, and that it contained a provision that no ships attempting to run a blockade could be captured as prizes and be sunk unless such ships endangered the capturing ship or endangered the enterprise upon which it was engaged, and then only after removing all of the passengers from the ship to a place of safety?

Mr. STAFFORD. I decline to yield any further. I am fully acquainted with the declaration of London. That has nothing to do with this discussion at all.

Mr. STEVENSON. Has not Germany repudiated all of these conventions by her action in sinking vessels without warning?

Mr. STAFFORD. One minute; I am not going into the past history of the positions of the two belligerent powers—Great Britain and her allies and Germany and the central powers. I will call the attention of the gentleman from South Carolina to this fact, that Germany was willing at the outset of the European war to adhere to every principle laid down by the declaration of London, but the British Government, which, through Earl Grey, inaugurated the convention that met in London in 1908–9, declined absolutely to be bound by it. That is an academic question that has no relevancy to this question. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he can find in either one of the sections of the joint resolution as reported to the House a denial of the principle he is arguing for?

Mr. STAFFORD. The chairman of the committee stated very positively that there was no liability at all on the part of the United States to compensate the owners of these vessels. The gentleman from New York who just preceded me [Mr. ROWE] also took that position, that there was no liability, whether the property was owned by United States citizens or foreign subjects.

Mr. ROWE. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I took just the opposite position.

Mr. STAFFORD. I understood the gentleman to say that there would be no recognition of liability until the war was at an end. Here is a peculiar feature about that. The bill does rather contradict the position of the distinguished chairman of the committee. The bill provides, in section 2, for the means whereby the Secretary of the Navy may appraise the property that is taken over and says that that appraisal shall be considered as competent evidence in all proceedings hereafter authorized in any claim for compensation. That rather presupposes that some person somewhere will make a claim for damages.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsion has again expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for two minutes.

Mr. EDMONDS. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman will yield, I want to say that the chairman of the committee did say that we have the right to confiscate these ships, and I gave as my authority the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, which fully carried that out. I also said that it had been the policy of our Government when property was taken of enemy subjects to compensate the owners thereof.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman deny that he used the language that there was no liability at all on the part of the United States?

Mr. ALEXANDER. There is no liability, strictly; no.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman cited a decision over 100 years old. We all know and recognize the principle that the Supreme Court will follow in its decision, so far as public matters are concerned, the policy of the political department of the Government that determines its foreign policy. The case that the gentleman referred to, decided over 100 years ago and reported in Eighth Cranch, was decided when international law was one thing, but here are our representatives at The Hague convention agreeing to initiate a totally different policy, and the Supreme Court would accept the policy of the State Department in passing upon these rights.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. The authority of international law that the gentleman read from states that these vessels that arrived here in ignorance of the existence of war, which had been prevented from leaving our ports within the prescribed time, would be compensated for. Now, these vessels were not prevented from leaving our harbor; they could have left at any time; we did not prevent them.

Mr. STAFFORD. The authority I read from contains direct approval of the position that enemy merchant ships in ports of the enemy at the outbreak of war are exempt from confiscation.

Mr. STEENERSON. If the gentleman will read it over, he will find that it will not include the class he describes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The authority I read from gave three classes of merchant vessels that were exempt to which I direct special attention. The first class was those who are found in an enemy port at the commencement of hostilities. These ships were found in the enemy ports of the United States—that is one of the classes.

Mr. STEENERSON. What are the other classes?

Mr. STAFFORD. The other two classes are where they enter the port after the declaration of war, where they enter without knowing that war has been declared. The first class covers this case exactly.

Mr. STEENERSON. I understood that that was modified by the succeeding paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; if the gentleman will read the text, he will see that my position is well taken.

Further, Mr. Chairman, in the case of the Buena Ventura, in One hundred and seventy-fifth United States Reports, page 384, the Supreme Court followed the liberal policy of our Government in recognizing as exempt from seizure private merchant vessels owned by enemy subjects in giving a liberal construction of the proclamation of President McKinley at the outbreak of the Spanish-American War, in exempting from seizure Spanish merchant ships that had left our ports prior to the declaration of war and was taken as a prize by one of our warships on the high seas. Though the language of the proclamation did not specifically exempt this merchant ship from capture, still the Supreme Court held that it came within its purview, and that in construing the proclamation—to refer to the prior views of the executive department of the Government as evidence of its policy regarding the subject. A reference to the views that have heretofore been announced by the executive department is made in Third Wharton, supra, and will be found that they are in entire accord with the most liberal spirit for the treatment of noncombatant vessels of the enemy.

Reading from the decision on page 389—

In that case the Supreme Court decided that the ship was exempt and that the claimant should be awarded the moneys arising from the sale of the ship.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if it is the accepted principle of international law that the Government has no right to appropriate the property of aliens domiciled in this country without compensation certainly we can claim that it is an equitable act to compensate the owners of these vessels, whether they are subjects of Germany domiciled here or abroad. Why, there are instances in the practice of nations in war times where enemy governments have declined even to confiscate a war vessel that was driven into their harbors by reason of stress conditions. And yet these vessels that sought our ports as a haven of refuge at the beginning of the war and could not with safety leave because of the British vessels being on patrol outside should not be appropriated without compensation to their owners. I approve of the right to take them, but I dissent from the principle that we should not compensate the owners of private property in this country taken for the use of the Government.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended one hour, so that I may yield some time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that his time be extended one hour. Is there objection

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in the discussion of this bill I would like to be brief and state plainly and clearly a few thoughts that I wish to present. There is no question in this bill of a violation of any treaty that we have or had with Germany. Of course, if Germany has violated her treaty, it would not be binding on us, since a treaty can not be unilateral. But the article of the treaty sometimes referred to as being possibly in conflict with this bill is article 23, which provides for the safety of property and the right of removal of property of the citizens of a nation with whom we are at war for a limited time after the declaration of war. There is nothing in this case applicable to that, because that applies to resident merchants in this country citizens of the enemy nation. These ships are not supposed to belong to resident merchants in America of German citizenship. Nor, indeed, if that were the case, if the article in question applied to German citizens living outside of our country, would this bill violate it. This bill simply sets in motion the power of eminent domain of the Government to take the property of an alien or of a citizen, and the Government has the right in a case of public necessity arising from war to take over the property of its own citizens, and certainly no less the property of any other resident human being within its borders. But under all our practice it has been the custom when taking the property of our citizens under the right of eminent domain to compensate them for that property, and consequently this resolution provides that when these ships are taken there shall be a survey and estimate of the value of the ship at the time the ship is taken, with a view to using that evidence in future court proceedings which are authorized by this bill to be instituted by any citizen of America. When those court proceedings are instituted the court will determine whether or not the citizen is damaged, and this bill provides that in ascertaining whether the citizen is damaged the court shall inquire into the real truth and not merely the legal status of the property. If an American has the legal title to the ship, say, but if it is shown that the beneficial title is in a German citizen, in a German land, the American will not get judgment under the authority of this resolution, for this resolution provides only that American citizens under its terms may sue the Government to reclaim or to secure such damages as they are entitled to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. I think I will get to the part the gentleman has in mind.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to inquire of the gentleman where that provision is?

Mr. HARDY. The provision is that any person or corporation may institute suit against the United States, but the second part of the section provides that in order to recover judgment the claimant must prove that he was the owner at the time of the taking of the interest for whose taking he seeks compensation; that is to say, that the American citizen must so prove.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the gentleman is reading from a part of the bill that has been eliminated by the committee.

Mr. HARDY. I am reading from the bill which we are asking the House to adopt.

Mr. STAFFORD. From what section is the gentleman reading?

Mr. HARDY. Section 3.

Mr. MANN. There is no section 3.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that by the action of the committee that section was eliminated.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman is correct. That was the form in which the House bill stood, and is perhaps what will be embodied in future legislation. But in order to expedite this legislation we have eliminated all except the first and second sections. As the bill now stands we have only section 1 and section 2, which is the form in which the resolution was passed by the Senate. Section 2 provides for a survey and estimate of the value of the ships taken over. It does it in order that that survey might be held as prima facie evidence of the facts; that is, of the value of the ships when taken over. It does not undertake to decide the matter or manner of compensation now. We leave the final settlement of the claims of American citizens and of all others to be ascertained and determined by proceedings that may be instituted under the laws that will be passed when Congress has ample time to pass those laws.

I take it that the rights of German citizens as against the American Government for property of theirs that is taken under this law will in its ultimate conclusion depend largely upon the action of the German Government with reference to the property of our citizens which may be taken over by that Government, and that that will be settled in the final terms of peace under the treaties which may be negotiated between this Government and the German Government; and if we, in accordance with the ideas of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], were to give the right now to a German citizen to go into our court and establish his claim and obtain judgment against the Government of the United States for damages, we would then leave our citizens hopeless for any recovery in Germany after the war was ended, and I think we would do something that no nation ever has done, or ever will do, if, pending the war and while the war is going on, we authorize German citizens to institute a suit against our Government for property taken belonging to them and recover judgment and obtain compensation before that war is ended. That is what the gentleman from Wisconsin wants us to do.

I want to say that, so far as our policy as a nation is concerned, from its foundation it has never been a policy of ruthless power. We have never intended, never desired, and never will desire to wrongfully take the property of citizens of any nation, even though we are at war with that nation. It has been our policy that any property which comes rightfully within our jurisdiction will have all of the rights of its owner preserved, and when this war is ended there will not be a German right which will be violated by the American people, and I believe I know this Congress well enough to know that it will never use its power to take from any man, German, Austrian, Englishman, Frenchman, or American, any right that justly belongs to him, but we do not propose to settle up the claims that should be settled by the German Government for and with its citizens before we know what Germany will do with American rights. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this is a very simple proposition. There are over 600,000 tons of German shipping in our ports, which we urgently need now in war times. This bill should be passed in 20 minutes. We take those vessels, and under section 2 we arrive at their value as best we can, and wait until the war is ended to determine what remedies, rights, and recompenses we shall grant to those damaged.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said that we ought to wait to see what Germany will do with our citizens in Germany and their property, as I understood him?

Mr. HARDY. I think so; yes. In other words, I think these rights should be determined by the treaty that determines the end of the war.

Mr. MANN. If we seize property here belonging to German citizens, will anybody quarrel with Germany if she seizes property over there belonging to American citizens?

Mr. HARDY. Whether we quarrel with it or not, she will seize the property in case of necessity.

Mr. MANN. She has not done it yet.

Mr. HARDY. I do not know whether we have any there that is needed for war purposes.

Mr. MANN. Oh, that does not make any difference. This has not anything to do with war. If we commence to seize property belonging to German citizens here, we must expect that Germany will seize property over there belonging to American citizens.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman assumes the very point of controversy—that this has not anything to do with war. These are ships that are useful in time of war. We are taking over ships that belong to our citizens. A Member of Congress told me lately that he is interested in some of the ships that have already been taken over.

If we did not need these ships in war, if it was a house or lot or money belonging to German citizens in the bank, I should be against seizing it, but these are thought necessary in the conduct of our war, and we would take them even if they were American ships, and we do propose to take them.

Mr. MANN. We do not take them as warships.

Mr. HARDY. We take them as warships in the sense that we take them for the purposes of war.

Mr. MANN. We take them to help carry on the war in one sense, to help transport materials——

Mr. HARDY. Like Gen. Jackson took cotton to carry on the war.

Mr. MANN. That would justify the taking of money; that is the same thing; that would justify Germany in taking anything belonging to American citizens.

Mr. HARDY. I do not know whether gentlemen draw any distinction between Gen. Jackson taking cotton at New Orleans and taking money or not, but it is a well-recognized fact that under the right of eminent domain the Government takes the things necessary for its defense.

Mr. MANN. And when we commence taking things belonging to German citizens, then Germany will commence taking things belonging to American citizens. It is pure hypocrisy——

Mr. HARDY. There is no hypocrisy about it. It is pure hypocrisy for any man to say it is not necessary to take those ships for the purpose of carrying on the war, whether they belong to American citizens or foreigners. [Applause.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I only rose to present one phase of this matter. I am in favor of this bill which appropriates the interned ships of Germany, with which we are at war. I think it can be justified upon the ground of emergency and necessity, but at the same time I do not believe there should remain the slightest question that there should be compensation to the owners of these ships to the extent of their value as of the present time. This bill is silent upon the question of compensation. There is evidently serious doubt in the minds of some Members of this House and many distinguished international lawyers of the country regarding the duty of the United States to make compensation or payments for these vessels. For instance, I read in a recent issue of the New York Times a most interesting contribution by Prof. Albert Bushnell Hart, professor of history in Harvard University, in which he endeavored to sustain the contention that because of our treaty relations with the German Government and because of the acts of Germany toward us that we would be justified not only in taking and using but actually confiscating these ships.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. HICKS. I know when the war broke out, or shortly afterwards, it was stated in the papers in many cases American automobilists traveling through Germany had their automobiles seized by the German Government for use of the German Army. Is not that a fact and is not that something in the same line as the taking of these ships at the present time?

Mr. SMALL. Assuming it is a fact and about which I have not accurate knowledge, but I will come to the inference the gentleman seeks to draw from that in a moment. I was not convinced by this most illuminating contribution by Prof. Hart as to the justification of the United States in taking over these ships without making compensation.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I will.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does the gentleman from North Carolina esteem Prof. Hart, for whom I entertain the highest respect, to be an international lawyer?

Mr. SMALL. Well, he is a recognized authority on the history not only of our own country but the history of other countries, and his opinion is entitled to consideration upon any international question.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I just wanted the gentleman's views about it.

Mr. SMALL. At any rate, he did not succeed in convincing me. What I have in my mind regarding the attitude of our Government toward these ships is this, that we should do the thing which is actuated by the principles of fairness and of justice and of righteousness, regardless of what Germany does to us.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. Does not the gentleman recognize the fact that by only incorporating sections 1 and 2 in this bill, finding the value and leaving it there as the permanent finding, that we put ourselves in the attitude by future legislation to do whatever Congress in deliberate purpose may find to be just?

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman is entirely right, and I have no disposition to criticize the committee in not providing in this bill any specific declaration upon compensation; but as a Member of this House, believing that we are big enough and rich enough to do exact and even justice, without regard to what is done by any other country, I wish to make, even from an humble source, an expression of what I believe ought to be the attitude of the United States upon this question, and whenever the time shall come, and I am not in favor of postponing that time until we can weigh up in the scales the acts of Germany so as to determine whether by reason of these acts we should do an act of justice or not, that I am in favor of this great country doing justice, regardless of the attitudes or acts of any other country.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. Is not there great force in the suggestion made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] when he says that it would be very unwise for us at this time to make any declaration regarding that matter, for the reason that necessarily there will be a treaty at the close of this war between Germany and the United States, and in such treaties all these matters are the matters that are determined by treaties as to the rights of individuals respectively against the other countries for damages for the destruction of their property? That is always included in such treaties, and is it not wise for us now not to put any provision in this bill, because that will be attended to when the treaty relations between the Governments are closed at the end of the war?

Mr. SMALL. I admit, Mr. Chairman, there seem to be strong reasons for that, and I so endeavored to express myself a moment ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for just another question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I ask that he may have five minutes more.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY. I would just like to call the gentleman's attention to another thing along that line. The rights of our citizens against foreign governments is never presented through a suit against those governments, but through diplomatic representation of our diplomatic agents. The rights of German citizens will be ascertained after this war is over through diplomatic channels, by diplomatic methods, by the German Government, and our citizens will have their rights established in the same manner. So that a claim for damages now would be extremely contrary to international custom, it seems to me.

Mr. SMALL. I am not prepared to make the contention that our relationship toward this question in making compensation should be set forth in this bill, nor am I particular as to when it is done, although I do not think there should be any undue delay. The only point I make is that we should do that which is right and just with relation to our appropriation of these ships.

Mr. Chairman, the President has said, and I take it it is the sentiment of every intelligent and just-minded citizen in our country, that the private property of alien enemies within the United States shall be scrupulously respected and preserved. These ships in large degree, if not altogether, are the property of residents or citizens of the Imperial German Government. Simply because this property consists of ships instead of money in bank or real estate located here, or buildings, or movable personal property, does not in my mind differentiate them so as to apply a rule of right to one and not to the other. And it is because I have strong convictions upon this question, because I believe we should do that which is right and just, regardless of what other countries do, that I desired to make this brief expression at this time.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes.

Mr. HELM. Is it not a fact that two of the German ships, one at Charleston, S. C., and another at the Island of Guam, in American territory, were blown up and scuttled by the German officers? Is not that a fact?

Mr. SMALL. I understand so.

Mr. HELM. And did not the Germans by that fact recognize or forecast the possibility of the United States Government taking charge of or confiscating these ships, and was it not done to prevent that very thing?

Mr. SMALL. If I were to attempt to decide this question upon resentment, by any doctrine of reprisal, by any desire to gauge my principles of integrity and honesty by that which my enemy does, I might be induced to take a different position. But the point I am making is that because of orders by the German Government or German officers these ships were damaged or because of any other acts for which the owners of these ships were not responsible, while they might arouse my indignation, it does not make me willing to forget the principles of right and justice and have this great Government destroy and confiscate the property of innocent citizens of Germany who have their investments in this class of property. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS].

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I am going to use a few minutes to bring before the House the status of these ships. In the first place, we made a treaty with Prussia in 1799. This treaty ran for 10 years. After the expiration there was no treaty made until 1828, when we made another treaty with the same Government, which was ratified in 1829 and was good for 12 years, and to be extended after the 12 years annually without it was disagreed to by the parties signatory thereto.

In the treaty of 1829 sections 13 to 24, inclusive, of the treaty of 1799 were reenacted. Article XXIII of the act of 1799 gave all German citizens nine months in which to dispose of their property and carry off their effects without molestation; that is, German citizens residing in this country, and, as afterwards proven by a decision of the court, not exactly proven in a German case, but proven by decision of the court—would include ship property. Now, Article XXIV at the end states this, and this was a part of the 1799 treaty and included in the 1828 treaty:

And it is declared that neither the pretense that war dissolves all treaties nor any other whatever shall be considered as annulling or suspending this and the next preceding article; but, on the contrary, that the state of war is precisely that for which they are provided, and during which they are to be as sacredly observed as the most acknowledged articles in the law of nature and nations.

I am sure there was no intention to confiscate this property. It was simply left open for adjudication at an early date.

We need the ships. There is no question about that. We have got to have them. They are lying useless in the harbors, and the attorneys of the Hamburg-American Line do not make any question as to our power to take them. They simply state that in so far as the resolution empowers the President to take over the ships of the Hamburg-American Line they do not raise any question.

We take the ships. We have arranged to leave the question of compensation open. The treaty is here. Undoubtedly all those questions will be brought up when this case will be adjudicated in the Court of Claims, where they have a right to take it.

In the case of Wagner against The Juniata, Twenty-eighth Federal Cases, page 3821, the court reaffirming the principle stated by Chief Justice Marshall, said:

In respect to the vessel herself, now in the port of New Orleans, I consider the reasoning of the court equally strong against the claim of the libellant; she is to all intents and purposes property as much infraterritorial, within the limits of the United States, as the cargo placed in store a few hundred yards from the shore where she is moored; and she can with no more reason be said to be beyond the territorial limits of the United States than the river upon whose waters she is now floating.

Now, gentlemen, undoubtedly the committee, realizing that the Government needed these ships, has taken the best course that it is possible to devise to take possession of them at this time, and has left the question entirely as to how they were to be settled for open for the future.

Now, I want to go into the question that was brought up this morning as to the Guarantee Trust Co., of New York, which has loaned to the Hamburg-American Line money for carrying on the necessary repairs, and so forth, to these ships while lying in harbor. The Guarantee Trust Co., in order to be protected, undoubtedly had the Hamburg-American people turn these ships over to the Atlas Steamship Co., and the Atlas Steamship Co. endeavored to sell them when they found the war was coming on to the Karr Steamship Co. The Atlas Co. has nothing to fear. They have the right to libel any money that would come from the United States Government to the German owners and get their money out of it. I am not a lawyer, but I may say confidently that they will be taken care of in the settlement that will eventually be made for the ships.

The question was brought up as to why we left out the ships in the Virgin Islands. If you will read article 2 of our treaty with Denmark you will notice this:

But it is understood that this cession does not in any respect impair private rights which by law belong to the peaceful possession of property of all kinds by private individuals of whatsoever nationality, by municipalities, public or private establishments, ecclesiastical or civic bodies, or any other associations having legal capacity to acquire and possess property in the islands ceded.

You will see the reason why they were left out, because otherwise there would be a question as to whether or not they would be covered by the treaty made with Denmark.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. EDMONDS. With pleasure.

Mr. HICKS. This may not have a particular bearing on this matter, but it is a matter of general information. For a year or more it has been rumored that the German Emperor, either as an individual or as an official of the state, has been a large owner in the North German Lloyd Line. Has the gentleman heard as to that?

Mr. EDMONDS. I have never heard from the German Emperor on that, but I have heard rumors about it.

Mr. HICKS. Is there anything on that point in the hearings?

Mr. EDMONDS. There is nothing in the hearings in regard to the ownership.

Mr. HICKS. I did not wish to accuse the gentleman of undue familiarity with the German Kaiser. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMONDS. Well, we have met quite a number of noblemen here lately, and I thought possible the gentleman might have thought I had met the German Emperor. [Laughter.] I want to read from a joint resolution of the House of Representatives, approved on April 28, 1904. I read:

It is the sense of the Congress of the United States that it is desirable, in the interest of uniformity of action by the maritime states of the world in time of war, that the President endeavor to bring about an understanding among the principal maritime powers with a view of incorporating into the permanent law of civilized nations the principle of the exemption of all private property at sea, not contraband of war, from capture or destruction by belligerents.

Now, gentlemen, you will see that the House and the Congress has at all times stood for fair compensation for anything it has taken belonging to anybody else, whether belonging to our own citizens or to foreign citizens. I think we can afford to pass this resolution and leave it to the court to pass upon in due time what we are to pay for these ships. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back three minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I can hardly say in five minutes what I had hoped to say on one feature of this resolution—rather on a question growing out of it—that I wanted specially to speak to. It has been discussed and hinted at once of twice to-day, and I had hoped to have the privilege of at least expressing my views upon it more fully than I can do in five minutes.

The whole civilized world was horror-stricken when a high and responsible official of the Imperial German Government, in 1914, admitted that the action then contemplated by his Government in the invasion of Belgium was contrary to international law and broke solemn treaties. Treaties are the method by which governments from time immemorial have obligated themselves, the one to the other—and they were spoken of as "scraps of paper."

I believe that that is the most impressive outstanding feature, aside from the personal misery, of the whole war. It is whether the obligations of states, one with the other, shall be treated so lightly as to be discarded "scraps of paper." It is highly important, if we are to preserve a vestige of civilization, that we should get that thought out of the minds of men. We must have treaties. No better device for contractual engagements between states has ever been suggested, and it may be said that, in the main, they have been lived up to; and I believe that the world will return to them with renewed faith and with a greater fervor for their enforcement, with a stronger, clearer acknowledgment of their importance.

The thirteenth article of the treaty of 1785, repeated in the treaty of 1799, just referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS], and carried again into the treaty of 1828, sets forth certain reasonable, Christian, and humane rules for the conduct of the two Governments that were going into that agreement at the time for the treatment of the nationals of each if they should unfortunately ever engage in war. The purpose of Article XIII was to mitigate the horrors of war and to compel respect for the rights of property of private citizens and to secure decent treatment for individuals forced to reside in an enemy country.

I am convinced that section 2 of this resolution designedly recognizes that obligation in the words that permit a board of survey to be appointed to value this property that we are about to appropriate to our military use.

It is a recognition of the fact that the obligations of the three treaties to which I have referred—of 1785, 1799, and 1828—still bear on us, are still to be respected in principle; and I am delighted to know that the chairman of the committee [Mr. ALEXANDER] was wise enough to have those obligations recognized in the way he did, and incorporated in the resolution itself.

A few days ago I had occasion to visit the Patent Office and had a most interesting talk with the Commissioner of Patents. My business touched on the question of the right of Americans to use patents of German citizens taken out in the United States. I learned from him that there is to-day in Great Britain and in Germany, notwithstanding their intense hostility to each other, a respect for the patent laws of the respective countries; and he told me, upon what authority I do not know—I simply accepted his statement—that to-day patents taken out by Englishmen in the German Empire and being used there, either by the Government or by individuals with the consent of the Government, are respected to the extent that the royalties earned are set aside and kept for the benefit of the owners of the patents, and that the same thing is being done in Great Britain as to German patents; and that after the war the individual citizens who own them will be compensated for the use of them during this period of war when ordinary international commerce has been suspended. Now, we ought to cultivate that spirit; we ought to do all that we can to reestablish international law, and treaties that are international law as between the two parties making the contract. We can not build up civilization, we can not provide anything like a reasonable scheme for the maintenance of peace between the governments of the world unless we do respect that principle; and I would like to have it known to the whole world that it is the opinion of the American Congress, without additional legislation being necessary, that private property rights that were undertaken to be cared for in the three treaties I have mentioned are to be respected, and that the United States, at least, is going to conduct its war upon the basis of justice to private citizens; and that after the war is over we stand willing actually, in spirit and in fact, to help the world reestablish itself on a basis of sanity, and meantime we are going to keep the faith to which we are plighted.

Mr. Chairman, the fact that treaties have been broken and that people who were our friends have now for the time being become our enemies, ought not to cause us to set aside all the decent and well-conceived laws of the past for the recognition of their rights and the governing and protection of personally innocent and unoffending individuals. The most distressing feature of the situation in this country is the intolerant spirit shown by some of our people. Regardless of treaties I have heard a demand that we should take the property of Germans in the United States. Because a man has the temerity to stand up and plead for justice to citizens of an enemy country, who unfortunately happen to be here, he is frequently denounced as pro-German; because he merely stands for reason, for common sense, and for recognition of the principles that this Government has stood for from the beginning, and which I am proud to say I believe it will stand for until the end. These intolerant people, these people who believe it to be the duty of every citizen to hate the individuals of another country with which his is engaged in war, have been manifesting a hostility that is not creditable to them as men, and certainly if shared in by this Government as a political entity will reflect no credit upon it. [Applause.]

I yield back to the gentleman from Missouri the remainder of my time.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] use some of his time?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has used all his time.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended one hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that his time be extended one hour. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HADLEY] 10 minutes.

Mr. HADLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire or purpose to repeat arguments which have been made before the committee in so far as I have heard them. I think the time has come when this resolution ought to be passed as expeditiously as possible, though it should have due consideration.

There is one point to which I wish to address myself very briefly, which was being touched upon by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] when I was called out. Not having heard his remarks, I wish to allude to that phase of the resolution, though it may be somewhat of a repetition. I do not know about that. I refer to the second section of the resolution.

There seems to be quite a difference of view as to what we ought to do with regard to the question of compensation. I take it, when this discussion has been analyzed, there is really no serious controversy over any other question, if indeed there is a controversy there. There should be none upon that point. I desire to draw the attention of the committee directly to what the resolution provides in terms. It provides that the Secretary of the Navy shall appoint a board, with the approval of the President, to make a survey of the vessels which it is proposed to take over, with a view to determining their actual value at the time they are taken; and not only the vessels but the equipment and appurtenances and all property contained therein at the time of the taking. And what is the purpose of that survey? It is in order that it be preserved as a permanent record for future use in the event it should become necessary to consider the question of compensation. It is to be preserved, and to be submitted in any court of competent jurisdiction that may deal with that subject. That is expressly provided by the resolution.

It is true that the resolution does not in terms declare that compensation shall be paid. It is equally true that it does not either declare or intimate that compensation shall not be paid. It simply provides the present machinery whereby the evidence of value shall not only be ascertained but that it shall be preserved; and having been ascertained and preserved, it makes it mandatory, in the terms of the resolution, that such evidence shall be recognized as competent proof in any court having jurisdiction. At all events that is the effect of this language:

These findings—

Meaning the findings of the board of survey—

shall be considered as competent evidence in all proceedings on any claim for compensation.

How much further can Congress go at this time? How much further should it go than to preserve for the benefit of all persons who may be interested in the subject matter the evidence to which the owner may appeal in the future to show his damage? We ought not now to attempt to define the measure of damage, or to define the principle upon which compensation shall be paid; but we ought to preserve the means of determining the elements of value which go to the determination of the question of compensation and the measure of damage, in any court in which the question may subsequently arise. In my judgment that is as far as we ought to go at this time. We recognize that compensation may be due or may not be due. We recognize that under the circumstances of the case that question may arise, and it is proposed in the resolution to take the only sensible, reasonable, and practical means, as I look at it, of preserving the record for the benefit of whoever may be interested, whether he be alien or citizen. Then whatever court may hereafter be applied to, whether it be a prize court, court of claims, or any other court of competent jurisdiction, it will be a matter for that court to determine whether the compensation will be paid and not a question for us now to determine. It is not feasible and not practicable that we should attempt to determine that matter or to preserve any other right except to preserve all the means by which the real parties in interest may be protected if they ought to be protected. That is as far, I think, as we ought to go.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HADLEY. I will.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does not the gentleman think that after the war in an adjustment made by special commissions or diplomatic agents these records would be useful, and the fact that Congress did take such pains to prepare for the making and preservation of the records would indicate a disposition on the part of the Representatives of the people in this country that that should be the policy of the Government?

Mr. HADLEY. That is correct and represents my view. I thank the gentleman for eliciting it. In addition to the preservation of the record for court procedure, it will be useful in the determination of questions arising on the treaty of peace that may be entered into at the conclusion of the war, and, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas, will show the resolution and purpose on the part of the Government to recognize the claim for damages in case the party has a right to it.

It has been stated that we have 600,000 gross tons, approximately, of German tonnage to be affected, exclusive of that of other countries, or about 350,000 net tons. Everyone concedes and recognizes the immediate, urgent, and pressing necessity on the part of this Government for additional tonnage. I regard it as not only our right under the authorities which have been cited and under the statements made by the distinguished chairman of the committee to take this tonnage over, but under the circumstances—the war in which we are engaged and the circumstances which led up to it—it is our duty to do so and our duty to impress it into the service of the country for the prosecution of our commercial business and for the purpose of contributing to the support of the armies of the allies as well as our own.

I do not desire to repeat the arguments and go over the discussion of international treaties, because they have been very fully presented. I wished primarily to speak on the question of the construction of the second section of the resolution. I hope gentlemen considering the resolution will not lose sight of the fact that, while the committee did not attempt to provide the machinery for the final solution and determination of the matter, it did not ignore the fact that compensation might be had. I think the committee has done the proper thing in providing the means of ascertaining the value, so that the determination of the question of compensation in the future may be had if, indeed, it should arise. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, the remarks that I desired to make have been anticipated by the lucid statement of the gentleman from Washington, who has just taken his seat.

It appears to me the resolution has gone as far as it is practicable to go, as far as sound expediency and wisdom will justify. We can not go further, because we have no information to enable us to go further. There may be in the progress of this war developments that will enter into this question, and that different application of the principles will be then considered from what would now be considered if action had finally to be taken at this time.

That is to say, Mr. Chairman, that we can not do exact justice until we have all the facts in hand and the final accounting is taken. I do not take the view of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] that we should now utter or proclaim an abstract rule of justice respecting our contemplated conduct. I view this matter largely as one of offset and of accounting. If we have claims against Germany and Germany has claims against us, they can only be determined in or at the final accounting.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. For a question.

Mr. HARDY. And that will be through a representation of the diplomatic agents of the several Governments representing its citizens?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I imagine that would be the agency or instrumentality to ascertain these facts and to perform such accounting and settlement.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I will.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it not the modern approved practice in the settlement of claims of this character that there shall be appointed by the final treaty a commission to determine the respective claims of individuals arising out of the war?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think that has been the practice, but I do not desire to discuss the practice; I only wish to impress the fact that the claims of the United States and the claims of Germany are not separable. They are related and inseparable in the final accounting, and to do justice we must have them both at hand and give them both consideration and a fair apportionment.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. For a question.

Mr. COX. I agree with the gentleman's last statement. Now, this provision proposes to only deal with vessels owned by citizens and corporations subjects of Germany. Suppose in the last analysis it should be determined that the German Government owns some of these vessels or all of them. What effect would that have?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would rather not go into that now. I suppose it would be a very pregnant matter to be considered at the time of final settlement, and, as I said at the opening of my brief remarks, we do not have at hand the facts by which we would be justified in going any further at this time than this resolution prescribes.

We can now and in the progress of events catch the facts and incidents living, as they arise, and hold them to be hereafter submitted as evidence in the final adjustment between Germany and the United States.

May I be permitted one other remark in relation to the suggestion of my friend from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN]? I expect to see the United States practice the most rigid lines of justice and adherence to her treaties; but what circumstances may hereafter occur to disrupt, neutralize, or modify our treaty rights we do not now know, we can not now foresee. To say now that we can lay down a hard and fast line as to exactly what we will do without knowing what Germany will do or has done is to jump into the dark. All we can do is to do what we have done, to take the appraisement or survey of these vessels as they now stand, fresh in our minds as the incident occurs, and hold it hereafter as evidence to be submitted to the appropriate tribunal that will finally determine the mutual offsets, which offsets may not all now be in existence but may hereafter arise from time to time until the conflict is ended.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I shall not use the 10 minutes for the very good reason that what I had in mind to say has been better said than I could have said it. There is no question about not only the right but the duty of the United States at this time to take over these ships. What has been done and what shall be done with respect to the taking of the ships is a matter that appeals to everyone, layman as well as legislator, and those who have given no attention whatever to the study of international law as well as to those who have given it a most thorough study.

I have been impressed, the more I have thought about it, with the fears of those who have raised the question as to whether or not justice would be done to the owners of these ships at the close of the war. I do not agree that any settlement should be made at this time with the owners of these ships; but the owners of these ships need have no fear; they need not look forward to a time when the war shall have been ended to any difficulty they will have in getting justice from the United States. As to whether or not these ships shall become the victims of submarines at the hands of the German Government raises a question that will no doubt enter into the settlement of the matter of the payment for these ships; but the Government of the United States has always maintained its position of adhering with the strictest account to every treaty that it has entered into and to every obligation that it has assumed or that is thrust upon it, and that will be true with respect to these ships and to every incident growing out of this war as it has with respect to every other. The owners of the ships and the German Government may well look back to the action of the United States at the termination of the Spanish-American War, when this Government did more than was really expected of it by the vanquished. We did more for Spain than Spain had a right to expect. We did more for Spain than many of the people of the United States believed we ought to do; but it was the policy of the Government to do just what was done. That is the American feeling, and has been. That is the spirit of the American soldier at the termination of a war in which he has been a conqueror. Gen. Grant said to Gen. Lee and his men, "Keep your side arms and take your horses; you will need them for the spring plowing." That is the American spirit. So, I say, there need be no apprehension upon the part of the rightful owners of these ships with respect to the manner in which they shall be treated at the termination of the war. But we can not say now—we can not say here—what the conditions will be between now and the end of the war. We can not say what the treaty of peace or what range of subjects the treaty of peace will cover; but that treaty will make provision for such commissions as are necessary to adjust the matters growing out of the war with respect to the claims of citizens of foreign countries residing here, whether belligerents or otherwise, whose property has been affected during the war.

That is all I had in mind to say, and I would not have stated it if it had not been that it has seemed to me there has been some anxiety here for fear that the Government of the United States would take advantage of its power in the premises and in the final conclusion not do justice by the owners of any property it may seize for war purposes. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM].

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the resolution is abundantly safeguarded from every angle. It preserves and protects international and treaty rights.

My purpose in consuming this short period of time is not so much to discuss the resolution as it is to discuss a matter which

I think is pertinent and relevant at this time. The resolution proposes to take over 95 ships of gross tonnage of 628,837 and a net tonnage of 371,028. We are constructing 1,000 merchant ships. The necessity for this measure is obvious. The further necessity of keeping all of these ships afloat is the acute, the paramount, undertaking upon the part of the United States. We will not only need all of this tonnage and all that we can construct, but far more to carry munitions and supplies to the allies or to the American soldiers when they go to Europe. It seems to me that we ought to learn a lesson from the mistakes in the past. England for over a year has been arming her merchantmen without avail. A very small per cent of the English merchantmen, of the French merchantmen, of the Italian merchantmen that have been attacked by submarines have escaped. Now, let the United States profit by their example, and it seems to me that the proper thing, the first thing, for this Government to do is to take the necessary steps to avoid the very losses and misfortunes that have befallen the allies, and which they have been unable to avoid up to this time. It occurs to me that the sensible, common-sense conclusion is that the arming of these ships by the allies has been almost a total failure.

Now, after we have taken over these ships, how are we to keep them afloat? The only way, I think—there has been no answer yet discovered to the submarine question—is to furnish protection by convoys, and it occurs to me that no American ships ought to leave American ports until they are grouped or assembled in sufficient numbers and convoys are supplied to guarantee a safe passage from the American port to the ports of those countries with which the so-called central powers are at war.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. Do I understand the gentleman to contend that unarmed merchant ships are safer from submarine attacks than armed merchant ships, and if so, why. Why does the gentleman make such a distinction?

Mr. HELM. The unarmed ships are not safer, but the armed ships are not safe. The press dispatches state that 400,000 tonnage was sunk in one week very recently. Does the gentleman contend that that was a safe way to go to sea with those ships, which were armed merchantmen and yet were sunk? I contend that neither the armed merchantmen nor the unarmed merchantmen are safe at sea, and the thing that ought to interest the United States at the very beginning is to profit by the mistakes made by the allies and send our ships guarded and convoyed by submarine chasers and destroyers—small craft that present a small target, possessing the very highest speed, and are capable of fully protecting the American merchant ships.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman says whether a ship is armed or unarmed it is still subject to attack, and the unarmed ships have fared just as the armed ships——

Mr. HELM. Substantially the same.

Mr. BORLAND. Is it not the case that some of the armed ships have escaped and have successfully repelled the attacks of the submarines?

Mr. HELM. In a very negligible number, and I expect that the unarmed merchant ships of high speed have escaped just about as frequently as the armed ships of similar speed.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HELM. Yes.

Mr. COX. Has the gentleman any authentic record or data showing that any armed ship has sunk any submarine?

Mr. HELM. I have never read of it. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee for a few moments to a very important matter not directly connected with this discussion; however, it is indirectly connected with it. We are here considering the question of the transportation of men and of arms and of ammunition and of food products and other material to support our army that we shall send across the seas. I think we are beginning to understand, many of us, at least, the vast importance of the food question and its exceeding difficulty. We will be called upon shortly to consider legislation affecting it. I want to call attention to a phase of the matter that has been called to my attention by a letter I have just received this morning from a member of the Iowa Legislature, who is a large farmer and whose words are entitled to special consideration. What he says regarding conditions in the Middle West is as true of the other States where the great bulk of our food products must come from as it is the particular locality to which he refers, and I am going to read to the committee a part at least of this statement. He says:

> Since Congress has passed the conscription plan of raising an army, and, as I understand it, left it to the President to make exemptions, he should make his exemptions known without delay in regard to those in pursuit of agriculture if he intends so to do.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption right there?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has that bill yet passed Congress?

Mr. TOWNER. No, sir; but a bill has passed the House and a bill has passed the Senate and the conference bill will soon become a law, we all hope and believe.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman will agree that he could not make the selection until the bill passes specifying who shall come within those exemptions?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly; but what I am trying to impress upon Congress is the fact that those exemptions and all matters affecting the planting of crops should be passed upon and determined just as soon as possible.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I quite agree with the gentleman there.

Mr. TOWNER. I hope the gentleman will not understand that my suggestion is made in any spirit of criticism. It certainly is not, because I think we are all equally interested in doing everything we can do and in assisting in doing everything that should be done to carry on successfully this war. He says:

> The reason for so doing is this: Corn is now from $1.50 to $1.75 in the market and wheat $2.50 to $3, and with the comparative failure of this year's wheat crop all energies should be bent on planting as much corn as possible. Now to the point I desire to raise. If the farmer is in doubt about his help for the summer he can not and will not go after it with the determination necessary for desired results.

I presume gentlemen well understand that in the State of Iowa we have no large cities. Our State is almost exclusively an agricultural State. We will have to furnish our quota for the Army according to the population of the State. Unless there are exemptions made from the agricultural classes, it will take almost our entire quota, or a large portion of it, from the farmers of the State of Iowa. Now, if there are exemptions to be made in favor of the farmers in order that the crops may be largely increased and preserved, then whatever is done should be known just as early as possible.

If there are no exemptions to be made, it is equally important that our farmers should know it.

Mr. COX. Is it not true that the farmers of Iowa and Indiana now and for several years have been subject to a great shortage of farm labor?

Mr. TOWNER. I was just going to say that. I am glad my friend called my attention to it. Conditions are deplorable in his State and in mine with regard to farm help. It is almost impossible to secure it throughout all the Middle West. Farms are not being cultivated to crops because of the fact that help can not be obtained to do it, and that is the condition especially in the State of Iowa.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does not the condition pertain very generally throughout the United States?

Mr. TOWNER. I presume it does, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield to an interruption?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. FESS. Just this last week I received a letter from a farmer in my section of the State saying that the employment bureau of Dayton had sent out to his farm certain laborers, and he said that these laborers wanted to sit out in the evening until 11 o'clock and smoke cigarettes, and they could not get them up in the morning. And he asked if there was not something that could be done, so that they could get better labor. This is all that we can do now; but what can be done?

Mr. TOWNER. I have no doubt that conditions exist all over the agricultural parts of the United States where ineffective laborers will be sent for the purpose of taking care of this serious condition. Of course they will not be able to meet the shortage with such kind of help, for, as the gentleman suggests, such help is worse than valueless.

Mr. FESS. The word goes out that they are furnishing labor but the labor is really no labor at all.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say this, too, that there is hardly a town in the State of Iowa where there is a commercial organization in existence where they are not taking steps to secure, if possible, farm help. They are taking an inventory of the farms that need farm help. They are sending everywhere they can think of for laborers. They are promising men that if they will come from other places and work on the farms of Iowa they will pay their transportation there and back and give them an assurance of large wages.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Did not this House vote a little while ago that we did not want farm laborers, when they could not read and write?

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman will excuse me from answering that question now, I am sure.

I want to read a further statement of my correspondent from Iowa:

Now to the point I desire to raise. If the farmer is in doubt about his help for the summer, he can not and will not go after it with the determination necessary for desired results. On the other hand, if the President (or Congress) would announce, now, that the persons in agricultural pursuits will be exempt until the crop is in for this season, all the farmers, young and old, would take hold with the determination of carrying out their calculation in planting the biggest corn crop ever known. Furthermore it would have a tendency to bring the city lad to the farm or enlist, which might help out the present shortage of labor on the farms. It is now corn planting time—

And I ask special attention to this statement—

It is now corn planting time and not more than half of the corn ground broken up, and none of it finished for planting as yet, and that is the condition in southwestern Iowa. What about the more northern parts?

In confirmation of that I have also received this morning a letter from one of our large merchants, a very intelligent, capable, and reliable man, in which he says:

Rain for past two weeks. Snowed all day yesterday. Farmers discouraged on crop prospects.

It will be seen, I think, from these statements that the crop condition is not favorable. The prospects are not good for a large crop, though everything is being done that can be done to secure one. Certainly, at this time everyone who has any interest not only in the prosecution of the war across the seas but in looking after the welfare of our own people here in the United States should carefully consider that we may do everything that we possibly can to insure as large a crop as can possibly be raised this year.

Mr. SNOOK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will yield.

Mr. SNOOK. I represent a district in Ohio something like that which the gentleman represents in Iowa, purely agricultural, and I would like to ask him this question: Is it his idea that on the first draft that shall be made no farm laborers or farmers shall be drafted?

Mr. TOWNER. That is not for me to say. The gentleman has heard on the floor and has read in the newspapers the statement that it will be necessary to make some exceptions with regard to agricultural help.

Mr. SNOOK. What is the gentleman's idea with regard to that?

Mr. TOWNER. It would hardly be proper for me to express an opinion now. That is a matter that has been left to the President. I might venture to say, however, that it would be a great mistake, in my judgment, to take from the farms the small amount of help they now have. There can be no more important work than raising crops now. I have no disposition to criticize the President with regard to it, because I do not know what that attitude will be. But whatever is done should be done quickly. The farmers ought to know at once what they may expect. The planting and sowing time is passing, and will not come again this year. Of course I realize it can not be done until the bill finally becomes a law. But that will be within a few days. I am trying to impress upon the Members of Congress the vast importance of the conditions that we have to meet, and to call their attention to some of the problems that arise in the minds of the farmers regarding existing conditions. Just a few days ago——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO].

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, the United States are now at war with one of the most powerful, scientific, and efficient nations of the world, and it becomes the duty of all Americans to act together and in harmony, to the end of organizing our country in such a way as to bring this war to a successful termination, and as speedily as possible. In order to accomplish this result we are brought face to face with great problems which require cool men, deep thinkers, and courageous action to solve. We must not lose patience with honest and sincere men who differ with us in the plans of solution of these problems. We must assume that the aim of each and every one is the good of our country. Our President, who is not only the head of the Nation but the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, has appealed to every American to speak, act, and serve together to meet our Nation's supreme test. This appeal will no doubt meet with the hearty response of the American people.

While it is true that the best guide for the present and the future is the experience of the past, we must not lose sight of the fact that conditions have changed; that this war is a war of science and machinery. The invention of the flying machine and the submarine and the other modern implements of war and the scientific methods in which the war is being carried on makes it absolutely necessary to have perfect organization and efficiency and trained men to meet like conditions on the enemy side. We must not rely altogether on what we have been told by 4th of July orators to win this war. It is best that we should realize from the first what we have and what we lack, so as to prepare thoroughly for success in the end. Our democracy is engaged in the business of preparing to uphold its ideals with arms. The soul of this process is willingness to cooperate; the first requisite is readiness to cast aside prejudice, self interest, class interest, sectional interest, and every kind of crystallized demarcation, and merge into a voluntary whole. We must not try to ride hobbies on the horse of war.

I have listened attentively to the discussions here, and have read with deep interest a great deal on the important questions now before us, and I am led to submit a few suggestions for consideration.

All the military experts and men promiment in civil life agree that a well-organized and efficient Army and Navy must have back of it the mobilization of all the resources of the country; and it becomes necessary for us to do important things that we have neglected in times of peace. All are agreed upon the proposition that the immediate need of our Nation to-day is our food supply, and especially for the present year. Not only that the demand here and abroad has increased tremendously, but as a result of bad seasons the food reserves of the world are low. There is no doubt that the acreage and production will be increased, and if men think and act wisely this problem will be solved satisfactorily. But it is not amiss to encourage our farmers to increase their food production so that they can live more at home and at the same time be in position to supply the great demands to be made upon them by men engaged in other industries and by our military forces.

There is no assignable limit to the vegetables, truck crops, fruits, and poultry products which the people of the country will produce if they can get fair marketing, transportation facilities, and fair prices, and are not subjected to unfair governmental regulations. But how much this will benefit the cities will depend on the cities themselves to a large extent. They should know as much about their food supply as they do about their water supply, and its processes must be as pure and as uncontaminated.

The farmers will need some financial assistance because of higher prices for seed and labor and the need of machine power to make up for lack of man power. The Federal Farm Loan Board can do a good deal to accomplish this, but some of the needs are sudden—short-time needs—and must be met by quick mobilization of money. Much new land will be worked if this is done in time. The factories work on a guaranteed basis, and it may become necessary to give the food makers the same assurance. This Government must build or, at least, secure control of adequate cold storage for the perishable foodstuffs, like fruit, eggs, potatoes, and cabbage. It is the fall glut in those which makes their production hazardous to the farmers, and steps must be taken to obviate this danger.

I believe, too, that our Government should and will rise to the importance of seeing that certain unscrupulous middle men and speculators, who take advantage of just such a situation as exists to-day to demand abnormal prices from the consumers for products which they have bought from the producers much cheaper, are dealt with with a rigid hand.

I have heard a good deal since the war broke out about cutting down the cotton crop and increasing the food crop of the South. This is a question that should be dealt with very carefully. Very few people seem to realize that cotton is a food and feed crop. If the South raises less than 12,000,000 bales of cotton in 1917 this Government will realize that a calamity has befallen it. We all know the necessity of the lint from the cotton for clothing and munitions, but few think about what a 12,000,000-bale crop means in food and feed. Twelve million bales of cotton produces, after reserving seed for planting the next crop, 1,400,000,000 pounds of oil—more than twice the amount of creamery butter in the whole United States. Such a crop of cotton means in feed 3,800,000,000 pounds of cottonseed meal, which, pound for pound, has twice the food value of corn, and yet cottonseed meal sells, pound for pound, at about two-thirds the price of corn. Such a crop of cotton means 2,400,000,000 pounds of hulls, which, pound for pound, have a feed value about equal to timothy hay, and yet hulls sell for about one-half the price of timothy hay. Holland, one of the greatest dairy countries in the world, encourages her people to churn cottonseed oil and other vegetable oils in their milk, which produces palatable and wholesome margarine, from which she furnishes England millions of pounds for food.

But without curtailing too much the cotton crop, the South should plant more corn. The great sheet anchor of the United States against any real shortage of food is the corn crop. It makes most of our meat and, if absolutely necessary, it might make all our bread. I have often been told by old Confederate soldiers how they marched and fought in the Civil War on corn bread baked in camp. The farmers and millers of the country should prepare for an expansion of the corn-meal business.

We should, too, at this time, popularize rice as an article of food in those sections where it has dropped backward somewhat in the last years. The consumption of rice has not increased with its production, and we Americans to-day actually use less per capita than our ancestors did long ago. Its general use will not only increase the acreage and production, but will mean the saving of millions of dollars to the consumers who are compelled to pay exorbitant prices for wheat bead. We must demonstrate to the people as soon as possible how to properly cook rice, not only in custards and desserts but as a bread. It will be remembered that in the Russo-Japanese War, in all of their great campaigns, rice was one of the staple foods of the armies of Japan. I believe that its extensive use by our armies would be a big saving to the Government, and its transportation can be handled just as easily as flour. Like cotton, rice also furnishes some valuable by-products. Rice bran and rice polish are unexcelled as feeds for cattle and hogs.

But further than the mere production, I believe that right now is the time to look into the conservation, preservation, and transportation of our foodstuff—even before it has been produced. What good will it do to encourage increased production of foodstuffs if, when the farmers' products are ready for market, we are lacking in transportation facilities? We know that we will be short in tin and short of glass to preserve our food, and we should begin now to teach our people to save the supply that we have. We should teach our farmers the process of dehydration, which is so well understood and used in Europe. Then, too, we must realize that if we suffered from car shortage in times of peace, we are apt to suffer more in the months that are before us. I know from personal experience last year, when I waited for days for an empty car to ship some corn that I had for sale. And I know that this has been the experience throughout the country with all those who had anything to ship. When perishable foods are ready, they must move at once if the people in the congested centers are to be relieved and the farmers are to receive a fair compensation for their labors.

We must not only increase our railroad facilities and furnish cars to those who may need them and when they need them, but this is the time for our Government to correct a serious mistake made in the past; that is, improve our waterways and shipping facilities on them. Nature has given us the most magnificent system of waterways in the world, and we have done less as a nation to improve and use this system than any other nation in the world that assumes to be progressive. We must awaken to the importance of improving our waterways systematically, not only to accommodate our commerce, domestic and foreign, but for military purposes as well.

I recently read from an article by Sir Edward Bruce Hamly, in his Operations of War, where he states the following:

> The means of supplying troops in the field is not restricted to roads and railways. Canals and navigable rivers, where their direction is suitable, form valuable lines of supply. They have, too, the great advantages over railways and even over roads that they are not vulnerable except only at canal locks, and these locks are usually further apart than vulnerable points on a railway. Another advantage may be claimed for them in comparison with roads: they do not wear out, and though severe frosts, floods, and high winds may affect movement on them, progress on roads may be equally delayed by bad weather.

I believe we should devote our immediate attention to this phase of preparedness.

While we are doing all we can to hasten the building of our merchant ships for the purpose of assisting our allies in carrying products from this country to Europe, we must not neglect the necessity of improving our coastwise and inland shipping. The withdrawal of too many vessels engaged in local traffic would cause more harm than good in the end. It would demoralize our transportation service, render it impossible to move our food and other crops as rapidly as they ought to be moved, and bring about a condition of congestion extremely injurious to the whole situation. The railroads have broken down several times because of congestion in the months passed, and the situation would be made far worse if the coastwise vessels which have transported so many tons throughout the country were taken away from our own needs at this time. The very large traffic, for instance, which now finds its way to New York from Pacific points by way of the Panama Canal, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Atlantic seaboard would have to be carried to a large extent by the railway companies, if coastwise shipping were to be materially restricted. Thousands of miles of railroads in the Southern States now used in connection with Gulf shipping and the Atlantic seaboard would be crippled by the excess burdens placed upon them. It is not advisable to turn over our coastwise commerce to the railroads and depend on them alone to carry our products from port to port. This change would tend to delay the marketing and handling of our crops and products to the great injury of the people here and to our allies abroad.

The impossibility of getting transportation is one of the main causes of high prices, and until something is done to improve our roads, our railroad facilities and our waterway transportation, it matters not how much acreage is devoted to production and how great the harvest may be, the producers will continue to work at a disadvantage and the consumers will continue to pay high prices and suffer.

This is a time, too, when our people should practice economy in all things. No one has any idea of the food wasted in this country, and conservation of this is just as important as production. The average man in Europe can live on what an average American throws in the garbage pail. Economy of food can and should be practiced by each individual family, without any further urging from the Government, if we are to obviate having to resort to such laws as now operate in Europe in the homes of the families.

Some have suggested closing the schools earlier in the year, with a view of increasing the food production of the country. This is one idea, however, with which I can not agree; and I feel sure that such a mistake will not be made. If there ever was a time when the young boys and girls should be encouraged to remain in school, it is now. I imagine this idea of closing the schools comes from Europe, where conditions are different. There it became necessary for the entire male population of military age to go to the front, which left the farming in a great measure in the hands of the women and children. Naturally, the vacancies in the fields had to be filled by boys from the school. The future of this Republic depends on the training which our boys and girls are receiving to-day, and we should make many other sacrifices before we remove them from the schools. It has been shown by statistics that while crime has decreased among men of military age in Europe, as a result of the war, it has increased among the young men of school age. This is due to the fact that the fathers are at the front and the mothers are busy with other things, and the children are out of school. This is another reason why we must keep the children in school.

I am glad to note that the boys of this country are to-day being encouraged to devote more time to the study of agriculture and the girls are being better trained in home economics. The success of Germany is due in a great measure to the fact that they have encouraged scientific agriculture in the past. Practical education and extension of vocational education to the grown-ups as well as to the child must be encouraged by our Government. The Department of Agriculture should encourage the farmers of the South, who are rapidly giving up the old haphazard way of raising cattle and hogs, in adopting scientific methods. Because of our mild winters and the presence of feed right at hand, these animals can be raised and marketed more cheaply in the South than in any other section. But in carrying out this work it is to be hoped that the Government will select the most experienced and practical men to encourage and educate our people.

In war matters the country looks to the National Government for leadership and results, and rightly so. But yet the States retain many of their powers, and by cooperation and a judicious use of them can greatly promote national action and supplement national achievement. That all of them are desirous of doing this is to be assumed, and I am sure that material benefit will come out of cooperation between the National Government and the States. Let us hope that our State authorities and local auhorities will cooperate and act in harmony with our National Government in solving the problems necessary to carry out our work scientifically, efficiently, and with economy, and that our people will heartily respond to the efforts of our constituted authorities along these lines.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of embodying an answer to the secretary of the Cleveland Real Estate Board, in which he criticized my action upon the conscription bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] has 35 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] has 42.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, of course, it is my wish that we may get through before 5 o'clock and that the committee may rise and report this bill for passage this evening, but I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address myself particularly to some suggestions that have been made during the debate—that because of stock ownership by American citizens in some of the corporations owning these enemy ships, or by reason of mortgage liens upon them, there would be an unconstitutional taking of property.

Now, the law is well settled that an enemy ship—a ship of enemy register, flying the enemy flag—is subject to capture, and that, too, irrespective of whether it be in the ports of the country seeking to capture or whether it be upon the high seas.

With reference to the first proposition, as to any rights by reason of part ownership, I wish to read from Westlake on international law, page 147. I read:

> If a ship sails under the enemy flag, the character which her owner or any of her part owners may have as individuals is immaterial. By accepting the flag they have placed themselves under its protection; if that fails them, she may be captured and will be condemned, and no share which a friend may have in her will be saved. A mortgage or lien on a ship sailing under the enemy's flag, whether it arises by contract or by law as a factor's lien—unless it is a general law of the mercantile world, as that which gives the lien of freight—is treated as part interest in the ship and is not saved from the condemnation.
> The rule just stated with regard to mortgages and liens applies in England and the United States to cargoes as well as to ships, on the broad ground, stated by Lord Stowell, that "captors are supposed to lay their hands on the gross tangible property, on which there may be many just claims outstanding between other parties which can have no operation as to them."

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Suppose an American had a mortgage on a German ship. Would that rule still apply?

Mr. LENROOT. Absolutely; and it has been so decided by the Supreme Court in the case of the Hampton, in United States Reports, where it was decided that the mortgagee had no right or claim.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Can aliens, especially alien enemies, invoke any constitutional provision for the protection of their rights?

Mr. LENROOT. No. But we were speaking of American citizens, by owning stock or by mortgage, having an interest in enemy ships.

Now, as to the question of the right of the United States to take over enemy ships, as proposed in this bill, as to that there can be no question, with due respect to the opinion of my colleague [Mr. STAFFORD]. If I understood him correctly, he stated that that decision that so held was more than 100 years old, and that that doctrine had been modified since that time.

I wish to say that as late as the Spanish-American War the United States Supreme Court, in case after case, reaffirmed that doctrine. In the Spanish-American War, as Members will recall, President McKinley, by proclamation, gave Spanish ships 30 days in which to load, unload, and leave ports before they were subject to capture. There were many captures during the Spanish-American War by our fleet, and in a number of cases the question of the lawfulness of the capture arose, and particularly so in the case of the Buena Ventura, which will be found in One hundred and seventy-fifth United States, page 384; and in every one of those cases, as a matter of international law, the right to capture the enemy ship was sustained; but in each case they resorted to the proclamation of President McKinley to find the exemption, and in the case of the Buena Ventura particularly they said expressly that if that ship was exempted from capture it must be found in the interpretation of the proclamation of President McKinley, and not because of any international law respecting it.

Now, it is true that ever since this Government was formed, almost, the United States has contended for the inviolability of property upon the high seas, contending that the property of enemy subjects on the sea should be as inviolable as that upon land. But never has the United States been successful in securing the acceptance of that doctrine by other nations either by treaty or otherwise.

It is true, as stated, that in The Hague Convention of 1907 the provision that has been read was adopted as a part of that convention with reference to merchant ships being in the ports of an enemy and through force majeur not being able to depart. But as has also been stated, the United States never ratified that convention and never was a party to it, and that is not binding in any degree upon the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to his colleague?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman deny that the representatives of our Government declined to sign that convention, because they considered its stipulations retrogressive and that they were less liberal than the practice that had prevailed since 1854?

Mr. LENROOT. That is absolutely true; but so did this Government decline to sign the treaty of Paris, because they did not believe that the treaty of Paris went as far as it ought to go; and it was upon this very question, too, by the way, in the treaty of Paris, because that treaty did not secure the inviolability of ships upon the high seas.

But because the United States wanted to go further does not mean that the United States, in the absence of international law, is bound by what was done at The Hague convention.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but because the Government declined to adhere to those principles because they did not go far enough is no reason for saying that American international law contravenes those principles. Now, I ask the gentleman whether he can cite an instance in the Spanish-American War or under international law where the United States Government has confiscated enemy vessels confined in ports, as we are attempting to do in this case?

Mr. LENROOT. I was coming to a discussion of that proposition if the gentleman had not asked me that question. I was stating, first, what international law was upon the subject. I stated what the policy of the United States had been, and I am frank to say I believe that should continue to be the policy of the United States. But every situation must depend upon the particular facts in that situation. Now, what is the situation that we have before us at the present time with reference to the taking over of these ships? I do not say for a moment that we ought not to compensate the owners of these ships. I do say the committee is right in not undertaking to provide for their compensation now. And let me give the reason why I think it should not be done. In the first place, it is a matter of grace with any nation, and not of international law, as to whether they will compensate or not. If they do compensate, there is an obligation of equitable fair dealing upon the part of the owners of the ships as well as upon the part of the United States Government. Now, we are informed with reference to many of these ships that they were damaged and disabled by their owners, many of them, for the very purpose of depriving the United States of the power of making use of them. Now, shall it be said, as a matter of justice and equity, that an enemy subject who is the owner of a ship, and who voluntarily disables the ship for the purpose of injuring the United States, shall have the same rules of equity applied to him as to compensation as one who, finding his ship in the harbor and unable to depart, leaves that ship to be taken over and paid for by the Government? I think not.

Mr. SISSON. Then in addition to the statement made by the gentleman at this time we ought not to go into the question of payment, because in the settlement of the international differences and damages that may have been done to American citizens by the German Government those things would have to be considered at the same time.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true. Then there is another consideration. When these ships are taken over they will be engaged in merchant transportation. They will be in every sense of the word, so far as what they do is concerned, merchant vessels. Now, Germany, under international law, if she would observe it, has certain obligations with reference to the capture or destruction of merchant vessels. Now, when we take these vessels over, if Germany sees fit, in violation of international law, to destroy one of these German vessels that we have taken over, is it not a question for serious consideration at least, when this war is over, whether we should compensate a German subject for a vessel that has been unlawfully destroyed by his own government? [Applause.]

Secondly, supposing one of these vessels is captured on the high seas by the German Government, as she has a right to capture them, and supposing when Germany captures them she turns the vessel over to its owners, shall the owners get the vessel and also get from the United States Government the value of the vessel? Perhaps so. I am not expressing any opinion about it. But certainly we ought not at this time to make any such provision as that.

Something has been said about the treaty existing between this Government and Germany. I do not know whether that section has ever been read into the RECORD, but I think it should be, with reference to the obligations contained in the treaty of 1799 between this country and Germany. I want to read article 12 of that treaty.

Experience having proved that the principle adopted in the twelfth article of the treaty of 1785, according to which free ships make free goods, has not been sufficiently respected during the two last wars, and especially in that which still continues, the two contracting parties propose after the return of a general peace to agree, either separately between themselves or jointly with other powers alike interested, to concert with the great maritime powers of Europe such arrangements and such permanent principles as may serve to consolidate the liberty and the safety of the neutral navigation and commerce in future wars.

Now, mark this:

And if in the interval either of the contracting parties—

And that interval has existed now for the past three years—

And if in the interval either of the contracting parties should be engaged in a war to which the other should remain neutral, the ships of war and privateers of the belligerent power—

In this case Germany—

shall conduct themselves toward ports the merchant vessels of the neutral power—

In this case the United States up to the declaration of war—

as favorably as the course of the war then existing may permit, observing the principles and rules of the law of nations generally acknowledged.

That was the treaty between this country and Germany. Is there anyone who will say that that treaty has not been most openly, flagrantly, and deliberately violated by Germany? [Applause.] And then, will anyone say that because there was also in another article of that treaty a provision that enemy subjects whose property is taken should be compensated, we shall be bound, but Germany shall not? Those are questions that ought not to be settled now in this bill. Those are questions that ought to come up and be settled when this war is over. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLE. Has there been any adjudication by the courts of the property rights of parties who took the ships after they were interned?

Mr. LENROOT. These ships have never been interned in the sense the gentleman speaks of. A war vessel is interned in this sense, that when German ships have sought asylum here we have not permitted them to leave, but every one of these ships proposed to be taken by this bill was always at liberty to leave our ports at any time, from the day they sailed in there until the day that we declared a state of war to exist. We have done nothing to prevent their leaving until we took possession of them.

Mr. LITTLE. I do not care to dwell upon the fine distinction in the words, but I mean after the ships have been put in the position in which they have been put, has there been any adjudication of any property rights that were claimed to arise after the war began, on the part of those who were in possession of the ships?

Mr. LENROOT. Nothing more than the principle that was involved in the case of the Buena Ventura in the Spanish War, which case I cited a few minutes ago. That was a case where there was a Spanish ship loaded at some port in the South, which I think went to Norfolk. The owners of the ship had no knowledge of the existence of a declaration of war between Spain and this country. They had a clearance from American officers and yet they were captured. The same principle exactly applies to that capture which the court said was innocent in every respect as that which relates to a ship in the United States ports, but the court held that the capture was valid.

Mr. LITTLE. I did not make quite clear my question. Suppose I undertook to buy one of these ships. Has there been any adjudication of that right?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I think not. Now, I want to make one more reference——

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was not the Buena Ventura captured on the high seas?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but the same principle applies as to the owners of a ship having no knowledge whatever of the existence of a declaration of war. The court in that case said that the owners were absolutely innocent, and they were in exactly the same position as far as principle is concerned as these vessels in the ports of the United States. Now, the gentleman from Wisconsin cited the case of the United States against Russell, Thirteenth of Wallace, to sustain his position that compensation must be made. I want to call attention to the fact that the United States against Russell did not involve an enemy ship. That was a taking over of an American ship flying the American flag owned by loyal citizens, and there was no question whatever of an enemy character of that ship. The only question was whether they had a right to requisition the ship, and the court held that they did, and, of course, as in taking private property of American citizens for public use, held that compensation must be made. There was no question of an enemy ownership, and this bill rests wholly upon the principle of enemy ownership.

Mr. ELSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. ELSTON. Has the gentleman considered the status of a vessel bought under executory contract by an American citizen and American registry held in suspense, and the whole matter open since the 1st of January? My understanding would be that an equitable title rests in the American citizen, but the bill provides that the whole title may be taken by the Government whether Germany owns it in whole or in part. Does the gentleman think that the bill protects sufficiently the American citizen?

Mr. LENROOT. Until the change of registry is effected I think as a legal proposition—I say nothing of the equity—the right to take over depends on the registry at the time of taking over.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts how many speeches he has remaining.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I have two more—myself and one other

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] made two very important observations on two technical questions that grow out of this proposed resolution, both of which should be kept in mind when the matter of future adjustment is considered. I think these ought to be emphasized because they are largely the crux of the entire dispute over the question of confiscation, if there is such a dispute. I do not believe that there is anyone in the Congress who seriously questions the right under international law of the United States to take over these vessels. They are property of citizens of a foreign country which is at war with us. I can not understand upon what angle any discussion would be carried on that the United States, which is now a belligerent country, could not take over the vessels in the ports that belong to its enemy. Such right is certainly clear under international practices. The first section of the bill authorizes the President to do that thing, and if the bill would stop with that there might be some question of the wisdom of the policy, but certainly none on the authority, for that first section suggests that the United States can take over title and possession and operate or lease or charter and equip these vessels. That indicates a right in a belligerent nation, and that right is certainly well defined in international law; but the second section suggests whether this is to be confiscation or requisition. If the second section were not in the bill, we would jump to the conclusion that it probably meant confiscation. The first section takes over both possession and title and makes no suggestion of future adjustment. But the second section suggests that it is to be requisition, or at least it lays the grounds for it, since it there provides for a board of survey to ascertain the values of these vessels. It does not specify just why that is done, but all of us understand that in case it is to be adjudicated on the question of value, this Government by this provision shows clearly its intention not to take any advantage of the owners of these vessels. We here undertake to procure the facts by a jury properly appointed, and thus fix the basis upon which any future adjudication that might be required, or seemed to be justified, might be had. I think that is as far as the resolution ought to go. It leaves the question of adjustment for a later date, to be determined by subsequent events.

In other words, the question as to whether it is to be confiscation or requisition is not to be settled now. I do not think it ought to come up now. The question ought to be reserved for later consideration, because as has been so frequently stated we do not know all the elements that may be involved. Here is one of them: Members of the House seem to look upon the German vessels in the American ports as interned vessels. That is a common phrase that has crawled into the discussion by loose phraseology. The vessels are not war vessels to which that term is applied. The word "internment" is a word of common usage, but not international. Technically it is not well employed when applied to merchant vessels. If it was a war vessel the internment is by order of the government in whose port it lands and not by its own government. If a war vessel comes into a neutral port in time of war, it may coal and remain 24 hours, but after that it must go, and if it does not go within the time allowed it must dismantle and remain until the war is over. That is by order of the neutral government, in this case our Government. The war vessel is in port because the Government's order "Go out now, or stay until the end of the war" was respected by the belligerent power.

But that is not the case of these vessels now under consideration. These vessels came here for refuge; they sought an asylum. Under international law no belligerent war vessel is permitted to enter neutral waters to capture enemy vessels. On the high seas they were subject to capture. They sought neutral waters to avoid capture. They are now in our ports not because we would not allow them to leave, but because they forfeited protection against seizure the moment they went beyond the neutral waters. In that case they would be captured by the British or the French Government, and consequently they chose to remain in safety at their option and not because we forbade them to go. It is the case of an asylum rather than internment. That differentiation can not escape the discussion or consideration of the international question. These vessels are in American ports by their own choosing and not by our orders.

Then there is another feature that must not be overlooked, and that is that these vessels remained in port up to the time when our country ceased to be neutral and became a belligerent, and in that belligerency an enemy of the country whose citizens were the owners of the vessels. Prior to this date and while this country was extending the privilege of asylum to these vessels an attempt was made to destroy these vessels rather than run the risk to put to sea.

When the chairman of the committee was opening the discussion of this resolution I asked him the question, in order to fix the principle, Can we assume that the attempt at destruction of these vessels in American ports by German officers was under the order of the German Government? That is a determinant to fix the status, whether the vessel is private or public. If we could assume that, then the destruction ordered by the German Government makes those vessels public under the control of the German Government, and in that case we can confiscate them under any treaty now existing or under the principles of international law. The only question that is in doubt in my mind is when they were destroyed, or when the attempt at destruction was made upon them, whether we could assume that was by the order of the German Government. That question is one of doubt in my mind, and must be established by the facts which should surround the case.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes. I will yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. HARDY. I am informed by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] that after the merchant ships in the port at Charleston had been destroyed and their officers were arrested and charged with their destruction, those officers pleaded in their defense that they did what they did by order of the German Government.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to have that interpolation at this time, because that incidentally makes those vessels, whether in ownership or not of the German Government, at least under the control of the German Government, and consequently I think there is no doubt that our Government, an enemy of the German Government, can confiscate those vessels and do it without the violation of any international right at all. However, when the matter of confiscation or requisition comes up all the facts should be marshaled rather than allow a statement of officers to be conclusive.

Mr. HARDY. That shows that those vessels are being used by the German Government itself.

Mr. FESS. Yes; I think it could well be so regarded.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield to my friend.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Could not the German Government exercise such a control over these ships as to order their being dismantled or injured without exercising a proprietary interest in them—that is, without having title to them?

Mr. GORDON. Oh, no.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. But any government can confiscate ships and use them for naval purposes at any time, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. FESS. That might be a strained interpretation of the international relationship that governs the question. But an attempted destruction of the vessels to avoid taking them over would justify their seizure by the Government and confiscation as well.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Every day we give orders to shipping, forbid ships from leaving our ports, we do not give clearance, and things of that kind, and in that way we exercise Government control.

Mr. FESS. What I had to say on this question in regard to the control of the German Government in the attempt to destroy is not a matter of opinion simply, but it is a matter of adjudication by the courts of the United States. When certain cotton was captured in the Confederacy there was a question of doubt, as all of you remember, whether the cotton should be confiscated or requisitioned. This grew out of the fact of ownership, whether by loyal citizens or by citizens who were in the Confederacy. Members will recall that the principle adopted was as follows: In order to adjudicate it ultimately the cotton would be taken over without pay, and then the question of confiscation would be determined by the ownership later on, and in case after case—and this is the point that I desire to make—where the cotton was destroyed by the order of the Confederacy in order to prevent its falling into the hands of the Union forces, it was held by virtue of its destruction as being subject to confiscation without any further adjudication or demand. In other words, cotton, even though it might be held by a citizen loyal to the Union, if it were destroyed by the Confederacy the owner had no claim against the Government.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes. I yield to my friend from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TEMPLE. Is it not a fact that the names of a large number of these vessels appear upon the German Navy lists as auxiliary vessels of the German Navy, and is it not a fact that the officers are officers of the naval reserve?

Mr. FESS. I thank my friend for that statement, because it calls up other features that I wanted to call attention to, and that is one of the phases of it. The other phase is that when we come to adjudicating these questions of value later on, the Government ownership, in the way of subsidy, in the way of imperial control by the German Government over its own shipping, even though it be owned by its own citizens, will go a great way in determining what we should do in the matter.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes. I yield to the chairman.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would say that there are seven of those ships that our Government upon the facts disclosed recognized as a part of the German naval reserve, and they have already been taken over without any reference to this action, simply because they did belong to the German Navy.

Mr. FESS. And the chairman ought to admit at once there would be no question as to our right as belligerents to deal with an enemy ship owned by the enemy——

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not think there is a question about it.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mention has been made about the ship sunk at Charleston. I happened to be present at the trial of the men who sunk that ship. Their plea, as stated a while ago, was that they did it under orders of their Government; and further, that being on board a ship flying the German flag they did it in German territory; and that, having done it in German territory, they are not amenable to the laws of the United States; and further, that had they not done it they would have been guilty of treason and triable therefor when they got to Germany. That is the plea they set up.

Mr. FESS. That principle is pretty well recognized in international law. There seems abundant evidence to justify this Government in its action to take over these vessels without committing itself beforehand to specific terms.

Mr. GORDON. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that a great many of these difficulties as to privately owned ships are cleared away by the mere statement, which every one of us knows to be a fact, that a state of war between the German Imperial Government and the Government of the United States places in a state of war each citizen and subject of Germany with each citizen and subject of the United States?

Mr. FESS. That is true.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. May I ask the gentleman one question? Did these prisoners plead that they did that at the command of the German Government, or at the command of the German owners of the boats?

Mr. STEVENSON. At the command of the German Government; and the plea was overruled——

Mr. FESS. I can not yield any further——

Mr. STEVENSON. But they were given the benefit, or, rather, exculpated of being guilty of treason, because acting in concert under the command of their superior officer was not a conspiracy such as acting in concert by their own agreement.

Mr. FESS. Just to recapitulate very briefly. Many questions that are in doubt must be adjusted later on. In the first place, just the force of the treaties now obtaining is not entirely clear, to say nothing about Germany's conduct toward us in the light of past treaties. What those treaties are—there were three of them, and whether one is a supplement of the other or one supersedes the other is not clear. Whether those parts in the treaties of 1785 and 1799 not included in that of 1828 are void it is not certain. That will have to be adjudicated later on. Secondly, just the effect of war upon treaties that were not made with specific reference to a state of war but to regulate commercial rights is the question that must be adjudicated later on, and can not now be done. It is a question whether in the absence of provision otherwise a war does not abrogate treaty obligations. Another question is whether Germany has not by her conduct toward us repudiated the treaty obligations toward her. Still another question is whether these ships can be considered under such ownership or control of the German Government that they might be called public ships. We do not know, although strong evidence points that way. If they were, confiscation is clear. Another question is whether in the destruction of those vessels it was an act of the German Government because she feared they would be utilized in favor of her enemy. Later on that must be considered and can not be at this time adjudicated. There are so many questions that have come up that I am perfectly willing and shall freely vote to take these vessels, their title and possession, with the understanding that the Government is to operate or lease them or charter them and equip them, and then I hope that our Government, following the second section here, will proceed upon the basis that all rights of all people and of all citizens, of whatever nationality, will be regarded and respected, for our Government is too big to do anything else. [Applause.]

We have every reason, it seems to me, to employ our right in the premise. I feel quite certain the President has the authority to seize them without an act of Congress. However, I should prefer that our Government shall proceed upon the higher plane of public announcement that in our dealings even with an enemy and in time of war we will endeavor to secure every right to all citizens, even though they are citizens of an enemy country.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who have preceded me, I think have both raised a very important, if not the most important, issue here in connection with this bill. That is the question as to whether or not by the action of the German Government in ordering the crippling of the machinery of these 91 boats in our ports the title to these vessels did not transfer to the German Government by this very act, and whether, if the German Government ordered the destruction of these boats, it might not be conclusive proof that the German Government itself did by this very action confiscate these boats from the private ownership. I really believe, then, that if they did that we are fully justified in confiscating these boats, as in so doing we would be taking the property of the German Government and not the property of private owners or individuals. If, on the other hand, the real ownership of these boats is not vested in the German Government, I am interested just to the extent to see that confiscation of private property is not had by this Government without some basis of settlement being provided for eventually. I do not say at this time, but eventually, but believe the law should be made very specific now; and in that connection I want to quote a statement which was made by the State Department, with the authority of the President, on February 8, 1917, in which it stated:

> The Government of the United States will in no circumstances take advantage of a state of war to take possession of property to which international understandings and the recognized law of the land give it no just claim or title. It will scrupulously respect all private rights alike of its own citizens and the subjects of foreign States.

Then I also want to quote from the President's message to this Congress on April 2, in which he said this:

> Just because we fight without rancor and without selfish object, seeking nothing for ourselves but what we wish to share with all free peoples, we shall, I feel confident, conduct our operations as belligerents without passion and ourselves observe with proud punctilio the principles of right and of fair play we profess to be fighting for.
> It will be all the easier for us to conduct ourselves as belligerents in the high spirit of right and fairness because we act without animus.

This is a war measure and warranted by the exigencies of the case; but, however grave the situation, shipping that came to our ports in the legitimate prosecution of ocean traffic, the property of individuals and companies, should not be seized without rendering at the proper time just compensation therefor. The good name of our Republic demands that such a provision be incorporated in the bill.

This should not be left to the uncertainties of the future without a word indicating our disposition to treat the matter fairly.

We have entered into this great conflict not only because the rights of American citizens have been outraged and national and international laws disregarded in the most flagrant manner, but also in the interest of world-wide humanity and the dethronement of despotic rule and the substitution therefor of forms of government where the individual shall be known and recognized. Our policies with other nations have been honorable, our course such as to command the admiration of the world. Many peoples are looking to us for guidance. We can not afford to be misunderstood; we can not afford to proclaim to the world that we are taking the property of individuals owing allegiance to a nation with whom we are at war without having in contemplation the just and equitable intention of rendering at some time all equivalent therefor.

I anticipate that when it is known to the German Government that we have seized the German ships now in our ports the German Government in retaliation therefor might feel justified and think a sufficient precedent was established in warranting them in seizing any ships or property belonging to the United States or any citizens of the United States in their country. Under these conditions at the termination of the war a treaty would be entered into between the United States and the German Government in which peace terms would be provided, and in the consideration of these terms the property of the German Government and individual citizens seized or taken over by the United States and, vice versa, any property of the United States or of its individual citizens taken over by the German Government would have to be adjudicated; and in this connection it is reasonable to suppose that if there were anything like an equal division of claims of this character the United States would say to Germany, "You settle the claims with your citizens and we will settle the claims of our citizens." Then, according to this law, if this procedure were adopted, the citizens of the United States who have suffered the loss of property in Germany would present their claims to the United States, and they would either be adjusted amicably or a suit in equity would be brought against the United States for settlement.

It will be remembered in this connection that many old French claims under circumstances somewhat similar to this are still pending settlement by the United States, and the experience of claimants with claims similar to these against the United States has not been very satisfactory; that is to say, these adjustments result in long and tedious litigation, and in many instances have never been paid.

This is one reason why I think that the method of adjustment in this law about to be enacted should be made perfectly clear in this respect.

I believe that the exigencies of this case are such that we are fully justified in taking over these enemy boats. We want these boats for the purpose of conveying food and supplies to our allies, who are fighting to raise the standard of humanity and civilization. We do not want to take them for what they are worth as property, as much as we need ships, but we want to help lift our allies out of their bondage, and the seizure of these ships at this time for these various purposes will aid in this.

I shall, therefore, vote for the passage of this bill, with the full anticipation that if the act of the German Government in the ordering of the crippling of these boats is regarded under international law as confiscation by the German Government of the property of their own citizens, namely, these seized boats, the United States is fully justified in confiscating them, and need not make any settlement therefor; but, on the other hand, if it is finally determined that these boats are the property of individual citizens of Germany, after the war is over that prompt and full settlement will be provided for to the individual citizen.

This will thus remove any argument which might be used by the Government of Germany in persuading their people to enmity against the United States by pointing to this ship seizure as an illegal act of international law. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am not a lawyer, and I do not pretend to having any knowledge of international law or ordinary law, excepting the one law of common sense which my father taught me in my early youth always to bear in mind was good law. The law of common sense seems to me to be fairly shown in what has been said before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, of which I happen to be the leading minority member, and also before this House during the general debate that has been developed here. I believe that we have taken a common-sense action in preparing and offering this bill, and I sincerely hope that no amendment will be offered on the floor to change the same as it is now presented. The bill is considerably different from that which was originally brought to the committee's attention and which it was proposed that we originally should present to the House. There was some discussion in the committee as to the changes to be made. I had the privilege of offering an amendment. The committee cut the bill down considerably from what was originally brought to its attention and which it was proposed that we originally should present to the House. There was some discussion in the committee as to the changes that were made, and, as before stated, I had the privilege of offering an amendment which I hoped might have been adopted, and I will refer to the amendment, but I shall not offer it on the floor. And I hope that if any amendments are offered they will not be adopted. I think we want to get this resolution enacted into law as soon as it possibly can be done. The amendment I offered was to provide, after the word "coastwise," on page 2, line 20, the following:

Provided, That no vessel taken over as herein authorized shall be operated in the coastwise trade of the United States after the termination of the existing war.

The object of this proviso was to prevent permanent interference with the shipping business of the coastwise trade. I know that I am not in accord with the opinion of the gentlemen who sit on the majority side of the House, but I have never been in accord during my membership in this House with the Democratic Party in their action affecting the coastwise trade of the United States. Year after year we on the Republican side of the House have endeavored to protect the coastwise trade, and our friends on the other side of the aisle have made continued attacks upon it, and never until the election of 1912 were they allowed any opportunity to make any great inroads on the question of interfering with the coastwise trade. There was a proposition put into the Panama Canal act which I voted against on account of its having provisions for allowing the foreign-built vessels admitted to the American registry under the Panama Canal act to enter the coastwise trade. But it was found no great number of vessels less than 5 years old that were built abroad were available to be admitted to American registry under that act, consequently that proposition fell by the wayside and an amendment was finally adopted that provided for foreign-built vessels of any age that should be admitted to American registry under the provisions of the canal act should have the privilege of entering the coastwise trade.

I simply want to hold up to the committee considering this resolution the fact that when the time comes, if it ever does come, as I expect it will, if not in my lifetime in the lifetime of some others who have the same view that I have, that we should again obtain the control of both branches of the Congress and the Presidency the party now in the minority will endeavor to put the vessels of the coastwise trade in possession of what they formerly had as a right for more than 100 years, and that right, in my judgment, never should have been interfered with, for the protection afforded to our coasts on the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans in time of trouble would have been in the nature of a valuable volunteer coast guard by thus providing at any time to have vessels commanded by American masters and owned by American citizens possessing the exclusive right to enjoy the privilege of the coastwise trade, rather than to have vessels commanded by officers owing allegiance to a foreign flag, and who have been educated and trained under foreign influences, to have the privileges which are now afforded under existing laws and grants of authority afforded to the President in his discretion.

Nations generally do not admit vessels of other nations to their ports or allow the vessels of other nations to enter into their coastwise trade, especially if they have any protective ideas themselves. I have always been opposed to that, and I wish it distinctly understood here that I am opposed to the proposition of destroying our coastwise trade, which has been built up here after so many years of effort. But I do not feel at all at liberty to offer an amendment on the floor now, and I hope no one will offer an amendment like it. I would vote against it if it came upon this floor, for the reason that I believe the proposition which has been brought in here has been so clearly made out and is so clearly understood that it should be enacted without delay. It has been demonstrated beyond question in this debate that we are acting simply under the authority of the law, and it does not seem to me that any sound argument has been brought to bear on the action we are proposing to take. I believe we are authorized to take that action, and I am in full accord with it. I hope the bill will pass as it is now presented. [Applause.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the joint resolution for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to take over to the United States the immediate possession and title of any vessel within the jurisdiction thereof, including the Canal Zone and all territories and insular possessions of the United States, except the American Virgin Islands, which at the time of coming into such jurisdiction was owned in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen, or subject of any nation with which the United States may be at war when such vessel shall be taken, or was flying the flag of or was under the registry of any such nation or any political subdivision or municipality thereof; and, through the United States Shipping Board, or any department or agency of the Government, to operate, lease, charter, and equip such vessel in any service of the United States or in any commerce, foreign or coastwise.

Mr. MONDELL and Mr. BORLAND rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming rose first and will be recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I did not have the opportunity of hearing the part of the general debate that had reference to the bill, and therefore possibly the questions I shall ask have already been answered.

I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the following words:

Which at the time of coming into such jurisdiction were owned in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen, or subject of any nation with which the United States may be at war when such vessel shall be taken.

I assume the purpose of the bill is to take over the vessels which were interned in our harbors at the beginning of the war which were flying the German flag or the Austrian flag and were under German or Austrian registry. But the words that I have just read would seem to authorize the taking of a ship flying any flag or having any registry, if, as a matter of fact, it was owned in part, ever so small a part, by any corporation, citizen, or subject of a nation with which the United States is at war. Is it the intent of the framers of the bill to authorize the taking over of a ship flying the American flag or the British flag or the French flag or the Norwegian flag where it develops that some German subject had a small interest in the vessel, either as an individual or as an owner of stock in a corporation?

Mr. ALEXANDER. All the questions involved have been thrashed out in committee, but the purpose of this bill directly is to take over German ships. While it is broad enough to take over the Austrian ships, should we become involved in war with Austria, it would not authorize the President to take over Austrian ships at this time, because we are not in a state of war with Austria.

Mr. MONDELL. My inquiry is this: Is not the bill broad enough to authorize the taking over of a ship flying the American flag?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, no.

Mr. MONDELL. Or the French flag or the British flag?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is not.

Mr. MONDELL. Why not? It authorizes the taking over of any vessel owned in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen, or subject of any nation with which the United States may be at war when the vessel shall be taken.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes. Are we at war with France or England?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly not; but it may be possible—I do not know as a matter of fact whether it is so or not—but it may be possible that there are American ships, French ships, Norwegian ships, bearing those flags and carrying those registries in which some German subject may have a small interest, either as an individual or as a stockholder. The language I have just read would authorize, as I understand it, the taking over of any vessel flying any flag, bearing any registry, which was owned in ever so small a part by a citizen or a subject of Germany. Is that what was intended?

Mr. ALEXANDER. If it was under German registry or under the German flag, why should we not take it over?

Mr. MONDELL. But that is not what I am talking about. The gentleman has evidently not read his bill or does not understand it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I certainly have read the bill and I think I understand it. The gentleman evidently does not understand it.

Mr. MONDELL. The bill does not provide that the President may take over a ship partly owned by a German and carrying German registry and flying the German flag. If it did, then my inquiry would have no point. But it provides that he may take over any ship owned in any part by any subject of Germany. It also provides later for the taking over of a ship flying the German flag and bearing German registry.

But the first part of the paragraph, the words I have read, either mean that the President can take over any ship, carrying any flag, having any registry, owned in any part by any subject of the German Empire, or they do not mean anything.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am sorry I can not agree with the gentleman's construction.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will explain wherein I am wrong——

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will just read the language:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to take over to the United States the immediate possession and title of any vessel within the jurisdiction thereof * * * which, at the time of coming into such jurisdiction, was owned in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen, or subject of any nation with which the United States may be at war.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Not a Frenchman, not an Englishman. There is only one nation with which we are at war.

Mr. MONDELL. But, if the gentleman will allow me, there may be ships bearing the American flag, sailing under American registry, owned in small part by a German citizen or owned by a corporation some of the stock of which is in the hands of a German subject. Under the language of the bill which the gentleman has just read such a ship could certainly be taken over, because the bill does not confine its operations to ships having German registry carrying the German flag. The bill provides for the taking over of two entirely distinct classes of ships: First, ships having German registry bearing the German flag. Those are the interned ships. But in addition thereto any ship bearing any flag, having any registry, if it is owned in the most infinitesimal part by any subject of the German Empire. The gentleman asks me if we are at war with this, that, or the other country other than Germany. Of course we are not; but when you provide for the taking over of a ship which may bear the French or English or other flag, if a citizen or subject of Germany has any interest in it whatever, you are taking a step that under other conditions might lead to war.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman overlooks two very material points.

Mr. MONDELL. I will be very glad to have the gentleman enlighten me.

Mr. BORLAND. The first is that the bill provides that the President is hereby "authorized" to take over; he is not directed or required to take over——

Mr. MONDELL. I take it that the gentleman from Missouri would not want to vote for a bill that clearly and definitely and beyond all question authorized the President to take over American ships, even though it were only permissive in its terms.

Mr. BORLAND. No; but I want to call attention to the second point which the gentleman overlooks.

Mr. MONDELL. A great many crimes have been committed under mere permission.

Mr. BORLAND. The President ought to be authorized to take over such a ship, even though not under German registry or the German flag, if it is in fact wholly owned by German citizens.

Mr. MONDELL. Wholly; perhaps so, though I am not sure of that; but this says in "whole or in part."

Mr. BORLAND. Wholly or chiefly.

Mr. MONDELL. That is the information I have been seeking, and which the chairman of the committee did not give. Is that what the committee intended to do? If so, should it be done?

Mr. BORLAND. That is my construction of it. And if the Germans, for any purpose of their own, are sailing ships under some other flag, those ships ought to be liable to seizure to the same extent as German ships flying the German flag.

Mr. MONDELL. But there have been no ships interned except the ships carrying the German flag.

Mr. BORLAND. That is where the gentleman is getting down to a practical question; and, as my colleague from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] says, there are no ships within the contemplation of this law, except German ships. But if the gentleman is arguing a purely technical legal right, I say that the President should have the power and should be authorized to take over certain ships, even though they be not actually under the German flag.

Mr. MONDELL. That is what I want to know, whether it was the intent of the framers of the bill to give the President authority to take over an American ship, a French ship, or a Scandinavian ship bearing the flag and the registry of one of those countries if he discovered that a dollar's worth of the stock or bonds of such ship or any interest in it were owned by a German citizen. If that is the intent, I do not know that I shall quarrel with it, but why has no one discussed or defended so unusual and, as I see it, so questionable a procedure?

Mr. BORLAND. That is a purely technical construction of it. The chances are, as the gentleman knows, that the President will not take over any such ships, but he ought to be authorized to take over a ship, even though it may not be technically under German registry, if, in fact, it is owned by German subjects.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. It seems to me that the question the gentleman raises is perhaps answered by the words in line 8, page 2:

Which at the time of coming into such jurisdiction was owned in whole or in part.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; but that does not explain it.

Mr. SISSON. One moment. If it is a vessel of the United States Government, it is always within our jurisdiction. The United States Government controls absolutely all vessels of its own registry. Now, if it is a German ship, although wholly owned by American citizens, but registered as a German vessel, operating under the German law, coming into one of our ports, it might be seized under this bill; but if a German subject owns stock in one of our shipping corporations, I do not believe that the fact of his being a stockholder in the corporation or in a single ship would subject that ship to be taken under this language, because that would always be subject to the laws of the United States anyway, because it would have to come within our jurisdiction.

Mr. MONDELL. But if the gentleman will allow me, it seems to me the language of the act ought to be so clear that there would be no misunderstanding. If that is the intent, and it is decided that is a wise thing to do, I shall have no quarrel with it; but clearly the language I have read would authorize the taking over of a ship carrying any flag, under any registry, if German subjects were interested in any way in the ship, if they owned any part of it, either as individuals or as members of a corporation.

Now, that involves an entirely different principle from that involved in the taking over of a ship flying an enemy flag and under enemy registry, particularly ships that are, some of them at least, listed as German naval auxillaries. All that may be done legitimately as a war measure. Some may urge that any property of an alien enemy may be seized, houses, lands, money in bank, or personal property, including interests in corporations; however that may be viewed as a legal proposition we are not proposing to do it, but in this bill you authorize a procedure quite as extraordinary as it would be to authorize the taking over any banking or industrial enterprise owned in ever so small a part by a German citizen or subject.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question bearing on the same subject matter that has been brought to his attention by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. The question is, Why has there been a separation of ownership and registry? Why has not the gentleman joined the registry and the ownership?

I have a special case in mind the difficulty of which would be remedied if the suggestion of the gentleman from Wyoming were adopted. He has shown that you may take over a vessel under British or French registry in which a very small part is owned by German citizens.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the gentleman know of any case of that sort?

Mr. ELSTON. I can easily imagine a case of that sort.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Why should you go into imagining cases?

Mr. ELSTON. There is a case I have in mind, and I do not know but that the situation might appeal to the gentleman. I have no doubt of his disposition to be fair and equitable. There is an actual case on the Pacific coast where an American citizen purchased a German sailing bark. The purchase was made four or five months ago. The transaction was executory only in the fact that American registry was not granted in view of the fact that there was probability at the time of difficulties between the German Government and our own. The purchase price was deposited in escrow and the equitable ownership vested in the American citizen. This is a case which I think should be considered in this discussion.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am frank to say that the committee did not consider every possibility; but this bill makes it permissive with the President; he may take over the vessels or he may not. If there are any such cases as the gentleman imagines, I suppose the President will waive the equities in the interest of American citizens.

Mr. ELSTON. That is all the interest I have in it. I believe the committee should protect the rights of American citizens. I am not assuming that the gentleman is going to disregard them.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to make this suggestion: That if the intent of this bill is simply to take over the ships that were flying the German flag and under the German register, partly or wholly owned by Germans, that can easily be accomplished by striking out the word "or," in line 14, and inserting the word "and."

Mr. ELSTON. That is the suggestion I am making to the chairman of the committee. Why not strike out the word "or" and insert the word "and" and combine the ownership and registry?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Because it is wholly unnecessary. Our purpose is to pass this bill this evening that it may become a law at once. I think it is of paramount importance that we should get possession of these ships and not split hairs about imaginary cases that may arise in the future. We give the President permission to take these vessels, and he may or may not take them over, and we give him the implied power to consider the equities of such cases as the gentleman refers to.

Mr. ELSTON. I am just as anxious to have this bill passed as soon as possible as is the gentleman from Missouri. I am merely suggesting possible hardships under its execution. I certainly intend to vote for it.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I did not have the opportunity to speak in general debate, or, at least, I surrendered the reservation of time that I had. I want to say that I trust there will be no demand to amend this bill in regard to the taking possession of the vessels. For my own part, I think that we could well provide in the bill for the payment of any possible interest that an American citizen has in the ships, and so provide at the time. But I want to clear up, if I may, in the mind of my friend from Wisconsin, who is unquestionably right on the broad principle of international law, the legal aspect of this situation in this act of Congress. It would be utterly impossible for us to provide in this kind of a measure for the compensation to alien enemies. All we could do would be to announce a policy or make a recitation of future intention, which is sometimes a dangerous thing to do.

I take it that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] does not simply want that, but he will recognize instantly himself how impossible it is from a legal standpoint to safeguard the rights of an alien enemy. Assuming, as I know he does, that we have an indisputable right to seize these ships, and that it is our duty under the circumstances to do so, the question of the future compensation to a possible alien owner must be left to the future policy of the Government. It was provided in section 3 of the original bill that an American citizen should have the right of action against his own Government for compensation. That is a matter of grace, because under the general rule of law a sovereignty can not be sued without its own consent; but I have never seen a case where sovereignty submitted to be sued by a friend, even an alien friend. It is impossible to imagine a case where an alien enemy would have a right to go into the courts of the country during the continuance of a war.

Does the gentleman really expect that some provision might be made giving these alien enemies a legal right at this time? The entire provision will be a mere declaration of future intentions, which, as I say, would not only be futile, but in some cases dangerous.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman aware that under existing statutes foreigners may present claims against the Government in the Court of Claims if the same reciprocal rights are granted to citizens of our country in other countries?

Mr. BORLAND. I have no doubt there are such cases.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is the law; it is not a matter of cases.

Mr. GORDON. But there is no law authorizing an alien enemy to sue in the Court of Claims.

Mr. BORLAND. No; and there never was. I think the gentleman from Ohio is unquestionably right. These claims must be left to the adjudication of the peace commission upon the conclusion of peace, and it is impossible to exclude at that time the question of our reciprocal rights against the Government of that particular subject who claims that we have injured it. It may turn out that we shall insist upon Germany paying the claims of her own citizens. There have been three cases in this country where the United States has assumed as a matter of treaty the payment of spoliation claims to its own citizens. First, there was the French spoliation claims; second, the Spanish spoliation claims; and, third, the Mexican. It may easily happen, and I think will happen, that we shall insist upon Germany treating solely with her own citizens with regard to any spoliation claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. I move to strike out, in line 11, page 1, the word "or" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "and."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 11, strike out the word "or" and insert in lieu thereof the word "and," so that it will read: "when such vessel shall be taken and was flying the flag, etc."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard upon this for just a moment. The bill as it stands would very clearly authorize the taking over of a ship carrying any flag under any registry if it was owned in part by a German subject. Evidently that is not the intent of the framers of the bill.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does not the gentleman think that that ought to be the construction and ought to be the law?

Mr. MONDELL. That has not been my thought.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman says this very clearly does it. Does that not consummate the gentleman's thought?

Mr. MONDELL. I can think of no argument for going into an elaborate examination of the ownershsip of all of the steamships and shipping companies and privately owned ships of the world in order to discover whether some one of them may be owned in a very small part by some German subject. What we are proposing to do is to take over some interned ships, and if the resolution be amended as I suggest, it will give full authority to do that thing.

Mr. ELSTON. Would it possibly cloud the title by having a possible execution of this privilege in the President impending over the title of every vessel under American registry, French registry, or British registry in which a German citizen may have any interest?

There would be suspended over such vessels the possibility that the President under the athority of this act might forfeit the title to the Government of the United States. If the gentleman will permit, I can not conceive of any instance in which the United States Government would desire to take over any vessel partly owned by a German citizen, but sailing under either American, French, or British registry. There are very cogent reasons why German ownership in whole or in part should be joined to German registry before confiscation is permitted. In an actual case on the Pacific coast the equitable and legal ownership passed many months ago to an American citizen, and the only thing remaining is the change from German to American registry.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, if there is any reason why we should authorize the President to take over ships bearing the flag and having the registry of nations with which we are at peace, that is an important matter that should be considered and discussed, and it has not been considered and discussed in connection with this legislation, and my purpose is simply to amend the bill so that it will authorize what its authors intended to accomplish, as I understand it—that is, to take over these interned ships, ships owned wholly or in part by Germans, carrying the German flag and under German registry.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MONDELL) there were—ayes 13, noes 39.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the joint resolution to the House with the recommendation that the same do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOOHER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration Senate joint resolution 42 and had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment and with the recommendation that the joint resolution do pass.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the joint resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that those who spoke on the bill may have leave to revise and extend their remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who spoke on Senate joint resolution 42 have leave to revise and extend their remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none; and, without objection, House joint resolution 62 of similar tenor will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the reprint of the bill H. R. 4125.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4125) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging agriculture and regulating the marketing and distribution of foods and other necessaries of life.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. What does the gentleman mean by a reprint?

Mr. LEVER. I understand through the clerks of my committee that the document room has exhausted the supply of these bills that have been printed. I have not looked into the matter personally, but I understand that the number allowed are exhausted and Members can not get copies of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I do not know just what this reprint will be——

Mr. LEVER. I do not myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. RODENBERG was granted leave of absence indefinitely on account of sickness in his family.

STEAM YACHT "OWERA."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill S. 1845, the bill I mentioned this morning, to allow Senator GERRY to turn over to the department during the war his boat.

The SPEAKER. Is it a House bill?

Mr. PADGETT. It is a Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] asks unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 1845) to authorize PETER GOELET GERRY to enter into a contract with the Secretary of the Navy, in behalf of the United States for the use of the steam yacht Owera.

Be it enacted, etc., That PETER GOELET GERRY, a Senator of the United States from the State of Rhode Island, having offered to the Government for the period of the war the use of his yacht hereinafter named, be, and he is hereby, authorized to enter into a contract or agreement with the Secretary of the Navy, in behalf of the United States, for the use by the United States of the steam yacht Owera, owned by the said Senator, for such period as may be mutually agreeable to the parties to the contract or agreement herein authorized.

SEC. 2. That the provisions of sections 114 and 115 of the act approved March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," and any other laws or parts of laws inconsistent herewith, be, and they are hereby, declared inapplicable to the said PETER GOELET GERRY and the Secretary of the Navy, or such other officer or officers of the United States as shall, on behalf of the Secretary of the Navy, enter into the aforesaid contract or agreement for the purposes and to the extent set forth in section 1 hereof.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the gentleman a question. I notice in the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, in the report accompanying this bill, that he states it is not his policy to accept ships offered gratis to the Government unless it is with the authority of Congress. I wish to inquire whether the committee has considered the suggestion of the Secretary of making a general authorization for him to accept these vessels rather than singling out special instances, as is provided in the bill under consideration?

Mr. PADGETT. I will state that I can not say it has been before the committee. I have personally been giving some consideration to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Secretary directs attention to the fact that there are many instances of private persons having offered their vessels free to the Government, but he does not feel warranted in accepting them without authority of Congress. Why should not the House favor such a policy and not single out just one bill for special distinction?

Mr. PADGETT. When it was offered and it was called to my attention, as I stated, I had been thinking of preparing a bill along that line. But this is offered, and they want it, and they said it would be useful. I see no objection to granting the authority. Other persons can trade with the Government because they are not prohibited. But a Member of Congress without the authority of the House or Senate can not enter into any agreement for trade, because the statute forbids. This is simply to remove the objection of the statute and forbid him, notwithstanding the statute, to make the trade.

Mr. STAFFORD. We all agree that the Government is in need of ships.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir; very much.

Mr. STAFFORD. I suppose we all further agree that the Government should accept the ships of all persons, whether United States Senators or private individuals. Here we have a declaration of the Secretary of the Navy saying that he will not accept them without authorization of Congress. Why should we not have a general law rather than such a private bill as is under consideration?

Mr. PADGETT. As I was saying, I was thinking of preparing and introducing a bill of that kind, but so far it has not been done.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, the committee reports that Senator GERRY is the owner of a yacht, and as it is the Navy Department can not accept as a gift to the Government any property of considerable value without a contract.

Mr. PADGETT. Where is that?

Mr. MANN. I am reading from the report of the committee. What about the charge? Does the gentleman know?

Mr. PADGETT. It is free. There is no charge or compensation at all to be paid.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing in this bill to that effect.

Mr. PADGETT. That is the proposition that he makes to the Government, and the Secretary in his letter states it is without charge or compensation.

Mr. MANN. But the report of the committee shows that the department declined to accept the free gift to the Government, and therefore it is necessary to enter into a contract. That implies that there is to be a contract for a consideration.

Mr. PADGETT. No. The Secretary in his letter stated that it is without charge or compensation.

Mr. MANN. But the Secretary states he wants authority to enter into a contract because he does not accept free gifts.

Mr. PADGETT. There is the general law, you will remember——

Mr. MANN. I know the general law forbids a Member of Congress making a contract.

Mr. PADGETT. I understand, and the general law forbids the Government to accept gifts also.

Mr. NORTON. What would be the compensation if the yacht was destroyed during the war?

Mr. PADGETT. None whatever, as I understand, sir.

Mr. NORTON. There is nothing to indicate that in this proposed legislation.

Mr. PADGETT. That will be in the contract. He proposes just to turn it over to the Government and let them use it without any liability or any compensation.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the gentleman considers this as an emergency matter.

Mr. PADGETT. The Government is needing ships very much.

Mr. MANN. That being the case, why is not what the Secretary refers to an emergency matter? The Secretary's letter says that while the department is very much in need of vessels and desires to accept vessels they can not do so without the consent of Congress. Why is not that an emergency matter just as much as for one vessel?

Mr. PADGETT. I was stating to the gentleman that I was thinking of preparing a bill and bringing it before the House.

Mr. MANN. Thinking about it is very slow if it is an emergency matter. This bill was reported to the House two weeks ago.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. I have several other matters here that are needed——

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman is only thinking now of preparing a bill on a real emergency matter.

Mr. PADGETT. I have been preparing a good many others that are on the calendar.

Mr. MANN. On the calendar?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. I have been holding hearings every day, and we have been considering bills and reporting them.

Mr. MANN. I think it would probably expedite the gentleman's thinking about the general subject if we do not pass this bill at this moment.

Mr. PADGETT. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. MANN. Then I am not sure whether this has met the approval of the Democratic caucus. [Laughter.] We were told this morning by gentlemen on the other side that the House could not pass anything because the Democratic caucus had so decided. The Democratic caucus runs the Congress. I think the gentleman ought to go and get the approval of the Democratic caucus.

Mr. PADGETT. I appreciate the gentleman's humor. [Laughter.] But on the merits of this matter I think we ought to pass this bill, and I hope there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. For the present I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 8, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting tentative draft of legislation to amend section 1570 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (H. Doc. No. 122); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting tentative draft of a bill to authorize the designation by the President of six officers of the Navy for the command of fleets or subdivisions thereof with the rank of admiral and vice admiral, and for other purposes (H. Doc. No. 125); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

5. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting tentative draft of a provision of legislation authorizing the President to drop from the rolls of the Navy or Marine Corps any officer under certain conditions (H. Doc. No. 126); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

6. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting tentative draft of a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to determine where and when there are no public quarters available for officers of the Navy and Marine Corps (H. Doc. No. 127); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

7. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting tentative draft of a bill to provide for the disposition of the effects of deceased persons in the naval service (H. Doc. No. 128); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

8. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting tentative draft of a bill for the relief of certain enlisted men of the United States Navy (H. Doc. No. 129); to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

9. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of Olympia Harbor, Wash. (H. Doc. No. 130); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed, with illustrations.

10. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation required for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, for disposition of remains of officers, soldiers, and civilian employees (H. Doc. No. 131); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. LEVER, from the Committee on Agriculture, to which was referred the bill (H. The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

MINT AT DENVER, COLO. (S. DOC. NO. 23.)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Director of the Mint submitting an estimate of a deficiency in the contingent appropriation of the mint at Denver for the current fiscal year in the sum of $4,000, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the twelfth district of the Indiana State Federation of Clubs, of South Whitley, Ind., and a petition of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, of Harriman, Tenn., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I present a memorial in the nature of a petition, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., April 28, 1917.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The United Irish Societies of Seattle, Wash., having appointed a joint committee to express to you officially their view of the service which it lies in the power of the Congress of the United States at this time to render to the cause of democracy and small nationalities, through the restoration of its freedom to the Irish nation, the committee has commissioned us as its officers to forward to you the following as the expression of its view and that of the various societies which called it into existence:

"On behalf of a great historic nation, whose nationhood and civilization antedate those of any other European country save Greece alone, and which for over seven centuries has maintained in open warfare its right to the liberties of which it has been robbed, we appeal to the Congress of the United States. We do so as citizens of this Republic, for the protection of whose honor and whose liberties the men of our race are to-day, as they have ever been since its foundation, ready to yield up, if necessary, all that they are and all that they have in this life.

"We appeal to you at this portentious crisis in the world's history for your aid in asserting and bringing to realization the restored liberties of Ireland, the cradle of our race, and ever the unfailing friend and champion of the American Republic, its liberties, and its institutions.

"When in his effort to bring peace to the distracted nations of Europe our national Executive, with that rare eloquence peculiarly his, proclaimed our national purpose to be therein the vindication of democracy and 'the rights and liberties of small nationalities,' he struck a tenderly responsive chord in the hearts of the Irish race the world over.

"It has happened, as the world well knows, that the leading belligerent nations have, however equivocally, sought in their response to the President's appeal to justify themselves by the avowal of a corresponding purpose.

"Since under the providence of God it has been vouchsafed that while claiming only to seek the well-being of humanity we should have been called upon ourselves to become one of the belligerents, the great privilege is now presented to us as a Nation to successfully assert against all opposing forces the glorious principles upon which rest the institutions of this Nation. With such an opportunity at its disposal, it is fitting that we should appeal, and we do appeal most sacredly, to the American Congress that it may at this time take such action as must necessarily secure at once the independence of Ireland.

"The great occasion now offers itself to the national representatives of this people, and we ask that, in the glorious spirit which wrought the liberation of the sister island of Cuba, and which has extended the willing hand of aid and comfort to all nations struggling to be free, the Congress of the United States shall demand of those nations with which we are to act in concert in the prevailing hostilities, and directly and immediately of that one of them which holds her in bondage, that Ireland shall forthwith be restored to her lost national independence.

"For such a demand at this time we have the warrant of over 140 years of unswerving loyalty to this land on the part of the Irish race, sanctified by their blood and made good in their labors and sacrifices for the perpetuity and well-being of American institutions."

Respectfully requesting that this communication may be read to your body and that it be printed in extenso in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, we have the honor to subscribe ourselves.

Very respectfully, yours,

WM. O'MULCAHY, Chairman.
EDWARD J. LOEW, Secretary.

Mr. KNOX. I present resolutions of the House of Representatives of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Resolved, That the House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania hereby request and urge the Members of the House of Representatives and of the Senate of the United States from this Commonwealth to vote for and assist in the adoption of the selective-draft measure now before the Congress of the United States.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution, signed by the speaker and chief clerk of the house, be forwarded to each Member of the Congress from this Commonwealth.

The foregoing is a true and correct copy of a resolution passed in the house of representatives on April 24, 1917.

R. J. BALDWIN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
THOMAS H. GARVIN,
Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. KNOX presented a memorial of sundry druggists of Plymouth, Pa., remonstrating against any additional tax on proprietary medicines, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from George W. and Thomas W. Gilmore, of Macon, and from B. W. Holt and W. F. Rawlings, of Atlanta, all in the State of Georgia, remonstrating against the proposed 5 per cent tax on automobiles, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MYERS presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Butte, Mont., indorsing the action of the President and Congress in declaring war, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of National Park Lodge, No. 168, International Association of Machinists, of Livingston, Mont., praying for the enactment of certain legislation for the conduct of the war, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented resolutions adopted by the Progressive national convention, held at St. Louis, Mo., April 13, 1917, indorsing the bill to amend section 4 of the act to regulate commerce passed February 4, 1887, and subsequent amendments thereof, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Kellogg Marsh Grange, No. 136, Patrons of Husbandry, of Marysville, Wash., praying for the requisition by the Government of warehouses, grain elevators, food supplies, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of the city council of Minneapolis, Minn., praying for compulsory military service, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Methodist pastors of Minneapolis, Minn., pledging support to the President and praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON COMMERCE.

Mr. THOMPSON. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I report back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute Senate resolution 54, submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and I ask for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposes to strike out all after the word "Resolved" and to insert:

That the Committee on Commerce, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-fifth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before that committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and the committee or any subcommittee thereof may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. There is a similar resolution on the calendar providing for hearings before the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. OVERMAN. I objected the other day to the resolution reported from the committee authorizing the Committee on the Judiciary to take testimony and to pay for stenographic reports. As soon as this resolution is disposed of I am willing to have that resolution taken up for consideration, and those are the only matters that I will consent to have considered this morning.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand the resolution for the Judiciary Committee is now on the calendar.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is correct.

Mr. FLETCHER. This resolution, providing for hearings before the Committee on Commerce, has been reported by the committee favorably with an amendment.

Mr. THOMPSON. This is Senate resolution 54, which was submitted by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to its consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to call up Senate resolution 53 from the calendar.

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 53, submitted by Mr. CULBERSON and reported by Mr. THOMPSON on the 4th instant, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-fifth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before that committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and the committee or any subcommittee thereof may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHAFROTH:

A bill (S. 2164) to provide for the erection of a public building at Montrose, Colo., upon a site heretofore acquired by the United States; and

A bill (S. 2165) to provide for the acquisition of a site and the erection thereon of a public building at Alamosa, Colo.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 2166) authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to lease certain property; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 2167) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a suitable site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building for the use and accommodation of the post office and other governmental offices, at Canton, Ohio, at a cost not to exceed $350,000, and to sell the present building and site; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. KNOX:

A bill (S. 2168) for the relief of the McClintic-Marshall Construction Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 2169) for the relief of Stephen A. Randolph; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 2170) for the relief of Dora Gaines Delano, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 2171) to abolish the United States land office at Springfield, Mo.; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 2172) granting an increase of pension to Allen Russell (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 2173) for the relief of Frederick W. Seidell; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 2174) granting a pension to Thomas J. Boice; and

A bill (S. 2175) granting an increase of pension to James B. Atkinson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GORE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 52) to prohibit and punish conspiracies in respect of transportation, handling, or dealing in food supplies, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 53) authorizing the President to appoint two additional Assistant Secretaries of Agriculture, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. GORE (by request):

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 54) empowering the Secretary of Agriculture to regulate dealings in agricultural products on boards of trade, and for other purposes;

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 55) authorizing the President to restrict or prohibit the use of food and feed materials in the manufacture of alcoholic and other beverages, and for other purposes;

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 56) authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to make a survey of the food situation and to ascertain basic facts in relation thereto, and for other purposes;

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 57) authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to establish grades for certain agricultural food products, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 58) vesting the President with certain powers in respect to movements of common carriers, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

AMENDMENT TO PENDING BILL.

Mr. ASHURST submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the importance of passing the proposed amendment to the Federal reserve act as a means of floating the bonds and Treasury certificates which we have on hand now at the rate of $200,000,000 every two weeks. The espionage bill has had the floor for some days, and I have not been willing to interfere with the orderly proceedings, but I do wish to call the attention of the Senate to this matter and to discharge my responsibilities in connection with it.

I have a very urgent letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, dated May 5, to this effect:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, May 5, 1917.

DEAR SENATOR: The House passed the bill to-day covering certain of the amendments to the Federal reserve act which the Federal Reserve Board is anxious to see made law, and I write to beg that you give this matter your prompt and vigorous attention, so that the Senate bill may be passed at the earliest possible moment. I can not exaggerate the importance of prompt action in this matter. It is of additional importance in view of the $2,000,000,000 liberty loan we are now trying to place. The stronger we make the Federal Reserve Banks and the more we enlarge their facilities the more useful they can be in all of the important financing which lies ahead of the Government. Please let me know how soon you think the bill can be put through the Senate.

Cordially, yours, W. G. MCADOO.

Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN,
United States Senate.

I was called up this morning by the Federal Reserve Board, urging this measure, and I wish to discharge my duty in the matter. If it is delayed any longer the responsibility should be placed upon the Senate and not upon the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

I ask unanimous consent that we may, at 8 o'clock to-night, take up this measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state, for the information of the Senator from Oklahoma, that in his absence from the Senate and the city the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] requested the Chair to hold House bill 3673, which came from the House of Representatives, until the return of the Senator from Oklahoma. The Senator from Oklahoma having returned, the Chair lays before the Senate the bill from the House of Representatives, which will be read by its title.

The bill (H. R. 3673) to amend the act of December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the act of August 4, 1914, August 15, 1914, March 3, 1915, and September 7, 1916, was read twice by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. OWEN. I now ask unanimous consent that at 8 o'clock to-night we may take up this bill for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. I object to that.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill will have to be reported before we can give unanimous consent for its consideration. The Senator from Oklahoma will have to report the bill sometime to-day, and if he then desires to ask unanimous consent for its consideration, well and good.

Mr. OWEN. There is pending on the calendar this same bill in substance as Senate bill 1796. I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 1796 which has been reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency and which is on the calendar.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Are we now proceeding by unanimous consent? Is the espionage bill the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is, and it is before the Senate. We are proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. BORAH. I object to unanimous consent until the espionage bill is disposed of.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to say to the Senator from Oklahoma that the espionage bill has been before the Senate for about 10 days and has been fully debated. My own honest opinion is that we will finish it to-morrow or Thursday morning. I think the Senate can proceed to the consideration of the bill the Senator from Oklahoma has in charge by Friday.

Mr. OWEN. I thought we might have a night session and dispose of this measure without interfering with the orderly debate on the espionage bill, and it was with that view in mind that I made the request.

Mr. OVERMAN. As far as I am concerned, I have no objection to a night session to consider the bill.

Mr. OWEN. It is a very urgent matter in financing the Treasury certificates which are being marketed in this country.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to a night session at 8 o'clock to-night for the purpose of considering the measure?

Mr. GRONNA. I object.

Mr. BORAH. I do not desire——

Mr. GRONNA. I have objected.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know that I shall object, but a number of us here know nothing about the bill to which the Senator from Oklahoma refers and we are very much interested in the bill which is now the unfinished business. I would have no objection to putting aside the espionage bill until this bill is disposed of, but I object to coming here at a night session while we are having such long hours on the important measure which is the unfinished business.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Could not the Senator from North Carolina, who has charge of the espionage bill, give the Senator from Oklahoma some time during the afternoon?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I want to continue and finish the pending bill. It has been here, as I have said, 10 days; and I want to get through with it. I am not going to yield for any purpose until that bill is disposed of.

Mr. BORAH. I really suspect that the bill of which the Senator from Oklahoma has charge, is more important than the bill which the Senator from North Carolina has in charge.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. Both bills are of great importance, and I do not wish to compare one with the other. I do wish, however, to put upon the Senate itself the responsibility of any further postponement of the bill to which I refer.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I rose to suggest to the Senator from North Carolina, as the espionage bill is divided into chapters, if it would not be possible after completing a chapter to lay it aside and take up the bill in charge of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], which, I think, can be passed in one day. It is a bill of very considerable importance, and it seems to me it should be given early consideration. If the Senator from North Carolina is not willing to do that, I will suggest to the Senator from Oklahoma that he move that a session be held to-morrow evening at 8 o'clock for the purpose of taking up the banking bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to suggest both to the Senator from Oklahoma and the Senator from North Carolina that if the Senator from North Carolina, when the time for adjournment arrives to-day, will move an adjournment till to-morrow that would give the Senator from Oklahoma two hours to-morrow morning in which to have his bill considered, and I believe the bill can be gotten through in that time.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I move that to-morrow evening at 8 o'clock the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1796.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is a request for the making of a special order, which will require a two-thirds vote. The only way the Chair can determine the matter is for the Secretary to call the roll.

Mr. BORAH. I ask that the roll be called.

Mr. OVERMAN. Without doing that, I suggest to the Senator that I am willing to accede to the suggestion that to-day the Senate take an adjournment until to-morrow, instead of a recess, which will give the Senator from Oklahoma two hours to-morrow morning.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oklahoma will permit me, if his bill should not be concluded within those two hours, I think the Senator might then arrange for a night session at which to complete it.

Mr. OWEN. I thank the Senator for the suggestion.

Mr. OVERMAN. I accede to that proposition, Mr. President, and at the conclusion of the session to-day I shall move an adjournment instead of a recess. The Senator from Oklahoma will then have from 12 to 2 o'clock to-morrow in which to have his bill considered. Then if we do not finish the bill, the Senator can ask for a night session.

Mr. OWEN. Then I ask unanimous consent that at 12 o'clock to-morrow, an adjournment having been taken from this afternoon, we may take up the bill to which I have referred in the morning hour.

Mr. GALLINGER. There will be no objection to the Senator's doing so to-morrow morning, but I suggest to him not to ask for an order to that effect.

Mr. OWEN. Very well; I withdraw the suggestion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair doubts whether what the Senator from Oklahoma proposes can be done without a roll call, although the Chair has no doubt the Senate will accede to his request for the consideration of the bill to-morrow. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, at the adjournment on yesterday the Senate was considering Chapter VII of the pending bill. It is only a short time, now, being only five minutes, when we shall receive the British commissioners. I therefore ask that Chapter VII of the bill be laid aside, and that we consider the last chapter of the bill, which is known as the mail-orders chapter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is now a pending amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I will ask the Senate to hear the reading of a letter from the Solicitor of the Post Office Department. There have been some reflections made upon the mail orders which have been issued by the Post Office Department. I want to say that of the orders which have been made by the present Postmaster General, there has not been any criticism whatever, because the policy of that department has been changed. I desire to have read into the RECORD the regulations and rules as now prescribed by the department in making mail fraud orders. I will ask the Secretary to read the part of the Postmaster General's report which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before that is done, I ask permission to offer an amendment to the last section of the pending bill, and to have it printed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert:

SEC. 6. Whenever the present war shall cease by the conclusion of peace between the United States and its enemies in the present war, the President shall so declare by a public proclamation to that effect, and from and after the date of said proclamation the provisions of this act shall cease to be in force and effect.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed. The extract from the communication referred to by the Senator from North Carolina will be read.

The SECRETARY. Reading from the report of the Assistant Attorney General for the Post Office Department to the Postmaster General for the year ending June 30, 1913, page 6, as follows:

FRAUD ORDERS.

The issuance of fraud orders under sections 3929 and 4041, Revised Statutes, as amended by the acts of September 19, 1890, and March 2, 1895, against swindlers using the mails to conduct schemes to defraud the public was practically discontinued and little effort has been made to enforce these sections during the past several years, the published reports of my predecessors showing that the Government relied almost entirely upon the enforcement of section 5480 of the Revised Statutes (now section 215 of the Criminal Code), which provides for the indictment and punishment of persons who use the mails in conducting schemes to defraud.

At the outset of the present administration the attention of the department was called to the fact that reliance upon criminal prosecutions to root out the various schemes to defraud the public through the mails had been ineffective, that criminal proceedings are necessarily slow, and by means of appeals and other methods the execution of sentence had been deferred for long periods, during which the concerns and individuals engaged in such fraudulent businesses had continued to reap a harvest of their fraudulent enterprises. In some instances, the penalty of the law being merely a fine, there was nothing to prevent the parties from continuing the conduct of their schemes except fear of subsequent fines. These they could easily afford to pay, in view of the large revenue derived from the business. Instances were brought to the attention of the department where even after a term of imprisonment the fraudulent scheme was resumed by the offender upon his release, and in other instances the operation of the fraudulent scheme was continued without interruption during the criminal proceedings, conviction, and imprisonment, during all of which time the public had been left at the mercy of these swindlers, in ignorance of the prosecution, and in reliance upon the integrity of any concern which the Government permitted the use of the mails; the very use of the mails itself being advertised by some of these fraudulent concerns as an evidence of the fact that they were necessarily doing a legitimate business or the Government would not permit them the use of the mails.

The following paragraph, quoted from the report of the chief post-office inspector of 1912, will be of interest:

"The discouraging feature to the department in its fraud crusade is the character of sentences imposed by the courts. In a number of instances parties who have robbed the people of millions of dollars have received sentences of only a few months, and it generally appears in certain of the courts that defendants who obtained several hundred thousand dollars, and were found guilty as charged in the indictments, have been sentenced to pay only small fines ranging from a few dollars to $3,000. Even the cost to the Government of the prosecution, which in most instances was many times the amount of the fine, has not been imposed against these wealthy defendants."

After numerous conferences of officials of this department among themselves and with officials of the Department of Justice the policy with respect to the enforcement of the laws providing for the exclusion from the mail of this class of matter was determined upon by you soon after assuming the duties of your present office. The object of this policy is a tireless campaign against those who conduct schemes to defraud through the mails, and involves a strict enforcement of sections 3929 and 4041 of the Revised Statutes as amended.

The theory that fraud orders can be evaded successfully by a mere change of name is not substantiated by the records. It is to be borne in mind that a fraud order immediately cuts off the source of supply of funds upon which the scheme largely depends for its continuance. Such an order also puts many prospective victims on their guard by reason of the return to them of their letters addressed to the fraudulent concern plainly marked "fraudulent" on the envelope. To continue the scheme under a new name requires in most instances the publication of advertisements and the sending out of circular matter under that name. Such matter soon comes to the attention of the department, and supplemental fraud orders can be forthwith issued. This office is aware of no instance in which the endeavor to conduct the scheme under a new name has met with real success after the issuance of a fraud order.

Some idea may be conveyed of the magnitude of the present undertaking, and the additional work which will be thrown upon my office as a consequence, when it is considered that in the enforcement of the criminal statute (sec. 215 of the Criminal Code) during the year ended June 30, 1912, more than 4,000 cases involving schemes to defraud were investigated by post-office inspectors; that in the two years preceding that date over 1,000 persons had been arrested for such swindling through the mails; and that the estimated losses to the public through the fraudulent operations represented by these arrests amounted to over $129,000,000.

In the enforcement of the laws authorizing the issuance of fraud orders not only will this class of cases come before my office, but in addition there will be submitted here a large number of cases which some district attorneys may not feel disposed to present to the grand juries.

Upon the resumption of the fraud-order work by this office a modified plan of procedure was adopted, which should make it free from whatever ground of criticism, if any, formerly existed as to methods pursued here.

When the post-office inspectors investigate these cases they submit to this office exactly the same class of evidence which they submit to the United States attorneys for prosecutions under the criminal statutes. The method now being pursued by this office in handling these cases involves, first, a careful review and analysis of the evidence presented by the post-office inspectors by one of my assistants, who, if he thinks the case as presented warrants, prepares and presents over his signature a citation of charges and specifications informing the respondent of the nature of the case against him. These charges and specifications are transmitted by me to the respondent with a notice that upon a day certain he may submit his answer in writing and supplement the same by evidence in support thereof and by oral argument, if desired. Upon the day named in the citation a hearing is had before me, and the evidence in the possession of the Government's attorney is brought to my attention for the first time. The respondent is thereupon given an opportunity to present such evidence as he desires in defense. This results in a fair trial of the issues involved and not infrequently extends over a period of several days. The principal evidence in these cases is necessarily of a documentary character. If, in my judgment, it is established that the scheme involved is one which is prohibited by the statutes, it is necessary to review all of the evidence on both sides of the case and to prepare a memorandum for the Postmaster General showing the charges, the evidence adduced in support of them, the answer and the evidence offered in the way of defense or explanation, and the conclusion reached thereon by me. Upon this memorandum final action is taken by the Postmaster General, consisting either in the issuance of a fraud order or dismissal of the charges. In cases where it is found at the hearing that the evidence in the case is not sufficient to establish the alleged violation of law, the case is closed and no further action is taken in the matter by this office. It is proposed to enforce these statutes vigorously and with impartiality, and it is hoped that this course, together with prosecutions for violations of section 215 of the Criminal Code, will serve to stamp out the use of the mails for fraudulent purposes.

RECEPTION OF BRITISH COMMISSIONERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT (at 12 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.). The British commissioners having arrived at the Capitol, the Chair requests the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] to meet the members of the British commission in the Vice President's room and escort them into the Senate Chamber.

At 12 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m. the commissioners of the Government of Great Britain to the Government of the United States, the Right Hon. Arthur James Balfour, M. P., O. M., principal British secretary of state for foreign affairs; the Hon. Sir Eric Drummond, K. C. M. G., C. B.; Mr. Ian Malcolm, M. P.; Mr. C. F. J. Dormer; Rear Admiral Sir Dudley R. S. de Chair, R. N., K. C. B., M. V. O.; Fleet Paymaster Gen. Vincent A. Lawford, R. N., D. S. O.; Maj. Gen. G. T. M. Bridges, G. M. G., D. S. O.; Maj. H. H. Spender-Clay, M. P., British General Staff, escorted by the committee appointed by the Vice President, consisting of Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. COLT, and Mr. BORAH, entered the Senate Chamber, accompanied by Sir Cecil Arthur Spring-Rice, the British ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary accredited to the United States, aids of the British officers, the Assistant Secretary of State, Mr. William Phillips; Mr. Hugh Gibson, of the State Department; and Capt. George Quekemeyer, United States Army. The distinguished visitors were escorted to the places assigned to them, the Right Hon. Arthur J. Balfour and the British ambassador, Sir Cecil Arthur Spring-Rice, being seated, respectively, at the right and left of the Vice President.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, in honor of the distinguished representatives of Great Britain, who are the guests of the Nation and who are now in the Senate Chamber, and in order that Senators may have an opportunity to be presented to them, I move that the Senate take a recess for 30 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess for 30 minutes.

During the recess,

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators, for more than a century and a quarter the one great reason for the existence of this body has been to preserve the equality of all men before the law. A few days since we had the pleasure of greeting the representatives of that people whose shibboleth is "fraternity." To-day we honor, and in turn are ourselves honored, by receiving the representatives of that people whose forbears centuries ago, in an age of almost universal absolutism, compelled their King, annointed though he was with the holy oil of consecration, to give to them the Great Charter of human liberty. It were mere prophecy to say that without that Great Charter the Republic either of France or of America would be or have a hope of being.

May I express the hope that at the end of this most horrific warfare, when the representatives of liberty, fraternity, and equality shall take their seats at the council table of the nations, they will not arise therefrom until they shall, so far as human ingenuity can do so, guarantee to every people the right to be free from the fear of assault from without or oppression from within [applause] until they shall write this legend in the firmament, above the sun rising for a newer and, if not a better, at least a safer, civilization, "I shine only for the wise; they are not wise who are not just"? In the words of one woman lawyer, for whom I have profound respect, the wise Portia, to Antonio, Bassanio's best friend:

> Sir, you are very welcome to our house;
> It must appear in other ways than words,
> Therefore I scant this breathing courtesy.

I have the honor and the great pleasure of presenting to you the foremost champion of Magna Charta, the Right Hon. Arthur James Balfour, British secretary of state for foreign affairs. [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF RIGHT HON. ARTHUR JAMES BALFOUR.

Mr. BALFOUR. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate: You, Mr. President, have in graceful and pregnant sentences brought to our recollection the common origin of those liberties which, whether in France, in Britain, or in the United States of America, we all rejoice in and are all determined to defend. [Applause.] You have also in warm words of welcome spoken kindly of the mission of which I have the honor to be the head and to which you are now paying the rare, the very rare, honor of welcoming within your walls. Gentlemen, on their behalf not less than on my own I most sincerely thank you for your welcome. I know well that it is not a welcome to individuals. The kindness which each one of us as individuals has received since we came to this great city will never be forgotten by any one of us. It has been kindness, abundant, overflowing, generous, unlimited; but, gentlemen, behind that kindness paid by individuals to individuals, behind the expression of a hospitable and generous feeling to guests within your gates, there is, after all, something much deeper, something much more important, something which is, after all, the animating spirit which brings this great assembly here to-day.

The original object of our mission, if I may so express it, was mainly a purely business one. We came here to discuss matters of the deepest moment for the conduct of that great war in which both our nations are involved. We came here to explain to your leaders and statesmen what were the needs from which the allies mainly suffered, and to lay freely at the disposal of those responsible for the conduct of your affairs the results of our own experience, the consequences, perhaps I ought to say, in some cases of our own errors and blunders during two years and a half of strenuous and sanguinary fighting. That was the original object; that was the business side of our mission. But the reception which you have given us here, the treatment which we have received from the President, from the Cabinet, from the House of Representatives, from the Senate—that treatment raises the whole level of our mission from a purely business operation to a great incident in the common life of two great and free peoples.

Gentlemen, I do not think the importance of that is easy to overrate. I believe that the consequences will not be measured by any mere record of the transactions that may take place between our various Governments, nor will the effects of it vanish when we ourselves, in consequence of the calls of duty elsewhere, leave your hospitable city. No, gentlemen, this mission and the French mission which is associated with it, mark a new epoch in the relations of our three countries, and I believe that in the alliance thus cemented lie secure some of the greatest hopes, some of the proudest expectations, which we dare to entertain about the future of civilization. [Applause.]

Gentlemen, it is not, however, your kindness of heart alone which has given this significance to contemporary events. That significance is forced upon our notice whether we be citizens of America or citizens of France or citizens of Britain; but I speak especially at this moment of citizens of America and citizens of Britain. It is forced upon our notice by the unwearied efforts of an unconscionable German propaganda. Whether we live on the other side of the Atlantic or on this side of the Atlantic, we English-speaking peoples have never organized ourselves for military purposes; we have never been military States; and, when the war broke out, undoubtedly the Germans looked around the world, estimated the value (from their point of view) of the nations with whom they might be concerned, and, profoundly contemptuous of our views of civilization, whether they were British or American views, they decided that neither Britain nor America counted in the struggle by which they hoped to obtain the domination of the world. They found us unprepared; they found us unmilitary; and because we were unprepared and because we were unmilitary, they jumped rashly to the conclusion, firstly, that we were afraid to fight, and, secondly, that if we fought we would be wholly negligible quantities. I think they are beginning, possibly, to find out their mistake. [Great applause.]

How, gentlemen, did that mistake ever arise? It arose from the utter incapacity of the German ruling class—and it is only of the German ruling class that I speak to-day—to estimate value except in terms of drilled men and military preparation. They saw that England and America were prosperous, were unwarlike, were immersed in the arts of peace and involved in the industrial interests incident to a peaceful civilization, and they drew from that two conclusions: They drew from it, in the first place, the conclusion that because we were commercial we were therefore material; that we were incapable of high ideals or great sacrifices; and the further conclusion that even if we determined late in the day to pursue those high ideals and to make those great sacrifices we should be so utterly incompetent in the arts to which they had devoted so much of their attention that our interference in the war would be a thing which they could leave wholly on one side. On that miscalculation have been wrecked, and will be wrecked, all their hopes. [Applause.] It was their fatal blunder, a blunder from which they will never recover, but a blunder which has saved civilization.

Gentlemen, I speak with confidence about the issue of this great struggle, a confidence which is redoubled since you have thrown in your lot with those who have been fighting since 1914. [Great applause.] I see, indeed, suggestions that Germany, incapable of winning by arms, is going to win through the illegitimate weapon of submarine warfare. I believe it not. I do not at all minimize, I do not wish to minimize, the gravity of the submarine menace. After all, in the two years and a half during which the war has been going on, more than one difficulty of like magnitude has met us and more than one difficulty of like magnitude has been overcome.

The question of munitions is a case in point. I do not wish to detain you on such an occasion with details, but at the beginning of the war it became evident that Germany had recognized the importance of the munitions question, had been preparing for this war through years of peace by having at her disposal a supply of ammunition greater than all the rest of the world put together, and at one time it almost looked as if the cause of civilization and liberty were to be crushed under the multitude of shells and the weight of artillery. We have surmounted that difficulty. It was a very great one.

I do not deny that the submarine difficulty is a very great one. I do not deny that it will require every effort made, either in Britain or here, successfully to overcome it; but that those efforts will be made, that this menace will be overcome, that the United States of America, like Great Britain and her dominions, will throw themselves into the task with ungrudging efforts, and that those efforts will be crowned with success, I do not doubt for a moment. [Great applause.] This war is not going to be settled by the sinking of helpless neutrals or by sending women and children to the bottom by torpedoes or gunfire. It is to be settled by hard fighting; and when it comes to hard fighting, neither America nor Britain nor France need fear measuring themselves at any moment against those who have risen up against all that we hold dear for the future.

I therefore, gentlemen, look forward—not, of course, in a spirit of light and easy and unthinking confidence, but with firm faith—to the future of this war. It requires every man and woman on this side of the Atlantic, as on the other side of the Atlantic, to throw their united efforts into the scale of right. That effort unquestionably will be made, is being made, will be made yet further, and, being made, I doubt not that it will be crowned with success, and that posterity will look back upon the union of these peoples, symbolized by such meetings as that which I am now addressing, as marking a new epoch in the history of the world; an epoch in which all the civilized nations roused themselves in unity to deal with one of their number which has forgotten its responsibilities, forgotten its duties, and which, in unscrupulous lust for universal domination, has brought the greatest of known calamities upon the world.

Gentlemen, I have detained you too long, but I was led away by my subject. On my own behalf and on behalf of my friends around me, I beg to thank you for the unique honor which you have paid to us, and, through us, to our country, to our cause, which is your cause, and to the future of civilization, which is yours as much as ours.

I thank you. [Great applause.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The British commissioners will take pleasure in greeting the Senators of the United States and such guests as may be upon the floor of the Senate. At the hour of 1 o'clock the Chair will ask Senator ROBINSON, of Arkansas, to take the chair.

The members of the British commission then took their places at the left of the Vice President's desk, and the Members of the Senate were presented to them by the committee of the Senate appointed by the Vice President for that purpose.

At 1 o'clock p. m., upon the expiration of the recess, the distinguished visitors were escorted from the Chamber and the Senate reassembled.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the doors be closed, so that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of legislative business in secret session.

Mr. OVERMAN. I second the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The Sergeant at Arms will clear the galleries and close the doors.

The Senate thereupon proceeded to deliberate behind closed doors. After 4 hours and 40 minutes the doors were reopened.

While the doors were closed,

Mr. CUMMINS submitted the following amendment, which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

Add, at the end of section 1, chapter 7, the following:

"Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as giving authority to violate any treaty between the United States and a nation with which it is at peace, nor to punish a friendly and neutral power for the exercise of its neutral rights and privileges."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 42) authorizing the President to take over for the United States the possession and title of any vessel within its jurisdiction which at the time of coming therein was owned in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen, or subject of any nation with which the United States may be at war, or was under register of any such nation, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 7) authorizing the Clerk of the House in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 13) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, to omit the figures "$75,000," on page 42, line 16, as the same were stricken out by the amendment of the Senate numbered 78, etc., in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, further insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, asks a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DENT, Mr. FIELDS, and Mr. KAHN managers at the further conference on the part of the House.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, further insisting upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and requesting a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate still further insist upon its amendments and agree to the further conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. WARREN conferees at the further conference on the part of the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, and 4, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 6 of the bill, strike out all on line 18, and in lieu thereof insert the following: "38 privates, first class, and 38 privates, $15,080"; and the Senate agree to the same.

G. E. CHAMBERLAIN,
G. M. HITCHCOCK,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
S. H. DENT, Jr.,
W. J. FIELDS,
JULIUS KAHN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which was read:

House concurrent resolution 7.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 13) entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes," the clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to omit the figures "$75,000," on page 42, line 16, of said bill, as the same were stricken out by the amendment of the Senate numbered 78, the conference report on said bill and amendments to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask that the Senate concur in the resolution of the House.

The resolution was concurred in.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m., Tuesday, May 8, 1917) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 9, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 8, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, fill our hearts with that same love for Thee and for humanity that ennobled and glorified Thy Son and that makes Him the world's great Exemplar; that we may honor our lives and dignify the work which Thou hast given us to do, through Him who taught us the way and the truth and the life. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 31. Joint resolution to increase food crops in the United States; to the Committee on Appropriations.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 13) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes. The clerk in charge of the papers has received notice of the death of his sister and has left the papers locked up, so I ask unanimous consent that the printed copy of the conference report may be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the Clerk may read the printed copy of the conference report. Mr. Cannon, the journal clerk, has received a telegram announcing the death of his sister and is absent on that account. The drawer where he keeps these papers is locked. Is there objection to reading the printed copy of the conference report in lieu of the original?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement of the managers on the part of the House.

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 42.)

On No. 81: Adopts Senate figures.

On No. 82: Authorizes the present authorized appropriation to be used for the purposes mentioned in this appropriation.

On No. 83: Strikes out House language authorizing the use of proceeds received from the operation of a public utility to be available for the purpose of engineer operations in the field, which provides that such proceeds shall go into the Treasury.

On No. 84: Provides an appropriation of $200,000 for military surveys and maps.

On No. 86: Provides that one-half instead of one-third of the sum appropriated for ammunition and ordnance stores shall be expended in purchasing the articles provided for.

On No. 87: Strikes out the language "of able-bodied men capable of bearing arms" under the item for small-arms target practice.

On No. 92: Increases the appropriation that may be used for the purchase of ordnance stores and supplies from $5,000,000 to $6,000,000.

On No. 93: Strikes out the House provision authorizing the Secretary of War to loan service material for exhibition purposes.

On No. 98: Authorizes the purchase in limited quantities abroad of material for the Ordnance Department, and provides that such material when so purchased shall be admitted free of duty.

On Nos. 100, 101, and 102: Simply perfect the language.

On No. 103: Adds the words "radio company" to machine-gun troops or companies, etc.

On No. 104: Adopts the figures of the Senate increasing the appropriation of the House by $10,000.

On No. 106: Authorizes the purchase of a rifle range for the use of the District National Guard in the sum of $50,000.

On No. 113: Increases the appropriation for the expenses of sergeant instructors from $80,000 to $100,000.

On No. 116: Provides that the National Guard shall include officers and enlisted men of the Staff Corps and Departments according to those of the Regular Army when authorized by the Secretary of War.

On No. 117: Raises the appropriation for Infantry equipment in the National Guard from $800,000 to $1,200,000.

On No. 118: Provides for the closing of the accounts with the States of money heretofore appropriated for the Organized Militia at the end of the fiscal year 1918, wherever such funds remain to the credit of such States, Territories, or the District of Columbia on August 29, 1916.

On No. 127: Authorizes the acceptance of offers of gratuitous service of members of the Officers' Reserve Corps in the enrollment, organization, and training of the Officers' Reserve Corps, the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, or the Enlisted Reserve Corps of the Army.

On No. 132: Requires that no expenditure exceeding $5,000 upon any building, military post, etc., shall be made without the approval of the Secretary of War upon detailed estimate submitted to him.

On No. 133: Authorizes the Secretary of War to have printing and binding done outside of the Government Printing Office in time of actual hostilities.

On No. 134: Relieves the Navasota Transfer Co. of its obligations to the Government for the supply of hay and bedding at various posts in the Southern Department.

On No. 13: Strikes out the word "hereafter," so as not to make it permanent law.

On No. 16: Authorizes the appointment of second lieutenants from enlisted men, including officers, of the Philippine Scouts, members, including officers, of the Organized Militia, the National Guard, or the Naval Militia, between the ages of 21 and 34.

On No. 25: Adopts the Senate figures, but strikes out the proviso.

On No. 26: Makes the amount $1,070,000, instead of $900,000, for the pay of enlisted men of the Signal Corps.

On No. 27: Raises the appropriation for additional pay for length of service of enlisted men of the Signal Corps from $96,000 to $100,000.

On No. 29: Authorizes the increase of the General Staff for the period of the existing emergency to 91.

On No. 46: Makes the item for subsistence of the Army $18,500,000, instead of $16,500,000 in the House bill and $19,293,394 in the Senate bill.

On No. 50: Makes the item for "Regular supplies of the Quartermaster Department" $13,450,000 instead of $11,000,000 in the House bill and $13,453,995.19 in the Senate bill.

On No. 53: Fixes $2,000,000 for incidental expenses of the Quartermaster Department instead of $1,800,000 in the House bill and $2,199,000 in the Senate bill.

On No. 54: Repeals section 1120 of the Revised Statutes, which authorized the pay to any person who procured a recruit for the Army.

On No. 59: Fixes the appropriation at $16,000,000 for transportation of the Army instead of $15,000,000 in the House bill.

On No. 62: Fixes the appropriation at $28,640,000 for clothing and camp and garrison equipage instead of $15,000,000 as provided in the House bill.

On No. 71: Adopts the Senate provision for the purchase of additional land adjoining the military reservation at Fort Sam Houston of not less than 1,180 acres.

On No. 73: Provides an appropriation of $500,000 for the construction, maintenance, etc., of military and post roads, etc., in Alaska, and makes same available for two years beginning the 1st of July next.

On No. 78: Simply perfects the language for vocational training in the House bill, together with the Senate amendment, which later provides that the Secretary of War may select one or more regiments of Infantry, Cavalry, or Field Artillery for such training purposes.

On No. 95: Fixes the appropriation for automatic machine rifles at $5,000,000, instead of $3,000,000 as provided by the House bill and $7,350,300 by the Senate bill.

On No. 99: Authorizes mileage to officers of the Ordnance Department to be paid from the appropriation for the work in connection with which the travel is performed, but it does not make this permanent law.

On No. 105: Restores the House language for the acquisition, construction, and maintenance of shooting galleries and target ranges, and provides that $125,000 shall be available for the procurement of lands for Field Artillery in the eastern and western departments, as authorized in the last annual appropriation bill.

On No. 114: Is kept in the bill, but placed, as indicated, at a different place.

On Nos. 121 and 122: Adopts the Senate figures as well as the amendment offered by the Senate providing for 3½ cents per mile travel pay and the payment of the return journey in advance, and an additional provision authorizing the payment of not exceeding $100 a month for persons designated for training for officers in such camps.

On No. 123: Authorizes the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to designate the first corps cadets of the National Guard of Massachusetts a senior division of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps.

On No. 125: Undertakes to clarify the language and authorizes leave of absence to officers or employees of the United States or of the District of Columbia while in the training camps, not to exceed 15 days.

On No. 126: Provides that members of the Officers' Reserve Corps in the employ of the United States or the District of Columbia shall after being ordered to duty, when relieved, be restored to the positions they held when so ordered.

On No. 128: Authorizes any former officer of the Regular or Volunteer Army, Organized Militia, or National Guard, under 64 years of age, who has resigned or been honorably discharged after a total service of not less than three years, under such examination and within such age limits as may be prescribed by the President, be commissioned in any appropriate arm, Staff Corps, department, or section of the Officers' Reserve Corps with rank of not more than one grade higher than that formerly held by him in any of said organizations, but in no case above that of lieutenant colonel.

On No. 129: Restores the House provision suspending the act providing that not more than one-half of the Staff Corps shall be stationed or assigned to or employed upon any duty in the District of Columbia or near thereto during the existing emergency.

The amount of the Senate bill was reduced by a little more than $4,500,000.

S. H. DENT, Jr.,
W. J. FIELDS,
PERCY E. QUIN,
JULIUS KAHN,
D. R. ANTHONY, Jr.,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the fact that I did not ask that the statement be read in lieu of the report, but it having been read, I now make that request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. We have got the original papers here now.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, this annual Army appropriation bill carried, in the form in which it passed the Senate, a little over $278,000,000. In the statement filed by the managers on the part of the House there is a mistake in stating that the House conferees succeeded in reducing the Senate bill about four and one-half million dollars. On looking over the figures I find that the reduction really amounts to $8,129,722.17.

The House conferees agreed to increases that the Senate insisted upon amounting to $33,070,923.35. The principal item of that increase of $33,000,000 is $13,640,000, or a little less than one-half the total increase, for the purchase of clothing and camp equipage. We were convinced by what we were told by the Quartermaster's Department, that in view of the present situation the Army is very short in that regard. and the House yielded, raising that amount by nearly $14,000,000.

In this bill there are some changes made in the law. Amendment No. 37 gives to retired officers the benefit of whatever active service they have had in computing their longevity pay. We thought that was only fair and just because they had actually been performing service.

Amendment 42 authorizes the Quartermaster's Department to name other officers in helping to make distribution of the funds in their charge. The purpose of that is manifest, I think, upon its face, because there are times when one man is simply physically unable to discharge this duty and he calls upon another officer to assist him in it, each officer being held responsible for the proper distribution of the funds.

Perhaps the most important legislative change that was made in this bill was the increase of the age limit of second lieutenants who have been enlisted men, including the officers of the Philippine Scouts and the enlisted men who have been officers of the Organized Militia and National Guard, from 21 to 34 years instead of 21 to 30 years of age.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I wish the gentleman from Alabama would make that statement again. I did not quite catch it. Does it change the ages for admission?

Mr. DENT. So far as it applies to the enlisted men of the Regular Army and the officers of the Philippine Scouts and enlisted men and officers of the Organized Militia and National Guard, the entrance age was raised to 34 years, heretofore it having been 27 years in some instances and 30 years in others.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Twenty-seven years in all instances, except for enlisted men?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Let me understand that. It is proposed that a man 34 years of age may take the examination for second lieutenant?

Mr. DENT. Provided he has had service as an enlisted man, or officer of the National Guard. We made the maximum age limit 34 to meet the objection which the War Department is constantly making, that if you raise this age limit, the man will be subject to retirement before he has had 30 years of service as an officer, which is the usual rule in the department. The age limit of 34 would give these officers 30 years of service before they reach the retiring age, which is 64 years. We thought it was only just and fair that these enlisted men, and particularly officers of the Philippine Scouts who have, many of them, seen much more service than a great many officers in the Regular Army, should have the right to get into the Regular Establishment, and should have the benefit of their prior service.

Amendment No. 29 increases the number of the General Staff to 91. This is the proposition about which there has been so much controversy in the newspapers. That is the number requested by the General Staff and by the Secretary of War. As the House doubtless will remember, this increases the General Staff from 55 to 91, but the increase is positively limited to the period of the present emergency, so that it does not become permanent law.

In the same connection the Senate receded from the House provision suspending the manchu law so far as it provided that not more than one-half of the General Staff should be on duty in or near the District of Columbia, the suspension being during the period only of this emergency.

Mr. SHERWOOD. I see the statement of the House conferees says that the amount of the Senate bill was reduced in conference by $4,500,000. How much does the conference report as agreed to increase the bill above the amount which it carried as it passed the House originally?

Mr. DENT. Thirty-three million dollars. The House agreed to increases amounting to $33,000,000 and secured a reduction of $8,000,000. The bill as it passed the Senate carried about $278,000,000, and as agreed to by the conferees it carries about $270,000,000.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the chairman of the committee permit a question?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Did I understand him to say that there had been a change in the so-called manchu law which lessens the amount of time that officers are required to spend with their organizations?

Mr. DENT. Oh, no, indeed. I referred to the manchu law. This bill changes the law, or rather suspends the law during the period of this emergency in so far as a provision in the national defense act declares that not more than one-half of the General Staff shall be at or near the District of Columbia at any one time.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I misunderstood the gentleman. This is the time they should be with the organization.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Certainly.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The gentleman will remember the bill which passed the Sixty-fourth Congress and went to the Senate, and when it came back there was an amendment forbidding the use of tobacco by the soldiers at training camps. Is there any provision of that kind in this bill?

Mr. DENT. Not at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to direct the attention of the chairman of the committee to that item which was eliminated in the House on the motion of a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, which provided $500,000 for the building of roads in Alaska. The Senate reinserted the item, and the committee has accepted the amendment with an amendment that the fund shall be available until the end of the fiscal year 1919. I wish to inquire whether the gentleman has any assurance that no additional money will be called for to be expended in Alaska in patchwork on Alaskan roads and building bridges during the fiscal year of 1919, if this provision is adopted as is proposed for the ensuing year?

Mr. DENT. Of course I have no assurance to that effect and no way of obtaining that assurance.

Mr. STAFFORD. If I am not violating any confidence, I will state that I received a letter from the Secretary of War in which he stated that if this $500,000 appropriation was allowed to go through he would not make any additional recommendations for next year.

Mr. DENT. I have no such letter.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not know whether the gentleman had any assurance that if it was extended to 1919 the $500,000 would be all that would be used.

Mr. DENT. That was the object in giving them two years to expend it in, that they would accomplish the purpose they had in view.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. I think the gentleman will recollect that the purpose of extending it two years was that the time for working in Alaska is very short. The summer is only about three or four months long and by extending this amount, making it available for two years, they can begin the work very promptly in the fiscal year 1919, and thus do a great deal of work that ordinarily they would not be able to do if they waited for the usual annual appropriation. Of course they hope by saving time in that way to be able to finish their plans.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is plain that the $500,000 was too much for the next fiscal year, and that it should be distributed over two years instead of one.

But I wish to make another inquiry about an item that has never been in the House and which, I assume, is a matter about which the gentleman from California is much more cognizant. It is amendment 73, providing for the exchange of certain lands in the Presidio that were used in connection with the California exposition for other land with the regents of the University of California. All of us who visited the fair remember the location of the land, that it was directly tributary to the Presidio, that large Army post which will grow in importance as the years go on, and that the land was so situated as to be serviceable for Army purposes. I wish to inquire why the Government is surrendering that land to the university, containing a building that is partly a shack, where the university has no ground near by in exchange for other lands that no one knows what they are and which may be of doubtful value.

Mr. DENT. I will yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the land in question is about 9 acres in area. It occupies a place in the Presidio of San Francisco, which prior to the exposition was a swamp. The exposition company filled it in. The Government never had any use of that land at any time by reason of the fact that it was overflowed. The University of California has land in various sections of the State, as well as in several sections of San Francisco. The land that is intended to be exchanged for this 9-acre tract is about an equal amount in area, bordering on what is known as Lobos Creek. Lobos Creek now furnishes the water supply of the Presidio. It is an independent supply. If the supply of San Francisco were to be cut in the rear of the city by some enemy at any time, the military post of the Presidio would still have its own water supply. The Government owns one-half of that stream that meanders along toward the Bay of San Francisco, including the eastern and southern banks. The idea is to allow the city of San Francisco, or its citizens, to purchase the other half of the creek, and then turn over to the military authorities all the land from the center of the creek to the house line of the city, so that the waters of the creek will be protected from contamination. It is the thing that the Government has been trying to do for some years, but it has been unable to accomplish the purpose. By this exchange the Government will get this land and its water supply, and the regents of the University of California will get a tract of land upon which stands the Palace of Fine Arts, which was such a marvelous attraction of the exposition at San Francisco in 1915. There is no disposition to take advantage of the Government. On the contrary, the city of San Francisco and its citizens will give quid pro quo for the land. The gentleman's assertion that the building is a shack is not borne out by the facts. The building cost something like $2,000,000 in its construction. Surely that is not a shack.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to say that the building I visited on several occasions containing the exhibition of fine arts was nothing but a shack.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman's idea of a shack and my idea of a building are entirely different. He is entitled to his opinion, but a $2,000,000 building is hardly to be classified as a shack. It is all built of brick and iron, with the exception of some ornamental work, and it is proposed to make that ornamental work permanent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand that this land that is to be acquired by the city of San Francisco and conveyed to the Government in exchange for the site now occupied by the former Building of Fine Arts furnishes the present water supply of the Presidio?

Mr. KAHN. One-half of the water supply. The present water supply is Lobos Creek. The Government owns to the middle of that stream. The Spring Valley Water Co. and other private owners own the other half of the stream and the lands adjacent thereto. Individual owners and the Spring Valley Water Co. own the land back to the house line fronting on that creek.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the Presidio get its water supply from the Spring Valley Water Co.?

Mr. KAHN. It does not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Or does it get its supply from its own controlled sources?

Mr. KAHN. The Spring Valley Water Co. is making no claim to the water, and the Government at this time is using all the water of the creek for its water supply.

Mr. STAFFORD. Who furnishes the water—the Spring Valley Water Co., or does the Government supply its own water?

Mr. KAHN. The Government furnishes half from its own lands and half from the land of the Spring Valley Water Co.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand it, the Spring Valley Water Co. is going to have their rights taken over——

Mr. KAHN. By the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. By the county of San Francisco for the Hetch Hetchy project?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, the Hetch Hetchy project has nothing to do with this.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am asking for information.

Mr. KAHN. The Government takes all its water from the creek, and there is a question of the ownership of one-half of the creek, and also of the land which borders on the creek, and which runs back to the building line owned principally in private ownership. It is proposed to turn all that land over to the Government so that the Government will have absolute control of the water of the creek and also the lands abutting thereon, so as to insure noncontamination of the supply.

Mr. STAFFORD. And when they acquire this additional land then the Presidio will have an independent source of water supply not dependent on any outside source at all?

Mr. KAHN. Absolutely.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the value of this land that the Government is giving up?

Mr. KAHN. I do not know what the value of the land is. It is down on a flat which was, as I have stated to the House, a marsh prior to the time of the exposition.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that it has been filled up and is land that can be used now.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the value of the land that the Government is getting?

Mr. KAHN. I have no idea. I can not inform the gentleman, but I am told that the land that will be ceded is at least of equal value and possibly of greater value to the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. Is this land that the Government is ceding closer to the city?

Mr. KAHN. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Farther away?

Mr. KAHN. No; they are equally close to the city. The United States Marine Hospital is also near Lobos Creek, and I dare say that the water from Lobos Creek can ultimately be supplied to the marine hospital so that institution will also be free from a local water supply.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman's opinion is that it is of advantage both to the Government and to the city?

Mr. KAHN. I think so, because the Government for many years has been trying to arrange the purchase of those lands so as to have its water supply complete and uncontaminated.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. In reference to Senate amendment 121, where the conference added a proviso in reference to the training of officers, that clearly covers the case of applicants for commissions who go into the training camps to be trained, who will receive not more than $100 a month?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. How about the officers who are now in the Reserve Corps, who go into these training camps? Is there any authority or appropriation under which they can be paid while they are in the training camps?

Mr. DENT. Not unless they are designated to go to a camp for training by the Secretary of War, according to the language of the amendment under the provisions of this section.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman refer to the proviso?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It may be that this proviso would be construed to cover men now in the Reserve Corps, but plainly the reading of the proviso does not contemplate that. The proviso contemplates that anyone who receives this pay can make an agreement to accept an appointment in the Reserve Corps, in such grade as may be tendered by the Secretary of War. That plainly does not contemplate the payment of officers in the Reserve Corps in certain grades.

Mr. DENT. Unless they would be designated there for training and get a promotion, I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. MANN. They are not ordered to duty. I know that officers now in the Reserve Corps have been notified that they can go into a training camp. There is no law and no appropriation out of which they can be paid while they are in the training camp, and I apprehend that as to many officers now in the Reserve Corps it would add very materially to their value to the country if they would go into one of these training camps and receive training, but it can hardly be expected that men will do that and not be paid anything, while the man who is a mere applicant for a position is paid $100 a month.

Mr. DENT. I appreciate the point that the gentleman makes, and perhaps this language would not cover those officers, although it was the intention of the conferees to try to draft this language so as to cover every one who is designated by the Secretary of War to go into a training camp.

Mr. MANN. Well, it may be that they will so construe it, though the latter part of the proviso indicates that it is not intended for anyone except the applicant.

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that I shall inquire of the War Department their construction of this provision, and if I find that it does not take care of the case it states, which I think ought to be taken care of, I shall endeavor, as far as I can, to have it corrected in the new Army bill.

Mr. MANN. Then I will ask the gentleman with reference to amendment 78—I suppose this is highly technical——

Mr. DENT. Well, I intended to ask unanimous consent in regard to it, but I had not gotten to the point.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman probably has reference to the amount of the appropriation?

Mr. DENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Well, that is one point, but I would like to make a further inquiry as to two other points. The conference report restores the matter stricken out by said amendment—that is, part of it, involving the amount—leaving the two amounts named. Then it goes on to say "on page 59 of the bill, in line 5, after the word 'buildings,' insert the words 'needed for vocational training in agriculture.'" Of course the enrolling clerk has to enroll the bill from this conference report. There is no word "buildings" on page 59 in line 5, either in the bill as it passed the House or the bill as printed by the House with Senate amendments. I do not know whether it is intended to have the enrolling clerk search around the bill until he finds the word "buildings" in some place and then insert some language after it.

Mr. DENT. Well, I will state to the gentleman that the enrolling clerk called my attention to the figures here—$75,000—but my attention has not been called to the fact that there was a mistake in that amendment.

Mr. MANN. Then it goes on and says, "and in line 4, page 60 of said amendment, strike out the word 'regiment.'" There is no such word in line 4 on page 60 either of the amendment or the bill as it passed the House or of the bill printed with Senate amendments.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman kindly state where that ought to come in?

Mr. MANN. That is a guess on my part.

Mr. DENT. I would have to look at it——

Mr. MANN. I suppose, though I do not know, the gentleman wants to put the language in after the word "buildings" where it appears in the House print with Senate amendments, on page 59, in line 22.

Mr. DENT. But that page and that line is not the original House bill. This is a Senate print of the House bill.

Mr. MANN. I have the printed bill as it passed the House—the original bill in the hands of the conferees.

Mr. DENT. Well, does the gentleman think, then, if the House gives unanimous consent to add that language after the word "buildings," on page 59, line 22, that that would correct it?

Mr. MANN. Well, page 59 is not the right page. The reference of the conference report is properly made to the original House bill as it passed the House, with the engrossed copy and the engrossed amendments.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Vocational training in the engrossed copy of the bill comes on page 41, and if the gentleman refers to the language "and the construction of buildings for shops, storage, shelter of machinery," that is where that language comes in.

Mr. DENT. Page what?

Mr. MANN. Page 42, line 5.

Mr. DENT. Then I will ask unanimous consent——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will have to have a concurrent resolution.

Mr. DENT. I was going to state, if the gentleman will permit me, I understand, of course, that it will be necessary to get a concurrent resolution unless there is unanimous consent in both Houses to make these changes. I have an agreement with Senator CHAMBERLAIN, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, to ask unanimous consent in the Senate to make the changes in Senate amendment 78 where the mistakes were made in printing, and I thought that was the easiest way to get at it.

Mr. MANN. The enrolling clerk called my attention to the original conference report, which is not printed correctly. There are two errors in this one amendment in the print of the original conference report, which does not reflect very highly on the Printing Office. The report reads, "On page 42 of the bill, in line 5"; that is correct, and the other place it reads "in line 4 of said amendment." Well, it is not line 4 of the amendment, it is line 3, but probably that is near enough for the clerk to catch it; but the report as printed says "line 4 of said amendment, on page 60." Why they should insert that in the Printing Office, if they did, is beyond me.

Mr. DENT. Well, then, I understand, Mr. Speaker, that it is not necessary to make——

Mr. MANN. I think the clerk can make it out, while the report is not accurate.

Mr. DENT. But it is necessary to ask unanimous consent to strike out "$75,000."

Mr. MANN. That will have to be by concurrent resolution, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. DENT. Does the gentleman not think if this House and the Senate both grant unanimous consent to make the change that that will accomplish the same purpose?

Mr. MANN. The Senate has no power over this conference report any more. They can not act upon it.

Mr. DENT. They can change it by unanimous consent. However, I will adopt that course.

Mr. MANN. They have no way of getting control of it.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HULBERT. I assume that in the organization of the Army to be organized under the selective draft system that the negroes of the country will be expected to contribute their proportion toward the making up of that branch of the service, and I would like to ask the gentleman whether the provision for the 14 training camps is by virtue of any statute enacted here or regulation of the War Department?

Mr. DENT. By regulation of the War Department.

Mr. HULBERT. Does the gentleman know that the War Department has declined to admit colored citizens at the training camps to receive instructions?

Mr. DENT. I do not know. I do not know of any such instance, and have never heard of such.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I would like to ask the gentleman a question in reference to amendment No. 16, on page 17. It really is not in reference to any change in the law, but I want to ask the gentleman if his committee has given thought to a change. The minimum age for a commission fixed in this amendment is the same as it is in the law now—21 years?

Mr. DENT. That is the fact.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I expect the gentleman's attention as well as mine has been called to a large number of young men who are graduates of military schools in the United States, graduating this year particularly, who are 20, but not quite 21; young men graduating from Culver, from the Virginia Military Institute, and from the Pennsylvania Military College, and others. Quite a number of these young men have been brought to my attention who are the very best trained material we have for officers. During the Civil War, I have been informed, commissions were granted way below the age of 21. Has the gentleman's committee given attention to whether or not it would be advisable to change the minimum age of 21 to 19 or 20 during the emergency?

Mr. DENT. The conference committee?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I mean the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DENT. Neither one at this session of Congress; but I will say to the gentleman, so far as I am personally concerned, I see no objection to it, but it has not been considered either by the conference committee or the House Military Committee up to date.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Have any bills been brought to the gentleman's attention?

Mr. DENT. No. There may be bills before the Military Committee, but I will say to the gentleman that in the past few weeks I have not had a chance to examine any of them.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. One other inquiry I would like to make. I notice in this amendment which the conferees agreed upon there is given to officers of the Philippine Scouts an opportunity to take the examination and secure commissions in the Regular Establishment. Why does the Committee on Military Affairs of the House and Senate persist in always excluding officers of the Philippine Constabulary in matters of this kind?

Mr. DENT. They are not a part of the Military Establishment of the country at all.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Now, that reason has been repeatedly given, but I submit it does not answer the question at all. They are citizens of the United States who are better educated than the officers of the Scouts, are graduates of American colleges and universities, who, before they became officers of the Philippine Constabulary, had to demonstrate their military proficiency and graduation from military instruction; and they are the very top kind of material for officers in the United States Army to-day. And, what is more, they are younger in years. The gentleman knows that the officers of the Philippine Scouts are a splendid body of men, and I have tried to speak in their favor equally with others. They are all men who have been enlisted men in the Army, who, by reason of superior proficiency, have been given commissions in the Philippine Scouts. Most of them are men of mature years, beyond the age limit fixed here; but that is not true of the officers of the Philippine Constabulary, who for the most part are young men between the ages of 22 and 28, and are a class of men we ought to utilize now. They have not only had the educational training in a military way, but they have had the actual experience, and from my personal observation the experience of the officers of the Philippine Constabulary is not one whit inferior to the experience of the officers of the Philippine Scouts; and I can not see why on earth the time can not come when the officers of the Philippine Constabulary are not given this. It is not academic on my part. If I have received 1, I have received 50 to 100 letters during the last two years from these men, asking that they be given a chance that every other American boy ought to have.

Mr. DENT. I will say to the gentleman that I know he is very familiar with the situation over there, and he and I have had many conversations on the subject, and, so far as I am concerned, the Military Committee of the House would be very glad to hear him on that subject.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I will say to the gentleman that I will try to introduce a bill to-day giving that permission, and I hope that the gentleman's committee will give us an opportunity to consider it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I will yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Has there been any provision made concerning compensation of those who go to the officers' training camp?

Mr. DENT. Provision has been made for $100 a month, and 3½ cents a mile for transportation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DENT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to, was laid on the table.

MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. DENT. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 14) making appropriations for the Military Academy.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to reserve a point of order on the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order. Point or points?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think one will be sufficient.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The conference report was read as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 43).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2 and 3, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 6 of the bill strike out all on line 18 and in lieu thereof insert the following: "38 privates, first class, and 38 privates, second class, $15,080"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Bertram T. Clayton, jr., late a cadet at the Military Academy at West Point, to the position of second lieutenant of Infantry of the Army, and to place him upon the retired list with the pay of a retired second lieutenant of Infantry."

And the Senate agree to the same.

W. J. FIELDS,
JULIUS KAHN,
Managers on the part of the House.

F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on:

The House receded from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 1 providing extra pay for 19 enlisted men instead of for 13, as provided in the House bill. Although without authority, as the matter was not in conference, the conferees took the liberty of striking out the words "76 privates, at $15 each per month, $13,680" and substituting therefor "38 privates, first class, and 38 privates, second class, $15,080." This change was made upon the recommendation of the Engineer Department, which stated that the language originally used would tend to disrupt the present organization.

The House receded from amendments 2 and 3, authorizing the President to appoint William Harold Kehoe and Clyde R. Altman, late cadets at the Military Academy at West Point, to the position of second lieutenant of Infantry and to place them upon the retired list with the pay of a retired second lieutenant.

A provision was also added authorizing the President to appoint Bertram T. Clayton, jr., to the position of second lieutenant and to place him upon the retired list with the pay of a retired second lieutenant. The conferees thought this was only fair, as the case is similar to that of W. H. Kehoe, both having developed tuberculosis while cadets at the Military Academy.

S. H. DENT, Jr.,
W. J. FIELDS,
JULIUS KAHN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. STAFFORD. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the conferees have exceeded their authority in agreeing with an amendment to amendment No. 4.

Mr. DENT. In amendment No. 4?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman suspend a moment? The Chair wishes the gentleman from Wisconsin to state exactly his position.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I might save a little time on this. I am perfectly willing to admit that the amendment is subject to a point of order, with this statement: That the Senate put on two cadets at West Point, one of whom is at the hospital at Fort Bayard, N. Mex., and made him a retired second lieutenant. Out at that same hospital there is another cadet, the son of Maj. Burtram T. Clayton, of the Army, who developed tuberculosis while he was a cadet at West Point, and he is at the same hospital recovering from the same trouble as Cadet Kehoe, and the conferees thought that if they were going to yield in one case it was only fair and just that both should be put on the same footing. But if the gentleman makes a point of order, I confess the point of order is well taken.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, if the House will indulge me a minute or two in justification of my position, I wish to say that in the last Congress the Committee on Military Affairs reported two private bills authorizing the retirement of Cadets Kehoe and Altman, with the rank of second lieutenant. Those bills on several occasions were considered under the unanimous-consent call of the Private Calendar, and on the last call of the Private Calendar the opposition of those opposing those bills was very pointedly stated; that tubercular trouble in most instances is congenital, and that in these two instances it did not arise from Army service. While there were some facts showing that these cadets contracted a cold, still, to my mind, it seemed that they had tubercular trouble when they entered the academy.

This amendment confers upon the President the power to retire these cadets, if he see fit, on three-quarters pay for some cause that may not have arisen from Army service. In my brief experience I have known young men connected with the Naval Academy who, by reason of defective vision brought on by intensive study, have been compelled to resign. We might as well give them three-quarters pay as second lieutenants in the Navy for the balance of their lives if we are going to adopt that policy in these instances at the threshold of a war that will entail untold expense on this generation and on future generations. I think it is a wrong policy for the Government to adopt, and I am taking this position in order to attract the attention of the country to the fact that these two items have been included in the bill when they had no right to be included therein. I know the pressure that was brought to bear upon the Members of this House in the last Congress to allow these two bills to pass, and I assume as much pressure will be brought to bear on the President of the United States.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his point of order for a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; I will withhold it.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised at the gentleman from Wisconsin, who makes the claim here, in the case of these boys who now have tuberculosis, that it was congenital with them. Nobody claims that except the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. FOSTER. That may have been thought true a hundred years ago, but it is not now. To say to this House that we are proposing to retire these boys because they have contracted tuberculosis since they have been in the Military Academy, and then to charge that that was congenital and that they had it when they went there is hardly correct. I know my friend has not read up lately on these questions, because otherwise he would not make such a claim.

Those boys, if they had tuberculosis when they went in there, had it at least in such a stage that nobody could find it out. But the chances are ninety-nine out of one hundred or nine hundred and ninety-nine out of one thousand that those boys had in some way contracted that disease since they went into the academy. I am sure my friend from Wisconsin does not desire to create the impression that these boys had consumption when they went there; that is, that they had it from birth, as he indicates. We used to talk about a whole lot of things that doctors would not talk about now as true, things which no intelligent physician now would mention. They used to charge almost everything up from a man's birth, but we know differently now, it is not all inherited. Men have investigated those conditions, and they know that that does not exist, and that those conditions do not come in that way. They used to talk about people having "stomach trouble," which covered a multitude of sins, and men have died from appendicitis when it was said they had some "stomach trouble." People know better about those things now.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Were these boys exposed to peculiar hardships in the academy which would make them subject to this disease more than they would have been under ordinary circumstances?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know as to that, but I do know this: That they in all probability contracted the disease while they were there. Whether the Government should pay them or not is another question. I am not speaking that it should be done. That is doubtful in my mind that such action should be taken.

Mr. FIELDS. In answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] I will say that one of these young men, Cadet Kehoe, was thrown from a horse. His shoulders and chest were hurt, and a long illness ensued, during which tuberculosis developed. Cadet Altman, who is provided for in the bill, was almost up to the point of graduation. He took sick in March, I believe, before he was to graduate in June, and if he had remained only a few months longer he would have been graduated.

Mr. MANN. Getting tuberculosis from being thrown from a horse is a good deal like getting it congenitally.

Mr. FIELDS. A long illness ensued as the result of that hurt.

Mr. FOSTER. Whatever lowers a man's vitality may permit these germs to live in his system. They have learned that in treating tuberculosis one great element is the proper nourishment, and keeping the vitality to as high a point as possible. Now, what the hurt may have had to do about it I do not know; probably none.

Mr. BUTLER. This is setting a very dangerous precedent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] will not press the point of order. The effect of his action will be to eliminate one of the cadets, Bertram T. Clayton, jr.

Mr. MANN. It ought to eliminate both of them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It can not eliminate both. There are two of them. The Senate put one of them in, and the House added Bertram T. Clayton, jr. He is a son of Maj. Clayton, of the United States Army. Maj. Clayton was graduated from the United States Military Academy about 1886, and after serving some years resigned and went into private life in Brooklyn. He organized Troop C of the National Guard, and during the Spanish-American War went with his troop to Cuba and took part in the campaign there. Upon his return from Cuba he was elected to the Fifty-sixth Congress, and while in Congress was made the colonel of a regiment of the National Guard in Brooklyn, which he put into very fine military shape. After he left Congress he was appointed in the Army under the reorganization act following the Spanish-American War.

I knew this young man, Bertram T. Clayton, as a small boy, when he was 8 or 9 years old. I knew his father and was slightly acquainted with his mother. So far as I have ever known, there was no consumption in either family. This young man went to the Military Academy, and through overzealousness and overwork so impaired his system that he contracted a cold, and eventually developed consumption. He is in the military hospital at Fort Bayonne. He has no means. He is dependent entirely upon either the gratitude of the Government or whatever assistance his father may be able to give him, and his father is now likely to be assigned to active service at any time. As one of these young men is to be put on the retired list as a second lieutenant by the action of the Senate, it seems to me that the House ought not to prevent this other young man having the same action taken with regard to him.

Mr. HUSTED. I should like to ask if there is any precedent for this kind of legislation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know.

Mr. HUSTED. I know that in the past a great many young men have been compelled to leave West Point before graduation on account of physical disability.

Mr. FIELDS. In 1913 similar bills were passed by Congress.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The point I make is this: The Senate, by a Senate amendment, has provided for one of these young men. The other one is in the same hospital, in exactly the same condition. If the point of order is interposed, the conference report will be rejected, and it will not be possible to make provision for young Clayton, while the managers upon the part of the House will probably be compelled to yield to the insistance of the Senate to take care of the other young man. In view of the circumstances, with which I am familiar, as I have stated them to the House, I believe they should both be treated alike.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. May I ask the gentleman if he finds in our general legislative policy any warrant for such action? These young men have not been rendering service to the Government, so that the Government would be under some obligation to take care of them because their health was impaired in the line of duty; but, on the contrary, they have been at a school where the Government has been rendering a service to them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not making any contention about it. I am stating the facts. The Senate has provided for one and the House conferees have incorporated a provision for the other. If the point of order is insisted upon and the conference report rejected, nothing can be done for young Clayton, although the provision for Kehoe will probably be retained in the bill and can not be eliminated. In view of the situation regarding these men it seems to me we ought to treat them both alike.

Mr. LINTHICUM. If this young man Clayton recovers, will he render service to the Government, or will he continue to receive his retired service pay?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not in a position to make any pledge. The retired pay of a second lieutenant is about $1,700 a year.

Mr. BORLAND. He can be ordered back to duty.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He will be on the retired list, and can be ordered back to active duty at any time. I have been acquainted with him for a great many years, and I know that nothing would give him greater pleasure than to be able to go into the service and stay in the Army. His father being an Army officer, that was his ambition from the time he was a little chap.

Mr. DENT. If the gentleman will allow me to make a statement, I will say that young Clayton has an application on file to go into the Officers' Reserve Corps and has asked for active duty, and I have indorsed his application, and this morning Gen. Gorgas wrote me that he had indorsed it, and that he probably will be sent on some active duty.

Mr. MANN. Then he does not need to go on the retired list.

Mr. FIELDS. Cadet Kehoe desires to go on active duty just as soon as they will accept him. It is the ambition of his life to enter the Army and remain in it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not object to it. I think he ought to serve the Government when he recovers.

Mr. FIELDS. He is very anxious to do so.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He has been anxious to serve, but has not been able to do so. I have stated the facts about this young man, Clayton, as I know them. I was elected to this House 18 years ago, with his father as my colleague from Brooklyn, and we lived together in Washington. I am intimately acquainted with him. I know the facts connected with this young man. If provision is to be made for the other, it is a matter of common justice that we should make provision for both of them.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a great many boys who go to college throughout the country acquire tuberculosis, and a great many boys who have not been fortunate enough to go to college acquire tuberculosis. Of course, quite a number who go to Annapolis and West Point to be educated at the expense of the Government acquire tuberculosis. Those who are fortunate enough to have their school expenses paid by the Government are better off than those who pay their own expenses and go to some other college, and those who pay their own expenses at some other college are better off than those who are unable to afford the expense of going to college at all. Yet the proposition here is to give the preferred class compensation, to be paid out of the pockets of those who are not so fortunate.

These men are not in the military service of the Government. They are at school, at the expense of the Government, being furnished an education. Now, I have the profoundest sympathy for any young boy who acquires tuberculosis. It is a very unfortunate condition. I know myself with reference to it. I can see no reason why the Government of the United States should give special preference to two individuals who have gone to West Point and there became afflicted with tuberculosis. If we are going to make a rule of that sort, make it general. It would be far better to do something for all those who have tuberculosis throughout the country than merely to take care of two. These two young men, against whom no word can or would be said, who think now they want to go back into the Army, had better stay out of the Army. If they go back in the Army, they will not last long with tuberculosis.

Mr. FOSTER. They probably would not be taken back.

Mr. MANN. They probably would not, although we are told that they expect to get back.

Mr. FOSTER. That will not happen.

Mr. MANN. I think myself it will not happen, although that has been the strongest reason given for passing this provision.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman said we ought to do something for all those that are suffering with tuberculosis.

Mr. MANN. I said it would be far better.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does not the gentleman think that we had better begin at the root of the evil and regulate the milk and dairy supplies of the country?

Mr. MANN. Oh, if the gentleman from Maryland ever gets to the gates of heaven and St. Peter asks him a question, he will reply by talking about the milk supply. [Laughter.] He is possessed with the idea that nothing but the milk supply is the root of all evil. The gentleman ought to go back and drink the milk of the babies, build up again, and get some of those notions out of his head. [Laughter.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. The gentleman wants to eradicate the root of the evil, and not begin to try to cure the disease after it is contracted.

Mr. MANN. Unfortunately, I will say for the benefit of the gentleman, that I have one boy who has tuberculosis, and for years never drank milk before he became afflicted with tuberculosis.

Mr. LINTHICUM. He may have been in contact with somebody who had it.

Mr. MANN. He was not. How he got it, no one knows.

Mr. LINTHICUM. He either got it through contact with somebody else or through the milk. It is not congenital.

Mr. MANN. No one knows. Tuberculosis germs are in the air everywhere.

Mr. FOSTER. Let me say that I think my colleague is quite right; very few cases can be traced to their origin.

Mr. MANN. They do not know how it comes. It is said that more than 25 or 33 per cent of all the population probably at some time in their lives have a touch of tuberculosis. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] says that we will have to agree to the Senate amendment. We do not have to agree to it; if this goes back, the Senate amendment ought not to be agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for two or three minutes.

The SPEAKER. We are arguing the point of order, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I dislike to say anything that might in the least way interfere with the aid that the Government might give to these young men, but it is a dangerous precedent to make. If the gentleman will permit me to say, for 20 years I have sat on a subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs and have dealt with a number of cases like these. On every occasion we have resisted. My chief, the chairman of the committee is here, who will bear me out. We have resisted on many, many occasions, and, although it has given us a great deal of pain, we have declined to offer Government aid and assistance to the young men who have contracted disease or become crippled in some way at the Naval Academy and who could not be graduated; but I know of no time when favorable action has been taken by the Naval Affairs Committee of the House.

Mr. PADGETT. If the gentleman will permit me, under the law they have a pensionable status at present and can receive a pension, but if retired they would get three-quarters pay. This is a special method of giving a larger pension than that provided by the general law.

Mr. BUTLER. I will ask the gentleman if he remembers any measure of this kind that was ever reported favorably?

Mr. FADGETT. No; we have uniformly declined to report favorably on young men in that condition in the academy. We have left them to their remedy for a pension under the general law.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The law gives them a pensionable status, but it is not construed to include anything except disease or injury contracted in the line of duty.

Mr. BUTLER. That is correct; in the line of duty. I have known young men in the Naval Academy whose vision had become impaired and who asked for relief, but they never obtained it. I would be willing to vote in favor of a general provision by which some sort of assistance could be given to these young men, but to take two or three by the method we are now considering I do not think is hardly fair toward the others who have gone out and made their efforts repeatedly for assistance, but have obtained no sort of Government assistance.

Mr. CRAGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Certainly.

Mr. CRAGO. Does not the gentleman recognize the distinction between these cases and the ordinary case of a young man acquiring an education who acquires tuberculosis? I am told that in the case of Altman there is no tuberculosis in the family. These men have offered their lives to their country and were being trained, and we must admit that inside of a few months, or a year at least, if they had gone on with their education, they would have been graduated at the academy, and if this disability had come on them after that they would have been retired by operation of law.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; but if I can make a reply to the gentleman's question, and I have endeavored to recall all of it, we have never considered these young men in the Government service. It costs $18,000 or $20,000 to educate each young man at Annapolis. He must take his chances with other young men who are in institutions for the purpose of being prepared for the events of life. We have never considered them in the military service, and I repeat what I have already said, upon every occasion we have declined to report measures that would give them the advantage of Government aid.

Mr. CRAGO. Take the case of young men who are attending theological seminaries. I know of a number of cases where they have failed to graduate and become regular ordained ministers on account of failure of health, and invariably the church organizations have taken care of them in some way.

Mr. BUTLER. But that is a private institution, and I could say to my friend that they might take care of me if they wanted to, but this is a bill having to do entirely with a military institution of the Government, and I repeat what I have said—Congress has never considered any of the young men in these institutions as belonging to the military arm of the Government more than for the mere purpose of educating and training them. If they are unfortunate during the period of training at these academies, we have always declined to report measures that would give them Government aid.

Mr. CRAGO. Not always. There are precedents.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, I understand. I know they have gotten a rider on once in a while, but I say let them be considered on their merits.

Mr. CRAGO. The gentleman will admit that if one of these cases goes through both should go through?

Mr. BUTLER. I do most positively feel that way about it. If one goes for this reason, both ought to go, but in my judgment neither should. I am not going to offer any objection by point of order to the passage of the bill, which provides for young men suffering with tuberculosis.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. MASON. Are the students there on a pensionable basis? Can they get a pension?

Mr. BUTLER. They have a pensionable status, and it has been so held, and if they contract diseases while at the academy or become hurt in any way so they can not graduate they have a pensionable status and may receive a certain amount of compensation.

Mr. BATHRICK. Is that true of the Military Academy also?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. CRAGO. And in the case of Altman, he has held a position at West Point and is keeping that district in Pennsylvania out of a new appointment, and if we would take this action today we would make a place for another young man to start his military education.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Is the obligation on the part of the Government to make the place for the young man who wants to go to school, or is the obligation the other way?

Mr. CRAGO. I am not questioning the policy of the Government in withholding this aid. I do not know that it is exactly the thing to do, but I do claim that if one of these cases goes through, the other should, and I do say that there is a difference between these young men and the young man in the pursuit of an ordinary education, because they have offered their services to the Government, and in a few months or a year they would have been eligible to this retirement.

Mr. MANN. How about the young man who wanted to go and could not get the appointment?

Mr. CRAGO. He is unfortunate.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What are you going to say about the man who would have enlisted but for having taken tuberculosis three months before he intended to enlist? Is he not in exactly the same class?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a number of years ago I nominated to West Point one of the finest young men I ever knew. He was appointed. He was a splendid young officer. He was educated there for more than three years, and at the end of that time he had trouble with his eyes, brought about by hard study, probably with poor lights, and was compelled to resign from the academy. It never occurred to that young man that he was privileged to saddle himself upon the Public Treasury for the balance of his life, because the Government, having given him the opportunity, he had unfortunately injured his eyesight in his effort to secure a military education. It never occurred to me that having given that young man that opportunity I should come before the Congress and ask that he become a pensioner at three-quarters of his active pay for the rest of his life. He went out into the world and went into business. There was no obligation on the part of the Government to retire him, and he never thought there was, and I never thought there was, and met no one with a different opinion. But these young gentlemen provided for in this bill happen to have very persistent and very influential friends, men with political connections, and they have been tremendously insistent in what, in my opinion, is a very poor cause. I can not understand how any young man, having been given the opportunity of studying in the academy, being unfortunate in any way so that it was necessary for him to leave the academy before he received a commission, can in self-respect ask the Government of the United States to make him a beneficiary of public funds all his life by reason of that fact. I can not undertsand how any self-respecting relative or friend of that young man could ask to have that thing done. These young men are selected from among many who would be glad to have that splendid opportunity.

In the case of the young man to whom I refer, the loss of his eyesight was due to service. There is not any doubt about that. No one questions it, and no one denies it. We do not know how tuberculosis came to develop in these young men. It may have been due to the service, it may not. There was no question with respect to the young man to whom I have referred. His eyes were injured by hard and persistent study. He stood near the head of his class, but like a good citizen and a good soldier when he found that he could not pass he sent in his resignation and took his chances with the balance of the boys of the country who had not had the opportunity and the privilege which he had enjoyed.

And I repeat again, the last thing I would ever ask for a friend of mine, for a relative of mine, would be that, having been given the opportunity of receiving an education at the expense of the Government, having been unfortunate enough to develop some physical disability making it impossible for him to receive a commission, that he should then for his life, from youth to the grave, be fastened like a barnacle upon the Treasury, upon the good people of the country at a good round sum.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the conferees have exceeded their authority.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the conference report——

The SPEAKER. The conference report is knocked out.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FIELDS. Does that dispose of the whole conference report or amendment No. 4?

The SPEAKER. It disposes of the whole thing.

Mr. FIELDS. I thought the point of order was made to the particular portion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows it was so made to a particular portion, but if any part of a conference report is bad the whole thing goes by the board.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I will ask that the House further insist on its amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DENT, Mr. FIELDS, and Mr. KAHN.

ARMY BILL.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider and pass at this time the following concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution 7.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 13) entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes," the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to omit the figures "$75,000," on page 42, line 16, of said bill, as the same were stricken out by the amendment of the Senate No. 78, the conference report on said bill and amendments to the contrary notwithstanding.

The question was taken, and the concurrent resolution was agreed to.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees.

Mr. LEVER (when the Committee on Agriculture was called). Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Agriculture I call up the bill H. R. 4188.

Th SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina calls up a bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman can not call up the bill, as it is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman's point of order, of course, is good. Mr. Speaker, if the House will indulge me I will submit a unanimous-consent request on this bill. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill named.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I think I shall have to object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, here is a bill only reported yesterday; nobody has had an opportunity to see it. The bill as reported was not available until late this morning.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I recognize that to be the fact, and yet I will say this to the gentleman, that the time for planting in this country is rapidly passing.

Mr. MANN. That fact ought to have been considered by the committee and they should have reported the bill earlier, then.

Mr. LEVER. Some of the provisions of this bill we think will very greatly stimulate planting in certain sections of the country and we would like to have the very earliest consideration possible, but of course if the House feels that it would like to have a little more time to look into its provisions I will not press the matter. I always have been very liberal in such matters.

Mr. MANN. I am frank to say I do not know what the bill is. I have not had an opportunity to read the bill even, and could not get it until the House met.

Mr. LEVER. I think I should be able to explain it in a very few words.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt the gentleman could, but still it is not a very good practice. I take it from what the gentleman stated to me privately yesterday it is a very important bill.

Mr. LEVER. It is an important bill, but it does not involve any matter with which the House is not all more or less familiar. The first proposition in the bill provides a more general survey of the food situation in this country than we have the machinery to make at this time. The second proposition in the bill provides for the purchase of seed—field seed—for distribution for the crop of 1918 in certain areas where they may need to have seed. The third proposition involves an increase of the present activities of the Department of Agriculture along the demonstration county-agent methods of teaching farmers and also in its market-news service, together with some appropriations for combating animal diseases and encouraging meat-food production, together with some provisions for a more general distribution of information which the department is getting out from time to time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have a copy of the bill in my hands. Opening it on page 6, I see an appropriation of $6,500,000 for the eradication of insects and plant diseases, which certainly has nothing to do with a war emergency.

Mr. LEVER. Well, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that of that appropriation of $6,500,000, $6,000,000 is to be used in the purchase of seed and in their storage for the crop of 1918 in emergencies.

A portion of it is to be used in fighting diseases of vegetables and truck crops, particularly beans and the like of that, concerning which I would go into quite freely when the bill is reached under the five-minute discussion.

Mr. MANN. I think we ought to have an opportunity of seeing a bill of this sort. I realize the fact that it may be late in the planting season, but it is not the fault of the House. Having been in extra session for more than a month, propositions of this kind should have been reported before. I do not say it was anybody's fault; but if other people require consideration of this matter for a month, certainly the Members of the House ought to have a chance to read the bill before it comes up for consideration.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman, I think, will acquit the committee of any undue delay in the matter.

Mr. MANN. I am not charging the committee or charging the Department of Agriculture with any delay, although if it has taken them more than a month, or two months, since we knew there was going to be a war, or more than six months since we knew there was a shortage of food supply, to make a suggestion like this, we ought to have more than 24 hours, or at least 24 hours, in which to think about it.

Mr. LEVER. I wonder if we might enter into an agreement to fix a day on which this bill might be considered? I am very anxious to take it up at the earliest possible moment, and yet I do not want to get in the way of the revenue bill, if that bill is ready. I have not had an opportunity of consulting with the majority leader on that proposition. I do not think it will take more than an hour or two hours to pass this bill.

Mr. MANN. To pass this bill? From some recollection of the precedents in the House, I think it would take more than that time to pass this bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from South Carolina is quite a humorist.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to ask the gentleman if his committee is going to consider and thinks about reporting H. R. 4125?

Mr. LEVER. The committee is now having hearings on that bill. The committee has not reached any conclusion itself on the matter at all and has not taken it up in detail.

Mr. CANNON. That, with other commissions, many of them duplicated, I think, would take very largely people who would go into civil appointments and would leave us practically without anybody to draft.

Mr. LEVER. I would say to the gentleman from Illinois that H. R. 4125 has been introduced for the purpose of discussion not only for the Committee on Agriculture but for discussion in the country. The committee itself, I think, at this time has no very definite line of thought in its own mind, except the committee, I think, does realize that the food situation in this country is becoming each day more and more critical. And I think the committee would feel disposed, after we have had such testimony as we can get from people who ought to know, to try to find some remedy for the situation.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand there is a Council of National Defense at work down here at the other end of the Avenue, and they are trying to do exactly what this bill and other bills under consideration seem to indicate the committees want to do. They are spending money that is appropriated for the Army, and for other purposes, and the $100,000,000 that was given to the President for emergency purposes, and they claim to be compiling information with respect to the food supply and the industrial situation, and are making an inventory of all the activities of the United States and the remedies that are to be applied to meet the situation that is about to confront us. Now, why duplicate what they are doing?

Mr. LEVER. I have not been advised that the Council of National Defense is making anything like as careful, thorough, and comprehensive food survey of this country as that which is proposed in this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. They say they are. I do not know.

Mr. LEVER. If there is any disposition on the part of the House to feel that we ought not to consider this matter at this time, I do not feel disposed to force it to consideration. I do not want to take the time of the House, because there are other matters to come up for consideration.

Mr. HOWARD. When does the gentleman think we can get to this bill? Just on this point I want to say that my judgment is that if Congress is going to do anything to stimulate food production, they had better get at it.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Georgia does not think the stimulation of food supply is fixed by Congress? I thought the farmers did that?

Mr. HOWARD. I think they need a little artificial stimulation. I do not think the gentleman understands the situation.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think I do.

Mr. HOWARD. I am from the back country——

Mr. MANN. You do not need to tell us about that. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I shall have to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects.

Mr. LEVER. Then, Mr. Speaker, let me submit this unanimous-consent request.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman not to submit a unanimous-consent request now. Perhaps we can all agree.

Mr. LEVER. I was wondering if we could not consider this bill to-morrow or Thursday. I understand the revenue bill has not been agreed upon. I hear that informally from Members around me. In that case we might agree to take up this bill on Thursday, which would be perfectly satisfactory to me.

Mr. MANN. I was told last night that the expectation was the revenue bill would be agreed upon informally by the committee to-day, introduced to-day, ordered reported to-day, and that they would ask unanimous consent, or move, to take it up to-morrow. To-morrow is Calendar Wednesday, and it can only be done by agreement.

Mr. LEVER. Let me suggest this to the gentleman from Illinois, that the revenue bill is a very much more important bill than this, and I would not think unanimous consent for its present consideration would be granted if unanimous consent is not granted for this bill.

Mr. MANN. Well, that may be, although I take it that the revenue bill will take several days, probably, of general debate; but I do not know.

Mr. LEVER. That is the point I am trying to make. If I can get this bill in before the revenue bill, it will expedite the passage of this bill, I am sure, and I think we ought to pass it without a great deal of debate.

Mr. MANN. Do you mean to say that this bill will become effective as a law this month if we pass it now?

Mr. LEVER. Unless it is passed within 10 days it will not do much good in stimulating production.

Mr. MANN. Has this bill or the corresponding bill on the other side been reported to the Senate?

Mr. LEVER. I do not know, but the Committee on Agriculture there is holding hearings.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has been here for several years.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. If this bill were passed here to-day and passed by the Senate and signed by the President, does the gentleman think that any farmer in the northern part of the United States desiring to put in a greater crop, would be able to get five additional bushels of wheat or corn for seed as the result of its passage?

Mr. LEVER. I think that if this bill is passed to-day, in many sections of the country it would stimulate production, though not so much, perhaps, as other measures that are pending.

Mr. MANN. If it were passed to-day it might permit farmers to sow buckwheat. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORTON. It takes two or three months for the Department of Agriculture to send out alfalfa, after a request has been received.

Mr. LEVER. Maybe they have not got it.

Mr. NORTON. Even if they do have it. If it is ordered sent out now, it would not get to North Dakota until next July. It is all poppy-cock to say that this would assist the farmers in getting seed grain if the bill were passed this afternoon.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina withdraws his request. The Clerk will call the roll of committees.

The Clerk proceeded to call the list of committees.

TEMPORARY INCREASE, NAVY AND MARINE CORPS PERSONNEL.

Mr. PADGETT (when the Committee on Naval Affairs was called). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill H. R. 3330, Union Calendar No. 11.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to take up the bill H. R. 3330, No. 11 on the Union Calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to know what the bill is.

Mr. STAFFORD. May we have it reported by title, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3330) to temporarily increase the commissioned and warrant and enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3330) to temporarily increase the commissioned and warrant and enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves——

Mr. PADGETT. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER], if he is present, if we could agree upon some limit for general debate at the present time?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know, Mr. Speaker. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee to let it run for a little while.

Mr. PADGETT. Then I move for the present, Mr. Speaker, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 3330.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER] will please take the chair.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3330) to temporarily increase the commissioned and warrant and enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps, and for other purposes, with Mr. SHALLENBERGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 3330, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3330) to temporarily increase the commissioned and warrant and enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps, and for other purposes.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, under the legislation contained in the appropriation bill that became a law August 29, 1916, the enlisted strength of the Navy was made 87,000. That is, it was provided that it should be increased from 51,500 to 68,000, with authority on the part of the President to increase it to 87,000 whenever in his judgment an emergency existed that required the increase, and the President some months ago exercised this authority, and the present authorized enlisted strength of the Navy is 87,000.

The law also provided for 6,000 apprentice seamen, so that the enlisted strength of the Navy is 93,000.

The law also provided that the commissioned personnel of the Navy, the official branch of the Navy, should be 4 per cent of the enlisted personnel. We have at present, I think, 2,236 officers of the line, distributed in the various grades and ranks of the Navy. Under the provisions of the act of August 29 the distribution in the commissioned personnel was in the proportion of 1 admiral of the line to 4 captains, to 7 commanders, to 14 lieutenant commanders, to 32.5 per cent for lieutenants, and 42.5 per cent for lieutenants of junior grade and ensigns. This bill, as reported by the committee with various amendments, which will be submitted as the bill is considered under the five-minute rule, provides for an increase of the enlisted personnel in the Navy to 150,000, and of the enlisted personnel of the Marine Corps from 17,400, which was provided under the act of August 29, 1916, to 30,000.

But the bill provides that there shall be no permanent or temporary appointments either in the Navy or in the Marine Corps based upon this increase above the authorizations in the act of August 29. It provides that there may be temporary increases or temporary promotions in the Navy not above the grade of lieutenant in the Navy or major in the Marine Corps, based on the increase of the enlisted strength of the Navy and of the Marine Corps; and it provides further, as we do not have a sufficient number of officers—having 2,236, as I remember, and as I stated a moment ago—the bill provides that there may be temporary promotions and temporary appointments in the various grades and ranks of the Navy and of the Marine Corps up to the authorization provided in the act of August 29; and the sum of that would be that, based upon the enlisted strength of 93,000, 87,000 of enlisted men and 6,000 apprentice seamen, the commissioned personnel may be temporarily increased and promotions temporarily made to provide the commissioned personnel for that authorization, as we do not have in the permanent Navy a sufficient number of officers to meet that requirement.

But above the 87,000 no temporary promotions can be made or temporary appointments made above lieutenant in the Navy and major in the Marine Corps, based upon the increase provided in this bill; and above the grade of lieutenant in the Navy and major in the Marine Corps there can be no permanent or temporary promotions or appointments, either in the Navy or the Marine Corps.

Mr. FOSS. I want to ask the gentleman a question. As I understand it this bill relates simply to a temporary increase during the period of the war.

Mr. PADGETT. Absolutely.

Mr. FOSS. That all increases in men and officers, and also all promotions of a temporary character, shall cease when the war ceases.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; not later than six months after the end of the war.

Mr. FOSS. And as I understand you are not raising the permanent list at all?

Mr. PADGETT. There is absolutely no provision whatever in the bill for adding to the permanent Navy. That is governed absolutely by the law of August 29 last.

Mr. FOSS. And what is the permanent number of men under that law?

Mr. PADGETT. The enlisted personnel was 87,000, and 6,000 apprentice seamen, which would make 93,000. Now, as the graduates come through Annapolis, and the other sources provided by existing law, the commissioned personnel is 4 per cent——

Mr. FOSS. Of the total enlisted force?

Mr. PADGETT. Of the total enlisted force, but that has to be supplied, under the provisions of existing law, almost wholly from Annapolis. The output from Annapolis is not sufficient to provide the required number upon that basis. In the distribution of that 4 per cent a certain percentage goes to the line and a certain percentage to the staff, and then in the line distribution is made by a percentage and in the staff by a percentage.

Mr. FOSS. And those percentages are not changed?

Mr. PADGETT. Not at all, but it is provided that everything here shall be distributed according to the act of August 29.

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. From what force will these temporary officers be taken?

Mr. PADGETT. That is provided in section 5 of the bill, which provides—

That the additional temporary officers authorized in the various grades and ranks of the Navy and Marine Corps in accordance with the next preceding section may be temporarily appointed to serve in the grades or ranks to which appointed or promoted by the temporary advancement of officers holding permanent and probationary commissions—

And here are the classes—

by temporary appointment of commissioned warrant officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Navy, and warrant officers, noncommissioned officers, and clerks to assistant paymasters of the Marine Corps, citizens of the United States who have had previous naval or military service or training, and other citizens of the United States specially qualified—

With a committee amendment including the commissioned and warrant officers of the United States Coast Guard.

Those are the sources of supply from which it is expected that these temporary officers may be secured, and the bill further provides that these temporary appointments are to be made in the lowest grades, so that coming in from the outside they come into the lower grades, and promotions are made, either of the permanent Navy or of this temporary force during the continuance of the war, and all of it is limited to such time, not exceeding six months after the close of the war, as Congress or the President may permit.

Mr. BUTLER. How many captains are provided for in the Navy now?

Mr. PADGETT. Under the act of August 29——

Mr. BUTLER. We can not increase beyond 70, I think.

Mr. PADGETT. Seventy was the number authorized by law prior to August 29 last. There are four captains to one rear admiral, and at the present time we have, I think, about 88 or 89 captains, based upon a total of 2,036 officers that we have in the line of the Navy.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, we propose to repeal that provision——

Mr. PADGETT. No; we do not repeal anything.

Mr. BUTLER. Section 14 says—

That the provisions of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," approved August 29, 1916.

Mr. PADGETT. Which limits it to not exceeding 10 a year——

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. We propose to repeal that.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, in peace time we did not know that we would need more than 10 captains additional in any one year, and we inserted a provision in the act of August 29 that not more than 10 captains should be added in any one year, distributing the increase over a number of years. Now, it is proposed——

Mr. BUTLER. It is proposed to repeal that.

Mr. PADGETT. It is proposed to repeal that limitation of 10.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. So as to allow us to receive during this war such temporary increase as may be needed for the service.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, let us get down to something concrete. We can not under this bill have in the service at one time more than, say, 80 or 85 captains. If we repeal that provision, we can go up to at least 150 captains. After this war is over how many captains will we have?

Mr. PADGETT. We will go back absolutely to four times the number of rear admirals, depending upon the graduates from the Naval Academy who come into the service.

Mr. BUTLER. I know that the chairman is very familiar with the law, and I am perfectly willing to accept his interpretation of it. The gentleman feels absolutely safe in the statement that after this war is over we will go back to the old provision of the personnel act of last year?

Mr. PADGETT. Absolutely, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. And that the officers who are promoted to be captains during the temporary service will be demoted and go back to their grades from which they were promoted?

Mr. PADGETT. They will if they receive temporary promotion; but you must remember——

Mr. BUTLER. I understand.

Mr. PADGETT. That when the graduates come in from Annapolis the total number of the commission's personnel is increased, and every 100 that graduate from the academy have four officers, which are distributed. Now, there are 180 that graduate in March, and there will be from 180 to 200 that will graduate between now and September in the advanced class.

Mr. BUTLER. Let me ask the gentleman another question. You provide in this bill that there can be no temporary appointments above the grade of lieutenant.

Mr. PADGETT. Based on the increase above the personnel authorized by the act of August 29 last. But there is a provision for a temporary increase, the supply of officers needed and authorized under the provisions of the act of August 29.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I repeat my confidence in the good judgment of the chairman, but there is a lot in this bill that I do not know anything about or understand. I do not want to see the Navy after the war with 157 or 175 captains in it for every 400 or 500 men.

Mr. PADGETT. You will not.

Mr. BUTLER. If I do, I will make a holler about it. This is intended to be a temporary measure, but it has the most material by title and by reference which, if written out, would cover pages, and it requires the most particular and careful and accurate knowledge of all these statutes to understand it.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. It was considered by the committee for several days and in detail, section by section and paragraph by paragraph.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; I know we went over it and amended it.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the chairman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. I do not think there is anything in the bill that provides for any temporary commission of captain. There seems to be some confusion about it.

Mr. PADGETT. Under the amendment the committee adopted at the last session there is authorization for the temporary appointment in the various grades of the Navy and the Marine Corps up to the authorization contained in the act of August 29 last. Now, as they are supplied from Annapolis they would be permanent appointments; but during the war we will need more officers than the permanent list has. For instance, we have 2,236 permanent officers of the line of the Navy at the present time. We will need more than that during this war. In order to get the extra number, there is a provision made here that there may be temporary appointments.

Mr. BRITTEN. That does not apply to captains. Section 14 removes the restriction in the act of August 19, 1916, not to exceed 10 captains to be promoted in any one year. We are removing the restrictions; there may be 20 or 25 promoted this year. Is it possible to demote them and bring them back as commanders of the Navy?

Mr. PADGETT. The bill provides that all temporary appointments, upon expiration of the war and a period not exceeding six months thereafter—all temporary promotions, temporary appointments—shall cease.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is true, but the temporary appointments only include the rank of lieutenant junior and lieutenant proper. Captains on the list await promotion because of the exclusion in the law last year, where only 10 can be promoted in any one year; we are going to promote more than 10, and those are not temporary appointments.

Mr. PADGETT. The promotions under the act of August last would be permament appointments, but we need additional ones, and they are all temporary. Now, for instance——

Mr. BUTLER. I want to say that I am in trouble over this and have been. I believe that the repeal of the provision of the personnel act of last year will permit permanent promotions of 70 captains.

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, no. Let me call your attention to it.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope it will not, and I do not think the gentleman intends it shall. I am not accusing the gentleman, but the different provisions seem sort of twisted to me.

Mr. PADGETT. I think I can make it plain to the gentleman; it is so plain to my own mind.

Mr. BRITTEN. If the gentleman will yield, I am told that what the chairman of the committee is thinking about is an amendment that has been agreed upon by the committee but which has not been offered in the House.

Mr. PADGETT. That is true.

Mr. BRITTEN. And the confusion results from that.

Mr. PADGETT. But let me call attention to this, that we have a certain number of officers.

Mr. BUTLER. Based on the enlisted force.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. An enlisted force of 87,500 men.

Mr. PADGETT. No.

Mr. BUTLER. Well, by order of the President it can be increased to that.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, if the gentleman will allow me to make a statement I will make it perfectly plain. We have under the act of August 29 last an authorized enlisted personnel in the Navy of 87,000 enlisted men and 6,000 apprentice seamen, making 93,000 in the total. Now, the law authorizes a commissioned personnel based on that of 4 per cent. But we have not got 4 per cent or anything like it. We have 2,236, and under the provisions of the existing law that are not at all interfered with, modified, or altered in any way or affected by this legislation our supply of those officers comes through the graduates of the Naval Academy. Now, then, we provide that the distribution of the grades shall be in the proportion to the total number of officers. In other words, when we have 2,236 officers at the present time we get 22 rear admirals, 1 per cent of the commissioned personnel. Having 22 rear admirals, we can only have 88 captains, because there are 4 captains to 1 rear admiral. We have 7 commanders to 1 rear admiral. We have 14 lieutenant commanders to 1 rear admiral. We have on the proportion of 32½ lieutenant commanders to 1 rear admiral, and of lieutenants of the junior grade and ensigns we have the proportion of 42½ per cent. That would distribute the commissioned personnel. When you come to the question of captains, as I said, under the law of August 29 the total number of commissioned officers is distributed in the various grades, and you have 1 admiral and can not have but 4 captains.

Mr. BUTLER. How do you get the admirals?

Mr. PADGETT. You get 1 per cent of the total number of officers in the permanent grade. That would give us 22. We provided in the act of August 29 that not more than 10 captains should be added in one year. We had 70. That limited the number to 80, but under this provision if it is restricted with 22 admirals we would have 88 captains—four times 22—so that instead of increasing the captains by 75 or 100, as was stated a while ago, you would increase it to 88 instead of 80 under the provision that was made then. But you must remember that we will need in this war, while the war is going on, more than the 88 captains. We will need more than the number of commanders that are provided upon the basis of 7 commanders to 1 admiral, and those are all temporary. There is no provision authorizing a permanent increase in any way except as authorized in the act of August 29.

Mr. BUTLER. In other words, we propose now to take into the permanent service of the Navy sufficient enlisted men to make the number 87,000?

Mr. PADGETT. We have already got them.

Mr. BUTLER. I know we have got them, but we have got them within three or four months.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. But after this war is over we will have 87,000?

Mr. PADGETT. Ninety-three thousand.

Mr. BUTLER. How many rear admirals will we permanently have?

Mr. PADGETT. As soon as the Naval Academy supplies the number added it would increase it until it would reach the ultimate strength of 37.

Mr. BUTLER. And how many captains will we have?

Mr. PADGETT. Four times that would be 148.

Mr. BUTLER. One hundred and forty-eight captains. Is it not a fact that when the war is over our permanent naval strength will consist of 148 captains?

Mr. PADGETT. No; not when the war is over. I hope it will not last until the Naval Academy will supply that additional number. Whenever the Naval Academy will supply enough graduates——

Mr. BUTLER That will be within four years.

Mr. PADGETT. The commissioned personnel up to 4 per cent of the 93,000 under the provisions of the act of August 29 last we would have 37 rear admirals, and then in the meantime you will bear in mind that the large building program that we have authorized and that is under construction will have been completed and we will have need for every one of them.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection whatever to increasing the number of captains and officers in the Navy during temporary service, but it would be very disappointing to me to know that when this war is over we would have 148 captains in the Navy.

Mr. PADGETT. We would not have.

Mr. BUTLER. I am willing to accept the gentleman's statement, because it is a pleasure to admit that he has paid more attention to the subject than I have, and I know that he thinks he is absolutely right.

Mr. PADGETT. It is written into the law just as plain as the English language can make it.

Mr. BUTLER. A great deal of it is technical, and I admit that I become confused, and I largely rely upon the chairman of this committee, in whom I have great confidence.

Mr. PADGETT. In writing this bill, I want to say that we put it in the plainest, simplest English that can be found.

Mr. BUTLER. The English is good, but there is so much English put in every line and word that it bothers me.

Mr. PADGETT I think we have made it as plain as possible. We have provided that every appointment authorized by this bill is temporary. It is provided in this bill that every promotion that is authorized by this legislation is temporary. It is provided that every promotion made in this bill is temporary. We do not change the law of August 29 that fixed the proportions and the numbers and distributed them in the various grades, but we do provide that in order to get a sufficient number of officers in the various ranks there may be temporary appointments based upon the percentage authorized in the act of August 29, 1916, and in addition to that that there may be temporary appointments and temporary promotions in the grades not above lieutenant in the Navy and major in the Marine Corps, so as to have a larger number of these junior officers called into the service that they may be trained and prepared as a nucleus if the future should demand them.

Mr. CARLIN. Would it not relieve the situation somewhat if you gave the ensigns the rank of lieutenant as they graduate from Annapolis?

Mr. PADGETT. No; I do not think that ought to be done. That would be simply jumping grades.

Mr. CARLIN. It would make this difference: They have had some naval training and experience.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. CARLIN. And under this bill you take them from civil life, and they may not have had any.

Mr. PADGETT. But they have to go into the lowest grades.

Mr. CARLIN. The lowest grade is that of lieutenant.

Mr. PADGETT. No; the lowest grade is that of ensign.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. First let me ask a question of elemental importance only. The grade of rear admiral is that above the rank of captain?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It corresponds to the rank of brigadier general in the Army?

Mr. PADGETT. The grade of rear admiral in the Navy consists of two rear admirals—rear admiral of the upper line and rear admiral of the lower line.

Mr. SLAYDEN. There are two classes——

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir. The rear admiral of the lower line corresponds to a brigadier general and a rear admiral of the upper line corresponds to the grade of a major general.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman this question, and then I have another point to which I desire to direct his attention: Has not the Navy, as compared with the Army, a disproportionately large representation in the rank of rear admirals?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir; I understand we have less. The Army provides for a larger proportion of what is called flag officers in the Navy, which would be the general officers——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Brigadier generals.

Mr. PADGETT (continuing). Than the Army provides. The Navy has a smaller proportion. Now, it was recommended when we were framing the legislation of August last that the proportion of rear admirals number 1½ per cent, and we cut it down to 1 per cent.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Reference was made a few minutes ago, I think by the gentleman from Minnesota, or maybe the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], to the fact that the statute provides that there shall be a promotion to the rank of rear admiral of the lower line of only 10 captains a year.

Mr. PADGETT. No; it is the promotion from commander to captain, not from captain to admiral.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman means there shall only be 10 commanders in a year promoted to the rank of captain?

Mr. PADGETT. That is a provision in the act of August 29.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is immaterial anyway. This is the point I want to put to the gentleman: The gentleman says that it is not adequate to meet the present contingency, and therefore you will have to promote some 25 more——

Mr. PADGETT. No.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How many?

Mr. PADGETT. I said it would authorize the promotion of eight.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Eight in addition?

Mr. BRITTEN. Eighteen.

Mr. PADGETT. No; 8. We have already promoted 10 of them. The act of August 29—or rather, we had 70 captains under the old law, and when we established the percentage of 4 captains to 1 rear admiral and made the rear admirals 1 per cent of the commissioned personnel of the Navy, the rear admirals went up to 22, if I remember, or 23.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman said 22 a while ago.

Mr. PADGETT. That would have made 88 captains. We had 70 captains under the old distribution, but we thought that 10, running it up to 80, would be enough, and 10 the next year, until we distributed the increase over several years.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will say to the chairman here is what I am trying to get at: The law authorizes the promotion of 10 commanders a year to the rank of captain?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. That is, 10 increase, but wherever there are deaths or resignations or vacancies they are filled.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I understand.

Mr. PADGETT. It is distributed with the authorized increase.

Mr. SLAYDEN. What I am trying to get at is this: Suppose you promote 10 and require more captains for this emergency, and you promote 10 more. That is 20. Does that second increment, the 10 additional, become permanent captains in the line of the Navy?

Mr. PADGETT. No; the permanent number would be only 4 for each permanent rear admiral.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They can not exceed 10?

Mr. PADGETT. No. We have 22 rear admirals——

Mr. SLAYDEN. We are speaking about the promotion from commanders to captains.

Mr. PADGETT. Now we would have 88 captains. They are permanent captains. Now, you can not have under the law more than 4 captains to 1 rear admiral, but we hold it down and distribute that increase over 2 or 3 years. Now, the whole number of officers determines the number of admirals and the number of the other officers.

Mr. SLAYDEN. On a percentage basis?

Mr. PADGETT. On a percentage basis. For instance, 1 per cent of the total commissioned officers are admirals. Now we have 2,236 officers, and that gives us 22 rear admirals. Now that would give us 88 captains. It would give us 7 times 22 for commanders.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Now, this is the question I would like to get clear in my head——

Mr. PADGETT (interrupting). Now, the number of these various grades only increase by increasing the total number of officers in the permanent Navy, and the permanent number of officers are increased by the inflow from Annapolis. For instance, we graduated 180 in March. We added 180 to it, which would add 2 rear admirals, because a division of about 50 per cent——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then every time we increase the output of the Naval Academy we automatically increase the high commissioned personnel of the Navy. Is that it?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; we increase——

Mr. SLAYDEN. And who can tell what the law provides, outside of a specialist or an expert on that?

Mr. PADGETT. It is nothing in the world but an exact calculation.

Mr. SLAYDEN. There is no limit——

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; there it is.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Of course, in a matter that includes percentage it is simply a matter of elemental mathematical calculation; but——

Mr. PADGETT. The only way that the enlisted personnel can be increased is by act of Congress, and whenever Congress increases the enlisted personnel permanently, automatically the permanent commissioned personnel increases in the rate of 4 per cent. In other words, when there were 100 graduates from the Naval Academy there would be 4 officers in the total; when there were 200 added, there would be 8 officers that would be added.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is interesting.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, then, the 4 per cent is distributed according to the percentage—1 per cent for admirals, 4 per cent for captains, 7 per cent for commanders, 14 per cent for lieutenant commanders, 32½ per cent for lieutenants, and 42½ per cent for lieutenants, junior grade, and ensigns—so that Congress holds the whole thing in its hands. It only authorizes an increase of the personnel. If it reduces the personnel, it reduces the percentage of officers; if it increases it, it increases the percentage. Now, in this bill it is provided that the increase of the enlisted personnel shall be temporary, but it goes further and provides that there shall be no increase of the commissioned personnel on account of this temporary increase above the rank of lieutenant. It does give us additional lower officers, but no lieutenant commander, or commander, or captain, or rear admiral is provided for under any circumstances.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Why should you not do in Navy legislation what heretofore has been done in Army legislation? I do not know what may happen now.

Mr. PADGETT. You have a percentage basis in the Army.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And provide for so many officers of a certain rank?

Mr. PADGETT. That was the old law for years, but Congress changed both the Army and Navy and Marine Corps, and put them upon a scientific basis of a certain percentage, proportioned to what they had to do—the men they had to command.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to ask the last half of the question. This is an interesting discussion, but we have gotten far away from the subject. Now, to go back to those 20 commanders who are promoted to the rank of captain, 10 authorized by the statutes and 10 more to meet the emergency, that you say are temporary promotions or appointments——

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman does not state it accurately. The law authorizes so many captains in the aggregate and so many commanders in the aggregate, based upon this percentage; but we said that all that increase from captains to commanders should not take place at once; that not more than 10 of them should take place. So when we increase it from 70, instead of going above 80 we limit it to 80. Then the next year there would have been 10; that would have run it up to 90, but under the present strength of the Navy we would be entitled to 88.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That does not have a bearing on the question I wanted to ask. The law limits the promotion, so it has been stated here by the gentleman from Illinois and others, of 10 commanders to captains in a year; now, the contingency arises, and you promote 10 more. Suppose—and it is a mere supposition—some of our clever people should invent some sort of a machine that would answer the submarine, then the war would collapse promptly enough; then, would that second 10, that increment, go back to the rank of lieutenant commander that they had before? That is answered, I think, by yes or no.

Mr. PADGETT. I think I can answer it. Part of them would go back and part of them would not.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Would the numbers go back? It does not make any difference whether the individuals do or not.

Mr. PADGETT. They would go back to the established number under the act of Congress. To illustrate, we would be entitled to 88 captains. Suppose we appointed 10 more and made it 90 instead of 88; now, then, 8 of them would be permanent and 2 of them would be temporary. And if we appointed 10 more in the increase authorized upon the basis of 87,000, under the act of August 29, those 10 would be all temporary, and as soon as the war ended they would go back.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. PADGETT. That is absolutely what is provided for. I think it is as plain as it can be made.

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARLIN. I want to get clear in my mind just whether this bill does not discriminate against the ensigns in the Navy?

Mr. PADGETT. It does not.

Mr. CARLIN. Let us see. I notice you have provided that the clerks of assistant paymasters may be made lieutenants, but beginning with line 15, on page 5, you expressly provide that no ensign can be made lieutenant unless he has served two years as an ensign.

Mr. PADGETT. There is a committee amendment which provides that lieutenants, junior grade, and ensigns may be considered eligible for temporary promotions to the grades of lieutenants and lieutenants, junior grade, respectively, without regard to length of service in grade.

Mr. CARLIN. That answers my question.

Now, there is one other thing which, it seems to me, is left open, and I suppose it is covered by that amendment. As they are graduated now and commissioned as ensigns, they could, if thought wise, be commissioned as lieutenants?

Mr. PADGETT. They could for temporary service.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. Is there any provision of law contemplated by the committee to take care of an incident like this? For instance, Admiral Mayo is the senior admiral of the Atlantic Fleet——

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know that he is senior admiral.

Mr. NOLAN. Suppose that he should reach the retirement age of 64 years; what provision is there to retain him in the service, if thought advisable?

Mr. PADGETT. Every retired officer in time of emergency is subject to call to active duty. And I will say, further, that every officer in the Navy or Marine Corps on the retired list who is capable of performing duty has already been notified of the duty he is to perform and been directed to report.

Mr. NOLAN. The point I wanted to get at is this: Would they be retained in their command provided they reached the retirement age?

Mr. PADGETT. They would be detailed by the Commander in Chief of the Army. Many of them are detailed for shore duty. Having been absent from sea duty for years, they are keeping active men in command of the fleet and these men are being assigned to shore duty.

Mr. NOLAN. Then the law provides a method whereby the admiral of the fleet could be retained in that position if it were deemed advisable by the Commander in Chief?

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, yes.

Mr. NOLAN. There is another question that I want to ask.

Mr. MANN. When he is retired a new admiral is appointed to succeed him?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; but he would still be subject to service.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. PADGETT. And he could be detailed to that duty.

Mr. MANN. He might be detailed to that duty.

Mr. NOLAN. That is the point I wanted to get at. During an important crisis in this war we might have our fleet engaged in activities on the Atlantic Ocean; and is it possible for the man in command, having had experience, to be retained there?

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, yes; on any duty in the world; or any other retired officer could be put there.

Mr. BRITTEN. Many other retired officers have been put back in the service?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. Could he retain that command?

Mr. PADGETT. Certainly he could.

Mr. NOLAN. I understand the committee has an amendment increasing the pay of enlisted men as well as of petty officers. Is that true?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. To what highest grade of petty officers does that increase apply?

Mr. PADGETT. All the way up to warrant officers.

Mr. NOLAN. What is the increase proposed for enlisted men?

Mr. PADGETT. Fifteen dollars for the enlisted men, the same as in the Army.

Mr. NOLAN. And what percentage to the petty officers? Is that $15 a month, or a percentage increase?

Mr. PADGETT. It is $15 a month, just like the Army. In the Army it applies to the petty officers, and the Navy is in exactly the same position.

Mr. NOLAN. I see.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. SANFORD. If the gentleman has finished speaking about this subject I would like to ask this question: Am I correct in assuming that the full enlisted strength of 87,000 enlisted men is now realized?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. SANFORD. Is there need, then, to enlist in the near future to the new authorized strength included in this bill of 150,000 men?

Mr. PADGETT. The Secretary of the Navy told me informally that he did not know that he would enlist up to the full 150,000, but he wanted authority for that, or some leeway if it should be needed. But they expect to enlist above the present 93,000.

Mr. SANFORD. Can the gentleman say that there is need for any substantial increase in the enlistments from now on? I assume there is.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SANFORD. What I want to get at, then, is this: Is it the intention——

Mr. PADGETT. Let me call the gentleman's attention to a matter that may be of interest to the House as well as to him. About 10,000 have come into the Navy from the Naval Militia, and something over 5,000 have come in from the Naval Reserves, so that we have brought the enlisted personnel up to 93,000. I understand they have reached that, and I believe they have got all the apprentice seamen. They have the 87,000 enlisted men.

Mr. BUTLER. Beyond that, fully. They are getting a thousand a day.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. They are enlisting very rapidly, and they want to keep it up to get the men available. Ten thousand came in from the Naval Militia, and of naval volunteers something more than 5,000 came in, so that 93,000 and 10,000 make 103,000, and 5,000 more make 108,000 that are available.

Mr. SANFORD. Then, do I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the plan is to continue this campaign for volunteers that is now being carried on for enlisted men in the Navy?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. In the Navy they are all volunteers, and they are enlisting very rapidly. [Applause.]

Mr. SANFORD. Let me complete what I was getting at. Is there any provision, as the gentleman understands, in the conscription bill that we recently passed that would authorize the use in the Navy of any of the men conscripted?

Mr. PADGETT. I understand not. I understand that applies only to the land forces—to the Army.

Mr. SANFORD. I want to ask the gentleman another question. Does the gentleman think that it is a good thing at this time, when the country is applying the principle that has recently been adopted as the basis of our military policy, to carry on the "You next" campaign and the campaign of "Uncle Sam needs you," as it is now being carried on in the big cities—the campaign, one might say, of enlisting by abuse, as I have seen it applied? Does the gentleman think that that campaign is going to have a good effect upon the minds of the people whom we are trying to persuade to accept patriotically the conscription act?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know to what the gentleman refers. I do not know of any abuse. The Navy is receiving purely volunteer enlistments, and the Marine Corps is receiving purely volunteer enlistments, and they are enlisting very rapidly, and were prior to the conscription act.

Mr. SANFORD. Has not the gentleman seen the signs of great pressure applied in the cities?

Mr. BUTLER. There is no pressure exercised except advertising——

Mr. PADGETT. And the appeals that are being made.

Mr. SANFORD. Those appeals can not be resisted by the young men of the country—"The country needs you," and "You are next."

Mr. PADGETT. The country needs them. The duty is to arm and come on.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. There is also a committee amendment to this bill that will permit a periodic enlistment for the war only, is there not?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. I was going to take that up.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I want to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. SANFORD. Will the chairman permit?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does the gentleman from New York object to the Navy being supplied with volunteers while he favors conscription for the Army?

Mr. SANFORD. I certainly object to the campaign as it is now being carried on, to persuade men that it is their duty to enlist, when at the same time the Government is trying to teach the people that when the Government wants them it will take them according to law, and I think that the two campaigns are absolutely inconsistent and one is incompatible with the other.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Which one does the gentleman prefer?

Mr. SANFORD. I believe in the one that allows the Government to take the citizen whenever it wants him.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is that the reason why New York is so far behind in her quota in the Navy?

Mr. SANFORD. I do not know that New York is, in fact, behind in the Navy. But let me answer, if that is true, I should not be surprised if that were the reason, because throughout the State of New York——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is that the reason, also, why you are behind in the Army?

Mr. SANFORD. Let me answer. I think that is the reason why it is hard to recruit by the volunteer system in New York, because while almost everyone there that I know anything about is willing to do his duty——

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then they want to be forced to it.

Mr. SANFORD. They seriously believe that the welfare of the country demands a universal acceptance of the obligation to serve, and everyone that I hear from is anxious to serve when his country calls, but he does not care to push himself in the way. They have accepted the new idea.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. They want to wait until they are forced.

Mr. SANFORD. I want to ask if the gentleman from Kansas has not accepted the new idea?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is New York up to her quota?

Mr. SANFORD. Oh, I will be willing to compare the National Guard of New York with the National Guard of Kansas for that matter.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman would not compare any regiment of New York with the Twentieth Kansas. Kansas is up on all her quota.

Mr. SANFORD. I do not think we would gain anything by a comparison with Kansas. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I want to make an inquiry of the gentleman in reference to the Marine Corps, apropos the discussion we have been having with reference to the officers of the Army, which have been extremely interesting and valuable. I would like a little information with respect to the Marine Corps. As I understand, the law provides 14,700 men for the Marine Corps. I refer to the enactment of the law of last August. There were no brigadier generals in the Marine Corps, excepting the chief, as I understand it.

Mr. PADGETT. He is a major while he holds the office. He is in now. The highest rank is colonel.

Mr. MILLER or Minnesota. And then on down. Now, by the act of August last several brigadier generals will be created, as I understand.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; they have already been created, and confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. How many?

Mr. PADGETT. Five, I believe.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. This further increase will therefore provide for some additional brigadier generals.

Mr. PADGETT. Not one, sir.

Mr. BUTLER. Not one.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. These five already created will be sufficient to take care of the entire force?

Mr. PADGETT. We cut off all promotions or appointments above major in the Marine Corps, based upon the passage of this act. They are governed absolutely by the act of August 29 last.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. If five brigadier generals are needed in the Marine Corps for 17,000 men—and I assume they must have been needed or they would not have been asked for—why are not additional ones needed when you increase the force by 40 per cent?

Mr. PADGETT. Simply for the reason that the Marine Corps served in small detachments, many of them. Here is a detachment that is guarding a navy yard, and 75 or 100 on board a battleship, and another small detachment on another battleship or a smaller boat. So they are distributed around, and they have a number of them on shore station. Then if a large contingent of 10,000 or 15,000 should be sent abroad, they would be grouped together into one organization, and I think we do not require these additional higher officers.

Mr. BRITTEN. May I suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota that under this bill the increase in the personnel of the Marine Corps is merely temporary, and the officers commissioned in the Marine Corps are merely temporary, and only go as high as the rank of major. We do not commission any officers in the Marine Corps above the rank of major under this bill, and those below the rank of major are merely temporary.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Do I understand there will be no promotions above the rank of major?

Mr. BRITTEN. No promotions above the rank of major, and all the appointments made under this bill will be merely temporary.

Mr. PADGETT. No promotions above the rank of major on account of this legislation. Under the act of August 29, which increases the strength of the Marine Corps up to 17,400, the regular promotions would go on under existing law, as though this act was not passed. This does not interfere with the act of August 29, but with this increase of 12,600 there is no increase in the Marine Corps except a temporary increase, and there are to be no appointments or promotions under this act above the rank of major.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Then the opportunity for advancement, to an officer in the Marine Corps, pretty nearly ceases after he has attained the rank of major?

Mr. PADGETT. Oh, no; they have been having exceedingly rapid promotions. Some of them, under the act of August 29, have been getting them at the rate of two a week.

Mr. BRITTEN. I should like to suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota also that this temporary enlisted force will be retired after the war, and the Marine Corps will then again be reduced to 17,400 men.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. What will be done with the officers then?

Mr. BRITTEN. The temporary officers?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. They will go back to their original places?

Mr. PADGETT. If they are temporary promotions, they will go back to their original places.

Mr. BUTLER. And those appointed from civil life will go back to civil life?

Mr. PADGETT. Under existing law enlistments in the Navy or Marine Corps are for four years; or if a boy is a minor, his enlistment is during minority, and the length of his enlistment is from the date when he enlists until he attains his majority. We have a provision in this bill authorizing enlistments for four years, or for the period of the war, or for such shorter time or times as the President may prescribe. So that if a person wanted to enlist for four years, he could do so. If he wanted to enlist for the period of the war, there would be authority for him so to enlist. If the President should prescribe to take enlistments for one year or two years, or for a shorter period, he could enlist for that, so that enlistments need not be for the hard and fast period of four years, as at the present time.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. I want to ask the chairman of the Naval Committee who or what authority prescribes the rules and regulations governing the admission of midshipmen into the Naval Academy? Is that a function of Congress, or is it turned over to the Naval Board?

Mr. PADGETT. Congress prescribes the number who shall be appointed.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. I mean the qualifications.

Mr. PADGETT. The examinations, mental and physical, are held under the authority of the academic board, and the whole management of the academy is under the Secretary of the Navy, subject, of course, to the authority of the President.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Can the chairman inform me why it is made so much harder and more difficult for a young man to gain admission to the Naval Academy at Annapolis than it is to enter the Military Academy at West Point?

Mr. PADGETT. I could not tell the gentleman that, because my experience has been just the other way. My young men have gotten into the Naval Academy, but in the 16 years that I have been here I believe I have only had three who have gotten into the Military Academy.

Mr. SISSON. Is that because the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] is on the Naval Committee and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BRUMBAUGH] is on the Military Committee?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. No; I am not on the Military Committee nor on the Naval Committee.

Mr. PADGETT. And I have had them fail in attempting to gain entrance to both academies.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. This is what I refer to: The Military Academy at West Point has an accredited list of schools, graduates from which it will receive cadets without entrance mental examination. If a young man has made a certain standing, if he is a graduate of certain accredited schools, of which there may be a dozen in your district, he is admitted to West Point without entrance mental examination. They will give you a list of the schools. There may be in your congressional district half a dozen high schools, all the colleges, and, in fact, all the high schools of any standing—all of them on this accredited list. If the boy has made a certain acceptable grade, in many cases they do not even require graduation, he is admitted on the standing which he has made at school. Now, Annapolis will not accept the grade or diploma of the graduate of any school, college, or university in lieu of the required entrance mental examination. They will accept no diploma, even from a State university.

Mr. PADGETT. They hold examinations.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. The point I am really getting at is this: We have enacted laws here to increase the number of midshipmen at Annapolis, and we select splendid young men from our districts. Their parents go to the expense of having them prepare for entrance at Annapolis. A young man ofttimes drops out of college and the high school or is prepared by private schools for this examination. The cry goes up that we need more midshipmen. We go to the trouble of sending them there; we select splendid young men, anxious to go, but they are confronted with an examination that only a few of them can pass.

Mr. PADGETT. No; 66 per cent pass, and I understand that that is about the percentage that pass the college examinations. The passing mark is only 62½ out of a hundred. I do not know why the department has never seen fit to accept certificates or diplomas unless they do not think it satisfactory.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. Has not the gentleman got the figures exactly wrong; is it not 66⅔ per cent that fail and 33⅓ per cent that are admitted?

Mr. PADGETT. No.

Mr. SISSON. Out of an examination of six hundred and odd men a while ago only 250 or 260 passed.

Mr. PADGETT. I am talking about the run of the years.

Mr. SISSON. I recollect that in a debate we had some time ago the Speaker himself made the assertion that out of 600 men examined only two hundred and some odd passed, and the President of the United States, Mr. Taft, made a speech a short time after the examination, in which he and Speaker CLARK both delivered speeches, and as I read the speeches in the paper the Speaker made the statement that out of six hundred and odd men only 200 or 250 passed. I think the gentleman has got his figures exactly wrong, or else the last list of examinations was a wonderful exception to what has been going on.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know the result of the last one. But, Mr. Chairman, this is all foreign to the discussion here.

Mr. SISSON. I will state that I made my observation in response to the question raised by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BRUMBAUGH].

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BROWNING. Speaking of the failures at Annapolis, I think it can be obviated if we adopt my plan. To-day at Camden, N. J., the Civil Service Commission is holding an examination for me for two appointments to Annapolis. I know that there are 17 young men entering that examination.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. How many will pass?

Mr. BROWNING. I do not know. The last appointment that I made at West Point they accepted the diploma of the Salem (N. J.) High School, but at a February examination the young man failed, and he is out to-day.

Mr. PADGETT. At West Point I have had every candidate I have nominated take the examination except one, who went in on his certificate, and he was accepted by the academy. After he had been there four weeks he himself asked to resign, because he said he saw that he was not competent to carry on the work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. PADGETT. Five minutes will be enough.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may proceed until he concludes his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Is there any provision made for the Government to use the services of these young men who have spent a year, two years, or three years at Annapolis, and who have failed on some subjects and they have refused to graduate them?

Mr. PADGETT. They can come in under the clause authorizing appointments from citizens specially qualified. They would have some special qualification, and they could come in and receive a temporary appointment.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Does not the gentleman think that the age limit is too low—that it should be something like 20 years?

Mr. PADGETT. It is 16 to 20—four years' margin; and I think that is old enough. I will state that that question has been before the committee time after time for a number of years, and all of the naval officers have been advocating that it should be reduced from 15 to 18 instead of being from 16 to 20. I have stood out against it because I felt that it ought to be from 16 to 20. But they have made arguments that the young boys who go in from 16 to 20 are the best; that the younger they go in the better they adapt themselves to the service; that when you get them older they do not take so readily and so well to the service and do not adjust themselves to the new conditions and get what they call the sea habit.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. It may be that they adapt themselves better to the rules and regulations, but it appears to me that their minds are not mature enough to get the benefit out of the difficult subjects they are asked to pursue.

Mr. PADGETT. I think 16 to 20 is a fine age for them to enter.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. REED. What is the latest examination for the additional number of midshipmen to be appointed?

Mr. PADGETT. I understand that there is an examination June 27, which is the next one, and that will be succeeded by one in February. Any Member who wants to nominate candidates for this coming session, which meets in September or before October, can have their applicants take the examination the 27th of June. If they fail to nominate, Members can have the right to nominate candidates who will be examined next February.

Mr. REED. That is, to get the quota of four?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I understood the gentleman to say that we had 1 admiral for every 4 captains, and that we have 37 rear admirals.

Mr. PADGETT. Twenty-two. I said that if we got the enlisted strength up to the 93,000 authorized by law, and if the supply of the total number of officers should run up to a sufficient number, the ultimate limit of rear admirals would be 37, but we have 22 or 23 at the present time.

Mr. FESS. That would give us 148 captains.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; that is all under the act of August last; 7 commanders to 1 admiral.

Mr. FESS. Five hundred and eighteen lieutenant commanders, if we were full?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. FESS. And 1,202 lieutenants?

Mr. PADGETT. Twelve hundred and two or twelve hundred and three.

Mr. FESS. And 1,572 of the grade of ensign?

Mr. PADGETT. Under that it would be 42 per cent of the total.

Mr. FESS. I am asking purely for information as to the officering of the Navy if it were completed.

Mr. PADGETT. If it were up to the authorized strength of the 93,000 and we had that number of men; yes.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. FOSS. I want to ask the chairman if he thinks he has made ample provision here for the personnel during this war? Of course, we do not know at the present time how many men we will need.

Mr. PADGETT. I think so.

Mr. FOSS. It seems to me it would be wise to give a wide margin to the Secretary of the Navy in the matter of enlistments.

Mr. PADGETT. I think we have. Increasing it up to 150,000 I think is giving a leeway of 25,000 or 30,000.

Mr. HICKS. Admiral Palmer before our committee the other day stated 150,000 was ample to take care of not only the immediate need but for some time in the future.

Mr. FOSS. Of all ships likely to be put into commission?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes

Mr. FOSS. Including ships that will be turned over to the Government, including the torpedo-boat chasers and power boats now under construction?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; they said it would meet everything.

Mr. FOSS. I think it is very important that we should authorize a sufficient number of men in the bill, and it seems to me it makes very little difference whether we say 150,000 or 175,000, or even 200,000. There ought to be a wide margin; otherwise we would have to pass another bill.

Mr. PADGETT. I think we have given all the necessary leeway, because when you have the 150,000 there are 10,000 to be added to that.

Mr. FOSS. Of apprentices?

Mr. PADGETT. No; there will be 6,000 apprentices.

Mr. FOSS. We would have 4,000 additional?

Mr. PADGETT. No; that is included. Six thousand additional would make 156,000, and then the Naval Militia already has contributed 10,000, which would make 166,000, and we have over 5,000 that have already come into the reserves, which would run it up to 171,000.

Mr. FOSS. Was there any estimate made by the Bureau of Navigation, which was before the committee at the time, of the number of ships?

Mr. PADGETT. We had Admiral Palmer before the committee, and in his statement, which is printed, you will find that he gives an itemized statement of how in a general way the distribution would be made, and provides for what he says is an ample number.

Mr. Chairman, I have nothing further to say at the present time.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, whether the Members of Congress or the people of the United States agree or not with the President as to our entry into this war with Germany, the die is cast, and the United States has by its official act declared that a state of war now exists between our country and Germany.

Only two courses of action are now open to us as a Nation—admit defeat or press on to victory. To admit defeat means humiliation and national disgrace and destroys our right to exist as a Nation and throws into the discard all the things we as a free and independent Nation have loved, fostered, and fought to preserve. All of our early traditions and principles that Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln, and Grant have stood for disappear in clouds of smoke, the smoke of a generation of people who had confidence in the future generation, our generation, who are the heirs of the sturdy heritages and traditions of the past.

War is a stern reality, and four things will win this war, namely, organization, men, money, and food.

ORGANIZATION.

Organization must be had through the men who are charged with the supreme authority of guiding this Nation, the President and those men of his choosing and the heads of departments and others who are in authority with him. Any successful organization must have a single head. In this case it must be the President, because he is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and the full responsibility rests on him to perfect the organization and administer the various functions that are placed in his hands by Congress to be by him, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, properly and efficiently managed. It is the supreme duty of the Congress to place at the disposal of the President all necessary materials, including men, money, and food, and when Congress has acted it is the duty of the people to cooperate and trust the Commander in Chief to the fullest degree.

I believe that the selective plan of conscription as proposed by the President is the proper one, and I favor conscripting all men between the ages of 21 and 30 immediately and the placing in the hands of the President the authority to select from these men those that are needed for the various pursuits necessary to wage this war to a successful termination and bring the Imperial German Government to terms that will end the war, and thus preserve to this country the same degree of freedom and rights that we now possess and provide for future generations the same degree of freedom. I have supreme confidence in the people of this Nation and feel that they will respond to the urgent needs of their country in this critical period.

MONEY.

At the request of the President the Congress has placed at the disposal of the Commander in Chief the entire resources of our beloved country—over 100,000,000 people and a wealth of $200,000,000,000. Congress has provided an initial appropriation of $7,000,000,000, and is about to provide additional revenue to the amount of $2,000,000,000 to apply toward the annual cost of supporting the Army and Navy, and will furnish such additional credit and cash as are necessary. Our all is in the melting pot and every care must be exercised to see that as few mistakes are made as possible.

The responsibility of preserving our financial equilibrium is a great one and every care must be taken to keep it on a sound basis. We can if necessary furnish $10,000,000,000 a year for the next seven years for war purposes without going into debt any more in proportion than is the debt now of Great Britain and France occasioned by this war.

The word that I would send to Germany at this time is that our people are united; that our combined wealth of $200,000,000,000 and $10,000,000,000 a year to run the war machine, if necessary, seven years, and a conscripted army of 22,000,000 men have been placed at the disposal of the Commander in Chief to be used as he may see fit to bring the war to a successful termination.

FOOD.

The responsibility of feeding not only our own people, but the larger responsibility of feeding the balance of the people of the whole world now rests on our shoulders. The importance, therefore, of a thorough system of production and delivery, providing for the elimination of all waste and for efficient facilities for transporting food from the producer through the various stages necessary to bring it to the ultimate consumer is readily apparent and must be successfully coped with. All possible assistance should be given by the various departments of the Government to see that the farmer produces and that the proper agencies are maintained to make full deliveries at reasonable rates to the consumer, and to provide for exports to maintain our armies wherever they may be, and to maintain our allies as their needs may require. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the statement was made that this increase in the enlisted force of the Navy was only for the war. I suppose that represents the intention of the department, not the language of the bill.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, it is the intention of the committee to provide an increase up to 150,000 men, if need be, during the period of the war.

Mr. MANN. Why did not the committee say that? Of course the bill provides for a temporary increase, and it says that the President may take enlistments for the period of the war; but where is the provision in the bill that at the end of the war the force shall be decreased?

Mr. BRITTEN. Does not the suggestion itself convey that information—for the period of the war? If the appointment is a temporary appointment, for the period of the war, is it not natural to assume that when the war is over the present established or enlisted force will prevail?

Mr. MANN. There is no provision in the bill that enlistments shall be for the period of the war only.

Mr. BRITTEN. There is, according to a committee amendment, if the gentleman will read the report.

Mr. MANN. The trouble with the gentleman is that I read it carefully and know what the language is. The committee has told what it means and reports it without examining the language. The bill provides, by the committee amendment, that enlistments may be for the war.

Mr. MADDEN. Does my colleague mean to convey the idea that the Committee on Naval Affairs never read the bill?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. The Committee on Naval Affairs is one of the ablest committees of this legislative body or any other legislative body. I have served on committees myself, and I know something about the committee acts on bills. Of course it may be that the increase in the force is for the duration of the war, but I would be willing to bet my hat against 1 cent—and I do not know that it is worth a cent—that the Navy will never be restored to the enlisted force of only 87,000 men.

Mr. PADGETT. Ninety-three thousand is the number provided.

Mr. MANN. I am only referring to the language of the bill. Of course I do not know whether that is correct or not. There is no committee amendment about that. The bill says in the first section—and I am trying to get information—that—

The authorized enlisted strength of the active list of the Navy is hereby temporarily increased from 87,000 to 150,000.

Is that correct or not?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman ought not to criticize me for using the terms of the bill.

Mr. PADGETT. I am not criticizing the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; the gentleman was correcting me when I said the Navy, in my judgment, would never be decreased to 87,000. Now, if 87,000 is not the correct figure, I say it is not my fault; it is the fault of the bill. I do not know how many men there are in the Navy.

Mr. PADGETT. The enlisted strength is 87,000, as provided in the act of August last.

Mr. MANN. That is the act I was referring to.

Mr. PADGETT. And in addition to that the law provided for 6,000 apprentice seamen.

Mr. MANN. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee, Does he believe that the enlisted force of the Navy will ever be reduced to 87,000 after it has been increased to 150,000?

Mr. PADGETT. I do.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman's faith would move mountains. A man who has his childlike and implicit faith has no place in this body. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Is not the matter entirely up to Congress after all?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does not section 3 in clear terms distinctly say "that enlistments in the Navy and Marine Corps, during such time as the United States may be at war, shall be for four years, or for the period of the war, or for such shorter period or periods as the President may prescribe?" The committee put in an amendment providing for the increase of this force for the period of the war.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that means during the period of the war?

Mr. BRITTEN. I do.

Mr. MANN. It says as the President may prescribe, and are we prescribing it shall be for the period of the war?

Mr. BRITTEN. Well——

Mr. MANN. Are we prescribing it shall be for the period of the war?

Mr. BRITTEN. No; we are not.

Mr. MANN. That is all I said.

Mr. PADGETT. It is stated that temporary appointments shall end not later than six months after the war.

Mr. MANN. Those are officers appointed.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Here is the situation that will confront us: At the end of the war we will have a naval enlisted force, if this bill is carried out, of at least 150,000, whose terms do not expire necessarily with the end of the war——

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Not in the middle of a sentence, I will say to my friend——

Mr. CALDWELL. I thought the gentleman had finished.

Mr. MANN. I had not. The gentleman interrupted me in the middle of a word. [Laughter.] The bill will provide an enlisted force of 150,000 and at the end of the war we will have an enlisted force of 150,000 whose terms do not expire. Then we will have temporary appointments of officers whose terms will expire six months after the end of the war, and, of course, then it will be up to Congress to provide appointments further for the enlisted force that stays in the Navy——

Mr. BRITTEN. That is, the officers.

Mr. MANN. Now no sane man believes—no; I will take that back, some sane man may believe—but I do not believe with the great increase in our Naval Establishment at the end of the war we will ever go back to 87,000 enlisted men. I do not believe that anybody who has watched the Navy grow can believe that and look facts in the face. Now, I am not criticizing the committee for bringing in a bill that may provide for a reduction in the enlisted force at the end of the war. How many new ships are we going to have in the Navy in the next three or four years?

Mr. PADGETT. We have authorized battleships, I think, 54, all told, 6 battle cruisers; we authorized in the last Congress 38 submarines; we authorized the session before that, in August, 30. That makes 68. We had about 74 before that and in addition to that a number of cruisers, torpedo-boat destroyers, built and in course of building.

Mr. MANN. Well, will these 150,000 enlisted men man all these ships?

Mr. PADGETT. A good many of them will not be completed before the end of the war.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman does not know whether they will be completed by the end of the war or not.

Mr. PADGETT. Under ordinary expectations.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows nothing is ordinary now in reference to this war, everything is extraordinary; but I would like to know if the 150,000 enlisted men provided for in this bill will man all the ships that we have now authorized?

Mr. PADGETT. Admiral——

Mr. MANN. That is a simple question, will they or not?

Mr. FARR. Yes; allowing some for casualties.

Mr. PADGETT. I think it would.

Mr. MANN. During the next three or four years how many ships will be scrapped if they do not get injured in battle?

Mr. PADGETT. None I know of at all.

Mr. MANN. Then in the next three or four years, if we provide this enlisted force, at the end of that time 150,000 men will be on board ship——

Mr. PADGETT. No; because in time of peace no nation in the world keeps all the fleet in full commission. They only keep a percentage.

Mr. MANN. No nation except Great Britain and probably France and Germany and a few other countries that have a fleet.

Mr. PADGETT. Great Britain kept 60 per cent in active commission and 40 per cent in reserve before the war began.

Mr. MANN. They put them in the scrap heap.

Mr. PADGETT. They kept them with nucleus crews.

Mr. MANN. We are trying to build a Navy, and all the time we are told it is very important that we have a Navy. It was Thomas Jefferson, great man that he was, who proposed to build ships and put them in a storehouse, under a shed, in time of peace. That is what we are going to do with our Navy now, practically, according to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT]. Well, I doubt it. I have seen come and go a good many opportunities for increase and decrease of officers. I can not now recall a single case, though doubtless I could if I took more time, in which after we had authorized and provided an actual increase in the number of any class of people in the Government service we have decreased it since I have been a Member of this House. And I have not the slightest idea that when we increase the enlisted force of the Navy, theoretically for the time of war, and they are on board ships, we will decrease the number at the end of the war. But you can provide a temporary army and disband it. You can not very successfully scrap one of our naval ships that is not ready for the scrap heap, and build some submarine and torpedo destroyers, and tow them into port some place and let them lie there. Who believes that will be done? It does not seem to me that anyone can believe it will be done who has any confidence in the integrity of any one of the men who are managing the Government. I do not know how soon they would get out of date.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. MANN. I promised to yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL] when I reached the end of my sentence, and I now am glad to yield to him.

Mr. CALDWELL. Does the gentleman say that he wants to yield to me?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman now.

Mr. CALDWELL. You have finished the sentence, I presume?

Mr. MANN. Yes; I have finished the sentence.

Mr. CALDWELL. Section 3 on page 2 provides—

That enlistments in the Navy and Marine Corps, during such time as the United States may be at war, shall be for four years or for the period of the war or for such shorter period or periods as the President may prescribe.

May I ask the gentleman what, in his opinion, would be the longest time that that wording would authorize the enlistment of men?

Mr. MANN. Four years.

Mr. CALDWELL. Unless, of course, the war lasted longer than four years. He indicated a few moments ago it might last longer than four years.

Mr. MANN. Yes. That is the longest definite time.

Mr. CALDWELL. The longest definite time is four years. What is the longest indefinite time?

Mr. MANN. The length of the war.

Mr. CALDWELL. If the war did not last as long as four years, these would all expire?

Mr. MANN. If the enlistments were for the period of the war, they would all expire when peace was declared; but it would be a silly proceeding to take them that way.

Mr. CALDWELL. On the first page of the bill I notice, in lines 3, 4, and 5, it is provided this increase shall be temporary.

Mr. MANN. I take it that the gentleman from New York has just come in.

Mr. CALDWELL. I have been here most of the time. I have been here nearly as long as the gentleman from Illinois has.

Mr. MANN. Then, the gentleman has not been attentive, because I read all that to the committee, and so did the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT].

Mr. CALDWELL. You did not seem to coordinate the two.

Mr. MANN. That is exactly what I did. I read them in connection, while the gentleman was out sporting, probably.

Mr. CALDWELL. Not out sporting.

Mr. MANN. I thought he was. I thought possibly he had gone to the baseball game. I wish I had.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does not the gentleman think it would be a mighty good thing if it does require 150,000 men to carry on a mobilization of our Navy—and we have never had one in the history of our country that I know of—does not the gentleman think it would be a good thing to have 150,000 men in the Navy all the time?

Mr. MANN. Certainly. I am not quarreling with that.

Mr. BRITTEN. I understood that, and I hope the gentleman is absolutely correct in his statement.

Mr. MANN. I never have attempted to deceive myself. I think I rarely attempt to deceive anybody else, but I never attempt to deceive myself. I think the committee attempted to deceive itself when it proposed to increase the Navy to 150,000, with the great number of new naval ships now authorized, and then thought to itself that at the end of the war it would decrease the force to that which is now authorized. I think the committee attempted to deceive itself if it is honest, and of course I believe it is honest, in presenting a bill like this to the House.

Mr. BRITTEN. The best expert opinion that the committee could get indicated that 150,000 men would be vastly in excess of the enlisted personnel required for the ships built and building at the present time. I think that 115,000 to 120,000 men can be used, according to the best expert advice, on all ships built and building.

Mr. MANN. Really, you know, I had imagined that we had authorized about as many ships as we have now. Of course, I am clear off on that.

Mr. BRITTEN. What do you mean by saying that we authorized as many ships as we have now?

Mr. MANN. I said that we had authorized, not yet in commission, about as many ships as we now have in commission.

Mr. KNUTSON. Can I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can properly ask me a question, but I am not sure that I can give him any information.

Mr. KNUTSON. Are we committed to a definite naval program regardless of what the terms of peace may be at the conclusion of the war?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman asks if we are committed to a definite program in connection with the Navy. There is no way of committing Congress to a definite program on any subject. In the naval bill of last year, which is now the law, there is a provision to the effect that before we go to war we will seek arbitration. That is in the law at the present time. That was announced to be the policy of this Government less than a year ago, but we reversed it. We will reverse our policy on naval affairs. A few years ago it was the policy of the Government apparently to increase the naval force by one battleship a year. Then it became the policy to increase by two battleships a year. I do not know just what the policy would be considered now. Apparently the policy of the Government is to authorize a great many battleships and construct very few. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Was that reversal of the law to which the gentleman just referred the fault entirely of Congress, or was it the fault of the Executive?

Mr. MANN. I do not charge the Executive with responsibility for things which Congress inserts in the law.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is always well informed. Will the gentleman tell us whether it is true, as the newspapers reported a few days ago, that work on the large battleships and the large cruisers had been entirely, or practically entirely, suspended at this time?

Mr. MANN. I refer the question to my distinguished and learned friend from Tennessee.

Mr. PADGETT. My information, sir, is that the battleships, 30 of them, are now fully equipped with men.

Mr. MONDELL. I am speaking of the battleships that have been authorized, the battleships and the cruisers that have been authorized and laid down and under construction. Several days ago several newspapers that I read stated that it was proposed to suspend work on practically all of those ships.

Mr. PADGETT. I know of no such purpose. The piece I saw in the papers stated that such a thing was being contemplated.

Mr. MONDELL. The statement was that in view of the need for mechanics and workmen for the smaller vessels the men were to be taken off the large ships. The gentleman does not know whether that is being done or not?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know.

Mr. MONDELL. It would be a very practical and sensible thing to do, I should say, under the circumstances.

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know that it would be.

Mr. MANN. Well, when two such learned gentlemen disagree I refuse to be the referee. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. I am not sure that I am fully informed on the subject yet.

Mr. MANN. Just in passing, speaking of building these ships, I was on a torpedo-boat destroyer the other day and I saw a seaman sawing a piece of bronze, or whatever it was, off one of the torpedo guns. It took quite a while, and I sat there watching him. After he was through I said, "What is the reason you sawed that off?" "Well," he said, "there is a little operation in connection with this gun that we frequently have to go through. With that little piece sawed off we can do it in a half a minute. If that piece is left on, it takes us about an hour and a half." I said to myself, "Whoever designed that gun certainly was brilliant in that one respect—to leave it to a seaman to discover and remove a projection from a gun whereby it would take more than an hour to do something which is quite essential to do in handling the gun, but which, when he sawed it off, could be done almost instantly."

Mr. BRITTEN. Just at that point, what was the object of that projection on the gun? What was it intended to do?

Mr. MANN. I do not know. It was a projection merely, and the gun was just as strong when it was sawed off as before.

Mr. MONDELL. Was it a sort of vermiform appendix? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I saved it, by the way. I have it—the piece that he sawed off—as a souvenir.

Mr. BRITTEN. You might send it down to the Gun Factory.

Mr. MANN. I hate to detain the committee so long, but I wanted to ask a question in reference to these commissioned officers. Just what is the increase authorized in this bill in the number of different grades of commissioned and noncommissioned officers for temporary appointment?

Mr. PADGETT. The bill as submitted authorizes an increase based upon 57,000, the difference between 93,000 and the 150,000, of 747 lieutenants, and 954 lieutenants of junior grade and ensigns. It does not authorize any other grades above that. It authorizes a temporary increase from what we have in the permanent commissioned personnel—2,236 officers, I think it is—up to the authorization of the act of August 29 last. I have not figured out what that difference is, but it will be a substantial increase. We are short of officers at the present time. We have at the present time 2,236 officers, and with 4 per cent on the 93,000, that would be 3,720 officers. The difference between that might be authorized temporarily by the provisions of this bill, but none of them permanently, except such as come in from the Naval Academy, who are added yearly to the permanent increase of the commissioned personnel.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman this question: As to this increase that is now authorized, is there any way of utilizing now 150,000 enlisted men except for training them?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes, sir. A great many of these men will be put upon commercial ships that are taken over. A great many of them will be put upon auxiliaries that are used for the support of the Navy, fuel ships, coal and oil and supply ships, and transportation generally. A great many of these men are needed for that service.

Mr. MANN. They do not put Navy men on a coal ship, do they?

Mr. PADGETT. Heretofore, in time of peace, they have been operating them with civilian crews, perhaps with one or two naval officers; but in time of war they would be taken into the regular naval service and operated with naval crews. Of course, they would have to have military discipline and control.

Mr. MANN. I was under the impression that these coal ships had civilian officers and not naval officers.

Mr. PADGETT. In time of peace the fuel ships do have civilian crews, but in time of war they are operated under military control, and the crews would be enlisted men.

Mr. MANN. In time of peace, do all of these colliers, so called, have naval officers?

Mr. PADGETT. No.

Mr. MANN. I know that most of those that carry coal do not. I do not know whether they call them colliers or contract ships.

Mr. PADGETT. The colliers do not. They have civilian crews and civilian officers, but when they are taken over into the Navy in time of war they have military control, and are taken into the Navy.

Mr. MANN. What increase in the number of rear admirals is authorized in this bill?

Mr. PADGETT. None, except as I stated a while ago. I stated a while ago that there was an authorization for an increase over what we have, up to the authorized increase under the act of August last.

Mr. MANN. I know; but that does not mean anything to me, unfortunately.

Mr. PADGETT. I stated it before, and I will repeat it. It might go up from the 22 or the 23 that we now have to 37 rear admirals, but it could not go above that number.

Mr. MANN. And in comparison, what increase in captains?

Mr. PADGETT. It could go from the number that we have now, something over 80, to four times 37, which would be 148. That is the temporary increase.

Mr. MANN. That is based on what enlisted force?

Mr. PADGETT. On 93,000, that I mentioned a moment ago, provided by the act of August 29 last.

Mr. MANN. Do you make any provision here for any additional vice admirals?

Mr. PADGETT. No, sir; none whatever.

Mr. MANN. Why not?

Mr. PADGETT. Because I did not think we needed them. The department have sent down a suggested bill, which has not yet been introduced and has not been considered by the committee, recommending a change in the law with reference to admirals and vice admirals. Under existing law the commander in chief of the Atlantic Fleet, of the Pacific Fleet, and of the Asiatic Fleet, while serving as such commander in chief, has the rank of admiral, and the second in command of those three fleets has the rank of vice admiral while so serving. The department has sent down a recommendation for a modification of the law, that as there is no service for the vice admirals on the Pacific and Asiatic stations in this emergency the geographical restrictions be removed, and that they be allowed to serve generally in the Navy without being restricted to the Pacific Fleet and the Asiatic Fleet.

Mr. MANN. That seems to be a very sensible suggestion. The department has sent half a dozen or a dozen letters recently, addressed to the Speaker, asking for changes in the law relating in the main to technical matters.

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Most of which, it would appear to me, ought to be enacted into legislation. I do not know whether the committee has looked at them yet or not.

Mr. PADGETT. I will say to the gentleman that these recommendations reached me yesterday from the Secretary of the Navy. I noticed that they were sent to the Speaker, and they were referred, and I got that notice this morning. I have not yet had the opportunity to consider them.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that I have read them all. I have had them in print and have read them. They were referred to the Speaker.

Mr. PADGETT. I read the one that came to me from the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. MANN. I have read them as they came through the Speaker to the House.

Mr. PADGETT. But the one sent through the Speaker did not reach me until this morning.

Mr. MANN. And I hope the rest of the members of the Committee on Naval Affairs will get them and read them. It is a very good practice, which is seldom observed, for members of a committee to get the documents which are referred to their committee and to read them. But they never do it unless somebody else calls their attention to them.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is a very good suggestion. Are these documents all printed as they come through the Speaker's hands? Are they made public documents?

Mr. MANN. House documents.

Mr. BRITTEN. And put in the document room in the ordinary way?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. How would a member of the House who was not a member of that committee know when a document came to the Speaker and was referred in the natural way, to the Committee on Naval Affairs, for instance, unless he followed the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as closely as the gentleman from Illinois does?

Mr. MANN. It is a very simple matter. A document is sent to the House, referred by the Speaker to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered printed. It is delivered to the clerk of the Naval Committee. It is the duty of the clerk to know; and when I was chairman of a committee the clerk of that committee notified every member and sent to every member of the committee a copy of that printed communication so referred to the committee. It does not require any astuteness to do that. It only requires less than ordinary intelligence.

Mr. REED. Are all the petitions which are handed in at the desk printed?

Mr. MANN. They are not printed. If they were, our printing bill would be longer than the Atlantic Ocean is wide.

I believe that we ought to have additional vice admirals. I believe that we ought to provide for the appointment of one or more admirals. We are in war. I never have been an enthusiastic advocate of a great Navy or a great Army, but we are in the war, and that is not all. They are endeavoring now to give the impression—I do not know whether it is correct or not—that the Germans have the English and French almost whipped to a frazzle. I doubt it, but they are trying to give that impression now, so as to excite us. It may be true. But we are in the war. We can not back out.

If we are going to provide a great fleet, we ought to provide commanding officers for that fleet who shall be of equal rank to the commanding officers of the fleets of other countries which our fleet will meet. The same is true of the Army. If we are going to send an army to France, we ought to send an army officered just as highly as the French or English Army is officered. I know we are in the House of Representatives. Everybody kicks us around for a football, or tries to, but after all we sometimes maintain our dignity a little bit, and we ought to maintain our position in the world in making our legislation. And while we are in war I am in favor of giving to the Navy all the men it can use, all the officers it can use, all the ships we can build. We send them out hoping they will do well. And we should give to the Army the proper officers, also. The sooner we get over the idea in this country and in this House that we are conducting a woman's sewing circle, or a pink-tea affair, the better it will be for us all. We are at war with the greatest war power that the world has ever seen. The English and French have proved no match for Germany. The Russians have run like sheep before dogs. We can not run. [Applause.] The English and French have not run; it is not in the English blood to run, but we are at war, and we have got to learn how to conduct a war. We can not stand on the idea that we do not want to create some high office because we do not want to make a place for some pet. We have got to get out of that notion. Pets will soon go to the rear in this war. It will take men with red blood and determination to lead our forces, I hope, to victory. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 15 minutes.

Mr. MANN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, the situation that confronts the country is not getting far into the hearts and consciences of the people. Even Congress does not appreciate the fact that we are in one of the greatest wars in all history.

I thought on the night of the 2d of April, one of the most memorable nights in the history of the Republic, that we were really entering the war with all the military pomp and circumstance and force that nations command. Why, the pomp and circumstance that surrounded the Capitol on that night was so impressive that those who encountered it will never forget it. The Members of Congress who were under hoof and confronted with the point of the sword will never forget it. I thought that we were entering war then under leaders that knew war.

But the 2d of April passed and the enthusiasm of the administration for war seemed to have passed with it. It is a month or more since then. What has been done? Under circumstances similar to these the Congress took over the responsibility of the Nation and conducted a foreign war to a successful issue. The War of 1812 dragged on. It was not conducted by the Executive, and the House of Representatives, under the leadership of its Speaker, Henry Clay, practically took over the conduct of the war, created a sentiment in the country, created a war spirit, aroused the people to a knowledge of the fact that they were at war. I am not so sure that this Congress will not have to do a similar thing. We must not wait until some calamity occurs. The responsibility of Congress is hidden in the Constitution, and we must assume it.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I will.

Mr. AYRES. Does the gentleman think that Congress is making a good record when it has not agreed upon a military bill the past week?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The Congress would have agreed upon the military bill long ago if it had not been that a higher source is insisting on keeping certain conditions out of the bill that ought to be in it. [Applause.] The conferees would have agreed long ago if the administration had consented that a volunteer division of an army of fighters were permitted to organize for early embarkment to the seat of war to fight in the trenches with our allies. But the administration does not want that particular division. It is time to speak. This is a representative government, and you and I have a responsibility that we can not shift if we would. We are responsible to the people quite as much as the Executive.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Many Members here are interested in the statement that we have a higher power. Has it come to our Government that the Congress is not coordinate with the executive department but is under it?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I used the expression as it is currently used. The Congress is made up of men who sometimes protest that they are not rubber stamps, but they are. They do nothing that the Executive does not want, and they always do exactly what the Executive does want while they in their own minds and souls protest against it. That is the Congress of the United States to-day.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will yield further, my question was not facetious.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And my answer was not facetious.

Mr. FESS. From the standpoint of political science it seems to me that we are drifting to that view that Congress is a subordinate body instead of a coordinate body, and I think it is really serious.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. One of the most serious things that could happen to this country—and it did not begin with this administration; it has been going on for some years—the Congress has lost its position as one of the coordinate branches of the Government largely because it has yielded from time to time to the persuasion of one of the coordinate branches of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, I have no politics from now on until this war is over, except that of an American interested in the welfare of his country and in the successful termination of the war. To do that, to accomplish that purpose, I want the best that is in this Government utilized—men, money, material, everything. We are not using the best men. We are not using the best men in the executive department of this Government to-day. Men not big enough in time of peace are still kept in places of great responsibility. The administration is refusing real warriors when they offer their services. Why? The administration must answer to the American people soon for its delinquencies; for the failure to utilize the very best that is in the Nation.

If we sit idly by waiting for the Executive to announce what he desires and then do it hurriedly, and go home, as is intimated, we will make ourselves contemptible in the eyes of the world and in our own eyes. Mr. Chairman, this Congress should not think of adjourning, should not think of terminating its work while this war progresses. Men here have taken an oath to support the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic, and are we, because the Executive has all the plans that he has worked out, ready to say, "We have done your bidding, and we will now go home?" We have work to do. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Naval Affairs should take the initiative. The members of those committees are experienced in the matters with which we are now concerned, and they should call upon a coordinate branch of the Government to execute what this Congress under their leadership has done. The laws of the United States are not executed. Members of Congress know that.

Mr. Chairman, what I want to impress upon the House is this, that we are not here to do the will of a coordinate branch of the Government and then go home. We must assume our share of this responsibility and carry it out. The Congress of the United States at the close of the War of 1812 was charged with being the dominant power in the Government, with having taken from the Executive the power that the Executive rightfully possessed. Oh, what a contrast between the Congress of that day and of this!

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That enlistments in the Navy and Marine Corps, during such time as the United States may be at war, shall be for four years or for such shorter period or periods as the President may prescribe or for the period of the war.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "years," insert the words "or for the period of the war."

Page 2, line 7, strike out the words "or for the period of the war."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the number of additional commissioned officers in the Navy and Marine Corps, based upon the temporary increases herein or hereafter authorized in the number of enlisted men shall be temporarily appointed not above the grades and ranks of ensign, lieutenant (junior grade), and lieutenant in the line and staff of the Navy and the grades and ranks of second lieutenant, first lieutenant, and captain of the Marine Corps and shall be based upon the authorized temporary increase to 150,000 enlisted men in the Navy and the authorized temporary increase to 30,000 enlisted men in the Marine Corps, respectively, the computation and distribution in said grades and ranks to be made in accordance with the provisions of the act of August 29, 1916, and the authorized number of officers in said grades and ranks may be appointed as soon as sufficient eligibles are available: Provided, That there shall be no permanent or temporary appointments in or permanent or temporary promotions to any grade or rank in the line or staff above that of lieutenant in the Navy or of captain in the Marine Corps by reason of the temporary increase of enlisted men in the Navy above the number of 87,000 and 17,400 enlisted men in the Marine Corps authorized by the act of August 29, 1916: Provided further, That the proviso last above shall not be held or construed to limit or abridge the use or service of the officers of the Naval Militia and National Naval Volunteers, Naval Reserve Force, and Marine Corps Reserve as provided and authorized under existing law: Provided further, That the President may use the officers of the Navy and Marine Corps on the retired list for service in their several grades and ranks as provided by existing law: Provided further, That temporary chaplains and acting chaplains in the Navy may be appointed for service during the period of the war in the proportion of the enlisted personnel of the Navy as now prescribed by existing law.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, instead of acting upon the committee amendments as printed in the bill, the committee has decided to submit a new amendment in the form of a substitute for section 4, and I send that up to the desk.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman desires to ask unanimous consent to vote on the committee substitute without perfecting the original section in the bill?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to consider the substitute for section 4, which I send to the Clerk's desk, instead of perfecting section 4 as printed in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pages 2, 3, and 4, strike out all of section 4 and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"SEC. 4. Additional commissioned officers in the Navy and Marine Corps, based upon the temporary increases herein authorized in the number of enlisted men, shall be temporarily appointed by the President, in his discretion, not above the grades and ranks of lieutenant in the line and staff of the Navy and major in the Marine Corps, the distribution in said grades and ranks to be made in accordance with the provisions of the act of August 29, 1916: Provided, That all temporary original appointments shall be made in the lowest commissioned grades of the line and staff of the Navy and Marine Corps, exclusive of commissioned warrant officers, and that there shall be no permanent or temporary appointments in or permanent or temporary promotions to any grade or rank above that of lieutenant in the Navy or major in the Marine Corps by reason of the temporary appointment of officers authorized by this act in excess of the total number of officers authorized by existing law or on account of the increase of enlisted men herein authorized: Provided further, That, during the period of the present war, any existing deficiency in the total number of commissioned officers of the Navy and Marine Corps authorized by the act of August 29, 1916, may be supplied by temporary appointments in the lowest grades and by temporary promotions to all other grades until a sufficient number of officers shall be available for regular appointment or promotion in accordance with existing law: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be held or construed to limit or abridge the use or service of the officers of the Navy and Marine Corps on the retired list or of the officers of the Naval Militia and National Naval Volunteers, Naval Reserve Force, and Marine Corps Reserve, as provided and authorized under existing law: Provided further, That temporary chaplains and temporary acting chaplains in the Navy may be appointed for service during the period of the war in the proportion of the personnel of the Navy as now prescribed by existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute.

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the additional temporary officers authorized in the various grades and ranks of the Navy and Marine Corps in accordance with the next preceding section may be temporarily appointed to serve in the grades or ranks to which appointed or promoted by the temporary advancement of officers holding permanent and probationary commissions, by temporary appointment of commissioned warrant officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Navy, and warrant officers, noncommissioned officers, and clerks to assistant paymasters of the Marine Corps, citizens of the United States who have had previous naval or military service or training, and other citizens of the United States: Provided, That in making appointments authorized herein the maximum age limit shall be 45 years for commissioned warrant officers, warrant officers, and enlisted men to ensign, enlisted men of the Navy to warrant rank, candidates for assistant surgeon, noncommissioned officers of the Marine Corps to commissioned rank, members of the Marine Corps branch of the Naval Militia and National Naval Volunteers, Marine Corps Reserve, and civilians to commissioned rank, and warrant officers of the active list of the Marine Corps appointed to commissioned rank: Provided further, That graduates of the Naval Academy and warrant officers duly commissioned in the Navy or Marine Corps in accordance with existing law shall not, by virtue of this section, be required to receive temporary appointments; and the class of midshipmen graduated from the Naval Academy on March 29, 1917, and the classes to be graduated hereafter under the provisions of the act of March 4, 1917, may be commissioned effective from date of graduation: Provided further, That temporary appointments as warrant officers of the Navy may be made by the Secretary of the Navy: Provided further, That lieutenants (junior grade) and ensigns shall have had not less than two years' service in grade before being eligible for temporary promotion to the grades of lieutenant and lieutenant (junior grade), respectively.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I have some other committee amendments which I wish to offer——

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman want to agree to the committee amendments first?

Mr. PADGETT. That is all right; the Clerk can go ahead with the reading of the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendments: Page 4, line 17, insert the words, at the beginning of the line, "specially qualified."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 18, strike out the word "forty-five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 25, after the word "civilians," insert the words "specially qualified."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 2, after the word "rank," insert the words "and temporary chaplains and temporary acting chaplains."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 7, strike out the word "section" and insert the word "act."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 11, strike out the words "under the provisions of the act of March 4, 1917."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. I now offer a further committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 14, before the word "citizens," insert the words "commission and warrant officers of the United States Coast Guard."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

Mr. BRITTEN. Before the gentleman does that I would like to ask if a comma comes after the word "Guard" in the amendment just read?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; there is a comma in there.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk reports a period.

Mr. PADGETT. It should be a comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, strike out the proviso in lines 15 to 19, inclusive, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"Provided further, That lieutenants (junior grade) and ensigns may be considered eligible for temporary promotions to the grades of lieutenant and lieutenant (junior grade), respectively, without regard to length of service in grade."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That during the period of the present war the computations to be made by the Secretary of the Navy as prescribed by the act of August 29, 1916, shall be made semiannually as of July 1 and January 1 of each year, and at such other times as he may deem necessary; and the Board of Rear Admirals, for selection for promotion prescribed in said act, may be convened at such times as the exigencies of the service may require; and if 9 rear admirals can not be convened without injury to the service, 6 rear admirals may constitute the board, and 4 of the members must concur in the recommendations instead of 6, as prescribed in said act.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 6, line 3, after the word "require," strike out the semicolon and all the remainder of the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the permanent and probationary commissions, appointments, and warrants of officers shall not be vacated by reason of their temporary advancement or appointment, nor shall said officers be prejudiced in their relative lineal rank in regard to promotion in accordance with the act of August 29, 1916: Provided, That the rights, benefits, privileges, and gratuities of all enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps now authorized by law shall not be lost or abridged in any respect whatever by their acceptance of temporary commissions or warrants hereunder: Provided further, That no person who shall receive a temporary appointment shall be entitled to pay or allowances except under such temporary appointment: And provided further, That upon the termination of temporary appointments in a higher grade or rank as authorized by this act the officers so advanced, including probationary second lieutenants, warrant officers, and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps, shall revert to the grade, rank, or rating from which temporarily advanced, unless such officers or enlisted men in the meantime, in accordance with law, become entitled to promotion to a higher grade or rank in the permanent Navy or Marine Corps, in which case they shall revert to said higher grade or rank and shall, after passing the prescribed examinations, be commissioned accordingly.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 23, after the words "warrant officers," insert the words "clerks to assistant paymasters."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment upon my own motion because it occurred to me afterwards; this is to perfect the language in there in reference to the Coast Guard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 24, after the words "Marine Corps," insert the words "commissioned and warrant officers of the United States Coast Guard."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question. In line 14, on page 6, in the first proviso, it says:

That the rights, benefits, privileges, and gratuities of all enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps now authorized by law shall not be lost or abridged in any respect.

That would indicate some might be.

Mr. PADGETT. It is put in there as a protection. It is usual in cases of this kind, where you are changing legislation, to preserve by specific language their rights, and therefore we put the word "all" in there. There are various classes—for instance, petty officers of different ratings—who are enlisted men, and this is to take in all the enlisted men whatever their ranks and ratings.

Mr. FESS. It is not an error, but it is put in there on purpose?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes; it is put in there on purpose.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That all temporary appointments or advancements authorized by this act shall continue in force only until otherwise directed by the President or until Congress shall amend or repeal the authorization for the increases herein provided.

The following committee amendment was read:

After the word "provided," in line 11, on page 7, insert the words "and not later than six months after the termination of war."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That any officer of the permanent Navy or Marine Corps temporarily advanced in grade or rank in accordance with the provisions of this act who shall be retired from active service under the permanent commission while holding such temporary rank shall be placed on the retired list with the grade or rank to which his position in the permanent Navy or Marine Corps at the date of his retirement would entitle him, and any person originally appointed temporarily, as provided in this act, shall not be entitled to any rights of retirement, except for physical disability incurred in line of duty.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 7, line 17, after the word "rank." insert the following: "except for physical disability in line of duty."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That should any second lieutenant of the Marine Corps holding a probationary appointment for the period of two years become eligible for promotion to a higher grade and qualify therefor before the expiration of two years from the date of original appointment, he shall receive a probationary appointment in such higher grade, which appointment shall be made permanent or shall be vacated in the manner prescribed by the act of August 29, 1916.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 7, line 24, after the word "That," insert the words "during the continuance of the present war."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That the temporary appointments and promotions herein authorized to be made by the President shall be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 8, line 14, strike out the word "to" and insert the word "shall."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Also, the following committee amendment was read:

Page 8, line 15, after the word "President," strike out the following: "shall be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee expect this amendment to stay in the bill?

Mr. PADGETT. I hope so, sir. My recollection is that in the Army bill it provided, as it passed, that these temporary appointments should be made by the President without submitting them to the Senate.

Mr. MANN. I think it is quite appropriate. Years ago I put a bill through this House providing for the appointment of various officials by the President without confirmation by the Senate, and stuck to it and got it into the law. Roosevelt was President. He could not believe it. So he nominated a candidate and sent it to the Senate and asked for confirmation, when the law provided that he should make the appointment without the advice and consent of the Senate. It was unusual then, and, in the main, it is unusual now. It is utterly ridiculous to require the names of lieutenants and captains, either in the Army or the Navy, to be sent to the Senate for confirmation, where those appointments are confirmed as a matter of routine.

Mr. PADGETT. I think especially so when it is temporary. For that reason we have recommended this change.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

Also, the following committee amendment was read:

After line 16, insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 13. Nothing contained in this act shall operate to reduce the rank, pay, or allowance that would have been received by any person in the Navy or Marine Corps except for the passage of this act."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to offer an amendment to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment, offered by Mr. PADGETT: After the word "Navy" insert a comma, strike out the word "or," and after the words "Marine Corps" insert the words "or Coast Guard."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, just for the purpose of saying a word in regard to the Coast Guard. The total complement of the Coast Guard is 3,945 men, and of this number 2,107 are employed at coast stations in the service formerly known as the Life-Saving Service. They all perform most important duties—saving life and property, destroying derelicts, protecting the customs, enforcing quarantine and navigation regulations, suppressing mutinies, patroling the fishing grounds, and so forth. These men at the stations patrol the coast from Maine to Florida in all kinds of weather. All night long these hardy Americans march along the beaches, breasting the ice and sleet, ever on the lookout to seaward for wrecks and stranded seamen in need of assistance.

They are expert in their profession, inured to hardships, well disciplined, and always ready to sacrifice their lives, if need be, for the distressed mariner. No better men are in the service of any nation to-day than the officers and men of the Coast Guard. They have now been called into the Navy under the law and are entitled to every consideration at the hands of the Government they serve so faithfully.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That the provisions of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," approved August 29, 1916, which read as follows: "Provided further, That the increase in the number of captains herein authorized shall be made at the rate of not more than 10 captains in any one year" and "That officers of the Marine Corps with the rank of colonel who shall have served faithfully for 45 years on the active list shall, when retired, have the rank of brigadier general; and such officers who shall hereafter be retired at the age of 64 years before having served for 45 years, but who shall have served faithfully on the active list until retired, shall, on the completion of 40 years from their entry in the naval service, have the rank of brigadier general," are hereby repealed.

The following committee amendment was read:

Committee amendment to section 14: Page 8, line 21, strike out the figures "13" and insert "14."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. PADGETT: Page 9, after line 12, add a separate paragraph, as follows:

"SEC. 15. That on and after May 1, 1917, the pay of all enlisted men of the Navy during the continuance of the war be, and it is hereby, increased $15 a month over and above the rates of pay proper as fixed by law for times of peace."

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order on that amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, that is just the same as was incorporated in the Army bill. The Army bill, as it passed the House, and also as it passed the Senate, provided for that increase. The House provision was $15 a month for enlisted men in the Army, and this is identical, except that it will provide for the Navy instead of the Army.

Mr. MANN. Well, it may be all right; but there is a very great difference in the pay now between the Army and the Navy, and it is all in favor of the Navy.

Mr. PADGETT. There is very little difference. The base pay of the Army is $15 and the base pay of the Navy is $17.60.

Mr. MANN. I know; but the base pay has not much to do with it.

Mr. PADGETT. It is a difference of $2.60, as I understand.

Mr. MANN. There are a great many commissioned officers in the Navy.

Mr. PADGETT. This does not apply to commissioned officers. This applies only to enlisted men.

Mr. MANN. I mean noncommissioned officers in the Navy—and they are mighty well paid. When a man goes into a service of that sort and gets from $75 to $125 a month and his keep, and no chance to spend money, he is not badly paid. I do not think it is necessary. It is just an extravagance. It is necessary in the case of the Army, but——

Mr. PADGETT. It is putting the Navy on the same basis as the Army. The enlisted men in the Army were granted an increase of $15, and this gives the same increase to the same class of men in the Navy; and the gentleman will bear in mind the fact that there has heretofore been a good deal of criticism in the House to the effect that we were not paying them the same.

Mr. MANN. It does not put them on the same basis. The Navy now is paid higher than the Army. But I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. PADGETT. I wish, Mr. Chairman, to offer an amendment to the amendment on account of the provision with reference to the Coast Guard. This is put in there on account of the amendment that was adopted.

Mr. MANN. Are you going to increase the Coast Guard, too?

Mr. PADGETT. They shall have the same pay as the enlisted men of the Navy. Simply while they are serving on the ships they will have the same pay as the Navy.

Mr. MANN. They now get higher pay without this increase. But the Coast Guard men have to work.

Mr. PADGETT. This would not reduce them in time of war.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. TILSON. I do so for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] if the provision of his amendment is simply to add $15 to the pay of all enlisted men? It is not to increase the base pay?

Mr. PADGETT. It does not increase the base pay at all. It simply adds $15 to the pay that the men are receiving.

Mr. TILSON. So that the petty officer's pay will not be doubled up two or three times, but he will simply have $15 added to his monthly pay?

Mr. PADGETT. That is all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. PADGETT: On page 9 add to the new section the following:

"Provided, That during the continuance of the war warrant officers, petty officers, and enlisted men of the United States Coast Guard shall receive the same rates of pay as are or may be hereafter prescribed for the corresponding grades or ratings and length of service in the Navy."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I now move that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House with the recommendation that the several amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHALLENBERGER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3330) to temporarily increase the commissioned and warrant and enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. PADGETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

NAVAL AUXILIARY RESERVE.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the House Calendar the bill (H. R. 2337) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," relative to enrollments in the Naval Reserve Force.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," approved August 29, 1916, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding after the proviso under the heading "Naval Reserve Force," which reads as follows: "Provided, That citizens of the insular possessions of the United States may enroll in the Naval Auxiliary Reserve," a further proviso as follows: Provided further, That such persons who are not citizens of the United States, but who have or shall have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, and who are citizens of countries which are at peace with the United States, may enroll in the Naval Reserve Force, subject to the condition that they may be discharged from such enrollment at any time within the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, and such persons who may, under existing law, become citizens of the United States, and who render honorable service in the Naval Reserve Force in time of war for a period of not less than one year may become citizens of the United States without proof of residence on shore and without further requirement than proof of good moral character and certificate from the Secretary of the Navy that such honorable service was actually rendered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for one hour.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to address the House. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. PADGETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

STEAM YACHT "OWERA."

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1845) to authorize PETER GOELET GERRY to enter into a contract with the Secretary of the Navy, in behalf of the United States, for the use of the steam yacht Owera.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a Senate bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Let us have the bill reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That PETER GOELET GERRY, a Senator of the United States from the State of Rhode Island, having offered to the Government for the period of the war the use of his yacht hereinafter named, be, and he is hereby, authorized to enter into a contract or agreement with the Secretary of the Navy, in behalf of the United States, for the use by the United States of the steam yacht Owera, owned by the said Senator, for such period as may be mutually agreeable to the parties to the contract or agreement herein authorized.

SEC. 2. That the provisions of sections 114 and 115 of the act approved March 4, 1909, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," and any other laws or parts of laws inconsistent herewith, be, and they are hereby, declared inapplicable to the said PETER GOELET GERRY and the Secretary of the Navy, or such other officer or officers of the United States as shall, on behalf of the Secretary of the Navy, enter into the aforesaid contract or agreement for the purposes and to the extent set forth in section 1 hereof.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, yesterday when I called up this bill and asked unanimous consent for its consideration, I stated what I then believed to be the fact, that Senator GERRY would turn this yacht over to the Government absolutely, without expectation of compensation if it was destroyed in action. Since then I have seen Senator GERRY, and have obtained from him information upon that matter, and I think it proper to state to the House that I was in error in that respect. He turns over to the United States the use of the yacht without compensation, but he will make with the department the same contract that all others make, that if it is destroyed he is to receive reasonable compensation. That is the same provision that is made with all others; but he charges nothing for the use of it and the service that it may render to the Government.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. PADGETT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, if there is nothing further, Mr. Speaker, I will move that the House adjourn.

Mr. MANN. It does not make any difference whether there is anything further or not. The gentleman said he would move to adjourn.

Mr. PADGETT. I make that motion.

PERE MARQUETTE RAILROAD CO.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman withhold that for a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. PADGETT. If the gentleman will consult with the gentleman over there, Mr. MANN. I told him I would move to adjourn.

Mr. CRAMTON. I ask unanimous consent for the printing as a House document of 4,000 copies of the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission on their investigation of the financial history and operation of the Pere Marquette Railroad Co. and the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Railroad Co., the same to be distributed through the folding room.

Mr. MANN. That resolution ought to come from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CRAMTON. I introduced a resolution (H. Res. 70) to that effect several days ago, and I have had the matter up fully with the chairman of the Committee on Printing, Mr. BARNHART, who has not been able to get a meeting of his committee, owing to the fact that at least one, and perhaps more, of them are out of the city. It is quite urgent that I get action on the matter, for the reason that it is of particular interest now. I am getting many requests for this document, which I am unable to meet. Furthermore, I have had the type from the original print held up in the Government Printing Office.

Mr. MANN. They will hold it up until the Committee on Printing can take action on this matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
Mr. MANN. I will have to object.

ADJOURNMENT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] moves that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 9, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, reports on preliminary examination and survey of Connecticut River from Hartford, Conn., to Long Island Sound (H. SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, May 9, 1917.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, in the midst of all the storm and stress of life Thou art still God, the God of our minds and of our hearts and of our lives. Thou art drawing us to Thyself through the storm of life; Thou art teaching us our needs of Thy care. We lift our hearts to Thee to-day as we face the ever-increasing responsibilities of this high office. We pray that Thou wilt give to us the wisdom which will justify our authority; that Thou wilt give to us the grace which will sanctify the power that is lodged in the hands of Thy servants in the Senate; and that we may lift our hearts to Thee with such fervent, earnest prayer and faith as that it may please Thee to guide us in the discharge of the duties of this day. For Christ's sake. Amen.

FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS, a Senator from the State of Nevada, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Wednesday, May 2, 1917, when, on request of Mr. GALLINGER and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Navy submitting additional estimates of appropriations in connection with the urgent deficiency bill required by the Naval Establishment amounting to $4,366,860 (S. Doc. No. 25), which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Interior submitting a clause of appropriation to provide during the fiscal year 1918 for increased compensation as authorized by section 7 of the legislative appropriation act for the fiscal year 1918, the provisions of which shall apply to employees for the care of the new Interior Department Office Building, etc. (S. Doc. No. 24), which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1845) to authorize PETER GOELET GERRY to enter into a contract with the Secretary of the Navy, in behalf of the United States, for the use of the steam yacht Owera.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 2337. An act to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," relative to enrollments in the Naval Reserve Force; and

H. R. 3330. An act to temporarily increase the commissioned and warrant and enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions of the Chicago Theosophical Association, which will be inserted in the RECORD.

The resolutions are as follows:

Resolutions Chicago Theosophical Association.

The Chicago Theosophical Association, on April 28, 1917, unanimously adopted the following resolutions:

"Whereas our country has cast the die for war, and, right or wrong, the motives actuating the masses of our people are for humanity's redemption; and

"Whereas we firmly believe that the world is gradually evolving individually and nationally from greed, avarice, intrigue, and selfishness into a realization of the fundamentals of brotherhood; and

"Whereas our country has been comparatively heedless of the stupendous sacrifices which have been made during this titanic strugg'e, and must now itself display this heroic quality; and

"Whereas it is our belief that the whole effort on America's part should be in this complete spirit of sacrifice; and

"Whereas we feel that the American people desire to accept the inevitable in that spirit, and will not consider their personal rights invaded if the country is immediately put upon a war basis, its resources husbanded and luxuries curtailed: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That we urge our President and Congress to at once consider—

"(a) Establishing maximum prices on staple food products.
"(b) Making speculation in food a felony.
"(c) Placing a ban upon liquor.
"(d) Appropriating the bulk of profit.
"(e) Placing the financial burden upon us in proportion to our ability to carry same.
"(f) Handling of all financial matters by the Government direct.
"(g) Making every effort to curtail discrediting our foreign born, whose position is most pathetic."

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Sheffield, Pa., and a petition from the congregation of the First Baptist Church of Micanopy, Fla., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a number of telegrams from automobile dealers in my State. I present only one of them and ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARGO, N. DAK., May 7, 1917.

Senator A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.:

If the Government considers it necessary to raise revenue from automobiles for war purposes, the undersigned automobile dealers and distributors of Fargo favor a tax or license applied to all the three and one-half million automobile owners of the country. If desire is to tax prosperous corporations, we favor a tax on the net profits of all corporations and all merchants in the entire country, but we emphatically protest against the proposed tax of 5 per cent to be levied on all new automobiles at factory as not only discriminating and unjust but because it will prove disappointing and inefficient.

Calkins & Orr, representing Velie, Hudson, and Saxon; Oakland Motor Sales Co., representing Oakland and Oldsmobile; Horton Motor Co., representing Cadillac and Paige; Wheelock Auto Co., representing White, Franklin, and Mitchell; Northern Auto Co., representing Buick and Packard; More Bros., representing Pullman; Murphy & Palmer, representing Maxwell and Chalmers; George Schaas, representing Jeffrey; M. A. Enders, representing Studebaker and Chevrolet; J. C. Vincent, representing Dodge.

Mr. GRONNA. I also have two or three letters and telegrams here bearing upon important questions, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters and telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GRAND FORKS, N. DAK., May 7, 1917.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The report from Washington is that there is to be an additional 5 per cent added to the selling price of automobiles. If this action is taken by Congress it will be an injustice to the automobile owners, as automobiles are of a necessity to-day, and the automobile owners in this district are not favorable to such a tax, as it would be discriminating. We hope that you will not support any measure favorable to unequal taxation.

The Hon. A. J. GRONNA,

DEAR MR. SENATOR: In accordance with the unanimous vote of the ministers and delegates of the Mouse River Association of Congregational Churches, I am directed to send you the following resolution:

"That this association record itself in favor of the immediate passage by our Government of a bill prohibiting the manufacture, sale, and importation of intoxicating liquors as a war emergency measure for the purpose of conserving food supply, factory and farm production, and military efficiency in the Nation."

On behalf of the Mouse River Association.

W. KNIGHTON BLOOM, Registrar.

THE AD-CLUB OF GREATER GRAND FORKS,
Grand Forks, N. Dak., May 3, 1917.

Senator A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: At a meeting of the executive committee of the Grand Forks Ad-Club, held May 2, 1917, the following resolution was adopted:

"Whereas it has come to the attention of the Grand Forks Ad-Club that Senator HITCHCOCK has proposed a free advertising campaign to mobilize men and money; and

"Whereas the Grand Forks Ad-Club firmly believes that the most economical and efficient way of mobilizing men and money is not by inaugurating a free advertising campaign, but by inaugurating a campaign of publicity to be paid for the same as grain or munitions are paid for; and

"Whereas we believe that the publishers of the United States can be relied upon to give the Government hearty cooperation as fully as they should be expected to do; and

"Whereas paid advertising has proved very successful as used by Great Britain and Canada during the world struggle: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That it is our firm conviction that advertising space for the purpose of mobilizing men and money should be placed upon a paid basis by the United States Government, and an appropriation made therefor, in the usual manner."

Yours, very truly,

J. A. POPPLER, President.

A petition to Congress.

The Mennonites of this country are either immigrants or the descendants of immigrants from various countries in Europe which they left to avoid compulsory military service. Assurance was given them by high officials of the United States, including President Grant in 1873, that they need fear no compulsory conscription here.

In view of this, our attitude regarding military service, we petition the Congress of the United States to exempt us and other noncombatant Christians from all compulsory military training and service in the event of the enactment of such a law.

Our people are mostly engaged in agriculture and are in every way loyal citizens. They pray for this exemption because they try to follow the doctrine of our Lord Jesus Christ, stated in Matthew 5:44—"Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you."

Our hope that this petition will be granted is based on the fact that in a democracy the conscience of the individual is duly considered, and the further fact that in Canada our brethren have been assured by the Government that the exemption for which we pray is granted them.

APRIL 30, 1917.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan presented a telegram, in the nature of a petition from the Michigan Farmer, of Detroit, Mich., praying that, if a 3-cent second-class-postage rate be established, that it shall not take effect for one year, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented petitions of the Woman's Christion Temperance Union of Hondo, the McKinney District Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South of Frisco, and of sundry citizens of Colony, all in the State of Texas, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARDWICK presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from the Varn Johnson Motor Co., of Savannah; H. D. Chapman and sundry other citizens of Sparta; from Lyon & Kelly, of Augusta; from Kingmun Moore and others, of Macon; from J. C. Bush, of Fitzgerald; from George W. and Thomas W. Gilmore and George Gilmore, of Warthen; from the Atlanta Automobile Association; from the Arrington Oakland Co., of Augusta; from Audley Hill, of Augusta; from J. W. Westmoreland, of Augusta; from the Augusta Automobile Association, of Augusta; from A. W. Smith, of Macon; from the People's Bank and the Overland Co., of Athens; and from J. W. Johnson and sundry other citizens, of Carrollton, all in the State of Georgia, remonstrating against the proposed 5 per cent tax on automobiles, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented petitions of Local Union No. 1414, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, of Bergenfield; of Local Union No. 32, Brotherhood of Masons and Plasterers, of Cliffside; of Local Union 1443, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, of Englewood; of Local Union 578, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, of Englewood; and of sundry citizens of East Rutherford, all in the State of New Jersey, praying for the improvement of the Hackensack River, N. J., which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Hackensack, N. J., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of the New Jersey State Board of Education and of the Board of Trade of Newark, N. J., praying for compulsory military service, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER presented petitions of the congregation of the First Congregational Church of Lyme; of 29 students of Dow Academy, Franconia; and of sundry citizens of Franklin and Northwood, all in the State of New Hampshire, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of Couture Bros., of Manchester, and of the E. J. Caron Amusement Co., of Manchester, in the State of New Hampshire, remonstrating against a tax on theaters, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of H. C. Lintott, of Nashua, and of sundry citizens of Woodsville, in the State of New Hampshire, remonstrating against the proposed 5 per cent tax on automobiles, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McLEAN presented petitions of the Manufacturers' Association of Bridgeport; of members of the Sunday school of the Westville Methodist Episcopal Church, of New Haven; and of the Citizens' No-License League, of Milford, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the Automobile Dealers' Association of Stamford, Conn., remonstrating against the proposed 5 per cent tax on automobiles, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of Cigar Makers' Local Union No. 42, of Hartford, Conn., remonstrating against an increase of the tax on cigars, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I present a letter from the Schwarze Electric Co., of Adrian, Mich., relative to the proposed tax on automobiles, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADRIAN, MICH., May 7, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CHARLIE: At a meeting of the board of directors of the Schwarze Electric Co. a resolution opposing the proposed automobile tax was unanimously passed. This proposed tax would certainly be a death blow to Michigan, as so much of this tax would have to be paid by our State. We are directly interested, because our business depends entirely upon the automobile trade.

We sincerely trust you will use your every effort to prevent so unjust legislation.

Yours, truly,

SCHWARZE ELECTRIC CO.,
By J. N. SAMPSON, President.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from the Common Council of Bay City, Mich., remonstrating against the proposed 5 per cent tax on automobiles, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Santa Ana, Cal., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the Property Owners' Protective Association of Oakland, Cal., remonstrating against national prohibition as a war measure, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were each read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

H. R. 2337. An act to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," relative to enrollments in the Naval Reserve force; and

H. R. 3330. An act to temporarily increase the commissioned and warrant and enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps, and for other purposse.

AMENDMENT OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. OWEN. From the Committee on Banking and Currency, I report back the bill (H. R. 3673) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the acts of August 4, 1914, August 15, 1914, March 3, 1915, and September 7, 1916, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to substitute therefor the bill (S. 1796) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the acts of August 4, 1914, August 15, 1914, March 3, 1915, and September 7, 1916. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate may proceed to the consideration of House bill 3673.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not wish to impede the progress of this bill, but I simply wish to give notice that at the conclusion of the morning hour this morning I shall very briefly address the Senate on Chapter II of the pending unfinished business, S. 2, the espionage bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill 3673.

Mr. GRONNA. Personally I have no objections to taking up the bill, but it is a very important measure and there are several members of the Committee on Banking and Currency who talked to me and said they would like to be present when the bill is taken up. I think we ought to have a quorum, but I do not ask for it now.

Mr. OWEN. We might call a quorum immediately after the bill is taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3673) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the acts of August 4, 1914, August 15, 1914, March 3, 1915, and September 7, 1916.

The amendment of the Committee on Banking and Currency was to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That section 4 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, be amended by striking out the sentence reading as follows: "One of the directors of class C, who shall be a person of tested banking experience, shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board as deputy chairman and deputy Federal reserve agent, to exercise the powers of the chairman of the board and Federal reserve agent in case of absence or disability of his principal," and by adding in place thereof the following:

"Subject to the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal reserve agent shall appoint one or more assistants. Such assistants, who shall be persons of tested banking experience, shall assist the Federal reserve agent in the performance of his duties and shall also have power to act in his name and stead during his absence or disability. The Federal reserve agent may require such bonds of his assistants as he may deem necessary for his own protection. Assistants to the Federal reserve agent shall receive an annual compensation to be fixed and paid in the same manner as that of the Federal reserve agent. One of the directors of class C shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board as vice chairman to exercise the powers of the chairman of the board in case of the absence or disability of the Federal reserve agent; in case of the absence of the chairman and vice chairman, the third class C director shall preside at meetings of the board."

SEC. 2. That section 9 of the Federal reserve act be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 9. Any bank incorporated by special law of any State, or organized under the general laws of any State or of the United States, desiring to become a member of the Federal Reserve System may make application to the Federal Reserve Board for the right to subscribe to the stock of the Federal reserve bank organized within the district in which the applying bank is located. Such application shall be for the same amount of stock that the applying bank would be required to subscribe to as a national bank. The Federal Reserve Board, in accordance with such rules and regulations and subject to such conditions as it may prescribe, may permit the applying bank to become a stockholder of such Federal reserve bank.

"In acting upon such applications the Federal Reserve Board shall consider the financial condition of the applying bank, the general character of its management, and whether or not the corporate powers exercised are consistent with the purposes of this act.

"Whenever the Federal Reserve Board shall permit the applying bank to become a stockholder in the Federal reserve bank of the district its stock subscription shall be payable on call of the Federal Reserve Board, and stock issued to it shall be held subject to the provisions of this act.

"All banks admitted to membership under authority of this section shall be required to comply with the reserve and capital requirements of this act and to conform to those provisions of law imposed on national banks which prohibit such banks from lending on or purchasing their own stock, which relate to the withdrawal or impairment of their capital stock, and which relate to the payment of unearned dividends. Such banks and the officers, agents, and employees thereof shall also be subject to the provisions of and to the penalties prescribed by section 5209 of the Revised Statutes, and shall be required to make reports of condition and of the payment of dividends to the Federal reserve bank of which they become a member. Not less than three of such reports shall be made annually on call of the Federal reserve bank on dates to be fixed by the Federal Reserve Board. Failure to make such reports within 10 days after the date they are called for shall subject the offending bank to a penalty of $100 a day for each day that it fails to transmit such report, such penalty to be collected by the Federal reserve bank by suit or otherwise.

"As a condition of membership such banks shall likewise be subject to examinations made by direction of the Federal Reserve Board or of the Federal reserve bank by examiners selected or approved by the Federal Reserve Board.

"Whenever the directors of the Federal reserve bank shall approve the examinations made by the State authorities, such examinations and the reports thereof may be accepted in lieu of examinations made by examiners selected or approved by the Federal Reserve Board: Provided, however, That when it deems it necessary the board may order special examinations by examiners of its own selection and shall in all cases approve the form of the report. The expenses of all examinations, other than those made by State authorities, shall be assessed against and paid by the banks examined in the same manner and at the same rate that national banks are assessed for such expenses.

"If at any time it shall appear to the Federal Reserve Board that a member bank has failed to comply with the provisions of this section or the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board made pursuant thereto, it shall be within the power of the board after hearing to require such bank to surrender its stock in the Federal reserve bank and to forfeit all rights and privileges of membership. The Federal Reserve Board may restore membership upon due proof of compliance with the conditions imposed by this section.

"Any State bank or trust company desiring to withdraw from membership in a Federal reserve bank may do so, after six months' written notice shall have been filed with the Federal Reserve Board, upon the surrender and cancellation of all of its holdings of capital stock in the Federal reserve bank: Provided, however, That no Federal reserve bank shall, except under express authority of the Federal Reserve Board, cancel within the same calendar year more than 10 per cent of its capital stock for the purpose of effecting voluntary withdrawals during that year. All such applications shall be dealt with in the order in which they are filed with the board. Whenever a member bank shall surrender its stock holdings in a Federal reserve bank, or shall be ordered to do so by the Federal Reserve Board, under authority of law, all of its rights and privileges as a member bank shall thereupon cease and determine, and after due provision has been made for any indebtedness due or to become due to the Federal reserve bank it shall be entitled to a refund of its cash paid subscription with interest at the rate of one-half of 1 per cent per month from date of last dividend, if earned, the amount refunded in no event to exceed the book value of the stock at that time, and shall likewise be entitled to repayment of deposits and of any other balance due from the Federal reserve bank.

"No applying bank shall be admitted to membership in a Federal reserve bank unless it possesses a paid-up unimpaired capital sufficient to entitle it to become a national banking association in the place where it is situated under the provisions of the national bank act.

"Banks becoming members of the Federal Reserve System under authority of this section shall be subject to the provisions of this section and to those of this act which relate specifically to member banks, but shall not be subject to examination under the provisions of the first two paragraphs of section 5240 of the Revised Statutes as amended by section 21 of this act. Subject to the provisions of this act and to the regulations of the board made pursuant thereto, any bank becoming a member of the Federal Reserve System shall retain its full charter and statutory rights as a State bank or trust company, and may continue to exercise all corporate powers granted it by the State in which it was created, and shall be entitled to all privileges of member banks: Provided, however, That no Federal reserve bank shall be permitted to discount for any State bank or trust company notes, drafts, or bills of exchange of any one borrower who is liable for borrowed money to such State bank or trust company in an amount greater than 10 per cent of the capital and surplus of such State bank or trust company, but the discount of bills of exchange drawn against actually existing value shall not be considered as borrowed money within the meaning of this section. The Federal reserve bank, as a condition of the discount of notes, drafts, and bills of exchange for such State bank or trust company, shall require a certificate or guarantee to the effect that the borrower is not liable to such bank in excess of the amount provided by this section, and will not be permitted to become liable in excess of this amount while such notes, drafts, or bills of exchange are under discount with the Federal reserve bank.

"It shall be unlawful for any officer, clerk, or agent of any bank admitted to membership under authority of this section to certify any check drawn upon such bank unless the person or company drawing the check has on deposit therewith at the time such check is certified an amount of money equal to the amount specified in such check. Any check so certified by duly authorized officers shall be a good and valid obligation against such bank, but the act of any such officer, clerk, or agent in violation of this section may subject such bank to a forfeiture of its membership in the Federal Reserve System upon hearing by the Federal Reserve Board."

SEC. 3. That the first paragraph of section 13 be amended so as to read as follows:

"Any Federal reserve bank may receive from any of its member banks, and from the United States, deposits of current funds in lawful money, national-bank notes, Federal reserve notes, or checks, and drafts, payable upon presentation, and also, for collection, maturing notes and bills; or, solely for purposes of exchange or of collection, may receive from other Federal reserve banks deposits of current funds in lawful money, national-bank notes, or checks upon other Federal reserve banks, and checks and drafts, payable upon presentation within its district. and maturing notes and bills payable within its district; or, solely for the purposes of exchange or of collection, may receive from any non-member bank or trust company deposits of current funds in lawful money, national-bank notes, Federal reserve notes, checks and drafts payable upon presentation, or maturing notes and bills: Provided, Such nonmember bank or trust company maintains with the Federal reserve bank of its district a balance sufficient to offset the items in transit held for its account by the Federal reserve bank."

SEC. 4. That the fifth paragraph of section 13 be, and is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"Any member bank may accept drafts or bills of exchange drawn upon it having not more than six months sight to run, exclusive of days of grace, which grow out of transactions involving the importation or exportation of goods; or which grow out of transactions involving the domestic shipment of goods provided shipping documents conveying or securing title are attached at the time of acceptance; or which are secured at the time of acceptance by a warehouse receipt or other such document conveying or securing title covering readily marketable staples. No member bank shall accept, whether in a foreign or domestic transaction, for any one person, company, firm, or corporation to an amount equal at any time in the aggregate to more than 10 per cent of its paid-up and unimpaired capital stock and surplus, unless the bank is secured either by attached documents or by some other actual security growing out of the same transaction as the acceptance; and no bank shall accept such bills to an amount equal at any time in the aggregate to more than one-half of its paid-up and unimpaired capital stock and surplus: Provided, however, That the Federal Reserve Board, under such general regulations as it may prescribe, which shall apply to all banks alike regardless of the amount of capital stock and surplus, may authorize any member bank to accept such bills to an amount not exceeding at any time in the aggregate 100 per cent of its paid-up and unimpaired capital stock and surplus: Provided further, That in no event shall a bank accept for any one person, company, firm, or corporation to an amount equal at any time in the aggregate to more than 20 per cent of its paid-up and unimpaired capital stock and surplus."

SEC. 5. That section 16, paragraphs 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, be further amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"Any Federal reserve bank may make application to the local Federal reserve agent for such amount of the Federal reserve notes hereinbefore provided for as it may require. Such application shall be accompanied with a tender to the local Federal reserve agent of collateral in amount equal to the sum of the Federal reserve notes thus applied for and issued pursuant to such application. The collateral security thus offered shall be notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or acceptances rediscounted under the provisions of section 13 of this act, or bills of exchange indorsed by a member bank of any Federal reserve district and purchased under the provisions of section 14 of this act, or bankers' acceptances purchased under the provisions of said section 14, or gold or gold certificates; but in no event shall such collateral security, whether gold, gold certificates, or eligible paper, be less than the amount of Federal reserve notes applied for. The Federal reserve agent shall each day notify the Federal Reserve Board of all issues and withdrawals of Federal reserve notes to and by the Federal reserve bank to which he is accredited. The said Federal Reserve Board may at any time call upon a Federal reserve bank for additional security to protect the Federal reserve notes issued to it.

"Every Federal reserve bank shall maintain reserves in gold or lawful money of not less than 35 per cent against its deposits and reserves in gold of not less than 40 per cent against its Federal reserve notes in actual circulation: Provided, however, That when the Federal reserve agent holds gold or gold certificates as collateral for Federal reserve notes issued to the bank such gold or gold certificates shall be counted as part of the gold reserve which such bank is required to maintain against its Federal reserve notes in actual circulation. Notes so paid out shall bear upon their faces a distinctive letter and serial number, which shall be assigned by the Federal Reserve Board to each Federal reserve bank. Whenever Federal reserve notes issued through one Federal reserve bank shall be received by another Federal reserve bank, they shall be promptly returned for credit or redemption to the Federal reserve bank through which they were originally issued or, upon direction of such Federal reserve bank, they shall be forwarded direct to the Treasurer of the United States to be retired. No Federal reserve bank shall pay out notes issued through another under penalty of a tax of 10 per cent upon the face value of notes so paid out. Notes presented for redemption at the Treasury of the United States shall be paid out of the redemption fund and returned to the Federal reserve banks through which they were originally issued, and thereupon such Federal reserve bank shall, upon demand of the Secretary of the Treasury, reimburse such redemption fund in lawful money or, if such Federal reserve notes have been redeemed by the Treasurer in gold or gold certificates, then such funds shall be reimbursed to the extent deemed necessary by the Secretary of the Treasury in gold or gold certificates, and such Federal reserve bank shall, so long as any of its Federal reserve notes remain outstanding, maintain with the Treasurer in gold an amount sufficient in the judgment of the Secretary to provide for all redemptions to be made by the Treasurer. Federal reserve notes received by the Treasurer otherwise than for redemption may be exchanged for gold out of the redemption fund hereinafter provided and returned to the reserve bank through which they were originally issued, or they may be returned to such bank for the credit of the United States. Federal reserve notes unfit for circulation shall be returned by the Federal reserve agents to the Comptroller of the Currency for cancellation and destruction.

"The Federal Reserve Board shall require each Federal reserve bank to maintain on deposit in the Treasury of the United States a sum in gold sufficient, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the redemption of the Federal reserve notes issued to such bank, but in no event less than 5 per cent of the total amount of notes issued less the amount of gold or gold certificates held by the Federal reserve agent as collateral security; but such deposit of gold shall be counted and included as part of the 40 per cent reserve hereinbefore required. The board shall have the right, acting through the Federal reserve agent, to grant, in whole or in part, or to reject entirely the application of any Federal reserve bank for Federal reserve notes; but to the extent that such application may be granted the Federal Reserve Board shall, through its local Federal reserve agent, supply Federal reserve notes to the banks so applying, and such bank shall be charged with the amount of notes issued to it and shall pay such rate of interest as may be established by the Federal Reserve Board on only that amount of such notes which equals the total amount of its outstanding Federal reserve notes less the amount of gold or gold certificates held by the Federal reserve agent as collateral security. Federal reserve notes issued to any such bank shall, upon delivery, together with such notes of such Federal reserve bank as may be issued under section 18 of this act upon security of United States 2 per cent Government bonds, become a first and paramount lien on all the assets of such bank.

"Any Federal reserve bank may at any time reduce its liability for outstanding Federal reserve notes by depositing with the Federal reserve agent its Federal reserve notes, gold, gold certificates, or lawful money of the United States. Federal reserve notes so deposited shall not be reissued, except upon compliance with the conditions of an original issue.

"The Federal reserve agent shall hold such gold, gold certificates, or lawful money available exclusively for exchange for the outstanding Federal reserve notes when offered by the reserve bank of which he is a director. Upon the request of the Secretary of the Treasury the Federal Reserve Board shall require the Federal reserve agent to transmit to the Treasurer of the United States so much of the gold held by him as collateral security for Federal reserve notes as may be required for the exclusive purpose of the redemption of such Federal reserve notes, but such gold when deposited with the Treasurer shall be counted and considered as if collateral security on deposit with the Federal reserve agent.

"Any Federal reserve bank may at its discretion withdraw collateral deposited with the local Federal reserve agent for the protection of its Federal reserve notes issued to it and shall at the same time substitute therefor other collateral of equal amount with the approval of the Federal reserve agent under regulations to be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board. Any Federal reserve bank may retire any of its Federal reserve notes by depositing them with the Federal reserve agent or with the Treasurer of the United States, and such Federal reserve bank shall thereupon be entitled to receive back the collateral deposited with the Federal reserve agent for the security of such notes. Federal reserve banks shall not be required to maintain the reserve or the redemption fund heretofore provided for against Federal reserve notes which have been retired. Federal reserve notes so deposited shall not be reissued except upon compliance with the conditions of an original issue."

All Federal reserve notes and all gold, gold certificates, and lawful money issued to or deposited with any Federal reserve agent under the provisions of the Federal reserve act shall hereafter be held for such agent, under such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe, in the joint custody of himself and the Federal reserve bank to which he is accredited. Such agent and such Federal reserve bank shall be jointly liable for the safe-keeping of such Federal reserve notes, gold, gold certificates, and lawful money. Nothing herein contained, however, shall be construed to prohibit a Federal reserve agent from depositing gold or gold certificates with the Federal Reserve Board, to be held by such board subject to his order, or with the Treasurer of the United States for the purposes authorized by law.

SEC. 6. That section 16 be further amended by adding at the end of the section the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to receive deposits of gold coin or of gold certificates with the Treasurer or any Assistant Treasurer of the United States when tendered by any Federal reserve bank or Federal reserve agent for credit to its or his account with the Federal Reserve Board. The Secretary shall prescribe by regulation the form or receipt to be issued by the Treasurer or Assistant Treasurer to the Federal reserve bank or Federal reserve agent making the deposit, and a duplicate of such receipt shall be delivered to the Federal Reserve Board by the Treasurer at Washington upon proper advices from any Assistant Treasurer that such deposit has been made. Deposits so made shall be held subject to the orders of the Federal Reserve Board and shall be payable in gold coin or gold certificates on the order of the Federal Reserve Board to any Federal reserve bank or Federal reserve agent at the Treasury or at the Subtreasury of the United States nearest the place of business of such Federal reserve bank or such Federal reserve agent: Provided, however, That any expense incurred in shipping gold to or from the Treasury or Subtreasuries in order to make such payments, or as a result of making such payments, shall be paid by the Federal Reserve Board and assessed against the Federal reserve banks. The order used by the Federal Reserve Board in making such payments shall be signed by the governor or vice governor, or such other officers or members as the board may by regulation prescribe. The form of such order shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

"The expenses necessarily incurred in carrying out these provisions, including the cost of the certificates or receipts issued for deposits received, and all expenses incident to the handling of such deposits shall be paid by the Federal Reserve Board and included in its assessments against the several Federal reserve banks.

"Gold deposits standing to the credit of any Federal reserve bank with the Federal Reserve Board shall, at the option of said bank, be counted as part of the lawful reserve which it is required to maintain against outstanding Federal reserve notes, or as a part of the reserve it is required to maintain against deposits.

"Nothing in this section shall be construed as amending section 6 of the act of March 14, 1900, as amended by the acts of March 4, 1907, March 2, 1911, and June 12, 1916, nor shall the provisions of this section be construed to apply to the deposits made or to the receipts or certificates issued under those acts."

SEC. 7. That section 17 be, and is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 17. So much of the provisions of section 5159 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and section 4 of the act of June 20, 1874, and section 8 of the act of July 12, 1882, and of any other provisions of existing statutes as require that before any national banking association shall be authorized to commence banking business it shall transfer and deliver to the Treasurer of the United States a stated amount of United States registered bonds, and so much of those provisions or of any other provisions of existing statutes as require any national banking association now or hereafter organized to maintain a minimum deposit of such bonds with the Treasurer is hereby repealed."

SEC. 8. That section 19 be amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 19. Demand deposits within the meaning of this act shall comprise all deposits payable within 30 days, and time deposits shall comprise all deposits payable after 30 days, all savings accounts and certificates of deposit which are subject to not less than 30 days' notice before payment, and all postal savings deposits.

"Every bank, banking association, or trust company which is or which becomes a member of any Federal reserve bank shall establish and maintain with its Federal reserve bank reserves as follows:

"(a) If not in a reserve or central reserve city, as now or hereafter defined, it shall hold and maintain with the Federal reserve bank of its district actual net reserves equal to not less than 6 per cent of the aggregate amount of its demand deposits and 3 per cent of its time deposits.

"(b) If in a reserve city, as now or hereafter defined, it shall hold and maintain with the Federal reserve bank of its district actual net reserves equal to not less than 10 per cent of the aggregate amount of its demand deposits and 3 per cent of its time deposits.

"(c) If in a central reserve city, as now or hereafter defined, it shall hold and maintain with the Federal reserve bank of its district an actual net reserve equal to not less than 13 per cent of the aggregate amount of its demand deposits and 3 per cent of its time deposits.

"Every member bank shall maintain in its own vaults an amount of specie or currency equal to at least 4 per cent of its demand deposits less the amount of those reserves with the Federal reserve bank which are in excess of the minimum reserves required by this section.

"No member bank shall keep on deposit with any nonmember bank a sum in excess of 10 per cent of its own paid-up capital and surplus. No member bank shall act as the medium or agent of a nonmember bank in applying for or receiving discounts from a Federal reserve bank under the provisions of this act except by permission of the Federal Reserve Board.

"The required balance carried by a member bank with a Federal reserve bank may, under the regulations and subject to such penalties as may be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board, be checked against and withdrawn by such member bank for the purpose of meeting existing liabilities: Provided, however, That no bank shall at any time make new loans or shall pay any dividends unless and until the total reserve required by law is fully restored.

"In estimating the reserves and the cash in vault required by this act, the net balance of amounts due to and from other banks shall be taken as the basis for ascertaining the bank deposits against which reserves with Federal reserve banks and cash in vault shall be determined.

"National banks or banks organized under local laws located in Alaska or in a dependency or insular possession or any part of the United States outside the continental United States may remain nonmember banks, and shall in that event maintain reserves and comply with all the conditions now provided by law regulating them; or said banks, except in the Philippine Islands, may, with the consent of the Federal Reserve Board, become member banks of any one of the reserve districts, and shall, in that event, take stock, maintain reserves, and be subject to all the other provisions of this act."

SEC. 9. That that part of section 22 which reads as follows: "Other than the usual salary or director's fees paid to any officer, director, or employee of a member bank and other than a reasonable fee paid by said bank to such officer, director, or employee for service rendered to such bank, no officer, director, employee, or attorney of a member bank shall be a beneficiary of or receive, directly or indirectly, any fee, commission, gift, or other consideration for or in connection with any transaction or business of the bank," be, and hereby is, amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"Other than the usual salary or director's fee paid to any officer, director, employee, or attorney of a member bank, and other than a reasonable fee paid by said bank to such officer, director, employee, or attorney for services rendered to such bank, no officer, director, employee, or attorney of a member bank shall be a beneficiary of or receive directly or indirectly, any fee, commission, gift, or other consideration for or in connection with any transaction or business of the bank: Provided, however, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to prohibit a director, officer, employee, or attorney from receiving the same rate of interest paid to other depositors for similar deposits made with such banks: And provided further, That notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or other evidences of debt executed or indorsed by directors or attorneys of a member bank may be discounted with such member bank on the same terms and conditions as other notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or evidences of debt upon the affirmative vote or written assent of at least three-fourths of the members of the board of directors of such member bank.

Mr. OWEN. I suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that he call for a quorum.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will call for a quorum. I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	New	Smoot
Beckham	Hollis	Overman	Sterling
Calder	Husting	Owen	Sutherland
Culberson	Johnson, Cal.	Page	Swanson
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman	Thompson
Curtis	Kellogg	Pomerene	Trammell
Fall	King	Robinson	Underwood
Fernald	Kirby	Shafroth	Walsh
France	La Follette	Sheppard	Warren
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Sherman	Watson
Gallinger	McKellar	Simmons	Weeks
Gronna	Myers	Smith, Ga.	Williams
Hale	Nelson	Smith, Mich.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to announce that Senators GORE, KENDRICK, NORRIS, KENYON, and BRADY are engaged in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry upon an important hearing.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] on public business. I also desire to announce that the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is absent on account of sickness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is absent on official business, and also that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] is necessarily absent and has a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. I also have been requested to announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, in making a report on this bill I should like to be permitted to make a statement with regard to the changes which are made by the amendment proposed by the committee, without interruption, as far as it is practicable, and after I have finished I shall be very glad to answer any question. I will answer questions while making the explanation if Senators desire it, but I would prefer to make a statement of the amendments which are now proposed connectedly and then answer questions.

In the first section it is proposed to modify section 4 so as to add these words:

Subject to the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal reserve agent shall appoint one or more assistants. Such assistants, who shall be persons of tested banking experience, shall assist the Federal reserve agent in the performance of his duties, and shall also have power to act in his name and stead during his absence or disability. The Federal reserve agent may require such bonds of his assistants as he may deem necessary for his own protection. Assistants to the Federal reserve agent shall receive an annual compensation to be fixed and paid in the same manner as that of the Federal reserve agent. One of the directors of class C shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board as vice chairman to exercise the powers of the chairman of the board in case of the absence or disability of the Federal reserve agent; in case of the absence of the chairman and vice chairman, the third class C director shall preside at meetings of the board.

Under the old law it was provided that one of the members of class C directors should act as deputy Federal reserve agent. He did not necessarily live in the town where the bank might be located. Some sudden exigency might call the Federal reserve agent from his post of duty, and in that event it was necessary to wire to the deputy to come to the city to take charge of the large amounts of securities and of gold and of Federal reserve notes in the possession of the Federal reserve agent. These amounts now go into very large sums, hundreds of millions of dollars in the 12 banks. It, therefore, has been found advisable to give the Federal reserve agents the power of bonded officers to take care of these securities in his absence.

Mr. KELLOGG. May I ask the Senator——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Are not these agents salaried officers?

Mr. OWEN. They are.

Mr. KELLOGG. That will make a large number of agents.

Mr. OWEN. There will be one for each of 12 banks.

Section 2 is a provision not found in the House bill, modifying section 9 so as to give a larger opportunity to the State banks or trust companies to enter this system. The modifications are shown in the Senate report numbered 11, calendar, which I would be glad if Senators might have in their hands, because in the report you will find the words which are stricken out of the existing law in line type and the words which are proposed to be inserted in italics, so that it makes it perfectly clear what the changes are.

This section 2 is intended to make the system more attractive to the State banks and trust companies. The most important part of it is the proviso which will permit them to withdraw from the system, if they want to do so, after they have tested it out. Under the existing law there appeared to have been no adequate means by which a State bank or trust company coming into the system could conveniently get out, and some of the State banks and trust companies that were willing to try it did not want to go into a system from which they saw no means of withdrawing.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And no prospect of profit at the time.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator suggests no prospect of profit. Of course this system is intended to safeguard the banks of the country, as well as the business and credits of the country, and to stabilize them. They have been the beneficiaries of the stabilization of the financial system by a very large increase in the deposits of the State banks and trust companies as well as the national banks.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not make the suggestion by way of criticism. Of course, it is a well-known fact that when the national banks were threatened with the forfeiture of their charter if they did not come in, there did not seem to be a very remunerative prospect on their investment. It may turn out to be an excellent investment for the State banks.

Mr. OWEN. Since that time the national banks have been beneficiaries by an increase of their deposits, due to the stabilizing of this system, of $450,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, Mr. President; but the State banks have also increased their deposits, I think, in even a greater ratio than the national banks, and they are not members of the association.

Mr. OWEN. I am compelled to observe that that does not happen to be an accurate statement.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is accurate so far as my State is concerned.

Mr. OWEN. It is not true with regard to the United States. The national banks have increased more largely in proportion, but the State banks themselves are stabilized by this system, because they can use the benefits of the system. I will put in the RECORD a statement of facts with regard to that matter.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from North Dakota suggests to me what was in my mind, that while the deposits in national banks increased 15 per cent, the deposits of the State banks increased 14 per cent.

Mr. OWEN. I will say to the Senator from Michigan that the increase in the deposits of national banks has been approximately 50 per cent since 1913.

Mr. GRONNA. I was giving the increase for the year 1915.

Mr. OWEN. I was giving it since this system was adopted, in 1913.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not want to seem to be put in opposition to what the Senator from Oklahoma is saying——

Mr. OWEN. I did not so understand the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Because I have gradually learned to estimate this law, which originally I opposed, at a much higher value than I did in the beginning. I am very frank to say that I am not now opposed to it. I think it will subserve a very useful purpose, and I say so without any hesitation at all. I wish that the laws of my own State were such that our State banks could, if they so desired, invest in the stock of the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. OWEN. Section 3 of the proposed amendment extends the clearing and collection facilities to nonmember banks, permitting them to put a balance with the Federal reserve banks and to check against it, so that they may get credit and debit and become members of the clearing system of this Federal reserve plan.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, while the Senator from Oklahoma is explaining section 3, may I ask for information? I have not had an opportunity to examine the House bill, as I have had other matters to attend to. Are there any provisions in the House bill as to how much money shall be kept by the nonmember banks in order that their checks may be cleared? The Senator from Oklahoma will remember that in committee I offered an amendment, which the committee was kind enough to adopt, in reference to that matter.

Mr. OWEN. The House of Representatives did not adopt such a provision, but the Senate bill takes the place of the House bill, we having substituted the Senate bill for it. The Senator from North Dakota is correct in his statement. We modified the form of the language which had been suggested by the Federal Reserve Board, which was adopted by the House, and we changed it on the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota.

Section 4 deals with foreign acceptances, and the change which has been made is by the insertion of these words:

Provided, however, That the Federal Reserve Board, under such general regulations as it may prescribe, which shall apply to all banks alike regardless of the amount of capital stock and surplus, may authorize any member bank to accept such bills to an amount not exceeding at any time in the aggregate 100 per cent of its paid-up and unimpaired capital stock and surplus: Provided further, That in no event shall a bank accept for any one person, company, firm, or corporation to an amount equal at any time in the aggregate to more than 20 per cent of its paid-up and unimpaired capital stock and surplus.

The House bill has a different provision in that respect. When I complete my observations with regard to the Senate amendment. I will in precise terms point out the differences between the House and the Senate bills, so that they may be clearly apparent to the Senate.

Section 5 deals with gold and gold certificates as collateral security for the issuance of Federal reserve notes. It provides, in effect, that the Federal reserve banks may, when they receive gold in due course of business, take that gold and deposit it with the Federal reserve agent, and receive from him Federal reserve notes, and in that way pass their notes into circulation. The effect of it is that it will drift into such banks a large amount of gold certificates and put gold that is now passing current in the pockets of the people. The ordinary citizen does not at all care whether he has a national-bank note, a Federal reserve note, or a gold certificate; he takes this current money without any question one way or the other; but the banks of the country, of course, preserve gold for their own uses. The citizens who do not care one way or the other whether they have in their pockets a gold certificate or a Federal reserve note will allow the drifting into these banks of a considerable amount of gold, and with the Federal reserve notes issued in lieu thereof anyone requiring gold can at any time easily obtain it by asking gold for his Federal reserve notes.

Mr. CURTIS. Is the purpose of the amendment to cause the gold to go into the Federal reserve banks?

Mr. OWEN. The purpose of the amendment is to cause that gold which is in ordinary circulation in the pockets of the people to drift into those banks.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. To accumulate there.

Mr. OWEN. To accumulate in the banks.

Mr. CURTIS. That is, when it reaches the member or smaller banks they are required to send it in to the Federal reserve banks?

Mr. OWEN. No; not at all. They do not have any requirement about that. It only applies when the Federal reserve bank has the gold in its own possession, permitting the bank to deposit its own gold and get Federal reserve notes in exchange for the gold deposited.

Mr. CURTIS. I now understand.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the Senator from Oklahoma now explain the per cent which is required to be deposited in order that these Federal reserve notes may be issued? That is really the crux of the whole situation, and is really the important section of the entire bill.

Mr. OWEN. Under the existing law the Federal reserve banks are required to hold 140 per cent of security against the notes which they are permitted to receive from the United States in the form of Federal reserve notes. Those notes are the notes of the United States; they are not the notes of the banks. Those Federal reserve notes, when they are issued to the Federal reserve banks, are secured by 140 per cent of securities, 40 per cent of which must be gold.

Mr. KELLOGG. What per cent must be gold, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. OWEN. Forty per cent must be gold. In the case of an exigency the Federal Reserve Board may reduce that requirement, under a penalty.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is the Senator from Oklahoma now speaking of the rediscounted collateral notes used at the Federal reserve banks?

Mr. OWEN. I am only speaking of the securities required by the United States to secure the Government in issuing the Federal reserve notes. The Federal reserve note is redeemable in gold at the Treasury of the United States and is redeemable in gold at the Federal reserve bank counter. Any man who wants gold can get it from the Federal reserve bank by depositing a Federal reserve note; but the existing law requires 140 per cent of security against the issuance to a Federal reserve bank of a Federal reserve note. Of that security there must be in the hands of the Federal reserve agent 100 per cent of short-time maturing commercial commodity bills and 40 per cent of gold in the hands of the bank against such notes when in circulation. These short-time maturing commercial bills are commodity bills, drawn against such security as wheat and other nonperishable materials, which are available for the market. The security, therefore, consists of 100 per cent of these very sound commercial bills, indorsed by a member bank, or of gold or a mixture of such commercial bills and gold; and, in addition, there must be 40 per cent of gold in the hands of the Federal reserve bank when the notes are issued by the bank.

The substance of the amendment is that the Federal reserve bank may take gold from its own counter, which comes into its hands in due course of business, deposit it with the Federal reserve agent, and get from him these Federal reserve notes, without requiring 40 per cent of gold in addition when the bank puts such notes in circulation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Oklahoma will recall, I think, that the early regulations of the Federal Reserve Board provided that this commercial paper should all be two-name paper. It would not make any difference if the Senator from Oklahoma were worth a hundred million dollars, and should tender his unindorsed note to his own bank, that note could not be rediscounted at the Federal reserve bank, because, forsooth, it did not arise out of a commercial transaction and lacked the element of two-name commercial paper.

I think that was a very great weakness, for much of the best paper, in fact, as the Senator from Oklahoma knows, a very large proportion of the best paper of any banking institution is paper which stands on the direct individual responsibility of its maker. I think, however, the board in that regard have modified their views somewhat, and that they are now accepting certain classes of single-name paper. Does the Senator know as to that?

Mr. OWEN. I so understand. The matter has been liberalized, as the directors of these banks and the Reserve Board itself have become more familiar with these transactions, and have learned how the matter can be done with perfect safety. So the regulation has been somewhat liberalized in practice.

The next important amendment——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that question will he inform us what is the amount of reserve notes now in circulation?

Mr. OWEN. I have not in my possession at this moment the information, but I can get it very quickly. It is between four and five hundred millions.

Mr. McCUMBER. Can the Senator give it to us approximately?

Mr. OWEN. I will put it in the RECORD in connection with my remarks. I will immediately get the exact figures, and put them in the RECORD, and advise the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have understood that it is somewhere in the neighborhood of $500,000,000.

Mr. OWEN. It is quite large, but not quite so much.

Mr. McCUMBER. And that, being based upon short-time notes, has added that much to our currency; or, in other words, has inflated our currency to that extent.

Mr. OWEN. I will say to the Senator that that is covered by a sequestration of a large amount of gold coin.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understood the Senator to say that the ratio of gold coin to the Federal reserve notes was 40 to 100.

Mr. OWEN. I do not mean that. I mean dollar for dollar in the hands of the Federal reserve agent.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator does not think, then, that it really means an inflation to the extent that the Federal reserve notes are put in circulation?

Mr. OWEN. No; I do not.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the greater portion is.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; I can agree with the Senator that some part of the notes may be called an expansion of the currency.

Mr. McCUMBER. I merely suggested that, as I think it has a considerable bearing upon what we now call the high cost of living, because there is so much more currency to pay for things we purchase.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to suggest to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] that, if that were true, the increase in the amount of circulation has not been any more rapid than the volumn of business in the country. If there were no other circulation than Federal reserve notes, the volume of those notes would respond absolutely and be a complete index to the amount of business that was being conducted by the country. The fact that more Federal reserve notes have been issued than there has been gold coined means that the volume of business has increased and requires that additional amount of currency.

Mr. OWEN. I think the Senator is correct in that observation.

Mr. McCUMBER. So that the Senator will not think that I am bound by that statement, or in the conclusion derived from it, I want to say most frankly that the business of the country could be done with a very much less volume of circulating medium. It could still be done, but the prices would be different from what they are now with a much larger circulation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that I do not think that the amount that has been issued under the Federal reserve act is anywhere near $500,000,000 at the present time. It is a varying amount, and it declines from time to time by reason of the fact that the banks have to pay interest, and when it is not needed that of necessity works automatically to bring about a decline. I think the amount is only $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 at the present time over and above the gold held in deposit to secure the same.

Mr. McCUMBER. But, if the Senator will allow me, let me suggest that for a certain length of time—I do not remember exactly the number of days—no interest is charged at all, as I remember. Therefore the fact that no interest is charged is an invitation to keep the currency continually inflated, because a note can be turned into currency any time it is so desired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I will say to the Senator that his idea about the Federal reserve notes is approximately correct, and that the total amount of Federal reserve notes outstanding is $458,874,000, against which the United States holds in the hands of the Federal reserve agents about $431,000,000 of gold.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I was about to suggest that it is shown in the Daily Statement of the United States Treasury issued May 7, 1917.

Mr. OWEN. Section 6, permitting deposits of gold coin and gold certificates with the Treasurer and Subtreasurer to the credit of the Federal Reserve Board, is intended to facilitate the handling of the balances which are due to the various 12 Federal reserve banks. They each have a gold balance in the United States Treasury for the purpose of promptly redeeming in gold the Federal reserve notes issued through the Federal Reserve Board. Under the old system they had to actually take these gold certificates and transfer them from one box to another, to make the balances daily. That proved quite a troublesome task and quite a responsible task. Now it is proposed to put this gold fund into an account with the United States Treasury, and this account is kept as a matter of bookkeeping, so that the balances are daily met out of the fund which is held by the Treasurer.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, his suggestion of a few moments ago that these notes were very largely secured by the deposit of gold is borne out by the Daily Statement of the United States Treasury; and also in a footnote there, under the designation of "a," the Senator will see, if he will turn to it, that against this total of outstanding Federal reserve notes of $458,874,000 there stands $27,343,000 in commercial paper and $433,089,000 in gold and lawful money, which is practically dollar for dollar in the broadest sense, and verifies the statement of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. Section 6, in reality, is merely designed for convenience in bookkeeping.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I understand the Senator will return to section 5 and further explain it later on.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; I will; and will be glad to answer any question which the Senator may desire to ask.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to ask a question about the expansion on account of permitting the gold used as a reserve to be used also as security.

Mr. OWEN. Section 7 simply relieves the national banks of the necessity of keeping on deposit United States bonds. We are now practically going out of the bonding system.

There are $433,089,000 in gold and lawful money held by the Federal reserve agents as against the outstanding Federal reserve notes of $458,874,000.

Section 8 deals with reserves and in effect provides that the banks shall keep with the Federal reserve bank 6 per cent of their demand deposits and 3 per cent of their time deposits, and keep in their own vaults 4 per cent of cash balances so as to provide till money. The House bill puts it at 7 per cent, but does not make any provision about till money, that being within the convenience and discretion of the bank, according to its location, whether it is immediately adjacent to a Federal reserve bank, where it can get currency in any amount it wants, or whether it is somewhat remote. Many of the banks carry a very much larger amount than 4 per cent just for their own convenience.

The differences between the House bill and the Senate bill are these:

Section 1 of Senate bill 1796 is practically the same as section 1 of House bill 3673, except that the House bill repeats the existing law.

The House bill provides that the Federal Reserve Board may require bonds of assistants to the Federal reserve agent. The Senate bill provides that the Federal reserve agent may require such bonds of his assistants.

The House bill provides that one of the directors of class C shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board as deputy chairman. There is no real difference, except a matter of words. The Senate bill provides that one of the directors of class C shall be appointed by the board as vice chairman and provides that the third class C director shall preside at meetings in the absence of the chairman and vice chairman. This latter provision is not confined in the House bill.

Section 2 of the House bill corresponds to section 3 of the Senate bill exactly, with the following exception: In the Senate bill the proviso beginning with line 4, page 9, is that the nonmember bank maintain with the Federal reserve bank a balance sufficient to offset items in transit held for its account by the Federal reserve bank; the House bill provides that this balance shall be in an amount to be determined by the Federal Reserve Board under such rules and regulations as it may prescribe.

It was introduced in the Senate in that form, but we changed it from the House provision on the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. It was changed by the Senate committee, and it now appears here as a change, using the language "a balance sufficient to offset items in transit held for its account by the Federal reserve bank."

Section 3 of the House bill corresponds with section 4 of the Senate bill and is identical, except that the proviso of the Senate bill beginning with line 11, on page 10, is as follows:

That in no event shall a bank accept for any one person, company, firm, or corporation an amount equal at any time in the aggregate to more than 20 per cent of its paid-up and unimpaired capital stock and surplus.

While the proviso in the House bill is as follows:

That the aggregate acceptances growing out of domestic transactions shall in no event exceed 50 per cent of such capital and surplus.

Section 4 of the House bill is identical with section 7 of the Senate bill.

Section 5 of the House bill corresponds with section 8 of the Senate bill.

The House bill requires a member bank in a reserve or central reserve city to maintain a balance with the reserve bank of not less than 7 per cent of its demand deposits, while the Senate bill provides for only 6 per cent.

The House bill does not require a member bank to maintain any till money.

The Senate bill requires member banks to maintain at least 4 per cent of its demand deposits as till money.

The Senate bill excepts the Philippine Islands from among the insular possessions which may have member banks. The House bill makes no such exception.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, when the Senator says "till money" does he mean the money that is actually in the possession of the bank?

Mr. OWEN. Oh, just money that is used for local exchange, for making change, and so forth.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I thought the Senator meant to distinguish between the money that might be in a State bank depository in the same city and the money in the actual possession of the bank.

Mr. OWEN. No; just money that they keep in their own tills for the purpose of settling with their local customers.

The Senate bill follows the old law in calling these balances "reserves." The House bill calls them "balances." Otherwise section 5 of the House bill and section 8 of the Senate bill are identical.

Section 6 of the House bill corresponds with section 9 of the Senate bill. They are identical, with the following exceptions:

The Senate bill includes attorneys among those connected with the bank who may receive interest on deposits and other accommodations. The House bill provides that these officers or directors may receive such accommodations upon the affirmative vote of a majority of the board of directors. The Senate bill requires the assent of at least three-fourths of the board of directors. Otherwise the provisions are the same.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The State law requires two-thirds in most of the States.

Mr. OWEN. Yes. We may compromise on that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think that would be a wiser number, for the simple reason that it will then harmonize with most of the State laws, most of which require a two-thirds vote when they loan to officers and directors.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; I know that a number of them do.

Section 7 of the House bill amends section 3 of the Federal reserve act so as to authorize the Reserve Board to permit or require a Federal reserve bank to establish branches. There is no provision in the Senate bill relating to this subject or amending section 3 in any particular.

Section 8 of the House bill proposes to amend subsection (e) of section 14 of the reserve act so as to permit the Federal Reserve Board to compel a Federal reserve bank to open and maintain banking accounts with foreign countries. There is no such provision in the Senate bill. I think it is advisable that at least one of these great reserve banks should establish foreign accounts, and that other Federal reserve banks might transact their foreign business through that particular bank. I see many advantages in that, and that is a matter, of course, which will come up in conference.

Section 9 of the House bill, with reference to the admission of State banks to membership in the Federal Reserve System, is identical in every particular with section 2 of the Senate bill.

The House bill contains no provision similar to section 5 of the Senate bill, relating to the deposit of gold and gold certificates as security for the issuance of Federal reserve notes.

I ask permission to put in the RECORD as part of my remarks the report which was made upon Senate bill 1796 in order that the matter may be fully in the RECORD for those who wish to examine it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The report is as follows:

AMENDMENTS TO FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. OWEN, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (S. 1796) to amend the Federal reserve act, having considered the same, report it back without amendment and recommend its passage.

The amendments to the Federal reserve act contained in this bill are those which were recommended by the Federal Reserve Board and are substantially the same as were reported during the last Congress in Senate Report No. 1059, February 14, 1917, the bill having failed to be acted upon during that Congress because of the pressure of other public business during the closing days of the session.

For the convenience of the Senate, each section of the Federal reserve act proposed to be amended is printed immediately following, so as to show the existing law in roman type, the parts stricken out in brackets, and the proposed change in italic, with an explanatory note following each of these proposed changes.

SECTION —. ASSISTANTS TO RESERVE AGENTS.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, be amended by striking out the sentence reading as follows: "One of the directors of class C, who shall be a person of tested banking experience, shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board as deputy chairman and deputy Federal reserve agent, to exercise the powers of the chairman of the board and Federal reserve agent in case of absence or disability of his principal," and by adding in place thereof the following:

"Subject to the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal reserve agent shall appoint one or more assistants. Such assistants, who shall be persons of tested banking experience, shall assist the Federal reserve agent in the performance of his duties and shall also have power to act in his name and stead during his absence or disability. The Federal reserve agent may require such bonds of his assistants as he may deem necessary for his own protection. Assistants to the Federal reserve agent shall receive an annual compensation to be fixed and paid in the same manner as that of the Federal reserve agent. One of the directors of class C shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board as vice chairman to exercise the powers of the chairman of the board in case of the absence or disability of the Federal reserve agent; in case of the absence of the chairman and vice chairman, the third class C director shall preside at meetings of the board."

This section provides for an amendment of section 4 of the Federal reserve act so as to authorize the Federal reserve agent to appoint one or more assistants, who shall be persons of tested banking experience, and to permit him to require bond of such assistants for safeguarding the gold, Federal reserve notes, and securities of which the Federal reserve agent is custodian.

This section, as amended, requires that the assistant shall perform the ordinary duties of the reserve agent, except that one of the directors of class C shall act as vice chairman and the third class C director shall act as chairman in the absence of the Federal reserve agent and the vice chairman. This is intended to give greater prestige to the representatives of the Government, the Government being responsible for the safeguarding of this system.

SECTION 2. ADMISSION OF STATE BANKS.

SEC. 2. That section 9 of the Federal reserve act be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 9. Any bank incorporated by special law of any State, or organized under the general laws of any State or of the United States, desiring to become a member of the Federal Reserve System, may make application [to the reserve-bank organization committee, pending organization, and thereafter] to the Federal Reserve Board for the right to subscribe to the stock of the Federal reserve bank organized [or to be organized] within the [Federal reserve] district [where] in which the [applicant] applying bank is located. Such application shall be for the same amount of stock that the applying bank would be required to subscribe to as a national bank. The [organization committee or the] Federal Reserve Board, in accordance with [under] such rules and regulations and subject to such conditions as it may prescribe, [subject to the provisions of this section] may permit the applying bank to become a stockholder [in the] of such Federal reserve bank [of the district in which the applying bank is located].

"In acting upon such applications the Federal Reserve Board shall consider the financial condition of the applying bank, the general character of its management, and whether or not the corporate powers exercised are consistent with the purposes of this act.

"Whenever the [organization committee or the] Federal Reserve Board shall permit the applying bank to become a stockholder in the Federal reserve bank of the district], stock shall be issued and paid for under the rules and regulations of this act provided for national banks which become stockholders in Federal reserve banks] its stock subscription shall be payable on call of the Federal Reserve Board, and stock issued to it shall be held subject to the provisions of this act.

["The organization committee or the Federal Reserve Board shall establish by-laws for general government of its conduct in acting upon applications made by the State banks and banking associations and trust companies for stock ownership in Federal reserve banks. Such by-laws shall require applying banks not organized under Federal law to comply with the reserve and capital requirements and to submit to the examination and regulations prescribed by the organization committee or by the Federal Reserve Board. No applying bank shall be admitted to membership in a Federal reserve bank unless it possesses a paid-up unimpaired capital sufficient to entitle it to become a national banking association in the place where it is situated, under the provisions of the national banking act.

[" Any bank becoming a member of a Federal reserve bank under the provisions of this section shall, in addition to the regulations and restrictions hereinbefore provided, be required to conform to the provisions of law imposed on the national banks respecting the limitation of liability which may be incurred by any person, firm, or corporation to such banks, the prohibition against making purchase of or loans on stock of such banks, and the withdrawal or impairment of capital, or the payment of unearned dividends, and to such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may, in pursuance thereof, prescribe.]

"All banks admitted to membership under authority of this section shall be required to comply with the reserve and capital requirements of this act and to conform to those provisions of law imposed on national banks which prohibit such banks from lending on or purchasing their own stock, which relate to the withdrawal or impairment of their capital stock, and which relate to the payment of unearned dividends. Such banks and the officers, agents, and employees thereof shall also be subject to the provisions of and to the penalties prescribed by [sections] section [5198, 5200, 5201, 5208, and] 5209 of the Revised Statutes [. The member banks shall also], and shall be required to make reports of [the conditions] condition and of the [payments] payment of dividends to the [comptroller, as provided in sections 5211 and 5212 of the Revised Statutes, and shall be subject to the penalties prescribed by section 5213 for the failure to make such report] Federal reserve bank of which they become a member. Not less than three of such reports shall be made annually on call of the Federal reserve bank on dates to be fixed by the Federal Reserve Board. Failure to make such reports within 10 days after the date they are called for shall subject the offending bank to a penalty of $100 a day for each day that it fails to transmit such report; such penalty to be collected by the Federal reserve bank by suit, or otherwise.

"As a condition of membership such banks shall likewise be subject to examinations made by direction of the Federal Reserve Board or of the Federal reserve bank by examiners selected or approved by the Federal Reserve Board.

" Whenever the directors of the Federal reserve bank shall approve the examinations made by the State authorities, such examinations and the reports thereof may be accepted in lieu of examinations made by examiners selected or approved by the Federal Reserve Board: Provided, however, That when it deems it necessary the board may order special examinations by examiners of its own selection and shall in all cases approve the form of the report. The expenses of all examinations, other than those made by the State authorities, shall be assessed against and paid by the banks examined in the same manner and at the same rate that national banks are assessed for such expenses.

" If at any time it shall appear to the Federal Reserve Board that a member bank has failed to comply with the provisions of this section or the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board made pursuant thereto, it shall be within the power of the [said] board after hearing to require such bank to surrender its stock in the Federal reserve bank [; upon such surrender the Federal reserve bank shall pay the cash paid subscriptions to the said stock with interest at the rate of one-half of 1 per cent per month, computed from the last dividend if earned, not to exceed the book value thereof, less any liability to said Federal reserve bank, except the subscription liability not previously called, which shall be canceled, and the said Federal reserve bank shall, upon notice from the Federal Reserve Board, be required to suspend said bank from further privileges of membership, and shall, within 30 days of such notice, cancel and retire its stock and make payment therefor in the manner herein provided.] and to forfeit all rights and privileges of membership. The Federal Reserve Board may restore membership upon due proof of compliance with the conditions imposed by this section.

"Any State bank or trust company desiring to withdraw from membership in a Federal reserve bank may do so, after six months' written notice shall have been filed with the Federal Reserve Board, upon the surrender and cancellation of all of its holdings of capital stock in the Federal reserve bank: Provided, however, That no Federal reserve bank shall, except under express authority of the Federal Reserve Board, cancel within the same calendar year more than 10 per cent of its capital stock for the purpose of effecting voluntary withdrawals during that year. All such applications shall be dealt with in the order in which they are filed with the board. Whenever a member bank shall surrender its stock holdings in a Federal reserve bank, or shall be ordered to do so by the Federal Reserve Board, under authority of law, all of its rights and privileges as a member bank shall thereupon cease and determine, and after due provision has been made for any indebtedness due or to become due to the Federal reserve bank it shall be entitled to a refund of its cash-paid subscription, with interest at the rate of one-half of 1 per cent per month from date of last dividend, if earned, the amount refunded in no event to exceed the book value of the stock at that time, and shall likewise be entitled to repayment of deposits and of any other balance due from the Federal reserve bank.

" No applying bank shall be admitted to membership in a Federal reserve bank unless it possesses a paid-up unimpaired capital sufficient to entitle it to become a national banking association in the place where it is situated under the provisions of the national bank act.

" Banks becoming members of the Federal Reserve System under authority of this section shall be subject to the provisions of this section and to those of this act which relate specifically to member banks, but shall not be subject to examination under the provisions of the first two paragraphs of section 5240 of the Revised Statutes as amended by section 21 of this act. Subject to the provisions of this act and to the regulations of the board made pursuant thereto, any bank becoming a member of the Federal Reserve System shall retain its full charter and statutory rights as a State bank or trust company, and may continue to exercise all corporate powers granted it by the State in which it was created, and shall be entitled to all privileges of member banks: Provided, however, That no Federal reserve bank shall be permitted to discount for any State bank or trust company notes, drafts, or bills of exchange of any one borrower who is liable for borrowed money to such State bank or trust company in an amount greater than 10 per cent of the capital and surplus of such State bank or trust company, but the discount of bills of exchange drawn against actually existing value shall not be considered as borrowed money within the meaning of this section. The Federal reserve bank, as a condition of the discount of notes, drafts, and bills of exchange for such State bank or trust company, shall require a certificate or guarantee to the effect that the borrower is not liable to such bank in excess of the amount provided by this section, and will not be permitted to become liable in excess of this amount while such notes, drafts, or bills of exchange are under discount with the Federal reserve bank.

" It shall be unlawful for any officer, clerk, or agent of any bank admitted to membership under authority of this section to certify any check drawn upon such bank unless the person or company drawing the check has on deposit therewith at the time such check is certified an amount of money equal to the amount specified in such check. Any check so certified by duly authorized officers shall be a good and valid obligation against such bank, but the act of any such officer, clerk, or agent in violation of this section may subject such bank to a forfeiture of its membership in the Federal Reserve System upon hearing by the Federal Reserve Board."

This section makes more convenient and desirable to the State banks and trust companies membership in the Federal Reserve System and throws reasonable safeguards around the admission of State banks, requiring them to comply with the ordinary safeguards of the national banks, but enables the State banks or trust companies which become members to withdraw without loss in case they find the membership undesirable. These withdrawals, however, are not to be permitted in such a way as to cause any sudden disturbance of the reserve bank to which the withdrawing State banks or trust companies are attached.

It protects by special rule the State banks and trust companies becoming members from excessive examinations in addition to the State bank examinations, confining the examinations to those made by the Federal reserve bank, of which it is required there shall be three annually. It is believed that under this section 2 there will be many State banks admitted.

In this connection there is submitted a letter from the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, who transmits copy of a letter from Mr. J. W. Butler, president of the Texas Bankers' Association. Mr. Butler's letter speaks for itself and explains the wisdom of the proposed amendments in leaving undisturbed the loan limits allowed State banks under their local laws while protecting the Federal reserve banks by limiting the rediscount privileges to notes forming lines of credit not exceeding 10 per cent of the member bank's capital and surplus.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Washington, April 14, 1917.

Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN,
Chairman Committee on Banking and Currency,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I hand you herewith, for your information, copy of letter received from Mr. J. W. Butler, president of the Texas Bankers' Association. This letter is significant, as Mr. Butler a year ago was reported as being most pronounced in his opposition toward the Federal Reserve System. It also tends to emphasize, in my judgment, the importance of lines 12–13 et seq., on page 7 of Senate bill No. 8, which will leave undisturbed the loan limits allowed State banks under their local laws, while protecting the Federal reserve banks by limiting the rediscount privilege to notes forming lines of credit not exceeding 10 per cent of the member bank's capital and surplus.

You will notice from the inclosed statement that the bank of which Mr. Butler is president is essentially a country bank, with a capital of $20,000 and surplus of $10,000, and the statement that he makes regarding exchange charges in the concluding paragraph of his letter shows a change of sentiment on the part of the country banks themselves.

Very truly, yours, W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

TEXAS BANKERS' ASSOCIATION,
Clifton, Tex., April 10, 1917.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: In these late wonder days of mighty transition and world movement it occurs to me as tremendously important that the State banks in this Nation add their support to the Federal Reserve System.

I would like to forward such a movement. In Texas we have more than 800 State banks. Not less than 500 of these banks have sufficient capital to make them eligible.

I wonder if it is possible to obtain some slight modifications so as to make a reasonable inducement to these banks. I am sure they have the proper patriotism and would wish very little change.

It occurs to me that if the loan limit allowed to State bank members was made flexible, allowing the State banks to make loans as large as permitted by the respective States under their laws, a great many State banks would waive all other objections.

If this is impracticable, then I wish a compromise could be effected permitting State banks to loan as much as 20 per cent of capital and surplus to one concern or individual. Texas State banks now enjoy 25 per cent limit in this respect. It would be only fair that the national banks in such States enjoy equal privilege.

It has been suggested to the writer that we enter our application of our little State bank for membership and that it would influence other State banks in Texas to consider the step.

Whether this influence be much or little, we would incline to make application if the limitation on loans could be modified.

In the West, Middle West, and South, all comparatively a new and undeveloped country, the deposits in the banks as compared to the capital does not rank so well as in the older thickly populated and highly developed sections. It is unprofitable to operate so much capital.

Indeed, the little State bank we have was formerly a national bank, and to accommodate the requirements of the live-stock and agricultural clientele it was necessary that our capital stock be higher than it could be operated profitably. For that reason we were compelled to change to the State system, reducing our capital to one-third that used as a national bank. Our loaning power to one concern remains the same. We are earning nice dividends.

Because of this dearth of deposits natural to any new, growing country the State system is best suited to the small community. In localities of this kind the deposits are small, and the requirements in loans large.

I believe the small country banks would waive the privilege of exchange now enjoyed. In this connection I have observed that a very noticeable trend downward in exchange charges is obtaining. I would appreciate an expression. I wish to forward the unification of the banking interests of our Nation.

Yours, very truly, J. W. BUTLER, President.

P. S.—I would not favor a reduction of the present rule of minimum capital; $25,000 is low enough.

Section 5198 of Revised Statutes deals with usurious interest.

Section 5200 deals with limit of liabilities which may be incurred by any one person.

Section 5201 relates to associations loaning on or purchasing their own stock.

Section 5208 relates to penalty for falsely certifying checks.

The committee hopes that as a matter of patriotism all qualified State banks will, in this great national crisis, enter the Federal Reserve System and thus give to the United States the most magnificent banking system in the world.

SECTION 3. EXTENDING CLEARING AND COLLECTION FACILITIES TO NONMEMBER BANKS.

SEC. 3. That the first paragraph of section 13 be amended so as to read as follows:

"Any Federal reserve bank may receive from any of its member banks and from the United States deposits of current funds in lawful money, national-bank notes, Federal reserve notes, or checks and drafts, payable upon presentation, and also, for collection, maturing notes and bills; or, solely for purposes of exchange or of collection, may receive from other Federal reserve banks deposits of current funds in lawful money, national-bank notes, or checks upon other Federal reserve banks and checks and drafts, payable upon presentation within its district, and maturing notes and bills payable within its district; or, solely for the purposes of exchange or of collection, may receive from any nonmember bank or trust company deposits of current funds in lawful money, national-bank notes, Federal reserve notes, checks, and drafts, payable upon presentation, or maturing notes and bills: Provided, Such nonmember bank or trust company maintains with the Federal reserve bank of its district a balance sufficient to offset the items in transit held for its account by the Federal reserve bank."

The effect of section 3, which amends section 13 of the Federal reserve act, is to permit nonmember banks to maintain an account with the Federal reserve bank against which it may clear its items, and in this way give the nonmember banks the clearing facilities of the Federal reserve banks.

SECTION 4. FOREIGN ACCEPTANCES.

SEC. 4. That the fifth paragraph of section 13 be, and is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"Any member bank may accept drafts or bills of exchange drawn upon it having not more than six months' sight to run, exclusive of days of grace, which grow out of transactions involving the importation or exportation of goods; or which grow out of transactions involving the domestic shipment of goods, provided shipping documents conveying or securing title are attached at the time of acceptance; or which are secured at the time of acceptance by a warehouse receipt or other such document conveying or securing title covering readily marketable staples. No member bank shall accept, whether in a foreign or domestic transaction, for any one person, company, firm, or corporation to an amount equal at any time in the aggregate to more than 10 per cent of its paid-up and unimpaired capital stock and surplus, unless the bank is secured either by attached documents or by some other actual security growing out of the same transaction as the acceptance; and no bank shall accept such bills to an amount equal at any time in the aggregate to more than one-half of its paid-up and unimpaired capital stock and surplus: Provided, however, That the Federal Reserve Board, under such general regulations as it may prescribe, which shall apply to all banks alike, regardless of the amount of capital stock and surplus, may authorize any member bank to accept such bills to an amount not exceeding at any time in the aggregate 100 per cent of its paid-up and unimpaired capital stock and surplus: Provided further, That in no event shall a bank accept for any one person, company, firm, or corporation to an amount equal at any time in the aggregate to more than 20 per cent of its paid-up and unimpaired capital stock and surplus."

This amendment of section 13 of the Federal reserve act enlarges the amount to which member banks may accept foreign or domestic bills, not to exceed its capital and surplus.

Under existing law these acceptances are only permitted up to 50 per cent of the capital, but it is believed that with the safeguard of proper regulations this business is entirely safe up to the extent of the capital.

SECTION 5. GOLD AND GOLD CERTIFICATES AS COLLATERAL SECURITY FOR THE ISSUANCE OF FEDERAL RESERVE NOTES.

SEC. 5. That section 16, paragraphs 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, be further amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"Any Federal reserve bank may make application to the local Federal reserve agent for such amount of the Federal reserve notes hereinbefore provided for as it may require. Such application shall be accompanied with a tender to the local Federal reserve agent of collateral in amount equal to the sum of the Federal reserve notes thus applied for and issued pursuant to such application. The collateral security thus offered shall be notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or acceptances rediscounted under the provisions of section 13 of this act, or bills of exchange indorsed by a member bank of any Federal reserve district and purchased under the provisions of section 14 of this act, or bankers' acceptances purchased under the provisions of said section 14, or gold or gold certificates; but in no event shall such collateral security, whether gold, gold certificates, or eligible paper, be less than the amount of Federal reserve notes applied for. The Federal reserve agent shall each day notify the Federal Reserve Board of all issues and withdrawals of Federal reserve notes to and by the Federal reserve bank to which he is accredited. The said Federal Reserve Board may at any time call upon a Federal reserve bank for additional security to protect the Federal reserve notes issued to it.

"Every Federal reserve bank shall maintain reserves in gold or lawful money of not less than 35 per cent against its deposits and reserves in gold of not less than 40 per cent against its Federal reserve notes in actual circulation: Provided, however, That when the Federal reserve agent holds gold or gold certificates as collateral for Federal reserve notes issued to the bank such gold or gold certificates shall be counted as part of the gold reserve which such bank is required to maintain against its Federal reserve notes in actual circulation [and not offset by gold or lawful money deposited with the Federal reserve agent.] Notes so paid out shall bear upon their faces a distinctive letter and serial number, which shall be assigned by the Federal Reserve Board to each Federal reserve bank. Whenever Federal reserve notes issued through one Federal reserve bank shall be received by another Federal reserve bank they shall be promptly returned for credit or redemption to the Federal reserve bank through which they were originally issued or, upon direction of such Federal reserve bank, they shall be forwarded direct to the Treasurer of the United States to be retired. No Federal reserve bank shall pay out notes issued through another under penalty of a tax of 10 per cent upon the face value of notes so paid out. Notes presented for redemption at the Treasury of the United States shall be paid out of the redemption fund and returned to the Federal reserve banks through which they were originally issued, and thereupon such Federal reserve bank shall, upon demand of the Secretary of the Treasury, reimburse such redemption fund in lawful money, or if such Federal reserve notes have been redeemed by the Treasurer in gold or gold certificates, then such funds shall be reimbursed to the extent deemed necessary by the Secretary of the Treasury in gold or gold certificates, and such Federal reserve bank shall, so long as any of its Federal reserve notes remain outstanding, maintain with the Treasurer in gold an amount sufficient in the judgment of the Secretary to provide for all redemptions to be made by the Treasurer. Federal reserve notes received by the Treasurer otherwise than for redemption may be exchanged for gold out of the redemption fund hereinafter provided and returned to the reserve bank through which they were originally issued, or they may be returned to such bank for the credit of the United States. Federal reserve notes unfit for circulation shall be returned by the Federal reserve agents to the Comptroller of the Currency for cancellation and destruction.

"The Federal Reserve Board shall require each Federal reserve bank to maintain on deposit in the Treasury of the United States a sum in gold sufficient in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury for the redemption of the Federal reserve notes issued to such bank, but in no event less than 5 per cent of the total amount of notes issued less the amount of gold or gold certificates held by the Federal reserve agent as collateral security; but such deposit of gold shall be counted and included as part of the 40 per cent reserve hereinbefore required. The board shall have the right, acting through the Federal reserve agent, to grant, in whole or in part, or to reject entirely the application of any Federal reserve bank for Federal reserve notes; but to the extent that such application may be granted the Federal Reserve Board shall, through its local Federal reserve agent, supply Federal reserve notes to the banks so applying, and such bank shall be charged with the amount of [such] notes issued to it and shall pay such rate of interest [on said amount] as may be established by the Federal Reserve Board [and the amount of such] on only that amount of such notes which equals the total amount of its outstanding Federal reserve notes less the amount of gold or gold certificates held by the Federal reserve agent as collateral security. Federal reserve notes [so] issued to any such bank shall, upon delivery, together with such notes of such Federal reserve bank as may be issued under section 18 of this act upon security of United States 2 per cent Government bonds, become a first and paramount lien on all the assets of such bank.

"Any Federal reserve bank may at any time reduce its liability for outstanding Federal reserve notes by depositing with the Federal reserve agent its Federal reserve notes, gold, gold certificates, or lawful money of the United States. Federal reserve notes so deposited shall not be reissued except upon compliance with the conditions of an original issue.

"The Federal reserve agent shall hold such gold, gold certificates, or lawful money available exclusively for exchange for the outstanding Federal reserve notes when offered by the reserve bank of which he is a director. Upon the request of the Secretary of the Treasury the Federal Reserve Board shall require the Federal reserve agent to transmit [so much of said gold] to the [Treasury] Treasurer of the United States so much of the gold held by him as collateral security for Federal reserve notes as may be required for the exclusive purpose of the redemption of such [notes] Federal reserve notes, but such gold when deposited with the Treasurer shall be counted and considered as if collateral security on deposit with the Federal reserve agent.

"Any Federal reserve bank may at its discretion withdraw collateral deposited with the local Federal reserve agent for the protection of its Federal reserve notes [deposited with it] issued to it and shall at the same time substitute therefor other [like] collateral of equal amount with the approval of the Federal reserve agent under regulations to be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board. Any Federal reserve bank may retire any of its Federal reserve notes by depositing them with the Federal reserve agent or with the Treasurer of the United States, and such Federal reserve bank shall thereupon be entitled to receive back the collateral deposited with the Federal reserve agent for the security of such notes. Federal reserve banks shall not be required to maintain the reserve or the redemption fund heretofore provided for against Federal reserve notes which have been retired. Federal reserve notes so deposited shall not be reissued except upon compliance with the conditions of an original issue."

All Federal reserve notes and all gold, gold certificates, and lawful money issued to or deposited with any Federal reserve agent under the provisions of the Federal reserve act shall hereafter be held for such agent, under such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe, in the joint custody of himself and the Federal reserve bank to which he is accredited. Such agent and such Federal reserve bank shall be jointly liable for the safe keeping of such Federal reserve notes, gold, gold certificates, and lawful money. Nothing herein contained, however, shall be construed to prohibit a Federal reserve agent from depositing gold or gold certificates with the Federal Reserve Board to be held by such board subject to his order or with the Treasurer of the United States for the purposes authorized by law.

This very important provision is intended to permit the Federal reserve banks to exchange Federal reserve notes in lieu of gold and in this way drift into the banks the idle gold which citizens now carry in their pockets with indifference and without national use.

It is estimated that under this item probably two or three hundred millions of gold will be acquired by the Federal reserve banks and the reserve bank system will be strengthened to this extent.

While this gold occupies the position of trust gold in the same manner that the gold held for the payment of gold certificates does, the effect of the proposed amendment is to permit the Federal reserve banks, if the occasion should ever rise, to issue to the limited extent that it has received gold in lieu of Federal reserve notes—to that extent and to that extent only—Federal reserve notes against 100 per cent of qualified commercial bills of short maturities underwritten by member banks as required by statute.

At present the reserve bank must have against its loan of Federal reserve notes 100 per cent of qualified commercial bills indorsed by member banks, plus 40 per cent gold, but, under the proposed amendment, if a bank should have a million dollars of gold deposited against a million dollars of outstanding Federal reserve notes, such bank would be permitted to issue a million dollars of reserve notes against a million dollars of qualified commercial bills of short maturities indorsed by member banks.

This is in effect the German system, which permits the Imperial Bank of Germany to issue legal tender notes against commercial bills of a qualified class at par subject to an interest charge to the Government.

It has been urged that giving this additional power to the banks would mean inflation. It does not mean inflation, because the reserve system is adequately protected against inflation by the control of the Federal Reserve Board, by the right to charge interest on the reserve notes, by the entire power being in the hands of the National Government to prevent anything of the kind.

It does give a larger power of credits for our commerce if our national interest should require it, and this power could only be exercised with the approval of the National Government.

It gives additional power to the National Government, and such issues of Federal reserve notes to a Federal reserve bank is safeguarded up to 100 per cent of such notes by the following line of credits:

First. The short-time credit of the individual borrower engaged in commercial business against an actual commercial transaction, the borrower's credit being regarded as perfectly good by a local member bank to the point that the bank is willing to indorse his paper and to advance him money on it on the bank's own account.

Second. This issue is secured by the indorsement of a member bank on a short-time maturing commercial bill.

Third. It is secured by the reserve of such member bank in the Federal reserve bank.

Fourth. It is secured by the stock held in the Federal reserve bank by the member bank indorsing the paper.

Fifth. It is secured also by the double liability of the stockholders of the member bank which has indorsed the paper used as a basis of issue.

Sixth. It is further secured by all of the assets of the Federal reserve bank and the double liability of stockholders of every one of the member banks.

Seventh. Finally, it is secured by the taxing power of the people of the United States.

There is no danger whatever in such credits. To call it inflation is not argument, it is abuse, and is a slur entirely unjustified by the facts.

In Europe the most strenuous efforts are made by the various Governments of Great Britain, France, Italy, Germany, Austria, and Russia to concentrate in the Government banks every ounce of gold available, as gold is the final basis of credit throughout the world. The United States has made no adequate effort to do this, and there are several hundred millions which could be concentrated in these banks under this system if adopted.

This is an emergency matter which the exigencies of war require should not be overlooked or slighted and must not be misunderstood.

The several smaller amendments are inserted to provide and recognize the fact that when a reserve note is covered by gold up to 100 per cent no further security is needed for the reserve note outstanding.

SECTION 6. PERMITTING DEPOSITS OF GOLD COIN AND GOLD CERTIFICATES WITH THE TREASURER AND SUBTREASURER TO THE CREDIT OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD.

SEC. 6. That section 16 be further amended by adding at the end of the section the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to receive deposits of gold coin or of gold certificates with the Treasurer or any Assistant Treasurer of the United States when tendered by any Federal reserve bank or Federal reserve agent for credit to its or his account with the Federal Reserve Board. The Secretary shall prescribe by regulation the form of receipt to be issued by the Treasurer or Assistant Treasurer to the Federal reserve bank or Federal reserve agent making the deposit, and a duplicate of such receipt shall be delivered to the Federal Reserve Board by the Treasurer at Washington upon proper advices from any Assistant Treasurer that such deposit has been made. Deposits so made shall be held subject to the orders of the Federal Reserve Board and shall be payable in gold coin or gold certificates on the order of the Federal Reserve Board to any Federal reserve bank or Federal reserve agent at the Treasury or at the subtreasury of the United States nearest the place of business of such Federal reserve bank or such Federal reserve agent: Provided, however, That any expense incurred in shipping gold to or from the Treasury or subtreasuries in order to make such payments, or as a result of making such payments, shall be paid by the Federal Reserve Board and assessed against the Federal reserve banks. The order used by the Federal Reserve Board in making such payments shall be signed by the governor, or vice governor, or such other officers or members as the board may by regulation prescribe. The form of such order shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

"The expenses necessarily incurred in carrying out these provisions, including the cost of the certificates or receipts issued for deposits received, and all expenses incident to the handling of such deposits shall be paid by the Federal Reserve Board and included in its assessments against the several Federal reserve banks.

"Gold deposits standing to the credit of any Federal reserve bank with the Federal Reserve Board shall, at the option of said bank, be counted as part of the lawful reserve which it is required to maintain against outstanding Federal reserve notes, or as a part of the reserve it is required to maintain against deposits.

"Nothing in this section shall be construed as amending section six of the act of March fourteenth, nineteen hundred, as amended by the acts of March fourth, nineteen hundred and seven, March second, nineteen hundred and eleven, and June twelfth, nineteen hundred and sixteen, nor shall the provisions of this section be construed to apply to the deposits made or to the receipts or certificates issued under those acts."

This amendment to section 16 is for convenience in handling the daily exchanges between the 12 reserve banks which now must be done by physically transferring gold certificates from one bank to another. It is proposed to put these certificates in a common vault and arrange the distribution by bookkeeping instead of by transfer.

SECTION 7. RELIEVING NATIONAL BANKS OF THE NECESSITY OF KEEPING ON DEPOSIT UNITED STATES BONDS WITH THE TREASURER.

SEC. 7. That section 17 be, and is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 17. So much of the provisions of section fifty-one hundred and fifty-nine of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and section four of the act of June twentieth, eighteen hundred and seventy-four, and section eight of the act of July twelfth, eighteen hundred and eighty-two, and of any other provisions of existing statutes as require that before any national banking [associations] association shall be authorized to commence banking business it shall transfer and deliver to the Treasurer of the United States a stated amount of United States registered bonds, and so much of those provisions or of any other provisions of existing statutes as require any national banking association now or hereafter organized to maintain a minimum deposit of such bonds with the Treasurer is hereby repealed."

This proposed amendment merely obviates a practice no longer required under the Federal reserve act of compelling national banks to keep a minimum deposit of United States bonds with the Treasurer of the United States.

National banks are no longer required to keep outstanding a minimum amount of circulating notes and a newly organized bank is not obliged to purchase or carry any bonds of the United States; but there are a number of national banks, organized before the passage of the Federal reserve act, which have retired their national bank circulation in full, yet they are, under a construction of the old law, required to keep on deposit with the Treasurer of the United States a certain minimum of United States bonds. The committee believes that these banks should be relieved of further obligation in this matter.

SECTION 8. RESERVES.

SEC. 8. That section 19 be amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 19. Demand deposits within the meaning of this act shall comprise all deposits payable within 30 days, and time deposits shall comprise all deposits payable after 30 days, [and] all savings accounts and certificates of deposit which are subject to not less than 30 days' notice before payment, and all postal savings deposits.

[" When the Secretary of the Treasury shall have officially announced, in such manner as he may elect, the establishment of a Federal reserve bank in any district, every subscribing member] Every bank, banking association, or trust company which is or which becomes a member of any Federal reserve bank shall establish and maintain with its Federal reserve bank reserves as follows:

"(a) If [a bank] not in a reserve or central reserve city, as now or hereafter defined, it shall hold and maintain with the Federal reserve bank of its district actual net reserves equal to not less than [twelve] six per cent of the aggregate amount of its demand deposits and [five] three per cent of its time deposits [, as follows:].

[" In its vaults for a period of 36 months after the said date five-twelfths thereof, and permanently thereafter four-twelfths.

[" In the Federal reserve bank of its district, for a period of 12 months after said date, two-twelfths, and for each succeeding six months an additional one-twelfth, until five-twelfths have been so deposited, which shall be the amount permanently required.

[" For a period of 36 months after said date the balance of the reserve may be held in its own vaults, or in the Federal reserve bank, or in national banks in reserve or central reserve cities as now defined by law.

["After said 36 months' period, said reserves, other than those hereinbefore required to be held in the vaults of the member bank and in the Federal reserve bank, shall be held in the vaults of the member bank or in the Federal reserve bank, or in both, at the option of the Federal member bank.]

"(b) If [a bank] in a reserve city, as now or hereafter defined, it shall hold and maintain with the Federal reserve bank of its district actual net reserves equal to not less than [fifteen] ten per cent of the aggregate amount of its demand deposits and [five] three per cent of its time deposits [, as follows:].

[" In its vaults for a period of 36 months after said date six-fifteenths thereof, and permanently thereafter five-fifteenths.

[" In the Federal reserve bank of its district for a period of 12 months after the date aforesaid at least three-fifteenths, and for each succeeding six months an additional one-fifteenth, until six-fifteenths have been so deposited, which shall be the amount permanently required.

[" For a period of 36 months after said date the balance of the reserves may be held in its own vaults, or in the Federal reserve bank, or in national banks in reserve or central reserve cities as now defined by law.

["After said 36 months' period all of said reserves, except those hereinbefore required to be held permanently in the vaults of the member bank and in the Federal reserve bank, shall be held in its vaults or in the Federal reserve bank, or in both, at the option of the member bank.]

"(c) If [a bank] in a central reserve city, as now or hereafter defined, it shall hold and maintain with the Federal reserve bank of its district an actual net reserve equal to not less than [eighteen] thirteen per cent of the aggregate amount of its demand deposits and [five] three per cent of its time deposits [, as follows:].

[" In its vaults six-eighteenths thereof.

[" In the Federal reserve bank seven-eighteenths.

[" The balance of said reserves shall be held in its own vaults or in the Federal reserve bank, at its option.]

"Every member bank shall maintain in its own vaults an amount of specie or currency equal to at least four per cent of its demand deposits, less the amount of those reserves with the Federal reserve bank which are in excess of the minimum reserves required by this section.

["Any Federal reserve bank may receive from the member banks as reserves not exceeding one-half of each installment eligible paper, as described in section 13, properly indorsed and acceptable to the said reserve bank.

[" If a State bank or trust company is required or permitted by the law of its State to keep its reserves either in its own vaults, or with another State bank or trust company, or with a national bank, such reserve deposits so kept in such State bank, trust company, or national bank shall be construed within the meaning of this section as if they were reserve deposits in a national bank in a reserve or central reserve city for a period of three years after the Secretary of the Treasury shall have officially announced the establishment of a Federal reserve bank in the district in which such State bank or trust company is situate. Except as thus provided, no] No member bank shall keep on deposit with any nonmember bank a sum in excess of 10 per cent of its own paid-up capital and surplus. No member bank shall act as the medium or agent of a nonmember bank in applying for or receiving discounts from a Federal reserve bank under the provisions of this act, except by permission of the Federal Reserve Board.

"The [reserve] required balance carried by a member bank with a Federal reserve bank may, under the regulations and subject to such penalties as may be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board, be checked against and withdrawn by such member bank for the purpose of meeting existing liabilities: Provided, however, That no bank shall at any time make new loans or shall pay any dividends unless and until the total reserve required by law is fully restored.

"In estimating the reserves and the cash in vault required by this act, the net balance of amounts due to and from other banks shall be taken as the basis for ascertaining the bank deposits against which reserves with Federal reserve banks and cash in vault shall be determined. [Balances in reserve banks due to member banks shall to the extent herein provided be counted as reserves.]

"National banks or banks organized under local laws located in Alaska or in a dependency or insular possession or any part of the United States outside the continental United States may remain nonmember banks, and shall in that event maintain reserves and comply with all the conditions now provided by law regulating them; or said banks except in the Philippine Islands may, with the consent of the Federal Reserve Board, become member banks of any one of the reserve districts, and shall, in that event, take stock, maintain reserves, and be subject to all the other provisions of this act."

This section provides for a readjustment and decrease in the gross reserves required of the member banks. The object of the amendment is twofold. First, to increase the gold holdings of the Federal Reserve System, and thus strengthen the system against any exigency that may result from the European war, and, secondly, to decrease the amount of gross reserves required of member banks. The amendment would add approximately $200,000,000 of gold to the present holdings of the Federal reserve banks. The amendment also proposes to require the member banks to maintain in their own vaults, for till money, an amount of currency equal at least to 4 per cent of its demand deposits.

SECTION 9. PERMITTING DIRECTORS, OFFICERS, OR EMPLOYEES OF MEMBER BANKS TO RECEIVE INTEREST ON DEPOSITS AND TO OBTAIN ACCOMMODATIONS UNDER CERTAIN RESTRICTIONS.

SEC. 9. That that part of section 22 which reads as follows: "Other than the usual salary or director's fees paid to any officer, director, or employee of a member bank and other than a reasonable fee paid by said bank to such officer, director, or employee for service rendered to such bank, no officer, director, employee, or attorney of a member bank shall be a beneficiary of or receive, directly or indirectly, any fee, commission, gift, or other consideration for or in connection with any transaction or business of the bank," be, and hereby is, amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"Other than the usual salary or director's [fees] fee paid to any officer, director, [or] employee, or attorney of a member bank, and other than a reasonable fee paid by said bank to such officer, director, [or] employee, or attorney for services rendered to such bank, no officer, director, employee, or attorney of a member bank shall be a beneficiary of or receive, directly or indirectly, any fee, commission, gift, or other consideration for or in connection with any transaction or business of the bank: Provided, however, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to prohibit a director, officer, employee, or attorney from receiving the same rate of interest paid to other depositors for similar deposits made with such bank: And provided further, That notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or other evidences of debt executed or indorsed by directors or attorneys of a member bank may be discounted with such member bank on the same terms and conditions as other notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or evidences of debt upon the affirmative vote or written assent of at least three-fourths of the members of the board of directors of such member bank."

This amendment removes an evident hardship imposed upon directors, officers, and employees of member banks, who under existing law might be held as precluded from drawing interest on their deposits and prevented from obtaining accommodations in their own bank. The amendment very properly provides for restrictions upon such loans which, in the judgment of the Federal Reserve Board and of your committee, properly insures the bank against fraud and incident loss.

COLLECTION CHARGES.

An amendment in relation to charging for checks was proposed by Senator GRONNA, as follows:

"Provided further, That nothing in this or any other section of this act shall be construed as prohibiting a member bank from making reasonable charges against the presenter, in no case to exceed 10 cents per $100 or fraction thereof based on the total of checks and drafts presented at any one time, for collection or payment of checks and drafts drawn upon it and remission therefor by exchange or otherwise."

At present a very large part of the exchanges of the country are taken at par. It saves bookkeeping; it saves annoyance to business men. It is just to the depositor that his check should be paid at its face value, and, as far as the clearings through the Federal reserve bank are concerned, there is no excuse whatever for charging—on the unjustified pretense that the bank against which the check is drawn is furnishing exchange from the local bank to the central bank—because each of the member banks is given full credit at par for all checks it remits against the other. Consequently each bank should be debited at par in order that these items may be cleared at the same instant on the books of the Federal reserve bank. For instance, if bank 642 sends in $10,000 of checks and receives credit for the checks against its associate member banks, there is no reason why the associate member banks should not be credited against bank 642 at the same time for $10,000 of checks which they present against it at that instant. Under the national-bank act, prior to the establishment of the Federal Reserve System, the banks in the reserve and central reserve cities made a habit of giving credit at par for remitted checks, and would send out and collect the checks at the counter of the bank against which the checks were drawn and the latter bank would make remittance in due time. The bank in the reserve city would be compensated by having a large balance kept with it at a low rate of interest, or perhaps at no interest at all, and there were other compensating features enjoyed by the bank in the central reserve city. But this system goes out of effect entirely in November in so far as a compulsory reserve with a reserve agent in a reserve or central reserve city is concerned. The reserve banks are now serving a very great and important function of giving increased velocity to credits by canceling the check on presentation, giving immediate credit and debit, and in this way doing away with what is called "float," or exchange items.

Your committee transmitted Senator GRONNA'S letter to the Federal Reserve Board requesting a report. The report is hereto attached, together with a report of the action of the board of governors of the 12 Federal reserve banks, showing it is the universal opinion of the experts employed by the Government that the present system of clearing through the reserve banks should not be changed:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Washington, April 13, 1917.

Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR OWEN: I have your letter of the 12th instant in reference to the amendment to Senate bill No. 8 proposed by Senator GRONNA, and brought it to the attention of the board at the meeting this morning.

After a full discussion of the matter the board directed me to say to you that it would regard the adoption of the amendment as most unfortunate. It believes firmly that it is the duty of every bank to pay without deduction or discount, at its own counter, checks drawn by its depositors against their balances. No bank questions this obligation on its part when cash payments are demanded by the presenter of the check, and about one-half of all banking institutions in the country are now remitting without deduction for checks on themselves forwarded by the Federal reserve banks. The board realizes that the operation of the Federal reserve check clearing system has in a number of cases deprived banks from an income from exchange on checks which they have hitherto enjoyed, but as they are enabled to offset checks drawn upon themselves sent them by the Federal reserve banks with checks drawn upon other banks and are permitted, furthermore, to cover by shipments of currency at the expense of the Federal reserve bank, no actual hardship is imposed. An amendment permitting a charge of not exceeding 10 cents per $100 or fraction thereof, based on the total of checks and drafts presented at any one time for collection and payment of checks and remissions therefor by exchange or otherwise, would, in the opinion of the board, be construed by the banks as a definite suggestion that they impose such a charge, with the result that eventually these charges would be generally made, not only as against checks coming in from a distance but even against checks presented by payees residing in the community where the bank is located. While banks would no doubt pay checks for their own depositors without any charge, it is entirely possible that many of them would avail themselves of the opportunity of enforcing this charge against checks presented by payees who are not depositors. This would impose a hardship upon those of the poorer classes who are not bank depositors.

The board would call attention also to the fact that for some years past actual payees of checks drawn upon country banks have been able in many cases to collect them without exchange charges, which have been absorbed by their depository banks, which have in turn been reimbursed by balances kept with them by the country banks. Immediately upon the passage of Senate bill No. 8, or no later in any event than November 17 next, no bank balances will count as reserve except those with Federal reserve banks, so that facilities for free collection will no longer be afforded by member banks, and the result would be that many individuals, firms, and corporations would be paying exchange charges of one-tenth of 1 per cent upon checks which they have hitherto been able to collect at par.

The enactment of the proposed amendment, in the opinion of the board, would, because of the injury it would work to holders of bank checks, create a strong protest all over the country, which would be far stronger than the pressure that is now being brought to bear for its enactment.

In this connection I inclose for your information copy of a resolution that was adopted at a meeting of the governors of Federal reserve banks which was held here last week.

Very truly, yours,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

[Resolution passed at tenth conference of Federal reserve bank governors.]

KITCHIN BILL.

Whereas it is stated that there is to be reintroduced in the present Congress for enactment the so-called Kitchin bill, the purpose of which is to so amend the Federal reserve act as to permit national banks to impose exchange charges contrary to the basic principles of the Federal reserve collection system; and

Whereas it is understood that under the direction of a committee of the American Bankers' Association, known as the committee of twenty-five, a vigorous and far-reaching campaign is being conducted to bring influence upon the Congress to secure the enactment of the Kitchin bill; and

Whereas it is the belief of the governors of the several Federal reserve banks that should the Kitchin bill become law it would not only serve to nullify the great benefits which would accrue to the business interests of the country under the operation of a scientific, direct, and efficient collection system, but its enactment would seriously affect and seriously injure the best and broadest development of the Federal Reserve System: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the governors in conference earnestly urge the Federal Reserve Board to use every legitimate means possible to prevent the enactment of the Kitchin bill when introduced into Congress, and to promptly develop and put into the fullest operation the Federal reserve collection system.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he has completed his statement?

Mr. OWEN. I have completed the statement.

Mr. KELLOGG. Turning to page 9 of the report, referring to section 5, as I understand, the old law read as follows:

Every Federal reserve bank shall maintain reserves in gold or lawful money of not less than 35 per cent against its deposits and reserves in gold of not less than 40 per cent against its Federal reserve notes in actual circulation.

Mr. OWEN. That is correct.

Mr. KELLOGG. And the amendment provides as follows:

Provided, however, That when the Federal reserve agent holds gold or gold certificates as collateral for Federal reserve notes issued to the bank such gold or gold certificates shall be counted as part of the gold reserve which such bank is required to maintain against its Federal reserve notes in actual circulation.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; that is the proposed amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. That permits, then, an inflation to a very large extent, by reason of the fact that the 40 per cent of gold may be used in both capacities, does it not?

Mr. OWEN. I do not agree with the Senator that it permits inflation, because the term "inflation" carries with it the suggestion that it is an improper increase of the circulating medium. In this case, where they have, for instance, a million dollars of extra gold which they have deposited with the Federal reserve agent, in that event they would be permitted to issue a million dollars of Federal reserve notes against commercial bills equal to a million dollars. The effect of it would be that they would only be required to have 100 per cent of commercial bills instead of 100 per cent of commercial bills plus 40 per cent of gold.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then, to the extent of that 40 per cent, the currency would be inflated. I do not use the word "inflation" in the sense that the Senator does.

Mr. OWEN. I should say it would permit expansion against commercial bills to that extent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There would be a redundancy to that extent.

Mr. KELLOGG. Can the Senator give me a reasonably accurate estimate of the amount of inflation or increase of the circulating medium of this country that that would produce?

Mr. OWEN. We hope that it will drift into these banks between $200,000,000 and $300,000,000.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then to that extent it would be an inflation of the currency?

Mr. OWEN. To that extent it would provide the power to these banks of receiving and issuing Federal reserve notes, which they might use against the same volume of the business of the country that would come into their hands in the form of these short-maturing commercial bills.

Mr. KELLOGG. While we can not tell what may happen in the future, in the past there has been a greater inflation than the business of the country justified, has there not?

Mr. OWEN. I do not think so.

Mr. KELLOGG. And this would permit a very large extension of the circulating medium.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator had his attention called a few minutes ago to the issuance of these Federal reserve notes. I did not know the exact amount of gold that had been drawn into the banks against those notes, but I find it is almost dollar for dollar. It has not resulted even in an appreciable expansion, much less what might be termed an improper expansion, for a larger amount of national-bank notes have been retired than the uncovered Federal reserve notes in actual circulation.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not say that the provision is not wise, but I think we should understand that it is going to permit a very great extension of our circulating medium over the present.

Mr. OWEN. The extension would be limited, first, by the amount of gold deposited to cover such notes, estimated as a possible $300,000,000; second, by the business demand of the country for currency in excess of the entire power of issuance under the present law; third, by the granting of such loans under conditions 1 and 2 and the circulation of such notes.

I will say to the Senator that in England, when they had the great panic of 1866, the English law of 1849, requiring that English £5 notes could be issued only by the Bank of England after the primary issue against 100 per cent of gold, was met by a ministerial permit authorizing the Bank of England to issue £5 notes against commercial bills in any quantity necessary to meet the exigency. It resulted instantly in supplying the sudden demand for currency which that panic created, and it resulted also in the immediate cessation of the panic.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It pledged only the resources of the bank. It did not pledge any specific character of coin or other value.

Mr. OWEN. No; but the effect was that the bank immediately issued these £5 notes to their customers against their ordinary bills, and therefore the effect was that the Government of Great Britain put a £5 note against the commercial bills of its merchants and business men; and the very moment it did that the panic abated, and they had no more panics for a number of years. When panics occurred afterwards they did the same thing on three great occasions, with the result of an immediate settlement of the panic.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator knows, I think, that there was a rigidity in the English system that does not exist in ours to-day under the present banking system——

Mr. OWEN. Well, we have modified that in a very substantial way, I am happy to say.

Mr. KELLOGG. And that that was a most extraordinary occasion, the beginning of the present war; and yet the English banking act did not permit the expansion that this bank act now provides for.

Mr. OWEN. I wanted to call the attention of the Senator then to the further history of this principle of finance. The German people, having observed what took place in 1866 in the immediate control of that panic by the free issuance of legal-tender notes against commercial bills, adopted it as a fixed part of their system and authorized the Imperial Bank of Germany to issue legal-tender notes against commercial bills without limitation, except that there was provision for a penalty of 5 per cent for the issuance of those notes—an automatic penalty which went to the federal treasury.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator from Oklahoma will allow me, his plan of expansion at least has the merit of being much more desirable than the clearing-house certificates to which we resorted 10 years ago with very great liberality, thus inflating the currency.

Mr. OWEN. We were compelled to use the clearing-house certificates.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Now, if member banks can resort to a central governmental depository, with jurisdiction throughout the entire country and accurate supervision of the note issue, it seems to me we are on a far less tempting basis, so far as overissuance of money is concerned, than we were before.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the remarkable fact that in violation of the laws of the United States in 1907 the bankers of this country had the wisdom and the patriotism to issue five hundred and odd millions of dollars of clearing-house certificates, of cashiers' checks, of time certificates, and of all sorts of credit instruments which served the function of money, and it was all retired without the loss of a dollar.

Mr. KELLOGG. I hope the Senator from Michigan did not understand my remarks as being in opposition to the present Federal banking system, which permits that expansion, and which is absolutely necessary.

Mr. OWEN. I did not so understand the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. I was simply calling the attention of the Senate to the fact that in addition to the emergency currency, as we may call it, which may issue under this banking system, this act does permit an additional inflation or expansion to a very large extent.

Mr. OWEN. It does; and in my judgment that is the value of the system.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, Mr. President; I entirely agree with the Senator from Oklahoma. I was making no criticism of the observations of the Senator from Minnesota; but, following the line suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma, banks not only issued these clearing-house certificates without authority of law but they lacked the potency of even corporate power to do it. The clearing house issued them under mutual agreements with one another, and the effect was most salutary. If we have now come to the point where, in an emergency, we can confidently turn our eyes to the great national reservoir from which we can draw Government money which will be acceptable to the people, and deposit commercial paper which has been recognized as worthy of credit, we have accomplished very much.

I am going to make this statement, which I have never made before: I regret that it is not possible for every banking institution in our country under Nantional and under State supervision to come into this system and uphold it and stengthen it and in turn rely upon it whenever an emergency arises.

Mr. OWEN. I am very glad to hear that expression from the Senator. I think that where the State laws permit, it really would be a patriotic act on the part of the State banks and trust companies to enter this system, and enable America to have the financial power to move the world. This system can make itself, with the cooperation of the State banks and trust companies, the most powerful financial system on earth.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is not the vice of the present system in this: That while the means of expansion is very simple and easy, the means of contraction, when the expension is no longer needed, is not so easy?

Mr. OWEN. I will say to the Senator that it is subject to a tax.

Mr. McCUMBER. But it is not subject to a tax until after six months. Is not that correct?

Mr. OWEN. Oh, a tax can be imposed on the issuance of these Federal reserve notes at any time by the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; but under the present law and rules there is no tax until after six months.

Mr. OWEN. The Federal Reserve Board can impose a tax on the issuance of Federal reserve notes at its will.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me call the Senator's attention to just how that operates in business.

I appeal to the Senator for a loan of $200, and in his naturally generous disposition he agrees to loan me $200. Now, how will he do it? He can loan me $100 out of his own pocket and take my note, drawing 8 per cent interest. Then he can take that note, drawing 8 per cent interest, and immediately deposit it, and secure another $100 on that, and loan me that $100; so that during six months at least, under the present law, he is receiving 16 per cent upon the actual dollars—the gold, or whatever he loans me—without any expense to himself; and if I pay the note at the end of that time he has received 16 per cent upon his investment. Nor does it stop there. By reason of that expansion of the currency and the lengthening of your method of purchasing you have increased the cost of everything that I must purchase by the inflation system.

It seems to me that in that respect the Vreeland-Aldrich Currency Act was an improvement over the present system, because the moment that this other $100 which the Senator would receive in a Federal reserve note was issued to him that moment he would be compelled to pay interest, and if he kept it a longer time, a greater interest, and so on, until it did not pay him any longer to keep it and loan it to me.

It seems to me that that is the vice of the present law.

Mr. OWEN. I will say to the Senator the existing law contemplated several means to prevent an expansion that would be unhealthy or beyond what would be the normal requirements of our commerce. The first was to tax the reserve notes themselves and fix the rate at which the notes could be loaned to the commerce and industries of the country. I will say to the Senator the experience of Belgium was that they enjoyed a rate of 3 per cent interest for the 50 years preceding the European war, and in this country of course we paid a very high rate of interest. It was hoped here the system, by making currency more accessible to the people, would affect the interest rate and would reduce the interest rate to our business people.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not saying that there are not a great many splendid provisions in this law.

Mr. OWEN. I am only speaking about the question of expanding this currency. The way in which it can be controlled is by taxing the issue itself under the existing law or raising the rate, which would, of course, prevent the issuance of these notes to the people.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the great trouble is that under the law you do not tax the issue at all, as I remember, until the expiration of six months.

Mr. OWEN. We have not found any actual need of taxing these notes, but you will find in the law itself the language which I may be permitted to read to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to have the Senator read it, as I may have forgotten it.

Mr. OWEN (reading)—

And provided further, That when the gold reserve held against Federal reserve notes falls below 40 per cent, the Federal Reserve Board shall establish a graduated tax of not more than 1 per cent per annum upon such deficiency until the reserves fall to 32½ per cent, and when said reserve falls below 32½ per cent, a tax at the rate increasingly of not less than 1½ per cent per annum upon each 2½ per cent or fraction thereof that such reserve falls below 32½ per cent. The tax shall be paid by the reserve bank, but the reserve bank shall add an amount equal to said tax to the rates of interest and discount fixed by the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. McCUMBER. But suppose, Mr. President, the reserves do not fall below the 40 per cent, what are the taxes then? Then there are no taxes whatever?

Mr. OWEN. No; there is no tax unless there comes about an expansion that will be regarded as unhealthy, and then it can be imposed.

Mr. McCUMBER. But let me ask the Senator, is it not a fact that since the new system has been put in operation there has not been a month when there has not been an inflation of the currency?

Mr. OWEN. I do not think so. The Senator from Minnesota called attention to it this morning, and he was quite right in saying the amount of these notes was approximately $500,000,000; it is $458,874,000; but against that there is $433,089,000 in gold and lawful money held by reserve agents. So there is very little expansion.

Mr. McCUMBER. The notes themselves can not be held against their own issue, I assume.

Mr. OWEN. The commercial paper in the hands of the Federal reserve banks against that issue was $27,000,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. And the rest was gold or other money.

Mr. OWEN. Gold or lawful money, which means legal-tender notes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does that lawful money include gold certificates?

Mr. OWEN. It includes gold certificates.

Mr. McCUMBER. Under the existing law, I mean.

Mr. OWEN. It does.

Mr. McCUMBER. No gold certificate is even lawful money. I do not think the Senator intends by this amendment to include gold certificates.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; because the actual gold could be obtained on them if desired. I think the gold certificate ought to be made lawful money. I think we ought to make legal tender every form of money which we offer to the people and put the full credit of the United States behind every dollar of money we put into the hands of the people. In point of fact, we do that in effect now, because it is all easily convertible into gold, if anyone wants it.

Mr. McCUMBER. But one trouble the Senator has forgotten is that suggested by the Senator from Minnesota. You issue the gold certificates against the gold, and you then simply balance, you do not inflate; but immediately you take the gold certificates and issue some more paper money upon them.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, no.

Mr. McCUMBER. To that extent it is inflation.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator is wrong. The Senator overlooks the fact that the gold certificates pass into the hands of the Federal reserve agent and are sequestered and taken out of circulation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Under the law which the Senator now proposes?

Mr. OWEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCUMBER. So that it will be a gold basis.

Mr. OWEN. Absolutely.

Mr. McCUMBER. And short-time notes only?

Mr. OWEN. Absolutely.

Mr. McCUMBER. That would answer the Senator's proposition, as I understand the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. It does not answer as to the gold certificate. The gold certificate, of course, takes the place of the gold, but under this proposed law the gold may be used as security for notes issued and for reserves under the banking act.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand the Senator says it can be done.

Mr. KELLOGG. It can be done.

Mr. OWEN. I do not think the Senator from Minnesota followed me, though perhaps I did not state it clearly. Under the existing law the Federal reserve bank is required to have 40 per cent gold in its own vaults as reserve against every reserve note in actual circulation, and in addition 100 per cent of commercial bills. The effect of this amendment is to permit the Federal reserve bank to take from its vault gold and deposit it with the Federal reserve agent and get the reserve notes back. That is all.

Mr. KELLOGG. And it permits expansion to that extent over the present law.

Mr. OWEN. It is rather a substitution in actual circulation of the Federal reserve note for a gold certificate or for actual gold.

Mr. KELLOGG. But it does permit inflation over the present law of $250,000,000 or $300,000,000.

Mr. OWEN. It would have the effect of sequestering $250,000,000, I hope, of actual gold coin and putting in actual circulation a like amount of reserve notes. Gold certificates would serve the same purpose and substitute in lieu of that the like amount of Federal reserve notes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Just let me finish by making this suggestion to the Senator in the shape of a prophecy: Just so long as you can turn a note into the bank and receive a Federal reserve note in lieu thereof without the payment of any interest or any penalty for a given length of time, just so long will men take advantage of that opportunity to get money for nothing and loan it for something, and just so long there will be an inflation of the currency.

Mr. WEEKS. I hope the Senator from North Dakota appreciates the statement he has just made. He talks about turning into the Federal reserve bank a note on which he is paying interest, or some one is paying interest, and getting circulation against it. Now, he wants to tax the circulation; but a tax on circulation is a tax on business—an additional tax to what he would pay as interest on the note—and it would be an impediment to good business methods. No man is going to turn a note into the bank and get circulation for it unless he actually needs circulation. The whole theory of this system is that the note will be paid and the circulation will automatically retire.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me to answer that, if I have a note of $100 drawing 6 per cent interest, and I can turn that note into a bank and get $100 in cash and immediately loan that cash out at the same rate of interest, naturally that would be my loan business, and I would be making a very good profit. I would not consider that it would be a tax upon business if the Government refused to furnish money for me for nothing that I could loan out to somebody for 6 or 8 per cent.

Mr. HOLLIS. Will the Senator from Oklahoma permit me?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HOLLIS. I should like to suggest to the senior Senator from North Dakota that when a member bank rediscounts promissory notes with a Federal reserve bank, receiving Federal reserve notes therefor, the Federal reserve bank draws the interest on the note, and the bank that has rediscounted the note merely takes the currency and loans it again if it can. So it draws its interest then on the currency and the Federal reserve bank draws the interest on the note.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me say to the Senator, even under that statement, if you turn in a note drawing 5 per cent interest or 4 per cent interest or this certificate money which bears less than that, and out in the country convert that in money which you may loan out at 10 per cent interest, you are ahead quite a little in the transaction.

Mr. HOLLIS. But you are only ahead the difference between what the discount rate is and what you are able to loan the money at—not the whole amount of the interest.

Mr. OWEN. There are some minor changes I would like to suggest myself, and I would be glad if attention would be given to them.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Before we go to that I should like to say to the Senator from North Dakota that there has been a large decrease in the amount of national bank notes retired under the provisions of the Federal reserve act. There are only $700,000,000 now in existence.

Mr. OWEN. It is the intention to retire all the national bank notes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that.

Mr. OWEN. On page 3, in lines 7 and 8, I move to strike out the words "in accordance with such rules and regulations," and in line 2, after the words "Federal Reserve Board," to insert "under such rules and regulations as it may prescribe."

This amendment is made in order to indicate more clearly that the rules and regulations referred to apply to the application for stock in the Federal reserve banks and are not intended to give the board the right to make future regulations applicable solely to State member banks which might further curtail their power as member banks after they have entered the system.

That is an amendment suggested by the State banks.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. On page 5, in lines 4, 5, and 6, I move to strike out "in the same manner and at the same rate that national banks are assessed for such expenses."

The purpose of this amendment is to enable the Federal Reserve Board or the Federal reserve banks to make examinations of State member banks either separately or in conjunction with the examiners of the State or of the clearing houses, of which the State banks may be members, without making the full charge based on the amount of the assets or resources of the bank examined as is required in the case of national banks. It is intended solely to charge the State banks the actual cost of examination and no more.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. On page 5, line 23, I move to strike out the word "ten" and insert "twenty-five," so as to read:

That no Federal reserve bank shall, except under express authority of the Federal Reserve Board, cancel within the same calendar year more than 25 per cent of its capital stock for the purpose of effecting voluntary withdrawals during that year.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. On page 7, line 15, after the words "actually existing value," I move to insert the words "and the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person negotiating the same."

This insertion is made solely for the purpose of making this definition of borrowed money analogous to that contained in section 5203 of the Revised Statutes relating to national banks.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. On page 11, line 2, after the word "acceptances," I move to strike out the word "rediscounted" and to insert in its place the word "acquired."

I should like to put in the RECORD an explanation of this proposed amendment.

When section 13 of the Federal reserve act was amended last September so as to authorize Federal reserve banks to make advances to their member banks for periods not exceeding 15 days on their promissory notes, secured by eligible commercial paper or bonds or notes of the United States, it was taken for granted that such member bank notes so secured would be eligible as collateral for Federal reserve notes. It is probable, however, that the word "rediscounted" in line 2, of page 11, is not sufficiently broad to include a member bank's note given to a Federal reserve bank for a direct advance as authorized by section 13. It is suggested, therefore, that the word "rediscounted" be changed to "acquired" so as to eliminate the possibility of any doubt on this question.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. The committee have no further amendments to offer, Mr. President.

Mr. GRONNA. I understood the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] had an amendment. I have a similar amendment, but I will let him offer his. I send to the desk the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Georgia. I wish to state to the chairman of the committee that this is practically the same amendment which I offered during the last session. It has reference to exchange. I trust the Senator from Oklahoma will not ask to have the bill disposed of until the Senator from Georgia can be heard.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 7, at the end of section 3, insert:

That the the first paragraph of section 13 be further amended by inserting at the end of section 3 of S. 1976 an additional proviso, as follows:

"Provided further, That nothing in this or any other section of this act shall be construed as prohibiting a member or nonmember bank from making reasonable charges, in no case to exceed 10 cents per $100 or fraction thereof, based on the total of checks and drafts presented at any one time, for collection or payment of checks and drafts and remission therefor, by exchange or otherwise."

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from North Dakota for his courtesy. The amendment I will propose now, if I may be permitted to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment submitted by the junior Senator from Georgia to the amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. Before we proceed to discuss the amendment I desire a quorum of the Senate present. I am going to ask for a vote as soon as we can get it, and I want Senators to hear the reasons why the amendment is offered. I make the point of no quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	McCumber	Sheppard
Bankhead	Gronna	McKellar	Simmons
Borah	Harding	McLean	Smith, Ariz.
Brady	Hardwick	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Hollis	Overman	Smith, Mich.
Calder	Husting	Owen	Thomas
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Page	Thompson
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Phelan	Townsend
Cummins	Kellogg	Pittman	Vardaman
Curtis	Kirby	Poindexter	Weeks
Fernald	La Follette	Pomerene	Williams
France	Lewis	Shafroth

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is necessarily absent on official business.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have been directed to announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is absent from the Senate on official business.

Mr. LEWIS. Permit me to announce the absence of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who are engaged on official business in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. KIRBY. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. HALE, Mr. KENYON, Mr. SHIELDS, and Mr. STERLING answered to their names when called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I am sorry to have called Senators who were busy from their various tasks outside of the Senate, but the object in doing so was to bring the attention of Senators who were absent not to a speech but to an amendment of some importance, which I desire to present briefly, giving, as briefly, as succinctly, and as compactly as possible, the reasons for the amendment. I propose to amend the bill by adding, on page 9, at the end of line 7, the following:

Provided further, That the first paragraph of section 13 be amended by inserting an additional proviso, as follows:

"Provided further, That nothing in this or any other section of this act shall be construed as prohibiting a member or nonmember bank from making reasonable charges, in no case to exceed 10 cents per $100 or fraction thereof, based on the total of checks and drafts presented at any one time, for collection or payment of checks and drafts and remission therefor by exchange or otherwise."

Mr. President, the amendment I have suggested is a proposition of the American Bankers' Association. I present it at their request, because my judgment approves it and because my experience tells me that there is no other way in which we can more materially strengthen the Federal banking system and to make it extend and ramify throughout this country.

The proposition, as Senators can see, is one to allow these banks to charge a very small exchange on the checks and drafts which they collect. I have some arguments which I wish to present, compiled by the committee of 25 who were appointed by the American Bankers' Association, in advocacy of this proposition. I desire to present them to the Senate, and I believe they will be persuasive.

First. This amendment, if adopted, will be the means of bringing hundreds of State banks and trust companies into the Federal Reserve System.

On that point I want to say that to my certain knowledge and in my own experience, for I live in one of the smaller towns of a great agricultural State, the smaller banks are not very willing to embrace this system, and even when they do embrace it they are not very anxious or even willing to remain in it unless they are allowed some exchange charges for collection. Their capital, Mr. President, is small; their overhead charges are large, relatively speaking. They have always to some extent relied on deriving some revenue from this source.

In the town in which I live, of possibly 3,000 population—a rich town of its size, surrounded by a very rich and prosperous agricultural community—there are something like four or five banks—small ones, most of them—and two of those banks are national banks. Within the last few days one of those banks—I think largely on account of this matter—has withdrawn from the system, and the president of the other told me during my recent visit home that he, too, would have to withdraw unless something of this sort were done. So much for that.

Second. This amendment would sweep aside the bitter antagonism that is entertained by more than 50 per cent of the banks and trust companies of America, because of the methods of coercion that have been used in the effort to force small banks to enter the collection system and to render a substantial service entailing labor, risk, and expense without the right of any compensation whatsoever. One of such methods is that of sending checks through the express companies for collection. It is not unusual for a country bank, carrying in its vaults in actual cash not to exceed $6,000, to receive for payment by remittance through the mail in a single day checks aggregating $10,000. It is customary to pay these checks by draft upon a balance in some central city, created there through direct credit arrangements, discounting of bills, shifting of credit or accumulation of available exchange, all of which is done at an expense to the small bank. The Federal reserve bank of New York, aware of these facts, inaugurated on April 2, 1917, the scheme of sending through the express companies for collection checks upon all State banks and trust companies in the State of New York who would not agree to the arbitrary demand that they remit to the Federal reserve bank at par regardless of the expense and labor that might be imposed upon such State banks and trust companies. The power of this club is because of the injuries and dangers that are possible to the small banks against which it is being wielded. It is designed to injure these small institutions and has in it the possibilities of even causing them to close their doors. Where is there a bank that can receive deposits day in and day out, 90 per cent of which are made up of checks and like credits, and at the same time pay all demands in lawful money? It can ont be done. The Federal reserve banks hold that in presenting checks through the express companies they are admitting that checks are payable at the counters of banks upon which drawn, but the people who draw the checks and send them to distant points do not want the funds paid over the counters. If the funds were paid over the counter, the drawers would need find some agency to transport the funds to the distant points where their debts are to be paid. What the people want is to have their indebtedness at the distant points liquidated. In furnishing the facilities for liquidating such indebtedness represented by checks banks are rendering a valuable service involving labor and expense, and for which they should receive pay.

Third. The amendment will open the way to friendly cooperation among banks that is so essential at this time in order to marshal the resources of not only the Federal reserve banks and their members, but the nonmember banks, trust companies, and individuals throughout the land as well, so as to make them available for the protection of the commerce, industry, and the credit of America during the crisis she is now facing.

Fourth. The purchase and sale of exchange is a legitimate function of banking, and when the resources of banks are used in an indirect way to perform the service usually performed through the purchase or creation and sale of exchange, the banks are entitled, under all laws of fairness and equity, to receive compensation therefor. The right to demand and receive pay for his labor is guaranteed to every citizen by the Constitution of the United States.

Fifth. The debtor and creditor are the parties benefited through an exchange transaction; that is, the buyer and seller are the principal beneficiaries from a transaction involving the sale of goods. The sale creates a debt, for which a check is given. The expense of liquidating the debt through the means of the check or otherwise is a matter resting between the buyer and seller and should be borne by the buyer or seller as they may agree between themselves. It should not be shifted to a third party, either by law or by ruling. The Federal reserve collection plan by its operations shifts the expense to the small bank.

Sixth. There is no means of creating without expense credit balances through which to liquidate checks, and there never will be any such means so long as time and distance remain.

Seventh. The public should be given the best possible service at the least possible expense. Exchange should be regulated but not eliminated. As a matter of right and principle, a bank's right to charge the beneficiaries an amount to make good the service and expense should not be denied.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KIRBY. I should like to ask the Senator this question: A man has his deposit in a bank which pays him no interest whatever on it; it gets his money and hands it back to him when he wants it. Why should not that bank hand out the money in payment of his check at any time or anywhere without any expense to him? The bank has the benefit of his money all the time; and why is it not for his benefit that his check should be paid without expense and be paid anywhere in the world when he wants it paid? Ought not the bank be required to do that much by reason of having the use of the depositor's money?

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course, the Senator has raised a question that is entirely argumentative. That is one view of the matter. There is an answer which suggests itself to my mind that I will give to the Senator. It seems to me that the man who draws the check does not pay the exchange. The expense is usually borne by the other man, the man who gets the check. So I do not think the Senator's question fits what happens. In other words, if the man who drew the check had to pay the exchange, I think that perhaps what the Senator suggests might be true.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, does not the Senator recognize also that of the checks that are received by a bank nine-tenths, or even more than that, are simply transfers of credit upon the depositor's own account?

Mr. HARDWICK. Sometimes; not always.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Now, is it not a fact that when you send to a bank checks to be credited to your own account there is no transfer of cash, except perhaps in one case out of ten? Is not that an element?

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course, if you send a check on another community it might be different, although they do not ordinarily charge in such case. If you have a general account they do not charge you exchange.

Mr. SHAFROTH. As a matter of fact, they get the benefit also of the four or five days that are consumed in the transmission of it from the one and the return of the check to the bank on which it is drawn; and it seems to me that is more compensation than the one-tenth of 1 per cent.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to finish reading this brief, and then I shall be glad to yield to him or to any other Senator. I can not very well answer such questions as that while my mind is on the argument presented by this bankers' committee. I will undertake to answer any question I can when I finish the brief of this committee, although I admit I am not an expert on this question.

Eighth. There are 750,000,000 so-called country checks circulated annually. These aggregate $30,000,000,000. The exchange charge thereon, including handling cost, averaged during the year prior to the inauguration of the Federal reserve collection plan $1 per $1,000, or $30,000,000.

Ninth. The operations of the free collection system is not essential to the accomplishment of the fundamental purposes contemplated by the Federal reserve act. In the present form it is a serious hindrance to development of the more important features of the Federal Reserve System.

Tenth. The Federal reserve banks, by fixing a service charge ranging from 1 to 1½ cents per check to cover the cost of handling within their own offices, have recognized the fact that there is considerable expense involved. There are at least two other banks engaged in the liquidation of every check. Then if the cost of physical handling within the one institution, which is presumed to have the most modern equipment, efficient and up-to-date methods, is from 1 to 1½ cents per check, it is but fair to assume there is a like expense within each of the other two banks through which the checks pass. The Federal reserve banks may become a means of reducing the expense, but they can not eliminate time and distance. So long as those factors remain there will be considerable expense attached to liquidating checks and drafts.

Eleventh. Gov. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, said, in a public address some months ago, "Section 16 shrinks into insignificance as compared to the underlying principles of the Federal reserve act."

Vice Gov. Warburg, of the Federal Reserve Board, in a recent address, indicated that checks are not a circulating currency because they are driven back home by law and custom over the most expeditious route.

Twelfth. Some of the Federal reserve banks pay express companies $2 per thousand dollars for collecting checks and drafts, but decline to pay a bank for a like service on the ground that the law and rulings of the Federal Reserve Board will not permit them to pay a bank for such service. Is a law fair that may be so interpreted? Why is not a bank entitled to consideration equally as favorable as that given to express companies? The charges made by the express companies are approved by a governmental body, namely, the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Thirteenth. The Federal reserve collection system is now handling less than 10 per cent of the total of the so-called country checks. The par lists of the Federal reserve banks according to the report of the Federal Reserve Board showed a net loss of 79 banks during the month ending March 15, 1917. Also indicated a net loss of 44 State banks and trust companies from the lists during the month prior—banks generally seek the most satisfactory channels through which to collect checks and drafts. Those interested in favoring the development of the Federal reserve collection system have proclaimed it a success, giving as argument the idea that more than 8,000 nonmember banks are in the system of their own volition and are happy because of its operations. To verify the accuracy of this position a letter was addressed to five banks in each State whose names appear upon the par lists of the Federal reserve banks; these letters brought immediate responses from 156 banks. Of this number 81 reported that they had no option in the matter. Their items were being presented through some member national bank, through the express companies or some other agent. Seventy-five only report that their items were being sent direct to them by the Federal reserve banks, and, of that number, 36 said that they had been coerced into making the arrangements and were strong in their denunciation of the plan. Seventeen stated they had remitted at par before the Federal reserve plan was inaugurated, and it therefore made no difference in their arrangements; 22 banks out of the 156 went into the plan voluntarily and were satisfied with its operations. In other words, a possible 2,000 banks out of the 8,000 nonmembers whose names appear upon the par lists of the Federal reserve banks are in sympathy with the present plan.

Fourteenth. Replies to a questionnaire sent to every bank in America indicated that 76.6 per cent of the banks are opposed to the present Federal reserve collection plan, and at the same time these banks made offer of their earnest cooperation in the development of a plan: (a) Based upon fairness and equity; (b) which would free them from unwarranted and unnecessary burdens; and (c) which would give the public the most efficient service upon the most economical lines.

Fifteenth. Before the inauguration of the present plan banks were not restricted in the matter of exchange charges, yet only 15 per cent of the total number of banks in America charged above 10 cents per hundred dollars. If this amendment is passed exorbitant charges will be eliminated, exchange will range from par to 10 cents per hundred dollars and will be governed as it should be by the flow of business to and from the different sections of the country and the other natural elements.

Sixteenth. Merchants, jobbers, manufacturers, and other business people do not want to transact business without profit. Banks should at least be permitted to cover their expense in rendering service to the public.

Seventeenth. Adequate and proper laws are essential, they must be just and fair in order to get the whole-hearted cooperation that is necessary to strengthen the banking system to a degree that will enable it to meet the unusual conditions that are certain to arise. By close cooperation of all the banks America will be enabled to maintain the enviable position that she has acquired among the financial powers of the world.

Mr. President, that, in substance, is the brief submitted by the committee of 25 of the American Bankers' Association.

I want to say in a general way, as briefly as possible, that this question has been, as I was informed, thoroughly thrashed out before the American Bankers' Association, an association made up of big banks and little banks, city banks and country banks, and there the amendment that I have offered was the compromise plan that practically all of them agreed upon, if my information is correct, and a committee of 25 were appointed to draft the proposition. They drafted the amendment that I have offered. The secretary of the association brought it to me knowing that I was in sympathy with this proposition, because of my knowledge of the situation in the rural sections of our own part of the country; and I offered it. These are the arguments—the brief, you might say—that he presented to me in support of the plan.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I notice that the Senator, in his amendment, provides for a collection fee of not exceeding 10 cents on the hundred dollars.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. McKELLAR. Are not the cost of collecting a large check and the cost of collecting a small check precisely the same? Why fix it upon the basis of the size of the check? Would it not be better to have a reasonable charge fixed for each check?

Mr. HARDWICK. I am compelled to confess to the Senator from Tennessee that I am not a banking expert.

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, I am not, either.

Mr. HARDWICK. Most of my operations in the banking business have been on the opposite side of the counter from the expert; but I think this, if the Senator pleases: There always has to be some yardstick, some standard. This service is charged for, for two reasons: First, the bank renders some service, performs some labor, and is put to some expense because of the service to the parties that are transferring money. Naturally, you are serving a man more if you transfer $10,000 for him than you are if you transfer 10 cents for him; so that everywhere, in every civilized country, exchange has always been based to some extent, if not entirely, on the amount involved. That is my information, in a general way.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand, it is a different thing where you buy exchange.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, I mean exchange charges. It has always been true. It was true under the old national banking law. It is true under every State banking law. It is true as far as there is a system of charging exchange on collections to-day in this country. It is based on the amount of money involved in each transaction. Now, the 10 cents a hundred is, I think, considerably smaller than it was before this change was made by the Federal Reserve Board. It used to be 25 cents, some Senator upon this side says.

Mr. McKELLAR. It has been reduced.

Mr. HARDWICK. These bankers, the city bankers and the country bankers, have thrashed it all out. I think some of the city bankers prefer this plan of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has just stated that this was a report or an argument presented by a committee of the American Bankers' Association.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. POMERENE. At the beginning of the Senator's statement, if I understood him correctly, he stated that it was the argument presented by a committee of national bankers. Was that correct?

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, the American Bankers' Association is what I meant. I do not know to what extent their membership is made up of national bankers or outside bankers.

Mr. POMERENE. I want it understood whether this is the view taken by the national banks alone, or whether this committee represents all the bankers of the country.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think it represents the entire banking interests of the country. I think any banker, whether he is a State banker or a Federal banker, or owns and operates a trust company, is eligible for membership in this bankers' association. Anyhow, at the last annual meeting of that great body this question was taken up and thrashed out, and a committee of 25 was finally appointed to solve it; and they finally solved it as far as they could solve it, as far as their own collective judgment went, by saying that this compromise was the best thing.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am in sympathy with what the Senator is saying, but I should like to ask him if he does not think it would be well to prescribe a limit. For instance, if the check was quite large, the collection charge on this basis would be a considerable amount. Ought there not to be a limit upon the cost of collecting any check?

Mr. HARDWICK. I would not object to that—say, a limit of $20, or something like that; whatever the Senator thinks. If they handle a $10,000 check, they ought to have more than if they handle a $10 check.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should think that while that may be true, there ought to be some limit upon the amount of the charge.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator pleases, while I do not think it is best to have such an amendment, on the whole, I would not resist it. This thing has been worked out by the experts in this business. I do not know the details of the matter. They have appointed a committee, which has worked for months on this subject, and they say this is the correct solution of it. Now, if we are going to do it at all, I reckon we had better do it in a businesslike way and not make any mistakes. I think, without a doubt, we ought to do it; and I think we ought to do it in the interest of the Federal Reserve Banking System itself.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator fixes a maximum limit of 10 cents per hundred as the authorized charge; and he also stated awhile ago that that was considerably less than the usual charge.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. POMERENE. Can the Senator state what has been the average charge for the collection of checks?

Mr. HARDWICK. I must say that I can not, of my own knowledge. Some Senator in this neighborhood said 25 cents a hundred.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. I know that it has varied very materially in different sections of the country.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; it varies very much, I know.

Mr. POMERENE. And I think the charge in the Southern States has been very much larger.

Mr. HARDWICK. In the South and the West the charges have been heavier than they are in New England or in the East.

Mr. POMERENE. I think that is correct.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I think it is about 25 cents on the hundred dollars.

Mr. HARDWICK. In the South, I think, maybe that is about right.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That is the custom down in the neck of the moral vineyard from which I come.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Vermont. I ought to have yielded to him before.

Mr. PAGE. I know that in the East, and, I believe, in the more densely populated centers of the South and the West, there is no such charge as one-fourth of 1 per cent. The charge made by the eastern bankers, as a rule, is one-tenth of 1 per cent on the ordinary transactions; but on sums of several thousand dollars the charge is usually about one-twentieth of 1 per cent.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, 10 cents on the hundred is one-tenth of 1 per cent.

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. In other words, this figure is about the charge in the East and in the larger cities elsewhere.

Mr. PAGE. That is about right for the great bulk of the business done. Now, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] asked why the charges should not be uniform. He will bear in mind that every bank that has a large number of small checks to handle has to keep a force of clerks to do that work. A check of $5 takes the same time and the same bookkeeping as the one of $5,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. I quite agree with the Senator on that. The only question was, What would be a reasonable amount to charge for the service rendered in collecting the check? And it seems to me that it would be practically the same in the case of a large check as it would with a small one.

Mr. PAGE. The facts are that, if the check is very large, it frequently happens that the actual currency must be sent from the home bank to the central bank upon which the check is drawn, and the cost of that transmission of currency may be a dollar per thousand. From many States it is usually not less than $1, and in many remote sections a dollar and a half or two dollars a thousand. This expense must always be incurred wherever the balances one way or the other are large enough so that the transmission of currency either one way or the other is essential.

The point about this whole matter is this—that the little banks scattered through the country have got to have something out of which to pay these expenses.

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly.

Mr. PAGE. You can not establish a little bank in a little town and pay the stockholders a fair remuneration if you can not get something for velvet—something for profit somewhere. The ordinary bank in a country village starts with a capital of fifty or a hundred thousand dollars, and the expenses of running that bank are 1 to 2 and sometimes 3 per cent on the capital stock. The bank that does this collection business has got to carry a good-sized balance in some central or city bank. I think the ordinary bank in the country which has $100.000 capital will carry nearly or quite $10,000 as a city balance, and oftentimes much more. On this balance the bank gets only 2 or 2½ per cent. If it is with a trust company, the bank may get 3 per cent; but the average national bank usually carries its account with another national bank on which is paid 2 to 2½ per cent. Some banks will not pay anything on balances but, as a rule, they now pay 2 to 2½ per cent.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me a minute, I want to say just one or two more sentences; and then I should like to have the Senator from Vermont take the floor in his own right, because I am anxious to hear him on this proposition.

Mr. PAGE. I beg the Senator's pardon for taking so much time.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not want to keep the floor. I want the Senator to take it.

Mr. President, I am about to yield the floor to the Senator from Vermont or any other Senator who cares to take it; but I want to say that it seems to me that if your national banking system is to be strong, virile, powerful, and able to meet all the demands that the country may put upon it, especially in times like these, it must not stop at the great cities; it must not end with the populous centers of trade and commerce; but it must reach out into the rural sections and into the small towns and into the great agricultural, mining, and producing communities of this Republic, everywhere where the people are toiling and producing and making money; and the banks of this country ought to be unified if it is possible to accomplish it. I think this is too small and too trifling a matter about which to run the risk of keeping thousands of the country banks out of this system, or of driving out many more of them in these small towns out of the system, if they happen to be in it already.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina if he will not consent to lay this bill aside temporarily until we dispose of the Federal reserve bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. How long will that bill take?

Mr. OWEN. I should say it will take only 30 minutes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is this amendment the only question involved?

Mr. OWEN. This is the only question that is left, so far as I know.

Mr. HARDWICK. So far as I know, it is. I have said nearly all I want to say about it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to laying aside the unfinished business for 30 minutes and proceeding with the consideration of the Federal reserve bill?

Mr. GRONNA. I shall object to any specific time. I shall not object to laying the unfinished business aside.

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not mention any specific time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator from North Carolina did not limit the time.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will agree that the unfinished business shall be laid temporarily aside, and if the pending bill takes more than an hour I shall call it up.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, so that other Senators may have time, I will now conclude. I do think that while the argument is made that this is a mere transfer of the bank balances, and no actual expense is involved, and that contention will be made on this floor, if we want to make this a great national system, strong and powerful, and let it reach out in the country to the small banks that have not large capital and must meet their overhead charges, we had better be a little liberal and had better let this compromise on this question be made. I hope the amendment I have offered may prevail.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I wish to say very briefly that, as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I have tried to see in this new banking system a benefit to the banks of the country at large. It is a system which the State banks ought to consider in a very broad-gauged way, for I believe that in case of a panic they are going to receive indirectly large benefits from the system, even though they do not belong to it, and so believing I have tried to look favorably upon its provisions.

But when the bill was before our committee I took pains to write to every one of our State banks in Vermont, placing it before them in a favorable light and asking if they could not utilize the proposals of the Federal Reserve Board, which, it seemed to me, had been made with the idea of being generous to State banks. I said to them that the only cost of collecting their checks under this proposed bill was a small deposit of money to cover the loss of interest while the checks were in transit in the process of collection. Nearly every one of them has replied, and the great majority of them have said that they were already receiving better terms through their correspondent banks in New York and Boston. The banks in New York and Boston no doubt avail themselves of the advantages that they have by reason of being members of the Federal Reserve System, but be that as it may, the country banks who carry fair balances with their New York and Boston correspondent banks get all the advantages offered them by the Federal reserve banks, and in addition get from 2 to 2½ per cent interest on their deposits, while in the Federal reserve banks they receive nothing on their deposits.

I wish it were possible to have this system broadened so that it would take in every State bank. The State banks in case of a panic are going to benefit from it, although in an experience dating back to 1874, and I have been in banking all that time, I have never seen the time when a country bank carrying a fair balance with its city correspondent bank has not been taken care of through every panic. In the panics of 1893 and 1907 there were times when we could not get actual currency without paying a little premium for it, but as far as all practical business purposes were concerned, our city correspondent banks took care of all our requirements, and to-day our correspondent city banks say to us, "Stay with us and you need have no fear but that you will be taken care of in the future as you have been in the past."

This being the case, some inducement must be held out to the State banks or they are not going to voluntarily embrace this Federal system, as I had hoped they might, for the general prosperity of the country, it seems to me, would be subserved if we could induce the State banks to enter the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, this question has been discussed at considerable length among the people of Mississippi. I have a great many letters and telegrams regarding it. I realize the force of the suggestion made by the interrogatory of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

My support of this amendment is not entirely in the interest of the banks. I realize that while the banks are institutions established in the interests of the stockholders, they are conducted to make the largest possible dividends upon the investment. There is nothing altruistic, in other words, in the enterprise, and we all are bound to admit that it is a very convenient plan to have in a community a great many of the small banks that are organized by small contributions from merchants, doctors, lawyers, and farmers of the community for the convenience of the community. I do not think it is prudent to enact laws which will prevent those enterprises from being profitable. None of them make a very large dividend or interest on the investment.

I had a letter a day or two ago in which the cashier of a bank wrote me that the profits of his little bank were in the exchange; that the interest on the loans just about paid the clerical force.

Mr. WEEKS. I ask the Senator if that letter was from Mount Holly? Is there such a town in Mississippi?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not know of it. There is a Holly Springs, but I have no recollection of any letter from a banker at Holly Springs. However, I have a number of letters from every portion of the State, and I really think it is in the interest of the mass of the people to give the banks this very limited income which would be derived from charging exchange.

For that reason I shall vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, this matter has been considered by the House committee and by the Senate committee and by the Federal Reserve Board, and they all have determined against it as inexpedient for the system. I wish to remind the Senate that when the Federal reserve act was first drawn the question was at that time discussed most fully and completely, and this provision was put in the Federal reserve act:

Every Federal reserve bank shall receive on deposit at par from member banks or from Federal reserve banks checks and drafts drawn upon any of its depositors, and when remitted by a Federal reserve bank, checks and drafts drawn by any depositor in any other Federal reserve bank or member bank upon funds to the credit of said depositor in said reserve bank or member bank.

In other words, those who remitted to the Federal reserve bank a bunch of checks got immediate credit for that against the other member banks of the system. There is an average of somewhere about 600 banks to each of the Federal reserve banks. We will say that there are 300 banks on this side having a lot of checks sent in and 300 banks on the other side having a lot of checks sent in. They all come to a common table, and every member bank sending in these checks gets credit at par. It is only fair that the member banks upon whom these checks are drawn should be debited at par. That wipes out the transaction. It is a mere matter of bookkeeping. It costs something less than a cent apiece for these checks to make the entries. It does not do any harm whatever to the member bank. The member bank gets credit for everything it sends to the reserve bank.

The trouble is that under the old system the member banks were induced to send their checks to banks in reserve cities and the reserve cities would give them immediate credit for the checks sent in, and then would act as a collecting agency. It would send out all over the country and collect the checks at considerable expense, and then when it came to remitting the amount on the checks some of the banks at that time would charge for the remittance. But we considered the question of a bank selling exchange or rendering service to anybody by this language put into the original Federal reserve act:

Nothing herein contained shall be construed as prohibiting a member bank from charging its actual expense incurred in collecting and remitting funds, or for exchange sold to its patrons.

Mr. CURTIS. Is it intended to include the expense of clerk hire? I understand that some of these banks handle many thousands of checks, and it must necessarily, as stated by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], amount to keeping a record of them, and that requires a clerical force.

Mr. OWEN. Of course they enter on their own books the checks drawn on their own bank. When a Federal reserve bank sends a bunch of checks back there they debit the individual who has an account with them and make an entry. That gives an account of their deposits; that is, when the checks are sent in. They would do that under any system.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand that in many cases it has been the practice of the banks not to charge for collections for regular customers.

Mr. OWEN. There is a considerable variety of ways in which they deal with them.

Mr. CURTIS. If they take checks from people who are not their customers, why should they not be permitted to charge?

Mr. OWEN. They have a perfect right to do it, and they can do it under the Federal reserve act.

Mr. CURTIS. Under the Federal reserve act I understand they can only charge the actual expense, which would be, according to the statement of the Senator from Vermont a minute ago, the postage.

Mr. OWEN. No; if you send a check to a member bank and ask them to give New York exchange, they may charge you whatever is right.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will yield, that is true about central exchange, using that term, of banks, but it is not true about the ordinary checks that are sent. That language does not cover them.

Mr. OWEN. Checks for collection?

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly, checks for collection; but the language does not authorize them to do that. It has been so construed by the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. OWEN. The only provision in the old act is just that which I read.

Mr. HARDWICK. But I am trying to get a construction of it, so that there can be no possible dispute between the Senator and myself. The practice and method is to exchange these checks, and exchange under that language is not allowed.

Mr. OWEN. The purpose of the act was to collect the checks at par which went through the Federal reserve bank.

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly, and——

Mr. OWEN. That was intended as a means of serving the depositors after having deposited with a member bank, so that the check would be worth its face value in paying his bills.

Mr. HARDWICK. But, Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. Just a minute, please. When I send my check to New York to pay my bills where I owe a thousand dollars I ought to have my check pay that thousand dollars. The suggestion has been made that you can put it on the man who receives the check, who is willing to take something less in order to get the bill paid. I do not want to pay my bills in that way. The American people do not want to pay their bills in that way. They want to pay dollar for dollar what they owe.

Mr. PAGE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. PAGE. Is it not true that the country banks believe this new proposal will have the effect of largely transferring the burden of collections from the shoulders of the city to the little country banks? Under the old system the large city houses like Marshall Field & Co., who take a thousand and one checks every day, have been obliged to pay, either by way of deposits with their bankers or otherwise, a very small fraction of 1 per cent for collecting those checks. We are now proposing to transfer that burden from the city merchant, who can afford to pay it, to the little country bank, which can not.

Mr. OWEN. I will say in answer to the suggestion of the Senator that I do not blame the country banks for wanting to levy upon the checks which pass through their hands a tax on the proposal of transferring credits, but by the Federal Reserve System we have provided a plan which does not cost them anything.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Oklahoma that it does indirectly cost them something, because the little country bank which makes a few hundred dollars a year out of these collections is under your proposal obliged to forego this little source of revenue.

Mr. OWEN. The bank can, if it pleases, send its check to the correspondent in the city and not send it to the reserve bank. They do not have to send it to the reserve bank, but if they do send it to the reserve bank this system has been based upon parring the check so that the credit and debit are given at the table by the Federal reserve bank. In that way there is the least possible cost, only requiring book entry, in disposing of the matter.

Mr. PAGE. Technically what the Senator says is true, but, on the other hand, and we can not argue around the fact, it in effect transfers a burden which has been heretofore borne by Marshall Field & Co. and other large city concerns, who can afford to pay, to the little banks in the country, which ought not to be called upon to forego this little stipend which they so richly earn. You deprive them of a legitimate fee, which they must have if small country banks are to live.

Mr. OWEN. In so far as checks of business men of the country pass through the reserve bank they are parred, but if the bank wants to change the Federal reserve act and prevent the remitting of checks in this country and go back to the old system of levying tribute that is not merited and where service is not rendered, then it will have to be done by repealing that provision in the reserve act and amending it as proposed by the American bankers' amendment. I do not blame them for desiring to tax the business of the country in that way, but when they do not render service they have no right to tax the business of the country. The business men of this country are entitled to have their checks parred at the face value. When I send my check, whether it be $10 or $10,000, to pay my bills I am entitled to my full credit for it; I am entitled to have every dollar of it paid and not have a dollar cut off of it for the accommodation of a bank that rendered no service.

Mr. PAGE. The banks, the Senator says, render no service. I insist that they do render a most valuable service, for they give to rural communities banking accommodations which are almost indispensable, and without these collections many of them would find it difficult to do business. I insist, Mr. President, that this collection fee is a strictly legitimate charge of which the country banker should not be deprived.

Mr. OWEN. I have been director in a national bank for 27 years. I organized one and I was president for 10 years. I have controlled its policy during that time. I talked this matter over with my directors, and they were perfectly satisfied to give up any such advantages as that because of the compensatory advantages in which the depositors were given an additional advantage, the depositor having his confidence strengthened in the system. It led immediately to the expansion of the deposits, it enlarged the amount of money the banks received, and the banks, because of that, have had a compensatory advantage far more than any such little item as this is concerned.

Mr. PAGE. The Senator speaks of compensatory advantages. I believe that 97 per cent of the country banks—and I do not know but 99 per cent of them—do not believe there are compensatory advantages sufficient to warrant entering the system.

Mr. OWEN. They have already gotten the advantage of the system even where they are not members, and having gotten the advantages, they naturally like not to pay the price even as to this trivial matter of letting the checks be parred.

Mr. PAGE. The Senator says this does not apply to the banks of the country as a whole. I think he is wrong. I believe the State banks will not go into the system, and many of the national banks would not be in it except that they have been forced into it by the Federal reserve law.

Mr. OWEN. I know there is a very lively propaganda being carried on by a particular section of the American Bankers' Association, and they have deluged Senators with letters and telegrams saying that they are just about to expire. They will not expire; they are all right; they are doing splendidly; they are earning big interest on their capital, on the whole.

The national banks are earning approximately 10 per cent on their capital and surplus every year.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Senator one further question. Does he not know that the small country banks generally feel that they have been wronged by being deprived of this legitimate collection fee?

Mr. OWEN. The little banks in the country and the big banks of the country are influenced by their own self-interest, and I am not quarreling with them about it. I only say they ought not to fix the policy of the people of the United States nor be allowed to tax the business of this country unfairly.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator then concedes that at present these checks are parred by the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. OWEN. In so far as they pass through the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not mean any other checks except those checks, of course. But that is done regardless of the question whether there is any expense in handling them in the small banks.

Mr. OWEN. There is no instance.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not concede that by any manner of means. That is a matter of controversy.

Mr. OWEN. I am only expressing my opinion.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is the Senator's judgment, but we contend that it is otherwise.

Mr. OWEN. When they go through the Federal reserve bank they are parred.

Mr. HARDWICK. No exchange is allowed?

Mr. OWEN. No exchange is provided, but the Federal Reserve Board would have a right to determine whether or not the banks were subjected to an expense and to make due allowance for it under existing law.

Mr. HARDWICK. Under their rule they have decided that they will not allow any.

Mr. OWEN. That is the evidence.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not know whether it is or not.

Mr. OWEN. That is the evidence and that justifies the observation I made a few moments ago.

Mr. HARDWICK. As the Senator knows, that is a matter of very great controversy.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. The chairman of the committee will admit that the chairman of the Federal Reserve Board stated to the committee that he was not opposed to this amendment. He said it was a matter for Congress to regulate.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; he did say it was a matter for Congress to regulate, and I think in that respect the Senator drew the inference that he had nothing to say about it. I immediately submitted the matter to the Federal Reserve Board for their consideration and this is the letter that I received from them. It is printed in the report which I submitted April 17, and is as follows:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Washington, April 13, 1917.

Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR OWEN: I have your letter of the 12th instant in reference to the amendment to Senate bill No. 8 proposed by Senator GRONNA, and brought it to the attention of the board at the meeting this morning.

After a full discussion of the matter the board directed me to say to you that it would regard the adoption of the amendment as most unfortunate. It believes firmly that it is the duty of every bank to pay without deduction or discount, at its own counter, checks drawn by its depositors against their balances. No bank questions this obligation on its part when cash payments are demanded by the presenter of the check, and about one-half of all banking institutions in the country are now remitting without deduction for checks on themselves forwarded by the Federal reserve banks. The board realizes that the operation of the Federal reserve check clearing system has in a number of cases deprived banks from an income from exchange on checks which they have hitherto enjoyed, but as they are enabled to offset checks drawn upon themselves sent them by the Federal reserve banks with checks drawn upon other banks and are permitted, furthermore, to cover by shipments of currency at the expense of the Federal reserve bank, no actual hardship is imposed. An amendment permitting a charge of not exceeding 10 cents per $100 or fraction thereof, based on the total of checks and drafts presented at any one time for collection and payment of checks and remissions therefor by exchange or otherwise, would, in the opinion of the board, be construed by the banks as a definite suggestion that they impose such a charge, with the result that eventually these charges would be generally made, not only as against checks coming in from a distance but even against checks presented by payees residing in the community where the bank is located. While banks would no doubt pay checks for their own depositors without any charge, it is entirely possible that many of them would avail themselves of the opportunity of enforcing this charge against checks presented by payees who are not depositors. This would impose a hardship upon those of the poorer classes who are not bank depositors.

The board would call attention also to the fact that for some years past actual payees of checks drawn upon country banks have been able in many cases to collect them without exchange charges, which have been absorbed by their depository banks, which have in turn been reimbursed by balances kept with them by the country banks. Immediately upon the passage of Senate bill No. 8, or no later in any event than November 17 next, no bank balances will count as reserve except those with Federal reserve banks, so that facilities for free collection will no longer be afforded by member banks, and the result would be that many individuals, firms, and corporations would be paying exchange charges of one-tenth of 1 per cent upon checks which they have hitherto been able to collect at par.

The enactment of the proposed amendment, in the opinion of the board, would, because of the injury it would work to holders of bank checks, create a strong protest all over the country, which would be far stronger than the pressure that is now being brought to bear for its enactment.

In this connection I inclose for your information copy of a resolution that was adopted at a meeting of the governors of Federal reserve banks which was held here last week.

Very truly, yours,

W. P. G. HARDING, Governor.

[Resolution passed at tenth conference of Federal reserve bank governors.]

KITCHIN BILL.

Whereas it is stated that there is to be reintroduced in the present Congress for enactment the so-called Kitchin bill, the purpose of which is to so amend the Federal reserve act as to permit national banks to impose exchange charges contrary to the basic principles of the Federal reserve collection system; and

Whereas it is understood that under the direction of a committee of the American Bankers' Association, known as the committee of twenty-five, a vigorous and far-reaching campaign is being conducted to bring influence upon the Congress to secure the enactment of the Kitchin bill; and

Whereas it is the belief of the governors of the several Federal reserve banks that should the Kitchin bill become law it would not only serve to nullify the great benefits which would accrue to the business interests of the country under the operation of a scientific, direct, and efficient collection system, but its enactment would seriously affect and seriously injure the best and broadest development of the Federal Reserve System: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the governors in conference earnestly urge the Federal Reserve Board to use every legitimate means possible to prevent the enactment of the Kitchin bill when introduced into Congress, and to promptly develop and put into the fullest operation the Federal reserve collection system.

These governors represent the organized banks of the United States; they are elected by the organized banks, and they represent their views. They come here and by unanimous vote point out the mischiefs that would occur if we were to break up the system of clearing at par. Already a large part of the banks of the country are clearing at par, without any question by anybody. New England has had a system of clearing checks at par for a long period of time, and we are only adopting now the New England system, in effect, of clearing checks at par.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PAGE. The Senator from Oklahoma is in part correct and he is in part incorrect. For example, every bank in the reserve cities like Boston and New York, where our balances are kept, have urged us to collect checks at par. In a bank with which I am connected we were under such obligations to our correspondent city bank that for a long time we collected at par; but after a time we found that our neighbor banks were making a thousand or two thousand dollars out of collections which we were not getting, and finally we went into what are called the "black-listed banks," and up to the time of the passage of the Federal reserve act the great body of the New England banks were charging for collections.

Mr. OWEN. I knew at Boston they did clear checks at par on a very large scale. The question is merely as to whether or not we shall interfere with the convenience and comfort of the depositors of the banks throughout the country, who are a good deal more numerous than are the banks, and who are entitled to have their checks paid at par and not have a deduction made from them by the payee. Of course, a payee who has a check sent to him for a thousand dollars and who puts it in bank will submit to that tax of a dollar or two dollars and a half when it finally comes down; but he does not feel that he has really received payment at par at last, because he is charged something out of the very check which has paid his bill. I think when a man who deposits in a country bank pays his bills in New York or in Boston or in Topeka such payment ought to be a par payment, and the local bank that has had the use of his money ought not to want to charge an exchange when a service has not really been rendered.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Take a case of this kind: Suppose the Senator from Oklahoma should go to a bank in some obscure village in Oklahoma and ask that bank to cash a check for $100 or $1,000, does he think that that bank should give him the money without any compensation?

Mr. OWEN. Not a bit of it; and under the Federal reserve act that bank can charge what it thinks is right for the accommodation.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But, as a matter of fact, it does not do so.

Mr. OWEN. But it can do so under the law.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But the Senator is familiar with the operation of the law, and the Senator knows that it is not often done, and that if it were done this protest would not be coming to Congress.

Mr. OWEN. No; the Senator from Mississippi does not really fully appreciate, I think, just what they are driving at. What they want to do is to charge for the entire bunch of checks which come from the Federal reserve bank in bulk. Listen to this a moment——

Mr. PAGE. May I ask the Senator from Oklahoma one question?

Mr. OWEN. Just a moment. Here is what the language is:

Provided further, That nothing in this or any other section of this act shall be construed as prohibiting a member bank from making reasonable charges against the presenter—

Mind you, that is broad enough to cover the Federal reserve bank—in no case to exceed 10 cents per $100 or fraction thereof based on the total of checks and drafts presented at any one time—

That exactly fits the case of a bunch of checks sent by the Federal reserve bank to a local bank for entry or—for collection or payment of checks and drafts drawn upon it and remission therefor by exchange or otherwise.

Which means a cross entry on the books of the Federal reserve bank.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is the Senator reading from the amendment which I offered?

Mr. OWEN. I am; yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Where is the word "presenter" in my amendment? I did not put that in.

Mr. OWEN. It is in the copy of the amendment which was given to me by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. HARDWICK. That must be the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. OWEN. This amendment, at any rate, reads "against the presenter"; but, at all events, it is intended to apply, and everybody knows it is intended to apply, to a bunch of checks sent down by the Federal reserve bank.

Mr. HARDWICK. I know, but the Senator from Oklahoma emphasized the word "presenter." I had a reason for not putting that word into the amendment which I offered.

Mr. OWEN. I had the copy of another amendment. Still, however, the word "otherwise" covers it. It is really intended to cover the remittance made to the Federal reserve bank.

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Oklahoma one question before he sits down. The customer of a bank in Vermont brings a thousand dollars in money and deposits it. He immediately sends his check to Boston where he owes a bill. The money is deposited in his home bank. The home bank may be compelled to send that money to Boston, very likely at an actual cost of from 50 cents to $1 a thousand for transmission. Why should the country bank be compelled to pay that money in Boston?

Mr. OWEN. The Senator from Vermont presents only one-half of this transaction. The other half is, that when the money comes back this depositor puts it in there, and the amount of deposits is all the time balancing the amount going out.

Mr. PAGE. I beg pardon; they usually do, I confess, but——

Mr. OWEN. Take it in the long run and they do.

Mr. PAGE. I know, but there must be many transfers, as every banker knows. They have to transmit shipments of currency to the country bank to supply the bank. Then when the balance of exchange runs the other way it becomes necessary to transmit currency from the city bank to the home bank.

Mr. OWEN. That transmission of currency is paid for by the Federal reserve bank.

Mr. PAGE. That is where we have to keep a balance of several thousand dollars with the Federal reserve bank.

Mr. OWEN. Where you keep a balance there.

Mr. PAGE. And without any interest.

Mr. OWEN. And they extend you that accommodation.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a moment. I have so often expressed my views upon this question that I shall not now take up any length of time.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], however, argues in a circle when he states to this body that this is a question between the depositor and the banks. It is a question between the great commercial bodies of this country and the little country banks. That is all there is to it. These same great commercial bodies do not have to take checks if they do not want them. They can refuse any check; they can compel the debtor, whoever he may be, who owes them money, to send them a bank draft. They do not have to accept checks.

I am really surprised to hear the argument presented by the Senator from Oklahoma. I had hoped that he would present an argument which would be of some real value in the way of information to this body. The excuse given by the Federal board seems to me to be indefensible. That any man who knows anything about banking must admit that the small commercial banks or the large commercial banks do not always charge exchange; they do not charge their own customers exchange; but why should we expect the little country banks, without any charge whatever, to clear all foreign checks, not drawn upon them, but drawn upon other banks? That is the question.

Now, Mr. President, I believe I am safe in saying that every banker in my State, whether he belongs to the Federal Reserve System or to the State system, is in favor of this amendment. I have not heard a single complaint from any depositor among the people of my State; but I have heard complaints from great commercial bodies, from the wholesale houses, and from the large catalogue houses. Whatever the banks lose in the transaction of their business on collection charges is all being made by the great commercial bodies, and there is not a penny taken out of the pockets of the people by the exchange charged by the little country banks.

Mr. President, I had a similar amendment, which I presented to this bill a year ago, but the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] has presented his amendment, and I shall be very glad to vote for it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator stated that there was not a penny taken out of the pockets of the people.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes, sir; I state that without fear of successful contradiction.

Mr. REED. Suppose there is a merchant in the Senator's home town who wants to pay a bill of $1,000 in New York City and he sends his check to New York City for $1,000. Does the Senator mean that, if the bank is going to charge a dollar or $10 for collection, the creditor in New York City will not deduct that amount from the remittance?

Mr. GRONNA. Is the Senator through with his question?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I mean to say that I have had actual experience for 25 or 30 years, and I know that he does not. Furthermore, if the creditor in New York receives that check and sends it back either to the little bank upon which the check was drawn or to its correspondent, there would not be a penny charged upon that check under the old system.

Mr. REED. Now, the Senator speaks with great positiveness——

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I do, because I am familiar with the matter.

Mr. REED. But the testimony that was adduced before the Banking and Currency Committee from many men, coming from many different banking institutions in different States, was to the effect that in many instances the merchant or the individual making the remittance—the remitter—was charged. If there are no charges being made to anybody, it is perfectly clear that the banks would not be here clamoring for a restitution of the right to make this charge.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not think that any commercial man will undertake to say that it has been the practice if he accepts a check from his customer he is going to credit his customer with any sum less than the amount of that check. I have never heard of that charge being made.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me just a moment, if it is true that the banks are here clamoring for a return of the right to make these charges, it is perfectly evident they are here because it will put some money in their vaults, and somebody will have to pay that money. Will the Senator tell us who it is?

Mr. GRONNA. I will say to the Senator that I do not know of any banker being here. I know that the amendment of the Senator from Georgia is here, and that amendment has been prepared by the Bankers' Association of the United States and has been approved by them. That is all I know about it.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think that they got it up for the purpose of cutting down their revenues or increasing their revenues?

Mr. GRONNA. Why, certainly they got it up for the purpose of increasing their revenues.

Mr. REED. If their revenues are going to be increased, somebody will have to pay that increase.

Mr. GRONNA. But the Senator from Missouri knows that this expense will have to be paid by the commercial bodies and not by the individual depositors.

Mr. REED. The Senator says if I "know anything about the business." I confess I am not as well posted, perhaps, in regard to country banking as is the Senator——

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator has manifested that.

Mr. REED. Because the Senator is himself a banker, he may speak with more experience, and possibly with more heat than I will——

Mr. GRONNA. Well, I have told the Senator from Missouri the way the business has been transacted and the way it is being transacted.

Mr. REED. Of course, it is entirely possible that the business being done by the Senator's bank may not be the model by which all banking business is done.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, does the Senator know of his personal knowledge any bank that does not transact the business in that way?

Mr. REED. I do not profess to say further than that the testimony before the committee of which I am a member, and which listened for many weeks to testimony, was to the effect that when the charges were made by the bank the money was collected from somebody, and when it was collected from somebody the profit went to the bank. Who that somebody was that had to make the payment differed in different instances. Sometimes the wholesale merchant would stand the loss and sometimes the retail merchant would stand the loss, according to the testimony which we received; but, in any event, if you load it onto the wholesale merchant in New York City primarily, you may be very sure that he in turn will add it to the price of his goods which he is selling to the country merchant. It gets back to that individual, and then in the end it will get back finally to the man who buys the goods.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Missouri a question?

Mr. REED. In just a moment. Like nearly everything else, it gets back to the ultimate consumer. So I do not think we gain anything by undertaking to dodge the question by saying that that money is primarily paid by the merchant in New York.

Mr. GRONNA. I did not say it was paid by the merchant in New York.

Mr. REED. And moreover the business is not all done between the country and New York. Checks are constantly sent back and forth a distance of 10 or 20 miles almost in local communities; indeed the great mass of the business of the country is done in that way. The testimony before our committee was that the banks had in many instances been utterly unconscionable in their charges.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Missouri a question?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator, of course, knows that the Federal Reserve Board has held that checks shall be cashed at par, and that since the Federal Reserve System went into effect there has been no exchange allowed upon checks that have gone through the Federal Reserve banks. Now, will the Senator show me where the public has profited by that system and where the prices of goods have been reduced to the public?

Mr. REED. Oh, of course, it would be absolutely impossible to take a 10-cent rake-off that some banker got on a check and trace it down through the channels of business to the ultimate consumer; but we, nevertheless, know the fact to-day that every burden that we may place upon business must necessarily be added to the cost of the goods which are ultimately to be consumed or used.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is not always true. It can not be passed on in many cases to the ultimate consumer; but generally it is true.

Mr. REED. In detailed cases it may not be so, but in the broad sense it is the law of trade. Is it not a mere begging of the question, then, to say that this money comes out of the big man—the big commercial institution—instead of coming out of the small individual? The question ought to be not who pays the money but, Is it a just and equitable charge?

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator from Missouri will yield, with the permission of the Senator from North Dakota, I will say that the question ought to be also whether the banks are not entitled from somewhere to a reasonable compensation for the service they perform? The Senator avoids that. That is the precise question that they present.

Mr. REED. No; that is absolutely involved in my statement. I say the question ought to be whether the charge is a just and an equitable charge.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. That covers all the Senator puts in his proposition.

Mr. HARDWICK. The proposition is, Do these men render service, and, if so, ought we not to allow them a reasonable compensation therefor?

Mr. WILLIAMS. "No charge at all" can not be just and reasonable.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it may be an exceedingly just and reasonable regulation.

I want just a word on this matter. I do not mean, however, to take the Senator from North Dakota off his feet. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. GRONNA. No, Mr. President; I have not concluded.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. GRONNA. I shall conclude in a few moments, but I have not concluded.

Mr. President, I did not mean to cast any reflection upon the Senator from Missouri with reference to his experience as a business man or as a banker; but anyone who has had any experience at all with banking knows that no banker, whether his bank is large or small, will charge exchange upon the checks of his own customers. I do not know of any banker who would be foolish enough to do that. It simply resolves itself down to this: Shall the small banks which are scattered all over the country—and the small banks are really the only ones involved—have a right to make a charge not to exceed 10 cents a hundred dollars for the collection of checks or drafts which they have to enter upon their books? It costs them something to keep clerks in their banks and enter all these items. It does not make any difference from what part of the country the checks come, they must all be entered in their books; and in many instances, as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] has stated—and I will say that the Senator from Vermont knows a great deal more about banking than I do, because I am not a practical banker—in many instances these banks have to transmit currency in order to pay these checks and to make up the balances. The whole question resolves itself into this, that there is an effort not only on the part of the large commercial bodies of this country, but upon the part of the large banks, to do away with the little banks in the country, which really serve a valuable purpose. They are of great benefit to the people of the Nation, especially in the new sections of country like the Northwest. I do not know how we would get along without them in my section of the country; and the statement that it is unreasonable that they should be permitted to charge not to exceed 10 cents a hundred dollars, it seems to me, can not be said to be unreasonable.

Mr. President, before I close I wish to state that I can not vote for this bill. I am a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, and I have given careful study to its provisions, but, whether this amendment is adopted or not, I shall be compelled to vote against the bill. My reasons for voting against it will not be influenced because of the failure of this amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator please, I hope the Senator will vote for the amendment, and that the amendment will not fail. I do not believe it will fail.

Mr. GRONNA. I shall vote for the amendment; but there is a provision in this bill of greater importance than the question of whether the banks shall be allowed to charge exchange upon checks. There is a fundamental question involved in this measure, and that is, Shall we permit all the gold in the United States to be mobilized from every bank and from every corner of this country into a few large banks? I may be mistaken in my judgment, but I remember having read in history that in 1864 gold went up to $2.85. Those who were in possession of the gold had an opportunity to make that tremendous profit. I say it is possible that to-day we are legislating in a way that may put it in the power of the great corporations to control the money market and burden the people of this country simply by holding and owning the gold. That is the reason, Mr. President, why I can not vote for the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I am in favor of this amendment. I doubt if the existing law authorized the Federal Reserve Board to make the order which it has made. I know that when the act was passed by Congress most of us did not think so.

Mr. President, I doubt something else: I doubt the power of Congress, or the right of Congress, at any rate, even if it had so intended, to require of any man anywhere to do any work without any compensation. The banks do a certain amount of work in connection with their exchange business. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] says that that work costs them nothing. That statement I take issue with. If a bank has a sufficient volume of this sort of business, it has to employ a special exchange clerk or teller. Some banks employ several who do nothing else. When the volume of that sort of business for a little bit of a country bank is so small that it does not justify the employment of a special exchange teller or clerk, still the time and the exchange work is divided among the other employees of the small bank and is subtracted from the work which they would be doing upon some other branch of the banking business. So the bank does do work and you want it to do the work without compensation. The bank does the work at some cost to itself, however small, but you who oppose this amendment do not want it to receive a sufficient remuneration to repay that cost—no remuneration, however small. It is wrong.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, the Senator does not interpret what I said to that effect, because the Federal reserve act itself provides for the payment of any actual cost that is incurred.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, yes; but the Federal Reserve Board has ruled in effect and contrary to the fact that there is no cost, because it has ruled that the exchange must take place at par. Now, as I understood this provision when the original Federal reserve bill came from the conferees, they had saved the point that I, for one, had insisted upon, that these banks should be allowed to charge at least enough to pay the cost of the transaction. Now, the Federal Reserve Board, in the face of that very language to which the Senator has referred, has ruled that this exchange work must take place at par, and, necessarily, in making that ruling they have ruled that it costs nothing, because the law itself enables them to charge whatever it costs.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator's attention is called to the fact that for the cross entry of these credits on their books the Federal reserve banks charge of course nothing, and the Federal reserve bank will itself remit the currency where it is necessary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that; but that has nothing to do with the little bank back yonder attending to its work. The "cross entries in the reserve banks" of course do not cost the country bank anything, but its own entries do, because they and the balance of the business entail work and work has to be paid for.

Now, as to the Federal board paying for the remission of the currency, that is wrong, too. Here is a transaction between me and the Senator from Oklahoma as buyer and seller.

The transaction is closed by exchange; and now you want to make the country pay the cost of the exchange, instead of making either the buyer or the seller, or the two together, pay it. The transaction of buying and selling is one between me and the Senator, and it is not a cost that ought to be laid upon the country through the instrumentality of the Reserve Board sending the currency for nothing.

Mr. OWEN. The fact is that these checks pass back and forth, and it is only the balances at the end of a season, or from time to time, that are remitted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that.

Mr. OWEN. The actual transmission of funds occurs only in one out of a thousand transactions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that perfectly, and I understand that the amount of cost which the public assumes through the instrumentality of the Reserve Board being a mere clearing house with sheet balances is small; but whatever it is—however small—the principle is the same. The point is, however, that that has nothing to do with the fact that the little country bank of $25,000 capital has got to do certain work for nothing; and the fact that when all of the checks that go through it and go through other banks everywhere are cleared together and a balance struck, the balance is very small, does not affect the amount of work that each country bank has had to do within its own four walls.

Mr. President, I intended when this question was presented to the Senate to make quite an argument in favor of it. I do not mean by that, necessarily, a good argument, but I mean an extended one; but the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], my colleague [Mr. VARDAMAN], the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], and the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] have, in my opinion, so perfectly and completely covered the ground that I had virtually nothing left to say, except upon the point which I intended to cover a moment ago. While we are talking the Germans are sinking ships.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, when we were undertaking to create a Federal Reserve System two questions were sharply presented. One was, What is to be the use of the Federal Reserve System? The other question was, How is the Federal Reserve System to be maintained if it is created?

The first question—What is the use of the Federal Reserve System?—could be answered in a word. Broadly, it was intended to sustain the credit of the entire banking system of the United States; and accordingly, at the instance and solicitation of every class of bankers in the United States, big and little, hearings were granted to all of these several kinds of bankers. The State banks and trust companies came before the committee and asked that certain provisions be inserted in the bill so that the State banks and trust companies could come under the system. These changes were made, and the understanding at that time was that, as all the banks of the country would get the benefit of this Federal Reserve System which was created to sustain the entire system, so all of them ought to be willing to make some contributions for the benefit of that system.

Now, what has transpired? It has transpired that the national banks, which were compelled to come into this system, have been practically compelled to sustain it; that the attitude of the State banks and trust companies has been: "The tree having now been planted, and its shade being now generous, we will sit under the shade of this great financial tree and enjoy its protection, but we will contribute nothing whatsoever to the watering or the pruning of the tree."

I think legislation ought to be enacted which will compel those who engage in the business of banking to each contribute his share to the maintenance of the system, to the maintenance of that great reservoir from which the system must draw in case of a financial stringency in the country. I say that legislation ought to be enacted to compel them to come in and do their duty, because the entire weight of all the fiscal transactions of the Government and of the people ultimately falls upon the Federal Reserve System; and as it does fall upon the Federal Reserve System there ought to be gathered into that system all the resources of the banks of the country. And yet, with a selfishness which I think is absolutely inexcusable, nearly all the State banks and trust companies have remained out of the system. They have figured coldly that the Federal Reserve System is big enough and strong enough to protect the finances of our country, and that they will enjoy its benefits and advantages and stay outside of the system.

So far as I am concerned, I am getting in a frame of mind where I am willing to levy some kind of a tax that will make it very necessary for these banks to come in and do their share. If, however, we are to maintain the Federal Reserve System without such legislation as I have spoken of, then there must be advantages of some kind given to the Federal Reserve System, because these banks that now make up the Federal Reserve System have to supply its capital; they have to subscribe for its stock; they have to practically guarantee its success. One of the things that it was thought would make the Federal Reserve System attractive, bringing business to that great system, was the clearing of checks at par. It is now proposed to destroy that feature of the system.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, the Senator is absolutely mistaken about that. He could not have known the facts, or he would not have made that statement.

Mr. REED. I am talking about the ideas that were present with the committee when this bill was written, and at a time when the Senator from Vermont was not a member of the committee, and at a time when he knows nothing whatsoever regarding its deliberations.

Mr. PAGE. That is true in regard to the city banks; but so far as the country banks are concerned, I think I know that they have not favored the system of collecting checks without pay.

Mr. REED. Let me ask the Senator, Is he interested in national banks?

Mr. PAGE. I am.

Mr. REED. And is he also interested in State banks and trust companies?

Mr. PAGE. I am; yes, sir.

Mr. REED. Your State banks and trust companies have not come into the system?

Mr. PAGE. No, sir; and I will say, further, that some of the national banks of Vermont are now discussing the idea of retiring from the system because of these conditions.

Mr. REED. Well, if a few more retire, they probably will all be stopped from retiring. These gentlemen who retire belong to the class to which the State banks belong to which I have been referring. That is, they say, "The system is here; the reservoir is created; the national banks put in their money, and it is there, and it is a protection to us in a time of any trouble. We can pull out and get that protection just as well outside as inside, and we will not contribute"—a very selfish purpose.

When the question of parring checks came up in the committee, when the Senator from Vermont was not there, of course—for he was not a member—some of the small country banks came in and said that was a considerable source of revenue to them. They undertook to justify their charges upon the ground that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] a few moments ago mentioned, namely, that they were performing a service. This was the line of reasoning which they presented: They not only said they were performing a service, but they said they were actually out of the use of money; for, said they, "If a customer of our bank draws his check and sends it to New York, and it is accepted in New York and sent back to us here at par, the customer has had the use of that money"; and so they undertook to figure, by that and similar transactions, that the money was passing back and forth from the country bank to New York, and that the banker was laying out the money. As a matter of fact, the only thing that was passing between the country banker and New York was a piece of paper in an envelope with a 2-cent stamp upon it, and the money was lying right in somebody's bank all the time, doing business and making money for the banker who happened to hold it.

It is true that there are occasionally transactions that must be conducted in cash. At the end of a day's business in a clearing house, when millions of dollars in checks have gone through, there may be a little balance that is settled by cash between the banks.

Mr. OWEN. And even that is settled by check.

Mr. REED. And even that generally is settled by check, as the Senator states. There may be occasionally some moneys sent from the provinces into the cities or from the cities back to the provinces, if we can use those terms; but, as a matter of fact, it is generally all transacted through the maintenance of a balance in some business center against which checks are drawn and to which checks are sent, and probably not one dollar of cash is moved from the outside parts of the country to the business centers for $1,000,000 of business that is transacted.

Mr. OWEN. It is covered by a gold balance in the Treasury, held by these 12 reserve banks now.

Mr. REED. Yes. Now, the system that was established in this way for the parring of checks was intended to cut off a system of petty graft that was being maintained by certain banks, and it was intended to confer that privilege and benefit upon the great body of our people. It was intended to arrange it so that in this country a man owing a bill to his neighbor in the adjoining county could send that neighbor a check for the face of the amount and that neighbor could take the check down and put it in a bank of the Federal Reserve System and get its face. It was intended to make it so that a man living in the city of Milwaukee and owing a bill in New York City, and having money in the city of Milwaukee, could send his check to his New York creditor and that creditor could deposit the check at par in a bank in New York City, and that bank could have a credit at par. It is only a matter of bookkeeping with the bank in Milwaukee. It was intended to give this benefit and blessing to the people of the country, and it was held out as one of the chief advantages flowing from this system.

Mr. OWEN. And it also avoids, I might say to the Senator, the necessity of keeping a bookkeeping account of microscopic charges on every check going through the country.

Mr. REED. Now, of course, there are some of these small banks that made two or three or four thousand dollars a year by nipping 10 cents off of this transaction, by collecting their toll of 5 or 10 or 20 cents off of that transaction, by getting a dollar off of this other transaction, and by taking $5 off of some other transaction. They were the keepers of the gate through which the business of the country had to pass, and everybody had to drop something into their hat as he passed through, although the money they were handling was the money of the gentleman who was passing through the gate, and always has been his money. The banks in modern times have never done business on their own account. They do business upon the money of their depositors. No attack is to be made on them for that; that is perfectly legitimate; but a part of the compensation that ought to come back to the public is the right of a man who has money in a bank that is a member of the Federal Reserve System to pay his bills at par with his check, so that that check can be put into any part of that great system in any part of the country and his check is worth its face.

Now, what is the proposition? Some bankers got together and they wrote out what they would like to have, and they would like to have some more profits and some more tolls; and two bankers on the floor of the Senate have given us the benefit of their experience and knowledge in extended arguments in favor of increasing the profits of the banker. I do not want to criticize that, but I am getting about in the frame of mind to call attention to a rule of the Senate which forbids any man voting on any bill where he is directly interested in the result.

Mr. PAGE. In that connection, Mr. President, if I may be allowed, I want to say that the Senator from Kansas City is trying to take a burden from that city of probably $100,000 a year and put it into their pockets, and to take from the little banker in the country the little pittance he gets from each check and give it to Kansas City.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator to whom reference is made is not a Senator from Kansas City. He is a Senator from the State of Missouri, and he represents the little banker just as he represents the big banker, and he represents the citizenry of that State as well as he can, and he has no special interest in any bank or in any class of banks; and there are a great many more little banks in my State that have votes than there are big banks that have votes. I have not in my office to-day half a dozen letters from the small banks of my State asking this; neither have I a protest from a single big bank against it.

Mr. PAGE. In the Senator's argument he is certainly speaking for Kansas City and not for the little banks of Missouri.

Mr. REED. I am speaking for my State. I am speaking for the Great Federal Reserve System. I am not speaking for a city. I am not narrow enough to speak for a city. I want to see the Federal Reserve System, which has already proven itself the bulwark of our Nation in time of financial stress and danger, maintained. It has been maintained thus far under the wise guidance of a board that have, I think, performed almost financial miracles; and there is no member of that board here recommending this change.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, it seems to me there is but one question involved in whether we should adopt this proposition or not, and that is the question as to whether it is best for the Federal Reserve System. It is perfectly optional with the State bank as to whether it will make a deposit with the Federal Reserve System or not, and consequently be deprived of the right to charge one-tenth of 1 per cent for cashing checks. There is nothing compulsory about it. If it does not want to keep on deposit with the Federal reserve bank money to meet this parring of exchange, it need not do so, and therefore it need not lose anything whatever. It is purely optional with the State banker, and consequently this theory that it is a coercion of the State bank, it seems to me, is not warranted.

Looking at it from the other standpoint, it seems to me to be clear that this system of exchange is equitable. These State banks do get an enormous benefit from the Federal Reserve System. The reason is because they can take their securities to a national bank that is a member bank and cash them, and that member bank can draw from the Federal Reserve System upon those securities all the money that is necessary to meet any crisis. With that enormous benefit—a benefit that is worth thousands of dollars to them and sometimes prevents a run upon them—should they not be willing, if this bill becomes a law, to enter into this system by keeping on deposit with the Federal reserve bank of their district money sufficient to meet at par the checks that are drawn by depositors upon their banks?

That being the case, Mr. President, it seems to me to be clear that the proposal of the committee ought to be adopted. It strengthens the Federal Reserve System. It is practically of little detriment to the country State bank. It is not any, considering the fact that the banker has got on deposit in his bank all the time money to meet the check and is getting the interest that it earns for the four or five days that it is necessary to have that check cashed and balanced after it is drawn and presented to the home bank. These are compensations that the State bank gets, and it seems to me, in view of that, that we ought to have the provision recommended by the committee as a law to make perfect the exchange of checks between banks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of New Mexico in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. VARDAMAN. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. STERLING. Has the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. STERLING. I am paired with that Senator and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Owing to the absence of my pair, the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], I withhold my vote.

Mr. VARDAMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to ask whether the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have a general pair with that Senator. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. In his absence I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "nay."

Mr. WEEKS (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. I observe that he is not present, and I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] because of illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. He is absent, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. HUSTING. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] is detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN];

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]; and

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays, 29 as follows:

YEAS—36.

Ashurst	Gore	La Follette	Simmons
Bankhead	Gronna	Lewis	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Harding	McCumber	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Hardwick	McKellar	Smith, Mich.

Dillingham	Knox	Smith, Md.	Weeks
Fernald	Lane	Smith, S. C.	Wolcott
Goff	Lodge	Smoot

So Mr. HARDWICK's amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to present a number of telegrams from citizens of Tennessee on the subject of the bill under consideration. I ask that they be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMPHIS, TENN., April 19, 1917.

Senator KENNETH MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

Will appreciate very much your influence toward securing enactment of Senate bill 1796, introduced by Senator OWEN, providing for reasonable exchange charge and reduction of country bank reserve to 5 per cent in vault and 5 per cent in reserve bank.

S. E. RAGLAND.

MEMPHIS, TENN., April 19, 1917.

Senator K. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

Understand Senate bill 1796, regarding Federal reserve amendments, has been introduced by Senator OWEN. Will appreciate very greatly your support of this bill, as we consider it contains provisions of great importance to the banking interests.

GILMER WINSTON, Vice President.

MEMPHIS, TENN., April 19, 1917.

Hon. K. D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

In my opinion you should support the Owen bill, 1796.

JO. L. HUTTON,
President Mercantile National Bank.

MEMPHIS, TENN., April 19, 1917.

Hon. K. D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

We indorse Senate bill 1796, introduced by Senator OWEN, and solicit your support of the bill.

MEMPHIS, TENN., April 19, 1917.

Senator KENNETH MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

Senate bill No. 1796, introduced by Senator OWEN, providing for reasonable exchange charge, with reduction of country bank reserve to 5 per cent in vault and 5 per cent in reserve bank, should unquestionably be passed. Your active influence toward securing enactment of bill into law will be appreciated.

D. M. ARMSTRONG.

MEMPHIS, TENN., April 19, 1917.

Hon. K. D. MCKELLAR,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

Regard it important that you vote for and support Owen bill, No. 1796, providing for reasonable exchange charges and country reserve requirements. Will appreciate your active support.

MANHATTAN SAVINGS BANK & TRUST CO.

NEW YORK, April 30, 1917.

Senator K. D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

Understand proposed amendments to Federal reserve act up for consideration in House to-day will likely be considered in the Senate in two or three days. These proposed amendments, as recommended by both House and Senate committees, increase the reserve of banks in Chattanooga and Nashville, which are reserve cities, from 6 to 10 per cent, and, we understand, also increases the reserve to be deposited with the Federal reserve banks slightly for other member banks in Tennessee. Normally this will work a hardship on every member bank in Tennessee. We hope you can see your way clear to urge that the present law governing amount that should be deposited with the Federal reserve banks remain as it is.

W. A. SADD.
T. R. PRESTON.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. GRONNA. On the passage of the bill I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was passed.

Mr. OWEN. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives upon the bill and amendment, and that the Chair appoint the conferees upon the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. OWEN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. MCLEAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that the unfinished business, Senate bill No. 2, be now proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. LEWIS obtained the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin if he desires to tender an amendment and to have it read.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wish to present an amendment to the pending bill, and I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 1, Chapter VII, insert the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That the power herein conferred upon the President to place an embargo upon the export of any article or articles from the United States to any foreign country shall in no case be used to prohibit such exports to any foreign country whose Government is at peace with the United States when such article or articles are for the use and consumption of and within such foreign country, unless such article or articles, in the judgment of the President to be so declared in his proclamation, be required for domestic use and consumption by the people of the United States, or for the use of the Government of the United States in its prosecution of the war; nor shall such power so conferred upon the President be used to interfere with the neutral rights of any neutral nation or to coerce the Government of any such neutral nation, directly or indirectly, to engage or participate in the existing war.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to offer that when the bill comes into the Senate. It would not be in order now, of course.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand the amendment is not in order now. If I may be permitted, I have offered it at this time because of the fact that there is pending on the desk of the Presiding Officer a motion in writing to close the debate. That motion after it is put and carried will cut off the offering of or voting upon any amendment which has not prior to that time been offered and read. I wished merely to have this amendment offered and read at this time so that I would have an opportunity for a vote upon it when the bill reaches the stage of voting in the Senate, and the chapter would then be open to amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. ASHURST. I gave notice this morning that at the conclusion of the morning hour I would address the Senate on the pending bill, but I gladly yield to the Senator from Illinois. I will follow him.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] have an amendment to offer?

Mr. HARDWICK. I have an amendment to chapter 1 to offer, but I need not present it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. LEWIS. I think the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] desires to introduce an amendment, and I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If the Senator will kindly yield for a moment, notice was given and the right reserved upon a motion to strike out, but for the reasons which have been suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] I wish to have the motion read, so that there may be no technical objections to its ultimate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request will be granted and the amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. A motion to strike out, which has been duly reserved and of which notice has been given. Strike out, beginning with the word "and," in line 19, page 8, down to and including the word "same," in line 13, page 9.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Illinois will yield to me, I desire to put myself in the same position in regard to a certain amendment that I shall offer to the bill as has been suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LEWIS. If I understand the Senator from Iowa, he desires to send his amendment to the desk and have it read and take such steps as will enable him to return to it when the bill is in the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield for that purpose, Mr. President.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not regard it as necessary, but in order to be on the safe side I desire to say that I will offer this amendment in the Senate. I now present it to have it read. It is an amendment to subsection (c) of Chapter II, being practically the same amendment which I offered at a former time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the proper place:

In time of war the President is hereby authorized to prescribe and promulgate rules and regulations for the purpose of preventing the disclosure to the public, and thereby to the enemy, of information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, and disposition of any of the armed forces of the United States or the plans of naval or military operations; and whoever in time of war shall willfully violate any such rule or regulation shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, however, That no such rule or regulation shall apply to the proceedings of the Congress of the United States nor to the debates therein.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire also to give notice and present now an amendment which I intend to offer to section 1 of Chapter XI when the bill reaches that stage.

The proposed amendment is as follows:

SECTION 1. A search warrant may be issued in conformity with the provisions of this act for the purpose of searching any premises or persons to discover any property which has been used or which is intended to be used as the means of committing a public offense.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am much obliged to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield at the request of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY], who desires to offer an amendment that it may lie on the table.

Mr. KIRBY. I desire to offer an amendment to subsection (b), page 8. I ask that it may be read now and considered when the appropriate time is reached.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the proper place the following:

A press censorship is hereby established for the period of the war with the Secretaries of the Navy and War as directors thereof. They or either of them by written order, may summarily suspend for 30 days any newspaper or magazine making publication of any information concerning the plans or conduct of any military or naval operations or movement of ships or troops, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for fortification or defense, or any other information relating to public defense which might be useful to the enemy, unless the matter has been given out for publication by one or the other of said directors, or its publication consented to. It shall also be unlawful for the owner or publisher of any newspaper or magazine to make the publications aforesaid or to fail to obey the said order of suspension, and upon conviction of either of said offenses in any court of competent jurisdiction the managing editor thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, and the publication suspended for a further period of six months as part of the judgment against the offender.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] desire to interrupt me?

Mr. KELLOGG. I send to the desk an amendment, which I desire to have read for the reason that I believe amendments will be cut off when the time for voting is reached.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield for that purpose, and here, I trust, these installment contributions will end.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Minnesota will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out beginning with the word "and," in line 19, page 8, down to and including line 13, page 9, and insert in lieu thereof:

Whenever the President of the United States shall by proclamation or Executive order declare a national emergency to exist by reason of actual or threatened war he may by proclamation prohibit the publication or communication of, or the attempt to publish or communicate, any information calculated to be useful to the enemy, relating to national fortifications or the movements or disposition of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or munitions, or war materials, of the United States, prior to the publication, communication, or disclosure of such facts by the Government, directly or by its authority. Whoever violates any such prohibition of the President shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or both: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its officers or Representatives or the publication of such discussion, comment, or criticism.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I rise at this time, with the permission of the able Senator in charge of the bill, to intrude a subject a little apart from the main discussion. I see the able Senator from New York, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], is here, and I desire him present, as I wish to refer to a matter of which he has knowledge. Thinking he might wish to contribute something in reply to some observations of my own, I have taken the liberty to merely notify him to note what I shall say.

Mr. President, we observe in the public press, which comes to us this morning, that Col. Theodore Roosevelt, a distinguished citizen of our Republic, former President of the United States, in an address at a dinner given in honor of the admired junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] at the Brooklyn Republican Club last night in the city of Brooklyn, State of New York, called attention to the fact that this country failed to prepare in times of peace and therefore it must pay for its folly.

Mr. President, the eminent ex-President may not have intended to leave the partisan suggestion that the responsibility for the failure of preparation was to be charged to the present Democratic administration, but since the report of this speech has gone through the press agency to all the papers of the country and will be read because of the great interest always enlisted in anything Col. Roosevelt would say, I find it justifiable certainly from my viewpoint to say that, in view of the fact that such an address was made before a club so distinctly a Republican Party organization, the remarks of Col. Roosevelt will be construed to mean that the failure of preparation was due to some omission of duty on the part of the Democratic administration. No other construction can follow, and in a most adroit and alert manner characteristic of his eminent qualifications it was insinuated for that purpose.

Mr. President, at a time like this I feel that every effort, whether made by the Democratic Party or its representatives, or that of the Republican Party or its representatives, to give the slightest partisan bias to anything we do or to unjustly tinge it with condemnation for that which any party has not done should be promptly reprobated. I can not feel that Col. Roosevelt meant to do this, but I can not overlook the fact that the conclusion is evident, the result inevitable—that such will be the effect.

Mr. President, I must at this point call the attention of the country to the country's real status.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LEWIS. Gladly.

Mr. CALDER. I hesitate interrupting the distinguished Senator at this moment, but I must leave the Chamber to keep an important engagement. I heard the speech last evening to which the Senator refers; it was delivered at a meeting of the Republican committee in Brooklyn, and I can say to him that the distinguished citizen of my State—or more properly as the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] put it recently, the greatest private citizen in America—Col. Roosevelt delivered an address that was in no wise a partisan one, and in it he insisted that it was the duty of every American citizen to support the Government with all the power he possessed, and it was particularly the duty of Republicans. There were 8,000 people present, and practically all were Republicans, and he advised them to cast partisanship aside in the end that there should be no division in the country in this crisis. The junior Senator from Illinois can be assured that no more patriotic address was ever uttered in this country.

Col. Roosevelt might, if he had wished to do so, told his audience that barely four years ago a Democratic House of Representatives insisted that the Army be reduced to the extent of at least five Cavalry regiments, and he could have advised the assembled multitude that during his seven years in the White House he had labored long and diligently to build up the great Navy we had when he left the office of President. He made no reflection upon the party in power nor did he say anything that might be construed as intimating that the Democrats at Washington, the President, or Congress had left anything undone to put this country in a state of preparedness.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I appreciate the contribution the able Senator from New York has made, and I clearly understand from him that he, like myself, acquits the "distinguished private citizen" of America, who, however distinguished he is, may he still remain a private, politically speaking, though I know from his eminent characteristics that that particular limitation will never qualify him if it is to be attended by silence as to his country's affairs. But in both these respects he has my admiration and friendship, and I concur with the able Senator from New York at once in acquitting President Roosevelt of any object whatever of a partisan nature.

I can not, Mr. President, however, overlook that the artful manner in which his speech presented is calculated to have the effect which I am sure the distinguished citizen would not reject—the placing of the blame, if blame there be, upon the Democratic administration. It is the Democratic administration that was in power in the time of peace preceding the war. This would lead very clearly to the conclusion that that administration must be that which is responsible for the unprepared condition which the eminent citizen says was a folly for which we will greatly repent.

Mr. President, however, that which the able Senator probably anticipated was not in my mind at all; it was not my intent to condemn Col. Roosevelt. I would no more condemn him for a partisan expression on the omission of duty than I would justify him in a partisan approval of fulfillment of duty. I merely rose to call attention to that which has not been sufficiently impressed upon the public mind. It is that no leader of any political party should at this time attempt to put responsibility for the condition of our country upon any one political party. We should, however, frankly tell our people that the condition which surrounds this country, which menaces it with a peril which the distinguished ex-President invites us to consider, is due to the fact that our country has not awakened to the danger which surrounded it for years. It is not that any political party has so failed in its duty nor that any administration should be charged with an omission sufficient to penalize it with any condemnation.

I want to invite the country's attention that when Col. Roosevelt suggested to us that this condition of unpreparedness was the failure of taking action in time of peace, he must inherit the result of that as well as this administration known as the Democratic administration. The people of America have never believed up to the present hour that we were on the eve of any war. They have never believed that there was a grievance against us in any part of the world sufficient to bring about a conflict. They have never been impressed with the dangers, and though now on the brink of disasters unless we prepare to meet them our country is still unaroused to that peril.

But let this be remembered, sir, that the country may understand that the charge of unpreparedness can not be laid at the doors of the Democratic administration and that the intimated charge of the distinguished private citizen shall not be construed to be in its effect as against this administration—that immediately after the Spanish-American War, and I can speak intimately of that, where I had an inconspicuous service, I then returned, as my distinguished friend, Mr. KING, of Utah, in front of me here well recalls, in the House of Representatives and participated in the matters of debate, being then a Member of Congress—that notwithstanding the fact that we had the menace of the Spanish-American War already passing before us and all were admonished when peace was declared of future dangers yet, so general was the idea as stated by eminent men that that was the last war in the world and that there would never be another, you could not arouse the people to take any steps for their defense, that Congress defeated the very effort to increase the Army following the Spanish-American War. It defeated the recommendation, as my distinguished friend from Michigan, Mr. SMITH, who served at that time with great distinction in the House, will recall, the recommendation of President McKinley to increase or make a reformation of the Army. Then Col. Roosevelt, after being Vice President of the United States, came in control of the Government. He recommended with all the avidity of his nature the increase of the Navy. Despite his recommendation, our country was so secure in the belief that we were in an era of peace where war could never again arise and that the burden of taxation upon the people was so unnecessary, that it defeated Col. Roosevelt in a Republican Congress, in a Republican Senate, in the increase of the Navy. His recommendations for four battleships could not be adopted, because the Representatives of the people did not believe there was such imminency of danger to justify the taxation that would follow the expense. Then the recommendation of two battleships a year met the same fate, notwithstanding all the lessons we had from what we had just gone through.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan rose.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Perhaps I ought not to intrude myself into the Senator's remarks at all.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator is quite welcome.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. However, I do recall very distinctly that in this Chamber the program of the so-called more conservative Senators, who sought to commit the Government to a very modest naval program, was completely undone, but we did succeed in almost doubling the proposed authorization.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, it may be that at the time to which the able Senator refers he may have in his mind some authorization which was made in this body; but the fact remains that in the final consummation President Roosevelt, in 1906, was compelled to recommend to Congress, as a concession to his defeats, that if we but repeated the program of the previous system of one battleship a year, or just enough to make up the loss or the decadence of that which was then in existence, it would be sufficient. He said he would not ask for increase of the Navy. Therefore we see that if there was any want of preparation, it was due to the fact that the people of this country did not feel the necessity for such preparation. If there was a failure to provide a Navy, it was because the people felt there was no demand for a further Navy. If there was a want of necessary Army, it was due to the fact that the people of the country would not be aroused to believe that there was any danger to the Republic. Therefore, sir, it is to the people of the country to whom we must address either blame or praise as to the conditions of naval or military preparation.

Mr. President, then, following President Roosevelt, President Taft recommended to this body the increase of the Army. As my brother, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], promptly brings to my attention, the increase of the Army in its force had not met with the approval of the previous President, President Roosevelt. He was a strong advocate—as I have ever been—of a powerful Navy, but President Taft did recommend to this body the increase of the Army in all its branches; but notwithstanding the recommendation—barring a few changes in the staff and some slight changes in methods of formation and government of the Army—the recommendations of President Taft were defeated, not because they were from President Taft, but because the country did not feel that there was any danger to our country justifying the increase of the Army; thus those who paid the taxes protested against the increase of the taxes necessary to the increase of the Army or the Navy.

Now, sir, what do we find? I invite Senators to a very interesting spectacle to which I shall now allude. The present temper of the day is still that there are no dangers; there is no part of our country yet aroused in this war; the Nation has not awakened up to the fact that there is any enemy at its door; the people of this country have not been shaken into a realization that they are upon the eve of a struggle that may mean the life or death of all that there is in republican institutions in America.

Sir, what more evidence do you want than one that I shall tender, among many? You, Senators, recall the processions of preparedness, which my friend and fellow officer in the service, Col. Roosevelt, among others, was the very first to invoke and to summon up—how we recall that from New York, just previous to the election, 289,000 were reported in the procession; in the city of Chicago, 235,000 in procession; in Kansas City, in Minneapolis, in San Francisco, Cal., in St. Louis, Mo., in Cleveland, through the South, and down to the city of Washington these processions of preparedness multiplied. These gentlemen making up the processions walked with gallant tread; they unfurled the flag with splendid pride; they condemned the administration then in power; they hissed their criticisms of Congress wherever they could; they vaunted splendidly their magnificent capacity to defend the Government and their immediate willingness to sacrifice everything for the defense of the Nation. But, Mr. President, now, when the country is at war, may I call your attention to the fact that if 15 per cent of those gentlemen who walked through our communities crying "preparedness" and criticizing Congress and who presented themselves as the living embodiment of all the patriotism there was in the country had merely enlisted we should have had the army. Yet, sir, while making imprecations against some government in power, either Republican or Democratic, yet when it came to opportunity for action, where were these gentlemen to be found? We see where they stand. When it came to presenting themselves as exhibitions of patriotism to our citizens in going to the front and offering their lives, then it was we saw the shrinking and shirking from any such sacrifice. When the time came for these gentlemen to enlist, to present themselves for the defense against those dangers which they condemned the administration had not prepared for, where were they? They saw no need for enlistment and made no effort to become soldiers for their Nation. Shall I charge them with lack of patriotism? No. Shall I charge them with want of bravery? No. But I must charge that they were not sufficiently convinced of the dangers against which they marched to give profert of their lives as security against them.

Mr. President, even those who marched in these countless thousands have not awakened to the fact that their country is in any danger that they protested then called for preparation. For this absence of sense of duty the United States was compelled to depart from the American policy of a volunteer system of enlistment to adopt one of the enforced system, which I deplore not only as an officer and servant of the national volunteer guard, but as an American. I deplore that the necessity has ever been forced upon my country that she has been compelled to certify before the world that she was so lacking in voluntary patriotism of her citizens, on the one hand, or were unaroused to their danger or, on the other, that their country was compelled by the force of power to enlist their lives for the defense of their Nation in order to save their Republic. Such is the state of our country.

Then, sir, when the intimation may be made from any source that the lack of preparation in time of peace could be charged to any administration that might be in power during that time of peace, let the reply be from Col. Roosevelt, eminent soldier and distinguished citizen; let it come from the leader of the Democracy; let it come from every man in every public place—that the real evil, if evil it is, is not of the officers in control of an administration, not in the execution or the failure upon the part of any leaders of any political party, but because our countrymen will not awake to the dangers that surround them even now, with the tocsin of war ringing in their ears and the resonance of the cannon of the fields of Europe echoing against their hearts. If my friend Col. Roosevelt and others of his splendid capacity will do a service, they will go to the country, in the small towns, and awaken our citizens to realize what the dangers are; to the cities, and arouse them from the torpor that has set upon them. Let us all go forth to remind them that, whether they were for the war or against the war, this country has declared for war.

There is but one outcome of this war. This country must be victorious or it must be defeated. There can be but one or the other. Which will the American citizen take? Which will he now prepare himself to endure?

The only way, Mr. President, that you can ever arouse the American people to take an interest in this conflict sufficient to insure American victory is that there shall be some agency which that citizen respects to go out to him and convince him of the danger. Let him know that we are at war; that the result of the war must be the surrender of the enemy or the surrender of America, or the compromise of a principle. Let him know what the consequence will be to the Republic, and then let us hope, with this lesson learned, he will be found joining with others in the defense of his country in numbers, in volume, in legions sufficient to guarantee the prompt preservation of the Republic. But, Mr. President, so long as this country shall remain as it now is, where one-half of the country feels that the declaration of war was a mere fulmination, another part of the country feels that, if it is to be a war, let the Atlantic coast fight it, and another set feels that it is a war merely of finance and not of the people—so long, sir, as these discordant elements wriggle among each other, revolve around each other, with no concord of support, we shall have the complaint which Col. Roosevelt makes, and before we know it we shall be confronted at our gates with an enemy encouraged to come to America by the appearance of a divided and a distracted country that presents the lack of unity in an opposition against an enemy or defense of its own Republic.

Therefore, sir, I arose to merely say that I trust there may be no intimation from any source, however lofty or humble, that shall partake of partisan reflections upon this administration upon the ground that it has failed to prepare. Let the country remember that the preceding administrations before the administration of President Wilson came into power spent $3,000,000,000 of the people's money ostensibly for a navy and an army, and yet, despite that expenditure, it still develops that when the Democratic Party came into power it found none of the elements of defense necessary to preserve the country, no doubt occasioned by the want of the country understanding our real dangers and preparing for them. We shall not charge these omissions to any party in power or any party out of power; but I must respectfully urge, as I bring these observations to a conclusion, that the duty of every man is now no longer either to condemn a political party or to place responsibility upon one for a political advantage, but that we all join together to front the perils which on every side surround our country, that it may unitedly, man to man, forgetting all differences of the past, political or personal, move shoulder to shoulder, heart to heart, under the slogan of "America, prepare or beware!"

LIBERTY OF THE PRESS AND FREEDOM OF SPEECH.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I wish to ask permission to have the address delivered by me yesterday in the Senate upon Senate bill No. 2, after making proper corrections and presenting it in the order in which it should have appeared, to appear in the RECORD of to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. VARDAMAN's speech, as corrected, is as follows:

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I shall ask the Senate to indulge me for a few minutes while I discuss briefly Chapters II and XII particularly, and submit some observations upon the tendency of such legislation generally as that embraced in the pending bill. Referring to what the able and learned Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] has said regarding the political war talk of Col. Roosevelt, permit me to indulge the hope, Mr. President, that the time is not far distant when in moments of great emergency like the present we may all be able to concentrate our affections upon the State and not allow party affiliations to influence our thoughts or compel our action. I wish the whole world had been no better prepared for war three years ago than America was when the Congress made the declaration of war a few weeks ago. If that had been the case, we would have had no war. Unfortunately it is the rule with nations as with individuals, preparation and readiness for a fight always promotes a conflict. That is the history of mankind.

Mr. President, America is confronted to-day by a number of cruel, stubborn, conscienceless facts, creating a condition which calls for very cool and deliberate consideration and a congressional judgment that will refuse under any circumstances to be stampeded.

Of all times, this moment, is the least propitious for listening with credulity to the whisperings of fancy or pursuing with eagerness the phantoms of hope, expecting the deficiencies of to-day to be supplied by the wisdom of to-morrow.

It is imperative that the right thing shall be done to-day, done boldly, effectively, for if we fail the ghost of our blunder will rise continually to haunt and vex us at every turn of the road.

Mr. President, when the storm is raging fiercely and the billows are rolling high the brave and steady-nerved pilot demands the utmost freedom of action.

No fixed, immutable, cast-iron rules for steering the ship in such an emergency are observed.

But every caprice of the weather and trick of disordered nature must be met, overcome, or avoided by the resourceful, untrammeled genius of the man in command of the ship.

It is easy to meet and overcome or mitigate the dangers of a catastrophe if we know it is identical with that which has happened heretofore.

No ship ever goes down on a well-known breaker. Locate the submerged rock and it is easy to avoid it.

I think it was Walt Whitman who said, "The whole theory of the universe is directed to one single individual, namely, to you."

That suggestion applies with great force to our system of government, and describes accurately the individual citizen's relation to the Republic.

The whole theory of this Government is directed to, and depends for successful administration and conduct upon, the fruitful initiative, good judgment, and sound sense of the individual citizen.

All of the just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed in theory, if not in fact, and the closer we cling to the theory the better will be the government for all the people.

And it must not be forgotten that the total strength of the Government is enhanced by preserving the constitutional plan of distributing the power.

All the wisdom and wealth, physical strength, and moral forces expressed and bodied forth in this Government are reposed primarily in the individual citizen of the Republic.

Every penny that will be expended in this great war—and God knows the magnitude of the amount staggers the imagination—must come from the products of patient toil. And its diversion from the normal channels of trade will necessarily deny to the toiler, to that extent, the opportunities necessary for the growth and proper development of the mind and morals of himself and those dependent upon him.

Every drop of blood that will be shed in this war in order to keep the American flag triumphant in the air and the lanes of commerce on the high seas free of all impediments will come from the veins of the individual man—that potential unit of the great mass of humanity which composes the aggregate invincible citizenship of this Nation.

And it must not be forgotten, also, that every ruddy drop drawn from the sad heart of the patriot—let it be said to the discredit of America—will be shed in obedience to a despotic law which denies him the freeman's privilege of offering his services to his country without compulsion.

Mr. President, at the risk of appearing academic or guilty of advancing a trite argument, I am going to ask permission to urgently impress upon the Congress and the people the pregnant truth that this Government belongs to the people; that the Congress is but the representative, the trustee, the custodian of the power which belongs to the people; and therefore we are charged with a very sacred trust and serious responsibility.

Buckle, in his History of Civilization, says:

"No great political improvement, no great reform, either legislative or executive, has ever been originated in any country by its rulers.

"The first suggesters of such steps have invariably been bold and able thinkers, who would discern the abuse, denounce it, and point out how it is to be remedied.

"But long after that is done even the most enlightened governments continue to uphold the abuse and reject the remedy.

"At length, if circumstances are favorable, the pressure from without becomes so strong that the Government is obliged to give way, and the reform being accomplished the people are expected to admire the wisdom of their rulers, by whom all of this has been done."

Pretty keen satire and grilling irony—a severe arraignment of the timeserver, but a very highly deserved and bitter denunciation of the pitiful, pliant political poltroon—the ever-present menace to free government, who would betray his people, crook the pregnant hinges of the knee, that patronage, pelf, or temporary popularity might follow his pusillanimous fawning, and then claim credit for that to which he is not entitled.

It is unfortunate that so many men in public life are incapable of independent, rational thought and courageous action.

To move along the lines of least resistance is the natural tendency of us all. We are too prone, too willing to take credit for things others have toiled and suffered to produce and to wear unblushingly the laurels others have sacrificed, to win.

Yes—

> It is easy to drift back, to sink;
> So hard to live abreast of what you think.

There must be very little temporal satisfaction or delight in playing the rôle of martyr, and yet I can understand how it is easier for an honest man to suffer for the right, than to luxuriate in the wrong. I can understand how it is easier to confront the frowns of a disapproving world, than it is to suffer in silence the raspings of an outraged conscience.

The ingratitude, however, of those for whom one sacrifices his life and surrenders all is a sharp and bitter tooth that bites to the quick, but to do right should be the highest reward, and to know that in the end good will come to the many for the acts that you have done or the sufferings that you have experienced should be the sweetest foretaste of the blessings that will surely come to the faithful in the realm of eternal rest.

I believe that service to man is the acceptable service to God, and he who contributes most to the sum of human happiness and the well-being of mankind will wear the brightest crown.

Mr. President, it is my deliberate judgment, that, in abnormal times, such as in the providence of God our beloved country is passing through to-day, the freedom of the press—the privilege of the newspaper to criticize and discuss the acts of officials—to spread broadcast proper news, to furnish the forum in which suggestions may be made touching all public questions, to promote discussion, and in that way encourage the attrition of ideas and the friction of suggestions, which alone make it possible for the eternal truth to be evolved—is vastly more necessary than in normal times, when the current of affairs moves on without a ripple.

There is enough of the dynamite of despotism in this bill to wreck the whole fabric of democracy in America. Time and trial have demonstrated that it is dangerous to vest so much power in one man or a few men. Unconsciously self-will, under the influence of vanity, sometimes becomes so ardent and active that it would break the world to pieces if necessary to make a stool for the tyrant to sit on.

As further evidence of the correctness of my position I desire to reenforce it by a quotation from a speech delivered by the late Hon. Jerry S. Black in the Milligan case, which I regard as strikingly pertinent. There is some similarity between conditions then and now. It was a time when sectional passion and prejudice ran high, swayed the greatest intellects and disturbed the usual poise of the leaders of thought. Judge Black, in my opinion, was one of the greatest lawyers of the English-speaking race, and his contributions to the juridical literature of America are of the most enduring and brilliant character. He says:

"But we are answered that the judgment under consideration was pronounced in time of war, and it is therefore, at least morally, excusable. There may or there may not be something in that. I admit that the merits or demerits of any particular act, whether it involves a violation of the Constitution or not, depend upon the motives that prompted it, the time, the occasion, and all the attending circumstances. When the people of this country come to decide upon the acts of their rulers they will take all these things into consideration. But that presents the political aspect of the case, with which, I trust, we have nothing to do here. I decline to discuss it. I would only say, in order to prevent misapprehension, that I think it is precisely in a time of war and civil commotion that we should double the guards upon the Constitution. If the sanitary regulations which defend the health of a city are ever to be relaxed, it ought certainly not to be done when pestilence is abroad. When the Mississippi shrinks within its natural channel and creeps lazily along the bottom the inhabitants of the adjoining shore have no need of a dike to save them from inundation. But when the booming flood comes down from above and swells into a volume which rises high above the plain on either side, then a crevasse in the levee becomes a most serious thing. So in peaceable and quiet times our legal rights are in little danger of being overborne, but when the wave of arbitrary power lashes itself into violence and rage and goes surging up against the barriers which were made to confine it, then we need the whole strength of an unbroken Constitution to save us from destruction."

What a glorious, brilliant beacon light to point the way in this hour of trial and doubt!

Mr. President, I am in no way indebted to the metropolitan newspapers for even justice at their hands, and I hold no special brief for the representatives of that potential influence in American politics. They have slandered, misrepresented, maligned, and abused me incontinently, shamefully, and cruelly.

There has been an air of abandon recklessness in their abuse of me which indicated that their masters were not pleased with my public career. They have unintentionally created the impression upon the impartial observer that I have not been plastic in their editorial hands or in any way obedient to their imperious dictations. To which I most gratefully enter a plea of guilty.

Their denunciations have been so severe at times that their corrupt purposes and pernicious motives appeared upon the surface of the dishonest criticism.

But I will cheerfully bear all of their injustice, and more, rather than to see the freedom of the press abridged in the slightest degree—not to serve the press, however, but, rather, the American people. I ask no quarter. I crave no favors. I demand justice only. I am willing to stand or fall by my record. I realize that error is short-lived, and any advantage obtained by the publication of a lie is ephemeral so long as truth unproscribed is free to combat it.

I think the observations of Thomas Jefferson on this question are the quintessence of human wisdom, and just as applicable to all states and conditions of the country to-day as they were in the morning of our country's career.

I would like to write these vital, virile ideas in ineffaceable characters upon the tablets of your memories and impress them upon the minds of the people, so that they might be taught to their children and their children's children until they shall become the instinct of the race. He says:

> One of the amendments to the Constitution * * * expressly declares that Congress should make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, thereby guarding in the same sentence and under the same words the freedom of religion, of speech, and of the press, in so much that whatever violates either throws down the sanctuary which covers the others.

And further:

Truth is the proper and sufficient antagonist to error, and has nothing to fear from the conflict, unless by human interposition disarmed of her natural weapons, free argument and debate.

And, continuing, he says:

There are rights which it is useless to surrender to the Government, and which governments have yet always been found to invade. Among these are the rights of thinking and publishing our thoughts by speaking or writing.

Our liberty—

He continues—depends upon the freedom of the press, and that can not be limited without being lost.

And further—

The press is the best instrument for enlightening the mind of man and improving him as a rational, moral, and social being.

And another truth he expresses, which I would especially impress upon the minds of the country to-day:

That where the press is free and every man is able to read, all is safe. * * * The only security of all is in a free press. The force of public opinion can not be resisted when permitted freely to be expressed. The agitation it produces must be subjected to. It is necessary to keep the waters pure.

Mr. President, those wise words spoken a hundred years ago are strikingly pertinent to the present-day conditions and can not be overlooked without detriment to the Nation.

It is very natural for men in authority to desire power—it is the natural impulse of the heart and promptings of the vanity of every potentate that his will is the best and wisest law for the government of all. There is no draft that makes such a dangerous drunk as power. Some wise man has observed that "power will intoxicate the best hearts as wine the strongest heads. No man is wise enough nor good enough to be trusted with unlimited power, for whatever qualification he may have evinced to entitle him to the possession of so dangerous a privilege, yet, when possessed, others can no longer answer for him, because he can no longer answer for himself." How profoundly true.

He knows in his own conceit what he wants to do and therefore thinks that everybody who differs from him must necessarily be wrong. That is the old human nature which is responsible for all the tyranny that has cursed the world in all the ages past and will curse it again if the people shall sleep on their rights and forget their duty to the State.

I am not questioning the wisdom of any particular individual; I am just discussing the nature of mankind generally, but I repeat the source of all power in the United States, determined by the very system and form of our Government, is vested with the citizen. That truth can not be too often repeated.

It is also a truth, let me assert again, proven by history and the experience of mankind, that even under the best forms of government those intrusted with absolute power have invariably converted it into a tyranny. It is well, therefore, to avoid everything that has in it the elements of ultimate despotism. The best way to avoid the dangers of an error is not to commit it; but if committed minimize its evil consequences by killing it in embryo. The American people can be trusted to do that which is best for their own Government. The irresistible influence of self-interest assures that. I would rather trust the feelings and the wisdom of all the people, than the judgment of any one man or small coterie of men.

The safest and best laws are enlightened public opinion crystallized.

If you will tell me what the man who toils wants, if you will describe his necessities, if I might be permitted to put my ear to his bosom and hear the throbs of his patriotic, honest heart, read his unexpressed thoughts, and know the impulses of his anxious soul, I can write the perfect law.

I can extract more wisdom and justice from the feeling of the masses, made known by the liberty of speech and freedom of the press, than by the reasoning or logical processes of the wise few.

Mr. President, I think any effort at this time to abridge the freedom of the press and limit free speech will be a mistake.

The world is passing through a trying ordeal. The old landmarks that pointed the way in the past are considered no longer altogether safe guides. Tyranny and the ambition of the few have engulfed the world in a sea of blood.

The men who are surrendering their lives in this unnecessary, brutal, unconscionable war were not consulted about it.

If they had been consulted about it, there would have been no war. This war is an impeachment of the morals of the rulers of mankind. It is a reflection upon their intelligence, an indictment of their consciences, and an outrage upon civilization, justice, and humanity.

Like dumb cattle the bravest and best of the earth are being driven to the slaughter, to satisfy the greed, cupidity, vanity, and the insane ambition of the enthroned few.

Never before in the history of the world was it so necessary, so imperative, to turn to the imperial individual—the private citizen—awaken him from his lethargy, appeal to his independence of thought, and arouse him to heroic action, as now.

The "common sense of most" is needed to hold the fretful world in awe and bring order out of the interminable chaos which seems to prevail through the world.

It is high time, I submit, that we should take into account the value of the human being and consider the sacredness of human life.

I wish every man engaged in this war throughout the world with one accord might stop at this moment and say to himself: "I will fight no longer, except for the right to rule myself and my own country; I shall dethrone the royal usurper, the king or the ruler that has betrayed me, and in the future, with my brothers throughout the world, we will submit our differences to the arbitrament of reason rather than the blood-stained, brutal sword.

We will organize the great world court, in which the international conscience shall be the supreme law, to which all our differences shall be submitted and settled.

We will organize "the parliament of man" and bring about "the federation of the world" for the good of the masses, rather than submit our interest and ourselves to be exploited for the aggrandizement of the titled few.

We will repudiate the right of any man to inherit a public office, and spurn with contumely the power that would attempt to force us to bend the knee of subserviency to a ruler who claims to hold his place by divine right.

This divine right assumption is a libel against God Almighty and an affront to truth and must forever be repudiated.

It is responsible for more wars—has blighted more lives, frustrated more ambitions, broken more hearts—in a word, it has filled the world with more misery and woe than any and all evils combined.

Its wrecks and ravages cumber the highways of history and point the student with warning hand to its disastrous consequences.

There never has been a war waged among civilized peoples that could not have been avoided or settled without bloodshed, with honor, if the masses had been wise, provident, and prudent, and the leaders, the officeholders, those in authority, had been brave, patriotic, and unselfish.

War is the game of the men in power, and those who profit pecuniarily thereby—a bloody game, in which the ignorant and subservient masses are merely the pawns.

I would that I had the power to put into operation forces that would educate the people, arouse in them that sense of self-preservation which would lead them, by any and all means, to uncrown every crowned head beneath the canopy of heaven to-day, and sell the jewels that glisten in those emblems of usurped authority, and with the proceeds feed the poor and educate the unlearned.

It is time for the men and women of the world whose labor feed and clothe mankind to make a declaration of independence, to think and act for themselves. The masses have been the slaves and serfs of the titled few long enough.

The only true nobility which society should be permitted to countenance are those who refuse to live by the toil of others and who prefer to serve rather than to be served. I have more respect for the patriotic artisan who does "his bit" with cheerfulness, for the plowman whose labor puts raiment on the naked and food in the mouths of the hungry—for the man who consecrates his genius to the service of humanity and devotes his life to the betterment of the condition of his fellowman—I have more respect, a thousand times more respect, for that class of men, than I have for the crowned loafer and the titled parasite, together with the American plutocrat, who "toil not, neither do they spin," but fatten upon the products of honest industry.

Mr. President, America at this moment is calling for men to do the ghastly work of war. We need men also to do the necessary heroic work of peace, work that must be done if society shall live after the war is over.

Some must work to feed, while others fight and bleed.

Yes; we need men—

"God give us men!" is the urgent cry—
Men who are honest, who will not lie;
Men who are strong, noble, and true;
Men who have courage to dare and to do.

God give us men who stand for the right—
Men who are ready all evil to fight;
Men that are clean, whose word is their bond;
Men who when called are sure to respond.

God give us men that money can't buy—
Men who have faith and are willing to try;
Men who have honor, virtue, and power—
"God give us men!" is the cry of the hour.

The newspaper is the greatest educator of modern times. From its teachings let us hope that truth will eventually triumph. There is no doubt about it in my judgment.

Therefore let the newspaper continue unhindered to carry on its great work of education; let us magnify the potency and dignity of the individual private citizen and minimize to the proper level the dignity and power of the officeholder in America.

Let us understand that—

The rank is but the guinea stamp;
The man's the gow'd for a' that.

Let us understand that "princes and lords are but the breath of kings; that an honest man is the noblest work of God."

Let the average man—the sovereign citizen—come into his own and express without fear of punishment his honest thoughts touching matters of vital public concern to him.

Mr. President, I repeat, America is passing through an ordeal that will test the spirit and purpose and strain the very letter of the Constitution.

The Congress and the Executive need all the wisdom and advice which the people are capable of giving through the medium of the press.

Too long residence in Washington, surrounded by flatterers and courtiers, the man in high office is liable to lose the common touch and forget the real people, for whose service the Government is at least in part established.

Our only means of ascertaining what the people really want, feel, and need is through the columns of the newspapers and magazines, and to cut off that source of information would be disastrous.

And while I know there are instances where the power of pelf will influence the newspaper to lie, to misrepresent and betray the people, still a large majority of the newspapers, thank God, I believe, will hew to the line.

So, unproscribed, untrammeled—

May the press the people's rights maintain,
Unawed by influence and unbribed by gain,
Here patriotic truth her glorious precepts draw,
Pledged to religion, liberty, and law.

No, Mr. President, I will not support any measure that permits any man or small coterie of men to proscribe the press or abridge the liberty of speech in this free country.

We are going to win this war for liberty, freedom, and democracy, but we are not going to win it with my consent by resorting to autocratic methods, by the methods of the tyrant, whose cruel grasp we are now trying to take from the strangled throat of struggling world democracy.

I take no stock in all this talk about "liberty" and the "driving of autocracy from the face of the earth" while at the same time and in the same breath we are sowing the seed of an intolerable despotism upon the free soil of America, which will grow up to vex us in the years to come.

Let me commend to all lovers of liberty, as the better expression of my own views, the wise counsel given by Judge Story in the concluding chapter of his great work on the Constitution:

"Let the American youth never forget that they possess a noble inheritance, bought by the toils and sufferings and blood of their ancestors; and capable, if wisely improved and faithfully guarded, of transmitting to their latest posterity all the substantial blessings of life, the peaceful enjoyment of liberty, property, religion, and independence. The structure has been erected by architects of consummate skill and fidelity, its foundations are solid, its compartments are beautiful as well as useful, its arrangements are full of wisdom and order, and its defenses are impregnable from without. It has been reared for immortality, if the work of man may justly aspire to such a title. It may, nevertheless, perish in an hour by the folly or corruption or negligence of its own keepers—THE PEOPLE. Republics are created by the virtue, public spirit and intelligence of the citizens. They fall, when the wise are banished from the public councils, because they dare to be honest, and the profligate are rewarded because they flatter the people in order to betray them."

Nothing truer was ever uttered by the loyal lips of an American patriot.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have submitted an amendment to Chapter II of the pending bill because I am unable to support that chapter in its present form. I am opposed to a censorship of the press as we have come to know that expression, and I oppose it on two grounds—upon the ground of public policy and upon the ground of constitutionality. I shall discuss the present chapter, reviewing both aspects of the same as they present themselves to me; that is, from the standpoint of public policy and from the standpoint of its constitutionality.

Press censorships in every government have invariably brought unhappy and in many instances disastrous results. The evil that a censorship creates is more malignant than the evil it seeks to avoid and conceal. If, during the ensuing war, the press should be censored and information as to the progress of the war should go to the public filtered through a censor, we would soon be living in a vapor of suspicion, a cloud of misinformation, a miasma of rumor.

A censorship of the press results in the diffusion and spread of misinformation and idle tales. Under a censorship sensational stories fly apparently on the wings of the wind. The ordinary citizen is practically helpless and knows not what or whom to believe. I do not mean to say that the press is always accurate in its gathering and presentation of facts, or always correct in its interpretation of facts, but in the main it attempts to be correct and seldom is willfully and wantonly unjust. A censorship proposed to be established with the intention and for the purpose of preventing our enemies from obtaining information as to the position and movement of our troops and fleets and the location of munition factories, machine shops, and details of coast defenses would, and no doubt should, meet with general approval.

The people composing the United States Government are now just about to enter upon a most stupendous struggle. Events of world-wide importance are following each other so rapidly that they tread upon each other's heels; and sufficient events are transpiring each day to make volumes of history for the historian of the future.

I wish first to present my view as to the censorship in respect to its being an unconstitutional statute as proposed.

The first amendment to the Federal Constitution reads as follows:

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; * * *

Or abridging, omitting the parenthetical matter—

the freedom * * * of the press.

Everyone here knows what the word "abridging" means. I need not pause to consider or discuss the meaning of "abridgment."

What does "freedom of the press" mean? It is amazing to note the amount of loose talk—not in the Senate, but throughout the country and in the newspapers themselves—as to what is "freedom of the press" as used in the Constitution of the United States. The average citizen of this Republic, the ordinary publisher in our country who is not a lawyer, thinks that "freedom of the press" means the right to publish his sentiments just as he pleases. In a large sense, that may be true; but in a legalistic sense, and from a constitutional standpoint, that is not entirely accurate. "Freedom of the press" means simply, solely, and only the right to be free from a precensorship, the right to be free from the restraints of a censor. In other words, under the Constitution as amended by amendment No. 1, "freedom of the press" means nothing except that the citizen is guaranteed that he may publish whatever he sees fit and not be subjected to pains and penalties because he did not consult the censor before doing so. The citizen is left to publish just what he pleases, and must take his chances before a court of his country as to whether or not he has published anything libelous or anything that may bring any human being to disrepute or ridicule, or whether he has published anything of a treasonable or obscene nature. I undertake to say upon the floor of the Senate that any sort of censorship which even the necessities of war may apparently cast upon us would not be in keeping with the Constitution of the United States.

Now, to discover what this phrase "freedom of the press" means, we will resort to that which lawyers, in all time, have resorted to. What was the meaning of the phrase "freedom of the press" when the Constitution of the United States was adopted? When the first amendment was adopted, what did those who adopted and urged the amendment, what did the lawyers of that day say "freedom of the press" meant? What did the reports and the courts of the time say "freedom of the press" meant?

Mr. President, I believe that Sir William Blackstone is a fairly good authority as to what is the common law of England; and the common law of England has been in force in this country since we have been a Nation. It was brought to these shores by the migration hither of our ancestors. They brought it with them. This book of Blackstone's Commentaries was written before the adoption of this amendment, so it is presumed that those who adopted the amendment adopted it with the language in it with the construction which he put upon it and which the common law gave it. I read now from volume

4 of Wendell's Blackstone's Commentaries, page 151, where that great commentator says:

In this and the other instances which we have lately considered, where blasphemous, immoral, treasonable, schismatical, seditious, or scandalous libels are punished by the English law, some with a greater, others with a less degree of severity, the liberty of the press, properly understood, is by no means infringed or violated. The liberty of the press is, indeed, essential to the nature of a free state; but this consists in laying no previous restraints upon publications.

Let me read that again:

But this—

What? Freedom of the press—

consists in laying no previous restraints upon publications, and not in freedom from censure for criminal matter when published. Every freeman has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public; to forbid this is to destroy the freedom of the press; but if he publishes what is improper, mischievous, or illegal, he must take the consequences of his own temerity.

Now, Senators will observe that these words are not the "wild shoutings of some demagogue out on the public hustings, seeking to arouse public prejudice and get votes." They are the words and the language of the great writer whose works we all consider and devoutly study—if I may use the words "devoutly study"—when we attempt to become lawyers. He says:

To subject the press to the restrictive power of a licenser, as was formerly done, both before and since the revolution—

Referring, I presume, to the English Revolution of 1688—is to subject all freedom of sentiment to the prejudices of one man, and make him the arbitrary and infallible judge of all controverted points in learning, religion, and government. But to punish (as the law does at present)—

What law? The common law of England—

any dangerous of offensive writings, which, when published, shall, on a fair and impartial trial, be adjudged to be of a pernicious tendency, is necessary for the preservation of peace and good order, of government and religion, the only solid foundations of civil liberty. Thus the will of individuals is still left free; the abuse only of that free will is the object of legal punishment. Neither is any restraint hereby laid upon freedom of thought or inquiry; liberty of private sentiment is still left; the dissemination or making public of bad sentiments, destructive of the ends of society, is the crime which society corrects. A man (says a fine writer on this subject) may be allowed to keep poisons in his closet, but not publicly to vend them as cordials. And to this we may add that the only plausible argument heretofore used for restraining the just freedom of the press, "that it was necessary to present the daily abuse of it," will entirely lose its force when it is shown (by a seasonable exertion of the laws) that the press can not be abused to any bad purpose without incurring a suitable punishment; whereas it never can be used to any good one when under the control of an inspector. So true will it be found that to censure the licentiousness is to maintain the liberty of the press.

Now, Mr. President, adverting to this bill, we find in lines 19, 20, 21, and 22, of page 8, the offensive language. We find there language which, even though Senators should admit might apparently be for the common good, offends the Constitution, because the same is as follows:

Whoever, in time of war—

Now comes the matter obnoxious to the Constitution—

in violation of reasonable regulations to be prescribed by the President, which he is hereby authorized to make and promulgate—

This language sets up a censor to whom you must go to have your writings viséed or O. K'd, or you are guilty of a crime; and that, in my judgment, I repeat, is unconstitutional. All the commentators that have ever written, all that wrote before the adoption of our Federal Constitution, and nearly all of them that wrote since, agree that "freedom of the press" means freedom from the restraints of a censor, means the absolute liberty and right to publish whatever you wish; but you take your chances of punishment in the courts of your country for the violation of the laws of libel, slander, and treason.

In 1803 a man named Croswell was indicted in the courts of New York for libeling Thomas Jefferson. Croswell published a brutal and scandalous publication. He was arrested and tried and convicted before one of the nisi prius courts of New York. He took an appeal to the supreme court of the State, the court of last resort in the State at that time being designated the supreme court. The case came before the supreme court, and upon the bench was Chancellor Kent. One of the attorneys, in fact the leading attorney, for the defendant Croswell was Alexander Hamilton. Alexander Hamilton as a constitutional lawyer will compare favorably with some of the lawyers of the Senate. I think we may fairly concede that Alexander Hamilton knew something as to what the Constitution meant. I have here the great case, which is reported in Johnson's Cases, third volume, at page 355 et sequitur. I will not pause to read the whole case, but will say that the prosecuting attorneys urged that under the common law "the greater the truth the greater the libel," and that therefore the defendant was not permitted to offer proof as to the truth of his publication.

The question of censorship was discussed, and Hamilton in his argument in February, 1804, at Albany—by the way, Hamilton's last great legal argument—pointed out that there was on the part of the attorneys for the defendant a misconception as to what was the common law. Some lawyers, for instance, Mansfield and Lord Raymond, insisted that the common-law doctrine, "the greater the truth the greater the libel," was a part of the common law. Hamilton pointed out to the satisfaction of the court, and all American lawyers have taken Hamilton's view, that "the greater the truth the greater the libel" was part of the "star-chamber rule," which, under the rule of the Stuarts, was injected into the common law and was not the common law at all.

Hamilton's view has been the view of all the courts of this country. The Legislature of New York in the succeeding year, 1805, enacted a law which provided substantially that the truth may be given to the jury in all cases of libel and slander where it is published for good and for justifiable ends. Hamilton was of opinion that a censorship violates the liberty of the press, and freedom from censorship means the liberty of the press.

Now, Mr. President, we are not wholly in the dark in our country as to what a censorship may mean.

I shall here include in the RECORD some authorities I have compiled from "Words and Phrases" (vol. 5, p. 4131, et seq.):

"Liberty of the press," as used in the provision of the Federal Constitution guaranteeing the liberty of the press, etc., means a right in the conduct of a newspaper to print whatever he chooses, without any previous license, but subject to be held responsible therefor to exactly the same extent that anyone else would be responsible for the publication. (Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va., 158, 182; 31 Am. Rep., 757; Negley v. Farrow, 60 Md., 158, 175; 45 Am. Rep., 715; Jones v. Townsend's administratrix, 21 Fla., 431, 450; 58 Am. Rep. 676; Upton v. Hume, 33 Pac., 810, 812; 24 Or., 420; 21 L. R. A., 493; 41 Am. St. Rep., 863; Fitzpatrick v. Daily States Pub. Co., 20 South., 173, 179; 48 La. Ann., 1116; Commonwealth v. Buckingham (Mass.) Thacher, Cr. Cas., 29, 39.)

The liberty of the press was said by Blackstone to consist "in laying no previous restraints upon publication, and not in freedom from censure for a criminal matter when published. Every freeman has an undoubted right to lay what sentiments he pleases before the public. To forbid this is to destroy the freedom of the press; but if he publishes what is improper, mischievous, or illegal, he must take the consequences of his own temerity." (Morton v. State, 3 Tex. App., 510, 516 (citing 4 Bl. Comm., side p. 152).)

In its broadest sense "freedom of the press" includes not only exemption from censorship but security against laws enacted by the legislative department of the Government or measures resorted to by either of the branches for the purpose of stifling just criticism or muzzling public opinion. It will not apply to a contract for the sale of a newspaper, whereby it was agreed that the seller would not edit, print, or conduct a newspaper, or be connected with one in the State, without consent of the purchaser. (Cowan v. Fairbrother, 24 S. E., 212, 215; 118 N. C., 406.

"Freedom of the press" does not mean "a press wholly beyond the reach of the law, for this would be emphatically Pandora's box, the source of every evil. The founders of our governments were too wise and too just ever to have intended by the freedom of the press a right to circulate falsehood as well as truth, or that the press should be the lawful vehicle of malicious defamation, or an engine for evil and designing men to cherish for malicious purposes sedition, irreligion, and impurity. I adopt in this case as perfectly correct the comprehensive and accurate definition of one of the counsel at the bar (Gen. Hamilton) that the liberty of the press consists in the right to publish with impunity truth, with good motives and for justifiable ends, whether it respects government, magistracy, or individuals." (People v. Croswell, 3 Johns. Cas., 337, 393; State v. Meyers, 21 Wkly. Law Bul., 302; 10 Ohio Dec., 238.)

The constitutional guaranty of freedom of speech and liberty of the press were designed to secure constitutional immunity for the expression of opinion; but that does not mean unrestrained license, nor does it confer the right upon the editor of the newspapers to write or publish whatever he may choose, no matter how false, malicious, or injurious it may be, without full responsibility for the damage it may cause. (Fitzpatrick v. Daily States Pub. Co., 20 South., 173, 179; 48 La. Ann., 1116.)

It is a popular thing to say that this must be put through as a war measure. Mr. President, this is America, not another country. We forget something of the genius of our people if we believe we can censor their sources of information. We must not for a moment think that the great war in which we are about to engage is going to be carried successfully through by means of confusing the people or denying them information to which they are entitled.

During the Civil War, the War between the States, feeling ran high and censorship was attempted. Indeed, not only was the censorship attempted, but Gen. Burnside seized and suppressed an edition of the Chicago Times, alleging that it was publishing matter treasonable and against the public safety. The edition was stopped, but in the loyal State of Illinois the feeling of the people was so keen, so intense, that the legislature of the State passed a resolution opposing the act of Gen. Burnside for stopping the edition of the Times, and Lyman Trumbull and Isaac N. Arnold, Lincoln's confidential advisers, urged him at once to revoke the order, and Lincoln revoked it. Not even in the most tense and critical periods of our country's history did the American freemen permit the hands of military authority to be laid upon the ark of freedom.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator stated, if I understood him correctly, that some people attempted to justify this censorship on the ground that it is a war measure. I wish to ask the Senator if in his opinion Congress has any greater power in time of war than it has in time of peace?

Mr. ASHURST. It has no greater power in time of war than in time of peace.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let me ask the Senator, because this question not only arises now, but in my opinion will continue to arise as other measures unusual and drastic may be proposed, Does the fact that Congress under the Constitution may declare war give any power to anybody to repeal or in any way conflict with the restraints and limitations and guaranties of the Constitution itself?

Mr. ASHURST. None whatever. I thank the Senator from Connecticut.

The State of Illinois during the Civil War may fairly be deemed to have been a loyal State, and I am able to imagine the flame of indignation that rolled over the State when Gen. Burnside attempted with his censorship to stop the edition of the Chicago Times, and that wise man, whose countenance seems seared with the plowshare of sorrow, at once directed Mr. Stanton, the Secretary of War, to revoke the order stopping the issue of the Chicago Times. I will read a copy of the order. It was subjoined as a note to a very long letter. It is dated "War Department, Washington, June 1, 1863." Note the date June 1. It was only one month anterior to the Battle of Gettysburg, the critical period of our country's history.

Maj. Gen. A. E. BURNSIDE,
Commanding Department of the Ohio.

GENERAL—

Here is a long letter, and then comes the postcript, as follows:

P. S.—Since writing the above letter the President has been informed that you have suppressed the publication or circulation of the Chicago Times in your department. He directs me to say that in his judgment it would be better for you to take an early occasion to revoke that order.

Here is wisdom—

The irritation produced by such acts is in his—opinion likely to do more harm than the publication would be. The Government approves of your motives and desires to give you cordial and efficient support. But while military movements are left to your judgment, upon administrative questions, such as the arrest of civilians and the suppression of newspapers, not requiring immediate action the President desires to be previously consulted.

The President's—

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Do I understand the Senator from Arizona to announce as the basis of his contention here that in time of war it would be unconstitutional for the President of the United States and for the military authorities acting under him to prevent in any way they could the dissemination of information as to the movement of troops which would come to the enemies of our country and aid them in their contest against us?

Mr. ASHURST. The learned Senator probably drew that inference. I responded to a question propounded to me by the distinguished Senator from the State of Connecticut. He asked me if Congress has any greater power in time of war than it has in time of peace. My reply is that our Constitution not being flexible nor amendable by Congress alone, Congress has no greater power in time of war than in time of peace. I call the Senator's attention, if he will pardon me for a moment, to the act of Congress under which Gen. Burnside assumed to act. It was the act of Congress of April 10, 1806, and section 57 thereof reads as follows:

ARTICLE 57. Whosoever shall be convicted of holding correspondence with or giving intelligence to the enemy, either directly or indirectly, shall suffer death or such other punishment as shall be ordered by the sentence of a court-martial.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. It seems quite clear, then, that the military officer acted without any authority of law at all. Is that the understanding of the Senator?

Mr. ASHURST. He acted without any constitutional authority.

Mr. WALSH. Or without any statutory authority?

Mr. ASHURST. I have not examined far enough to ascertain whether or not there was a statute passed after 1806. If there was a statute passed after 1806, I was unable to find it, though such may have been passed.

Mr. WALSH. I understood the Senator to state that that was all the authority he could find.

Mr. ASHURST. All I could find is the act of 1806.

Mr. WALSH. So that really Congress has not expressed its approval in any form of the act. Likewise it appears that he actually suppressed the paper.

Mr. ASHURST. He attempted to suppress it, as I read the President's order transmitted by the Secretary of War ordering the commanding general to revoke his order.

Mr. WALSH. While I subscribe to many of the very excellent principles for which the Senator from Arizona has so pointedly contended, he rerecognizes, of course, that there is nothing in this bill which would authorize any military officer to suppress a newspaper.

Mr. ASHURST. I think the Senator is quite right about that, and I was only adverting to it to support my argument and to reinforce that statement I made in the opening sentence which fell from my lips to the effect that such orders and such laws always create more irritation and do infinitely more damage than they do good, and I would be presumptious, if the Senator will pardon me, to attempt to put my opinion upon a question of constitutional law against that of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] or the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] either for that matter.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator was referring to the act of Mr. Lincoln. Will he permit me to call his attention to an order which Mr. Lincoln did promulgate and which, contrary to the statement of the Senator, was the basis of the action of Gen. Burnside, rather than the statute to which the Senator referred?

Mr. ASHURST. I would be very glad to see that; it may have escaped me in my researches.

Mr. KING. This is an order which was promulgated July 8, 1861:

Henceforward the telegraph will convey no dispatches concerning the operations of the Army not permitted by the commanding general, Winfield Scott. The above order is confirmed.

SIMON CAMERON.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator, but I have that before me and I have reflected upon it.

Mr. KING. Just a little further, if the Senator will pardon me, the second order, dated August 7, 1861, is as follows:

By the fifty-seventh article of the act of Congress entitled "An act for establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States," approved April 10, 1806, holding correspondence with, or giving intelligence, to the enemy, either directly or indirectly, is made punishable by death, or such other punishment as shall be ordered by the sentence of a court-martial. Public safety requires strict enforcement of this article. It is therefore ordered that all correspondence and communication, verbally, or by writing, printing, or telegraphing, respecting operations of the Army or military movements on land or water, or respecting the troops, camps, arsenals, intrenchments, or military affairs within the several military districts, by which intelligence shall be directly or indirectly given to the enemy without the authority and sanction of the major general in command, be, and the same are, absolutely prohibited, and from and after the date of this order persons violating the same will be proceeded against under the fifty-seventh article of war.

SIMON CAMERON.

Approved:

A. LINCOLN.

Does not the Senator know that under that order not only was the paper in Chicago suppressed, but numerous other newspapers were suppressed, and men were arrested and charged with sedition and various other offenses?

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is correct. Not only, Mr. President, as the Senator well said, was the Chicago Times seized and the edition suppressed, but editions of the New York World were seized and suppressed, I believe.

In war the strong man wins, and my desire and my solicitude—and I think I may be pardoned if I say I believe it is a patriotic solicitude—is that America will win the war to sustain the Constitution and sustain every constitutional right possible. Between winning the war and giving up the Constitution I would give up the Constitution, but in my judgment the time has not arrived when the citizen is called upon to give up one single particle of his constitutional rights.

Now, I am going to read for a moment from the fourth volume of Rhodes's History of the United States, referring to Gen. Burnside's order. I read from page 253:

Burnside was induced to further acts of folly.

After describing some acts he committed with which the writer does not agree:

He issued an order announcing that "the publication or circulation of books containing sentiments of a disloyal tendency comes clearly within reach of General Orders, No. 38, and those who offend in this manner will be dealt with accordingly." June 1 he promulgated General Order No. 84. The circulation of the New York World, it said, "is calculated to exert a pernicious and treasonable influence, and is therefore prohibited in this department. * * * On account of the repeated expression of disloyal and incendiary sentiments the publication of the newspaper known as the Chicago Times is hereby suppressed."

And the author concludes with this pregnant sentence:

Strange pronunciamentos were these to apply to the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, where there was no war, where the courts were open, where the people were living under the American Constitution and English law. Fortunately men bred in liberty do not easily forget their lessons.

I said in the opening part of my remarks that every attempt on the part of President Lincoln or Mr. Stanton, the then Secretary of War, to set up a censorship of the press inevitably brought a reaction which created much damage and intolerable discontent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Did the Senator state the name of the author from whom he read?

Mr. ASHURST. Rhodes's History of the United States, Volume IV, 1862–1864.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I am deeply interested in the information which is being given to the Senate of a historical character by the Senator from Arizona. Can he tell us whether any steps were taken by Congress to express either its approbation or its disapprobation of these efforts of the Executive to prevent information from getting to the enemy concerning military movements through the press.

Mr. ASHURST. As I said before, I did not in my searches find any statute, although doubtless one existed. I do not find any statute relating to the subject directly except the statute enacted April 10, 1806. All the authority that Gen. Scott acted upon when he issued the order, the first one read by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and many subsequent orders, was predicated upon the recital of the fifty-seventh chapter of the act of April 10, 1806. So I think I am fairly within the bounds of accuracy in assuming that there was no other statute, although there may be.

Mr. WALSH. Perhaps the Senator did not clearly understand the idea I desired to convey. What I wanted to learn was whether Congress during the war expressed in any way its approbation or its disapprobation of the course taken. For instance, was not a joint resolution passed by Congress asking a revocation of those orders?

Mr. ASHURST. I know of none, Mr. President.

Mr. WALSH. Or did Congress acquiesce, and thus approve that action?

Mr. ASHURST. I know of none whatever, except that contemporaneous history, which I have a right to advert to, indicates that nearly all the Senators who were supporting the President at that time were opposed to the censorship; and I again advert to the fact that as soon as the Chicago Times had ceased publication Lyman Trumbull, a friend of the President I think, rushed to the telegraph office and he and others sent their telegrams pleading with the President to revoke that order.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senator leaves that part of his address to which he is now devoting his time, might I add some supplemental matter concerning the territory embraced in a number of those orders to which the Senator has referred?

Mr. ASHURST. I should be very glad to have the Senator from Illinois do that.

Mr. SHERMAN. A large part of southern Illinois, which was covered by this order, might properly be described as hostile territory. It contained a peninsula of which the south end and both flanks were slave territory. A very large percentage of hostile sentiment was found there; so much so that life and property were at times unsafe. This sentiment was greatly aggravated by the publication referred to in the Chicago Times.

The publisher and editor of the Chicago Times was Wilbur F. Storey, who sometimes signed his name to the inflammatory articles. They were extremely treasonable; they went beyond the limits of legitimate journalism. I have had access to some copies of the paper containing editorials that were circulated in the Union camps at that time, and they exceeded anything in the extremity and violence of their attacks upon governmental action that has been seen inside the borders of the United States. The courts remained open and civil process could be served on all the territory affected in Indiana and in Illinois.

I should like to add here that the mere fact that military law had been assumed to be put in operation by Gen. Burnside, and that that country was in an actual state of war within certain theaters of operation, did not suspend the civil laws within the territory embraced in the order. May I ask the Senator from Arizona whether the mere fact that we have declared war by a joint resolution passed by Congress has at all affected the civil jurisdiction of all the peaceable authorities in this country so as to justify any such censorship?

Mr. ASHURST. The only person who has had his civil rights affected in the United States by the declaration of war is the soldier, who patriotically gives up for a short period by virtue of his enlistment some of his civil rights; but as to all others no civil right whatever is suspended.

Mr. President, I secured a book the other day which I had never before seen, although I have heard of the author; he was a correspondent of the New York Herald and the Washington agent of the Associated Press during the Civil War. His name was L. A. Gobright. He tells about the censor, a very young man, doubtless a very excellent young man, who had his office in the National Hotel—now an historic building, historic not only because the censor had his office there but historic because one of our greatest American tribunes died there—Henry Clay. This author, telling about the difficulty he had in getting through his dispatches respecting the situation to New York, recites the dispatch, and then says:

This dispatch had, like all others, to undergo censorship. The censor at the time was a very young man, who, appreciating the importance of his position—

I should think he would appreciate the importance of his position when every correspondent had to go to him and ask him whether or not he could send out his dispatch to his newspaper—

"put on airs"—

I do not know whether the Senate understands what that expression means or not, but I do—and assumed an undue degree of gravity. He had a small room in the National Hotel, high up badly lighted stairs—

"Badly lighted stairs" synchronizes with "censorship"—dark-chamber proceedings—and at first somewhat difficult to find. There he had on his table scissors of various sizes, a full rack of pens, several inkstands, a dozen or more of lead pencils, of different colors—black and blue—

I presume they were mostly blue—

a pot of mucilage, half a ream of paper, and other properties, thought by him to be essential to his high office. Well, I handed the dispatch to the young man, Mr. Holland, in the office, directing him to give it to the censor and to be particular in watching what this mighty little man did with it. When he returned, he informed me that the censor, without fully reading the dispatch, stuck it into his capacious pocket, which answered the purpose of a wastebasket.

Then the author goes on to recite more experiences, but I shall not weary the Senate telling about the difficulty of getting dispatches through. I will, however, read from page 322 another instance of what the author calls "censorial caution and astuteness." He says:

Passing up Pennsylvania Avenue on a Saturday night, I happened to meet one of Gen. Wool's staff. My friend had just arrived from Frederick, Md., and had in his pocket an official communication from his chief to the Secretary of War. He informed me that there was much alarm in western Maryland, Lee and his army having invaded that State. He told me no more, because he had not yet ascertained the particulars. I immediately went to the telegraph office to "send off" the fact of invasion—making not more than 20 lines. The censor—not the young man who had vetoed my former communication, but a man at that time well known to many persons in New York and elsewhere—looked at my dispatch, then said: "It can't go." "Why not?" "Because it gives information to the enemy." "Colonel, do you suppose the enemy does not know what he himself is doing? And, besides, is it not important that the people of Pennsylvania and New York should know of their danger? Should they be kept in ignorance on so vital a question?" I continued my interrogatories. Although the censor had not the reputation of being a very wise man, he was impressed a little with my arguments, and, by way of compromise, agreed to forward my dispatch with the qualification of the one which, he said, he had sent to his wife. That qualification was, "It is said that," etc. Thus the positive announcement was turned into a mere rumor, which the public could believe or not. No better bargain could be made; and I, of course, was forced to submit.

Having now read some extracts from this book showing the workings of a censorship and its ridiculousness in this city during the war between the States in a Government where free people are accustomed to indulge in the luxury of reflection, I will give attention to the expression from the censor of the press in England, and I believe the person whom I shall now quote was the last censor in England until the present war.

Sir Roger L'Estrange in May, 1680, in first exercising his authority as licensor and censor of the press, and in explaining the attitude of the ruling classes, among other things said:

A newspaper makes the multitude too familiar with the actions and councils of their superiors and gives them (the multitude) not only an itch, but a kind of colorable right and license to be meddling with the Government.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to ask the Senator a question in regard to his amendment. I wish to know if he would not consent in line 7 to strike out the word "calculated," and to insert in lieu thereof the word "intended"?

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator. The amendment which I tendered on yesterday I will modify at his suggestion in line 7 by striking out the word "calculated" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "intended," or will introduce another amendment to that effect, so a vote may be had upon both forms.

Now, Mr. President, this great right, the freedom of the press—and I use the term "freedom of the press" in its legal sense as used in the Constitution—has been so jealously guarded that some of the best authorities say that if A learns that a paper is about to print a false scandal about him, he has no remedy by injunction or otherwise, but is left to his remedy at law for damages or by prosecution. Quoting from 8 Cyc., page 893, Monograph on Constitutional Law:

Injunctions to prevent abuse of the right. It is still, however, uncertain whether the attempt to prevent, rather than to punish, abuses of speech or publications is constitutional.

There are a number of very respectable authorities tending to show that sometimes injunction will lie; but the authorities are very respectable and numerous to the effect that injunction will not lie. I ask to include the authorities in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Authorities: The following cases sustain attempts to prevent such abuses: Shoemaker v. South Bend Spark Arrester Co. (135 Ind., 471; 35 N. E., 280; 22 L. R. A., 332). Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. In making the change in the amendment just suggested by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], does the Senator from Arizona also intend to strike out the word "calculated," in line 9, on page 2, and substitute the word "intended"?

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator from Iowa. That amendment should follow. I am going to modify my amendment to that effect before I tender it finally, when I conclude my remarks, or offer another amendment to that effect.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, will the Senator pause long enough to explain what he means by the word "intended"? Does he mean that the publisher must make the publication with the intent to help the enemy?

Mr. ASHURST. If the Senator will pardon me, I want to get the amendment in the shape in which it will command the most votes. I think the committee provision is in grave danger of being adopted. My amendment originally contained the words "all information calculated to be of aid to the enemy"; but the Senator from Kansas has suggested a modification to that, and the Senator from Iowa suggests that to be consistent I ought to insert the word "intended," instead of "calculated," on line 9, page 2, so that it would read "intended to be useful to the enemies of the United States."

The word "calculated" might imply that the defendant calculated in his mind that it should be of use to the enemy. I believe there should be a guilty mind; that the information was intended to be of use to the enemy. The intent can only be drawn from the acts and the motives of the defendant. So, Mr. President, that reconciles me to the insertion of the word "intended." I am going to read my amendment later. It provides for a jury trial; it provides that a jury shall pass upon the question of intent.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. Let me inquire, would it not be treason if it were intended that the enemy should get the information?

Mr. ASHURST. I am inclined to think it might be and ought to be; I rather think so.

Mr. WALSH. Then that is covered by the statute relating to treason.

Mr. ASHURST. In treason there must be an overt act and it must be proved by two witnesses. If I write a letter to the Senator I "publish" it. My amendment will cover not only those publications which appear in newspapers but any letter that is calculated to be of use to the enemy, because "publication" includes the writing of a letter by one man to another man; that is publication in the eyes of the law.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to suggest to the Senator that if it is treason, if the statute really designates a thing that falls within the definition of treason, it will be necessary, as a matter of course, to have two witnesses to the overt act.

Mr. ASHURST. That is true.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Would not the word "intended" operate to shift the burden of proof upon the State in a manner different than would be the case if the other word were employed?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to ask the Senator whether he would not just as soon go on in the morning? I should like to have a quorum here in order to made an effort to secure a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. ASHURST. I fear I may be obliged to be absent for a time to-morrow. I would have finished by this time had I not been interrupted.

Mr. OVERMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not know he desired to conclude this afternoon.

Mr. ASHURST. I am going to finish very soon, just as soon as I can. I would not want a day or so to elapse between the beginning of a speech and its conclusion, for in that event one half of my speech might get lonesome without the other half.

Now, Mr. President, it is said that republics never learn by experience, and that democracies are wholly unable to fight a successful war. I do not wholly agree with such statements. We are now called upon to avail ourselves of the lessons taught to us by the British Empire. Shall we learn? No man can say who won the war for Great Britain, because it has not been won as yet; but I am able to name the man who has prevented Great Britain from being defeated. The man who prevented Great Britain from being defeated in this war was not the distinguished Right Hon. Arthur James Balfour, who did us the honor to address the Senate yesterday. The man who saved Great Britain was not David Lloyd-George; not that distinguished statesman, Herbert Henry Asquith; not even Sir John Jellicoe; nor was it Churchill. But the man who saved the British Empire was none other than Alfred Charles Harmsworth, known to heraldry as Lord Northcliffe. He made personal visits to the British lines. He discovered that the shells that were made in England would only reach one-third of the distance they were guaranteed to reach; that inferior powder was being used in them; and that thieving contractors were palming off upon the Government shells of one-third of the potentiality they were guaranteed to have. In spite of censorship, in the face of a court-martial, Alfred Charles Harmsworth published to Great Britain and to the world those facts that a censorship sought to conceal, and in those publications saved his Government and country from disaster.

So, Mr. President, we may pass our statutes and say to the press that we will filter out the news to the people through some man; but the press of this country, if I know it, if it is patriotic, as I believe it is, will publish the facts, censorship or no censorship, if the attempt is made to feed our troops embalmed beef and set up typhoid fever camps, such as were set up in the War with Spain. During the Spanish-American War, in the city where I now live, viz, Prescott, Fort Whipple was located, as it is now, about 1 mile from the city. Troops were brought to Fort Whipple and it became necessary to have more shoes for them. The shoes wore out in three days. They had paper soles and were paper shoes. Do you think that the press of this country would be performing a patriotic duty if it sat silent, cowed by a censorship, when grafting contractors were palming off on the Government paper shoes and embalmed beef and shells that would not explode and would carry but one-third of the distance they were intended to go? No. There would be a hundred Alfred Charles Harmsworths, who might not be lords in one sense, but would be lords in another, who would come to the rescue of their country and publish the facts to the world that an incompetent War College or bureaucratic commander might—I do not say would, but might—see fit to suppress. Human nature is human nature. I attempt to conceal my defects, and so do you all. If I were Secretary of War, and had defects or made mistakes, I would expect to try to conceal my defects, and so would you all; but it is our duty as men and as Senators to see to it that no defects and no blunders are concealed, but that they are laid before the American people, so that at least they may know the facts in the case and aid the officials in correcting them.

So, Mr. President, I am opposed to censorship. A golden stream of $7,000,000,000 is soon going to proceed from out the Treasury of the United States, raised by taxes laid upon the people. We may want to discuss how and when and by whom that is to be spent. We do not know what we might want to say about it. We do not know what the papers might want to say about it; but in making this speech I wish to be understood as not in the slightest degree reflecting upon the integrity or the capability or the honesty of those Cabinet ministers now in charge of our affairs.

I believe I can say, without that offensive flattery that should disgust a Cabinet officer, that our Cabinet to-day measures up just as high and is just as pure and is just as patriotic, and upon it we may as confidently and as trustingly depend as upon any Cabinet in the history of our Government. But do you claim that they are infallible and unable to make a mistake? If they are the wise men I think they are, if they are the patriotic men I believe them to be, they will welcome a disclosure so startling as that made by Lord Northcliffe, should like facts exist, regarding the shortage and the inferiority of the shells that were furnished to the British Government in the latter part of 1914 and during the early part of the year 1915.

We are going to make, in my judgment, many, many mistakes in this war, because we are human beings. We only learn by mistakes, and unless the mistakes are discovered and exposed to the public how will we learn? Our War College and our generals will probably be in command of more men than they have ever before assembled even on paper. They will be called upon to perform duties requiring high efficiency.

I know there are men in the world who are like the ancient ruler who always beheaded all those who brought bad news; but, Mr. President, there is some iron and blood in the American people. They can bear bad news without flinching. They want the truth during the progress of this war. The only effective way, in fact, the only way in which they can secure it, is to have these lynx-eyed reporters and these editors, who we have a right to assume in large part are patriotic, lay before the country each morning or each day the status as to how the soldiers are fed, how they are clothed, and so on. Nobody expects that any newspaper will, and indeed the editor should be punished if he did, publish information as to the movements of the fleet, the troops, the aircraft, the location of powder factories, the location of defense works, and all that sort of thing.

I do not know who the censor is that has been appointed. I was told the other day; I have forgotten. I am going to assume that the censor who has been appointed is a man of the highest character; but when I assume that I am not bound still further to assume that he is the wisest man, the most circumspect man, in all our country.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Before the Senator goes to that, I should like to address another question to him, because, in my judgment, his discussion is very enlightening and helpful.

The Senator referred to the difficulties which a war correspondent encountered during the Civil War about getting dispatches to his paper from Washington to New York. There are a great many correspondents of foreign papers now in the city of Washington.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. Information conveyed from this city to Copenhagen, for instance, or to Christiania, or to Stockholm, undoubtedly would get right into Germany. Are we to understand the Senator as objecting to a censorship of the cable under which these gentlemen who are correspondents for these foreign newspapers would be limited at all in transmitting information for publication in their papers?

Mr. ASHURST. No, Mr. President. I would not want to give to the correspondents of foreign newspapers the authority to publish and send to a foreign country any news as to the movements of our troops. I would not want that at all. In fact, I would be willing to assist, if I could, in the suppression of dispatches to points in other countries from which they might reach our enemies.

Mr. President, I will illustrate what I mean. I have for a long time believed there was a powerful wireless station in Mexico working with Germany. I called the attention of the War Department to my views. I presume that the letters and communications are in the department. Finally I secured a copy of a newspaper from Mexico, and I found in one little corner a notice that "there are now 30 wireless stations working in the Republic," and that "the land wires are unnecessary, because our wireless is working everywhere"; and in another corner of the paper I found a dispatch saying that "the powerful wireless, being the thirty-first, has just been completed and set up" on the northern side of the island of Lobos, on the eastern side, although I believe there is such an island also on the western side, and that that wireless would work anywhere in the world. I sent that to the War Department and asked their attention to it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, that is most interesting and important information which the Senator now gives us. Then an American newspaper publishes all about the movements of our troops, anything it sees fit to publish; it goes over into Mexico; they put it on the wireless there and send it to Germany.

Mr. ASHURST. I just said that I would be willing to do anything we could, take more aggressive measures, in respect to dispatches going to points from which they might reach our enemies.

Mr. WALSH. But the point is that we can not control the Mexican wireless from this country. If they permit wireless stations to be established there, we can not prohibit that.

Mr. ASHURST. But does the Senator think the American people should be allowed to remain in ignorance as to the fact that those conditions exist in Mexico?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly not. I do not understand that there is anything in this bill that would prevent information being circulated to the effect that there are wireless stations in Mexico in communication with Germany; but that is not the point. The point I am making is that those wireless stations being there, as we will assume for the purpose of the discussion, affording opportunities for communication with Germany, if we allow our papers in the United States freely to print information concerning the disposition and movements of our troops, and those newspapers are carried across the border into Mexico, as a matter of course, all the information that they contain will be transmitted by wireless to Germany.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator says "information as to the movements and disposition of our troops." My amendment—which I am going to read now, because I am going to conclude—provides for striking out all after the parenthetical (c), and inserting the following:

Whoever, in time of war, shall publish any information with respect to the movements, numbers, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the location of any fortifications, munition plants, machine shops, shipyards, docks, factories, naval stores, arsenals, or any other information relating to the national defense calculated to be useful to the enemies of the United States, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed in any way to limit or restrict any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives or the publication of the same—

That provision is in the bill now—

Provided further, That in any prosecution hereunder the jury trying the cause shall determine not only whether the defendant or defendants did willfully publish the information relating to the national defense, as set out in the indictment, but also whether such information was calculated to be useful to the enemies of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. President, that is the point I am making. The Senator, as I understood him, interprets his own language to mean that the crime has not been committed unless the publisher intends that the information shall get to the enemy; but I want him to assume the case where the publisher does not intend anything of the kind at all. He simply intends that it shall get to his readers in this country; but it is carried across into Mexico, and thus the information gets abroad. I would not give that interpretation to the language of the amendment as proposed by the Senator, but I take his own interpretation of his own language; and the crime would not be committed, as I understand him, unless the publisher of the newspaper printed the matter with an intent that it should get to the enemy.

Mr. ASHURST. There are two different kinds of offenses attempted to be defined here: First, the substantive offense of publishing any information concerning the disposition of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United Stafes, or with respect to the location of any fortifications, munition plants, machine shops, shipyards, docks, and so forth. That is one offense. Intent is not necessary there.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly.

Mr. ASHURST. The next offense described in my second amendment is, any information not described above calculated to be of use to the enemies of the United States; because I have not sufficient ingenuity, and very few men have, to describe all the offenses that might come under the class of "calculated to be of use to the enemy."

Mr. WALSH. Then, I inquire of the Senator, wherein lies the difference between his amendment and the provision found in the bill?

Mr. ASHURST. The provision found in the bill is unconstitutional because it sets up a precensorship. That is where it offends against the Constitution. It sets up a precensorship; but the fundamental law of our land requires that in cases of this kind, in all cases regarding publications, the jury must pass upon the case. A man can be deprived of his liberty only after a jury has found him guilty; because "freedom of the press" means, and means only, freedom from anybody saying what you shall and shall not publish.

Mr. WALSH. I quite agree with the Senator, but I do not understand how he finds a precensorship in the provision of the bill and does not find it in his amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Why, there is no precensorship in my amendment. My amendment simply says that whoever in time of war shall do certain things is guilty of a crime.

Mr. WALSH. But that is what the bill says.

Mr. ASHURST. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. The bill says:

Whoever in time of war in violation of reasonable regulations to be prescribed by the President, which he is hereby authorized to make—

That means that regulations can be made. It involves the great question as to whether or not these regulations are reasonable. It means that a censorship is set up, that some man is clothed with sufficient authority to visé the dispatches of all persons; and the gravamen of the offense in the bill is the publication of the matter without the consent of the party set up as a censor.

Mr. WALSH and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield; but I want to get through in a minute.

Mr. WALSH. I want to say to the Senator that those of us who are responsible for the language do not give it that interpretation.

Mr. ASHURST. I said half an hour ago that I would be very presumptuous to set up my opinion on a constitutional question against the opinion of the distinguished Senator from Montana, but nevertheless that is my opinion; and, indeed, a censorship now has been established, though not under this authority.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator refers to that, because that is a matter that is altogether different from the matter under consideration here, and I take this occasion to say that the censorship to which the Senator refers is nothing more nor less than this: A Mr. Creel has been appointed to give to the newspapers such information as the War Department chooses to give out concerning the movements of the troops. He has absolutely nothing to do with the activity of any newspaper correspondent who gets any information anywhere else.

Mr. ASHURST. I am very glad to know that. That is probably not in law a "censorship"; it is a matter of departmental policy. I presume that if the department does not desire to promulgate to the general public what is transpiring in that department, it would take statute law to require it to do so.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. In order that I may understand the position of the Senator—and I desire to do so—I want to submit a concrete illustration, and ask him whether he thinks there ought not to be some provision by which punishment might attend such conduct.

Suppose that we shall send to France—as we doubtless shall within a short time—a number of troops. They will have to be transported upon our vessels or the vessels of our allies. Does not the Senator think that, in view of the submarine warfare, we ought to conceal from our enemies the fact that these troops are going, the places from which they go, and the hours of their departure?

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is entirely right; and any newspaper that would publish that—and I doubt if any newspaper in the Nation would publish it—should be punished according to law.

Mr. KING. Supposing now that a newspaper should publish those facts—not in order that the knowledge may get to the enemy but hoping that it will be confined to its own readers—does not the Senator think that it would be proper to lodge somewhere the power to inflict punishment upon the newspaper that gave out that information in such a way that it would reach the enemy?

Mr. ASHURST. Why, in drawing my amendment I reflected for a time upon the advisability of making punishable with death the offense of communicating to the enemy such intelligence or publishing anything as to the movements of the fleet. I would vote for a provision like that. I want that substantive fact of guilt to be found by a jury, however.

I want to say before I pass on that the day the colonel, of whom my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] spoke—that colonel who has two large fists and a mouthful of teeth—sails for Europe at the head of a hundred thousand men—and he will sail—I do not believe you can find a newspaper in the Nation unpatriotic enough to publish the fact that he has sailed, or to give the name of the port from which he sails, or where the men are going, or how they are going.

Mr. WALSH. I quite agree with the Senator; I do not expect any paper will print it; but my attention was called the other day to a publication which appeared in one of the papers in New York City which gave exact and explicit information concerning the location and the extent and the number of nets spread in the harbor of New York City for the purpose of intercepting any submarine that might come into the harbor.

Mr. ASHURST. I am very much disappointed. I did not believe that they would attempt to do that, and it disappoints me to learn it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the Senator from Arizona concludes, I wish he would clear up a matter which touches me somewhat. As the Senator's amendment was originally drawn it was easy to see that it provided for an offense that had not been covered by the preceding part of Chapter II, but as he has now consented to its change by eliminating the word "calculated" and substituting the word "intended" I see no difference except in form between paragraph (c) as it would be if the Senator's amendment were adopted and paragraph (b). It defines practically the same offense and the same proof would be required to establish it.

Now, we have attached as a penalty to a violation of paragraph (b) punishment by death or imprisonment not less than 30 years. Punishment for exactly the same offense in substance attached to the amendment by the Senator from Arizona is a fine of $10,000 and imprisonment for not more than 10 years. It would seem to me that if the Senator intends to redefine practically the same offense he ought to attach the same penalty.

Mr. ASHURST. As to the particular penalty, I have no pride of expression, but think heavy penalties should be inflicted.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest to the Senator that in its present form, as the Senator from Iowa has said, the amendment is merely a repetition of paragraph (b) in the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it is exactly the same in legal effect. I may say to the Senator from Arizona that in my judgment he has simply described the crime of treason just as the crime of treason is described in paragraph (b).

Mr. FLETCHER. When you use the word "intended" for "calculated" you base the whole thing on the proposition of paragraph (b) during time of war.

And (b) whoever, in time of war, with intent that the same shall be communicated to the enemy, shall collect, record, publish, or communicate, or attempt to elicit any information with respect to the movement—

And so forth.

That is all covered by the proposal.

Mr. ASHURST. I think that part can be stricken out of my amendment. I realize that it is very difficult to catch the guilty and at the same time not to throw heavy or unjust labor upon the innocent. I think the Senators who have given attention to the particular question as to lines 19, 20, 21, and 22, with reference to the rules and regulations to be observed, will see the radical fundamental differences between my amendment and the provision of the bill on page 8.

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. ASHURST. There is the radical change.

Mr. CUMMINS. But in paragraph (b) we have no rules and regulations provided, for paragraph (b) declares that "whoever, in time of war, with intent that the same shall be communicated to the enemy, shall collect, record, publish, or communicate."

The offense is punishable by death because it is treason.

Mr. ASHURST. In other words, let me get the point the Senator makes.

Mr. CUMMINS. In the Senator's amendment there are no rules and regulations, but the provision is now that anyone who publishes information intended to be useful to the enemy's cause shall be punished.

Mr. ASHURST. I catch the Senator's point. Then striking out the word "calculated" in line 7 of my amendment changes the whole course of the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely, and makes it simply a duplication of paragraph (b).

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator for calling attention to it. I am bound to admit that there is very great force in what the Senator says. Hence that is one of the reasons why I have offered two amendments, one containing the word "intended," and the other containing the word "calculated," so that if, upon reflection, Senators believe the amendment containing the word "intended" will be found more serviceable, they will have an opportunity to vote for that. I wish to say that I have submitted the two amendments in order to be within the rule which will take effect to-morrow, I presume, requiring the amendment to be submitted before the vote is taken upon the motion calling for the cloture upon the bill.

The privileges which the English-speaking people hold to be of inestimable value, to wit, suffrage—based upon patriotism and integrity instead of upon property—a free press and freedom of religion, have not been easily acquired or easily maintained. The contest for a free and untrammeled press has been just as keen and intense as the contest for a free ballot.

In England, until the expiration of the licensing act, May 3, 1695, it was by no means certain that the publication of a newspaper was not illegal. The Court of Star Chamber delivered an opinion that it was unlawful to publish without license, and, indeed, near the close of the reign of Charles II the judges pronounced that it was a misdemeanor at common law to publish any news of a political nature without the express approval of the licensors of the King. Even John Milton's Paradise Lost narrowly escaped severe mutilation, and with difficulty obtained "leave to print" from the King's licensors.

Article I of the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States was a rampart reared for the protection of the American people against those persons who believed that republican governments were dangerous delusions, and for the security of the people against legislative, executive, and judicial usurpations, just as the Bill of Rights and the Great Charter were reared by the English people for their own protection against the encroachments of the royal prerogative.

Congress passed the act of July 14, 1798, which declared it to be a crime to publish any false, scandalous article concerning Congress or the President, and making it unlawful to stir up sedition against the United States. The manifest purpose of this sedition law was to shield the Federal Government from damaging criticism, and the sedition law was of a transient nature limited to short duration and expired by effluxion of time on March 4, 1801.

The constitutionality of the sedition law was vigorously assailed with great ability and earnestness and was defended with equal vigor. This sedition law was impugned as being directly opposed to the letter and spirit of the Constitution of the United States and as wholly inconsistent with the rights of citizens and the liberty of the press. It never came before the United States Supreme Court, but Mr. Vice President John C. Calhoun, writing in August, 1832, said that from the date of the formation of the Constitution in 1787 down to 1832 only one question of a political character had been settled in the public opinion, and that that question was the unconstitutionality of the sedition law.

It is difficult to estimate the number of prosecutions conducted under this sedition law, but sufficient it is to observe that each prosecution still further served to swell the tide of indignation against it and its authors, and the heat of popular resentment against the sedition law was undoubtedly one of the features of the campaign which promoted the triumph of Thomas Jefferson and the defeat of John Adams in 1800.

We must not forget that in many of the governments of antiquity liberty degenerated into license, and that with many of the ancient rulers the word "liberty" became an excuse or pretext for measures which transformed liberty into license and destroyed the very things which made liberty valuable. Indeed, the history of the world furnishes us with many painful and shocking examples of men who have spoken rapturously and sometimes with flaming eloquence of liberty and patriotism, but who simply used such speeches as a disguise or mask to conceal the fact that they were subverting true liberty.

We in this age who are not restrained to establish and publish a newspaper or print our sentiments therein seem to think these rights were born with us, are inherent in us, and seemingly it never occurs to us that our patriotic ancestors gave up their liberty, shed their blood, and sacrificed their lives in order that we might enjoy privileges which we of to-day accept as a matter of course, but which mean very much to people who value true freedom. American citizenship is an inheritance which has been achieved and maintained only by virtue of stupendous sacrifices that have been made by those who have gone before to secure for us this inestimably valuable boon.

The United States is just entering upon a struggle of unparalleled proportions against the most perfectly organized and powerful nation in the world. Such a situation, of course, calls for sacrifice from every individual citizen of this Republic. In responding to the duties incumbent upon us in this posture of affairs the soldier stands foremost and his sacrifice is the greatest. He will be called upon, if necessary, to give up much that is dear to him—his home, freedom of speech and action, his prospect of gainful occupation for a time, and perhaps his life. The soldier exacts no conditions, but loyally gives himself to his country as represented by the constituted authorities placed over him, and although the soldier yields up his civic rights entirely for the good of his country, he is none the less a citizen. He simply waives his rights temporarily to give greater efficiency to his efforts and justly looks forward to the time when the authority of government will again restore the exercise of civil rights he has so patriotically laid down.

The duties of the citizen not in the battle line are of a more peaceful and not so exacting a character, but every citizen is none the less a soldier; he is either a soldier of the shop, a soldier of the soil, a soldier of the train, a soldier of the farm or factory, and it well becomes the citizen not in the battle line to appreciate the grandeur and magnitude of the devotion of his fellow citizens in the field and to prove that he, the citizen not in the battle line, is also a soldier called upon to make some sacrifices, but that his country's demand upon him is relatively small when compared to the sacrifices that may be called for from the soldier. Hence, of course, the citizen not in the battle line must and should be willing to give up a part of the liberty he exercises in normal times and imitate, so far as possible, the loyal and patriotic example of the soldier in the field. The citizen will be unfair to the soldier as well as unfaithful to the country if while enjoying the fruits of freedom he were unwilling to give up a portion of the privilege which the soldier resigns for the common good.

We must admit that freedom of discussion as to the movements of the Army and Navy and the location of munition factories and powder plants, which would be perfectly innocent and harmless in time of peace, may be insidious treason and strike at the root of military power in time of war. Hence a statute should be enacted laying heavy penalties upon those persons who publish any information concerning the location, number, and movement of troops and fleets, the location and operation of munition factories, powder plants, fortifications, and defenses; but let the statute be enacted in accordance with the Constitution; allow the offending person to be indicted, tried by a jury of the vicinage; let the question of the guilt or innocence of the person be tried according to law; make penalties as heavy as may be thought necessary—subject the defendant to rigorous and extreme punishment—but do this in the manner provided by the Constitution.

If it be wise to require the citizen in civil life to give up his great right to publish his sentiments and views and to forego for the common good his right to have accurate information as to the state of war, let the citizen be denied such right and privilege in accordance with the methods prescribed by our Federal Constitution.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, every phase of the bill has been discussed at length. There are 12 chapters and every chapter has been discussed. I want to see if I can not get an unanimous-consent agreement to vote on the bill. I ask the Senate to agree to the order which I ask to have read by the Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that not later than 11 o'clock a. m., Friday, May 11, 1917, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill S. 2, the espionage bill, so called, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that after 11 o'clock on said day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment thereto.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am sure I want to reach an early vote on the bill; I do not intend to object to an agreement to fix the time to vote; but that is lacking in one element, namely, that the bill will be before the Senate between now and 11 o'clock on Friday.

Mr. OVERMAN. To-morrow anyone can speak as long as he pleases.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want the vote to be had to-morrow.

Mr. OVERMAN. Of course there is no reason why we should not vote to-morrow.

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to have the privilege of offering an amendment, and when the debate has been concluded I wish to have a vote upon the amendment. I think there ought to be a provision in the agreement so that the bill may be kept before the Senate continuously until it is concluded, and if we can conclude it before the hour named on Friday we ought to do it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I expect to finish it on Friday, even without a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose some Senator upon that side, or this side either, has another bill that he thinks very important, just as the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] had a bill to-day, why should he not bring it before the Senate?

Mr. OVERMAN. I will say to the Senator that I will keep this bill before the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. For both discussion and action?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have faith enough in the Senator from North Carolina to accept his statement.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senator from North Carolina. I want to facilitate the vote on the bill, and I am desirous of aiding the Senator from North Carolina in bringing the bill to as speedy a conclusion as possible. In the order he submits for adoption by unanimous consent, he has proposed that what we usually call general debate shall end at 11 o'clock on Friday, and that we shall then proceed to the consideration of amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Not later than 11 o'clock on Friday.

Mr. STONE. Well, not later.

Mr. OVERMAN. We can take them up earlier.

Mr. STONE. Of course, if it can be done earlier all the better, but that is immaterial. When 11 o'clock on Friday is reached we are to consider amendments, and no speech beyond 10 minutes shall be permitted. In the meantime what is going to happen?

Mr. OVERMAN. We will go on with the bill to-morrow, and my opinion is that one of the first things we reach will be the espionage chapter, if the Senator wants to speak on that, because we have finished with the last chapter. Then the bill comes regularly into the Senate for concurrence in the amendments adopted as in Committee of the Whole, and amendments then will be offered to each chapter.

Mr. STONE. I understand the process of proceeding as well as the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know you do.

Mr. STONE. But what I had in mind is that when we conclude the consideration of the bill as in Committee of the Whole this afternoon, as the Senator hopes to do, and it goes to the Senate proper, and we adjourn or take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock, the bill then comes before the Senate and is subject to amendment as in Committee of the Whole. If the bill goes to the Senate this afternoon, and we adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow, or take a recess until that hour, all general debate must end by 11 o'clock the next day.

Mr. President, I do not know how many amendments are going to be proposed in the Senate to the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Now, I want to say——

Mr. STONE. Just wait a moment. I do not know who is going to get the floor or who is going to ask to take the floor, or whether we are going to have two or three Senators recognized, who will speak out the whole day of Thursday. So I come to the point I have in mind, that this order ought to contain a provision that when the bill goes to the Senate from the Committee of the Whole no Senator shall speak longer than one hour. That will give more of us a chance to say what we desire to say.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, what I should like to see inserted in the agreement would be a provision that speeches on the bill hereafter should be limited to 10 minutes. A 10-minute speech is listened to and has some effect upon the action of the Senate, while a long speech vacates the Senate Chamber and accomplishes nothing. If the Senate would agree to give the Senator from North Carolina what he asks and agree that, beginning on to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock, we should proceed with the consideration of this bill and any amendments that should be offered, and that thereafter no Senator should speak longer than 10 minutes, we should really have a debate; we should consider amendments, and every Senator would have an opportunity to say all that he really has to say.

Mr. OVERMAN. We could not get such an agreement, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Can we not?

Mr. STONE. No; you can not get such an agreement by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We can not get it otherwise.

Mr. STONE. Then you can not get it in that way.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say to the Senator from Georgia that I have conferred with Senators about that, and they will not agree to that.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia has debated this bill on several occasions and at considerable length.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me, he is mistaken. He will not find that I took over 10 minutes at any one time. The Senator may examine the RECORD as to that.

Mr. STONE. I should not like to join issue with the Senator, but into how many hours the various 10 minutes which he took would run it is impossible for me to calculate at this moment. However, when the question comes up in the Senate on that provision of the bill relating to newspapers and other publications, the provision which has just been debated by the Senator from Arizona, I desire to be heard for 30 minutes or thereabouts. It may be a little less and it may be a little more, but not much less nor much more. I am not willing to have my opportunity circumscribed in the way suggested by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If I had known the Senator from Missouri desired to speak upon the matter, I should not have made the suggestion——

Mr. STONE. I am quite sure of that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Because I would be glad to be here and to hear him for 30 minutes or longer.

Mr. STONE. I am quite sure the Senator would not have made the suggestion. I believe he is entirely sincere in the whole statement that he has made.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am.

Mr. STONE. But I do not think any Senator ought to speak over an hour.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, to-morrow we shall have all day for speeches; this bill will be finished as in Committee of the Whole in an hour. Then it goes to the Senate, and on the matter about which the Senator from Missouri is speaking he can get the floor at once and make his speech on that particular feature of the bill.

Mr. STONE. How does the Senator from North Carolina know that I can get the floor?

Mr. OVERMAN. I know the Senator can get the floor, as there are only a few more speeches to be made, as I understand.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator will assure me of that fact, I have nothing more to say.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think to-morrow we will get through with all the speeches.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina if, under the unanimous-consent agreement which he proposes, it would not be possible to exhaust debate to-morrow and to proceed to a vote on the bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. That is what the unanimous-consent agreement provides for.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But that we shall not dispose of it before Friday unless debate is exhausted?

Mr. OVERMAN. Not later than Friday.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me?

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I desire to ask the Senator from North Carolina if this proposed unanimous-consent agreement will be applicable only to the Senate bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. It is applicable, of course, to the Senate bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As I understand, the other House has passed a bill very similar to this one. It must have reached the Senate by this time, and presumably it has gone to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is before the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I assume, without professing to read the mind of the Senator from North Carolina, that it is the intention of that committee to report that bill and to substitute the Senate text after the enacting clause?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then debate on the bill will be entirely reopened?

Mr. OVERMAN. Debate can be reopened.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. While I have the floor, as the Senator from North Carolina has yielded to me, would it not be possible to obviate that difficulty in advance?

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not see how we can do so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would it not be possible for the Judiciary Committee—and I feel great hesitancy in offering that committee or its acting chairman any advice—to report the House bill and to make the substitution before the unanimous-consent agreement is made?

Mr. OVERMAN. We can report that bill back, and when this bill is passed we can then offer it as a substitute for the House bill, but not until then.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Inasmuch as the whole proceeding is by unanimous consent, why could not that provision be made a part of the unanimous-consent agreement, to wit, that the text of the Senate bill, by unanimous consent, be substituted for the House bill?

Mr. OVERMAN. Of course, the Senate can do anything by unanimous consent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That will obviate the point made by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. The point I intended to make was that it would be very advisable, if possible, to make the substitution before the hour of 11 o'clock on Friday. Then the unanimous-consent agreement for restricting debate would apply to the substitute.

Mr. OVERMAN. How can we substitute this bill for the House bill until we finish this bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. We can do so by unanimous consent.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senate will make a unanimous-consent agreement such as we had on the Army bill, and have no debate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But that opens debate again, and we shall lose another day.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should like to make this suggestion to the Senator from New York: We ought to bring the House bill back here at once, offer the Senate bill as a substitute for it, and proceed to perfect our substitute for the House bill, which is the Senate bill. Then, when we adopt the substitute, we are through with it; we do not have another day with a reopening of the issues.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will ask unanimous consent to do that, I think the Senate will agree to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not any doubt about the parliamentary situation—that if the Committee on the Judiciary desire to report the House bill with the Senate amendment, it can be so reported.

Mr. OVERMAN. On second thought, I think we can do that without unanimous consent, for I can come in and offer the Senate bill as an amendment at any time by giving notice before it comes into the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Why can we not now, by unanimous consent, withdraw the House bill from the committee, take it up, and then offer this bill as a substitute for it, and go on and perfect it?

Mr. OVERMAN. We can report it back in the morning and offer this as a substitute for it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What would you offer as a substitute? The bill as it has been amended up to this time as in Committee of the Whole or the bill as reported originally by the committee?

Mr. OVERMAN. This bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. But this bill is not yet finished.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is not finished, but I should like to have that done after the bill is finished; and that is what I had intended to do.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Why can we not have a unanimous-consent agreement now to withdraw the House bill from the Judiciary Committee, to take it up, and let the Senator from North Carolina then offer this bill, as we have so far perfected it, as a substitute for the House bill? Then we can proceed to perfect the substitute and adopt it and be through with it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. One reason why it would be objectionable, in my opinion, to do it in that way, would be that an amendment offered on the floor would be an amendment in the second degree and would not be subject to any further amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all. We would have a right to perfect the substitute. The Senate bill as it now stands would be offered as a substitute for the House bill, and we could perfect the substitute before we voted on it, just as we are perfecting it now.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is just what I supposed; but in my opinion an amendment to an amendment offered from the floor would then be out of order as being in the third degree.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I think that the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia is practical and can be carried out. Let the committee report the House bill back with a substitute in the form of the Senate bill as it now stands. The substitute will then come before the Senate and will be open to amendment. I think we can do that.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator will remember that the committee has authorized that bill to be reported back. That can be done at any time.

Mr. NELSON. I suggest that the Senator report it back now and recommend that the Senate bill in its present condition be substituted for the House bill. That would settle it, and then the substitute would be open to amendment. I think the Senator in charge of the bill is authorized to make that report.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am authorized to make the report.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have a suggestion to make, which I think will meet with general approval. We might add a clause to the unanimous-consent agreement to this effect:

That upon the disposition of the pending bill the Senate will proceed to the consideration of H. R. 291, and vote without debate upon any motion which may be made to strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute the text of the pending Senate bill, and that House bill 291 shall then be passed by the Senate, if the motion to substitute shall prevail, without debate.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is all right.

Mr. CUMMINS. That would be very objectionable, unless the right to amend the substitute after its adoption were reserved.

Mr. WALSH. That procedure is to be obviated, if possible, the idea being to require all amendments that any Senator cares to submit to be offered to the pending bill, and then, when the pending bill is in such form as meets the approval of the Senate, take up for consideration the House bill and vote immediately upon a motion to substitute.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not care how it is reached; but it could be done in another and, I think, much simpler way, by reporting the House bill, agree to substitute for it the Senate bill as at the present time perfected, with a reservaton that the substitute shall then be open to amendment precisely as though it were an original proposition.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, there is a great deal more machinery about that than under the plan I propose. Under that suggestion we would have to refer it to the committee and the committee would have to report it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The very moment we vote to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill, and that motion is adopted, the right of amendment is over. There is no further opportunity to amend.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, why would it be? Why does the Senator want to amend it further after the Senate bill has been perfected?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not, if the motion to substitute is not made until the Senate bill is fully perfected.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the plan I had marked out—to perfect the Senate bill and offer it as a substitute for the House bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is subject to only one objection—and I do not raise it—namely, that when an amendment is offered to the amendment it will not be in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. There will be no amendments to it after the Senate bill is substituted, according to the suggestion made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. That will be the end of it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Chair if he can give us advice in advance with reference to the parliamentary status? If the House bill is reported from the committee and the Senate bill is offered as a substitute for it, is not that substitute open to amendment and perfection, just as we are seeking now to amend and perfect the Senate bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no question of doubt that the substitute would be open to amendment and that the original bill would be open to amendment. The House bill would first be subject to amendment and then the substitute. There is not any doubt about it and there never has been. It is a proposition to strike out and insert.

Mr. OVERMAN. According to that ruling, I do not see now why I should not report the House bill from the committee with the Senate bill as a substitute.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, before that is done I desire to say that I would not wish to give my consent to an agreement like that, because I do not believe that a correct statement of parliamentary law. If the substitute is offered, then an amendment to the amendment in the second degree will not be in order. There is no doubt about that being the law, in my judgment. So, I would not want to enter into an agreement that would put us in the condition that an amendment to the amendment would not be in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There never has been any doubt about it. The Chair will read again Rule XVIII, for the benefit of the parliamentarians of the Senate. It is as follows:

If the question in debate contains several propositions, any Senator may have the same divided, except a motion to strike out and insert, which shall not be divided; but the rejection of a motion to strike out and insert one proposition shall not prevent a motion to strike out and insert a different proposition; nor shall it prevent a motion simply to strike out; nor shall the rejection of a motion to strike out prevent a motion to strike out and insert. But pending a motion to strike out and insert, the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted shall each be regarded for the purpose of amendment as a question; and motions to amend the part to be stricken out shall have precedence.

There is not any doubt about the question presented.

Mr. HARDWICK. The precedents of the Senate, however, are the other way on this precise question, when it comes to the proposition that another bill is offered as a substitute, and I would not enter into an agreement based on any such theory.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the opinion of the Chair there is not any doubt as to the proposition to strike out and insert, and there never has been.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry. Why can not I, under the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, at any time before the bill reaches the Senate, give notice that I am going to offer, when the bill gets into the Senate the House bill, with the Senate bill as a substitute for it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The trouble about the whole matter is this: The Senator from North Carolina is presenting a unanimous-consent agreement which, if it be entered into, will result in the disposal of this bill in some way, either by its passage or by its rejection. He has proposed no unanimous-consent agreement whatever with reference to the House bill. When the pending proposed agreement is made, of course, he can not put into it the provision regarding the House bill. That is the trouble with it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that if the Committee on the Judiciary is ready to report House bill 291, which is a bill upon the same subject, striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting Senate bill No. 2 as amended up to this time, then to-morrow morning we can take up the House bill. Then the Senate can perfect the substitute or the original House measure, as the case may be, and the House bill will be before the Senate in place of the Senate bill. That seems to me to be the quickest and the easiest way to obviate the difficulty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] was thinking about was this: That the Senate bill, being offered as a substitute for the House bill, if it passed from the Committee of the Whole and reached the Senate, of course it could not be amended.

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Because it is all one amendment; but when the House of Representatives bill is reported with the Senate amendment it is in the Committee of the Whole. It has not reached and will not reach the Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; that is true. But I have the other situation in mind where it might be urged that an amendment was in the third degree, and it might prevent real consideration.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry there. We are operating under a unanimous-consent agreement which provided that each chapter should be adopted in Committee of the Whole as an independent proposition. Now we have passed the time for the amendment of many of these chapters in the Committee of the Whole.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We have.

Mr. CUMMINS. And if that rule is to prevail with the substitute we might not be permitted to amend the substitute at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But the Senate is operating under a unanimous-consent agreement to consider each chapter separately and adopt it separately in Committee of the Whole, but it is not under a unanimous-consent agreement that this bill shall ever come to a vote; and if the Senate does not want it to come to a vote and takes up the House of Representatives bill with a substitute this unanimous-consent agreement is dead.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is very satisfactory.

Mr. OVERMAN. I might report the House bill now as a substitute for Senate bill 2, and then ask unanimous consent for the consideration of House bill 291.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is all right.

Mr. OVERMAN. If that is the way to do it, I will report it now and ask that this bill be a substitute; that all after the enacting clause be stricken out and this be offered as a substitute——

Mr. HARDWICK. But you can not amend it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why, to be sure you can—as a substitute for House bill 291. I do that now by unanimous consent.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from North Carolina reports favorably from the Committee on the Judiciary House bill 291 with an amendment. The amendment proposes to strike out all of the text of the House bill and to insert certain words—the Senate bill as amended to the present time.

Mr. OVERMAN. Now, I ask unanimous consent to take up that bill for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, before that is agreed to I still want to suggest to the Chair that the committee has reported what the Senate has so far perfected as an amendment to the House bill—an amendment to strike out and insert, in the nature of a substitute—so that the committee amendment is the question before the Senate. If a Senator offers an amendment, that will not be open to amendment, because it will be in the third degree.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that an amendment offered by a Senator to that shall be in order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, as I understood the position of the Senator from Connecticut, it was this: That if an amendment was offered to this substitute——

The VICE PRESIDENT. There never has been any difference in the rulings since the present occupant of the chair has been here; at least, that any Senator may offer an amendment to the original House bill if he wants to; a Senator may offer to amend the amendment; a Senator may offer to amend the substitute; or a Senator may offer to amend the amendment offered to the substitute, under Rule XVIII. They are really original bills, being motions to strike out and insert.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think there is any doubt about that. Now, Mr. President, I substitute——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Chair lays this bill before the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. Just a minute. I think we ought to have another unanimous consent now, making the unanimous-consent agreement entered into with respect to the Senate bill applicable to this bill, namely, that all action taken with reference to the various chapters of the Senate bill in the Committee of the Whole shall be deemed to have been taken with reference to this.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; this is a new bill.

Mr. WALSH. Otherwise we start right in with Chapter I, and it is open to amendment and discussion all along down the line.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is all right.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is, unless we can get this unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. MARTIN. Have you taken up the House bill now?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, let the House bill be reported.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been reported.

Mr. OVERMAN (reading)—

It is agreed by unanimous consent that not later than 11 o'clock Friday, May 11, 1917, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (H. R. 291), the espionage bill, so called, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition, and that after the hour of 11 o'clock on said day no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than 5 minutes upon any amendment thereto.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I want in there a provision that during the consideration of the bill prior to 11 o'clock on Friday morning, if any Senator desires to speak upon the bill generally, or any provision of the bill generally, he may do so for not exceeding one hour. Has the Senator from North Carolina any objection to that?

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no objection.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Except that it would be impossible for all Senators to avail themselves of the privilege.

Mr. STONE. It would be less possible for Senators to avail themselves of the privilege if there be no limitation on debate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My only point is that the Senator has got it so long that only a few Senators could speak if they spoke one hour each.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understand that the vote does not come until 11 o'clock on Friday. There is no limitation on the time of speaking before that.

Mr. STONE. There is none, but I am trying to put a limitation upon it. If you do not, then two or three or four Senators may take the whole 8 or 10 hours.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think that is the intention.

Mr. STONE. If it is the intention, that is what I am opposed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have no objection whatever to the thought of the Senator from Missouri; but if it is intended that there shall be no vote upon any amendment to the bill until 11 o'clock Friday, I am opposed to it, and would not consent to it. I want to proceed to-morrow morning, as early as may be thought desirable, with the bill and go right forward with it; and anybody who wants to speak can speak, and if nobody wants to speak we can have a vote.

Mr. STONE. Why, to be sure; if no one wishes to speak, we can have a vote.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the suggestion is that there be nothing but talk to-morrow.

Mr. STONE. That is not my suggestion.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; not the Senator's, but that has been the suggestion.

Mr. OVERMAN. I said they could do that if they wanted to.

Mr. CUMMINS. And I do not want to enter into an agreement of that kind.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is nothing of that kind in the proposed unanimous-consent agreement. That was only a suggestion made by me to the Senator from Missouri—that he could speak as long as he wanted to.

Mr. STONE. I want to speak as long as I want to speak, but I say it will be considerably less than an hour; but I do not want to be cut off by some Senators who desire to speak very much longer, if there should be any.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why not, then, limit the time from now on to 1 hour for each Senator, and after 11 o'clock limit it to 10 minutes?

Mr. STONE. That is just what I am saying.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; I should like to see that done.

Mr. STONE. That is what I am saying, or substantially what I am saying.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then, Mr. Secretary, it is suggested that we insert:

Provided, That from this hour no Senator shall speak more than one hour.

Mr. STONE. "Provided, That from the adoption of this order."

Mr. OVERMAN. "Provided, That from the adoption of this order no Senator shall speak more than one hour."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. "From the adoption of this order up to 11 o'clock Friday."

Mr. STONE. "Up to 11 o'clock Friday, no Senator shall speak more than one hour."

Mr. OVERMAN. "Provided, That from the adoption of this order until 11 o'clock Friday no Senator shall speak more than one hour."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado will state it.

Mr. THOMAS. Some Senators, including myself, have reserved the right, after the bill comes into the Senate to present certain amendments. If this unanimous-consent agreement is made, what effect will that have upon our right to proceed according to our reservation?

The VICE PRESIDENT. We have done a lot of things since the Senator from Colorado was here. That bill is all out of the way.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand, Mr. President, that that bill is out of the way. At the same time it is the same bill that is before us; and I should prefer to proceed, as far as I am concerned, under the reservation which was then made. If, however, notwithstanding that, I can call up the amendment under the present arrangement at any time, I shall not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That arrangement can not apply to this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let me say this: This bill is about finished and is going to the Senate early to-morrow, because the only thing before the Committee of the Whole now that can possibly come up is the last chapter; and I have agreed upon an amendment with some Senators here who have been opposing the last chapter upon certain grounds, so that there can not be much debate on it. Therefore, when that is adopted, it will come into the Senate as soon as the Senator from Iowa introduces his amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Surely the Senator from North Carolina remembers that his Senate bill has been displaced.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand. I am talking about the bill that will be up, House bill 291. It really is this same bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It may really be the same bill, but it is in the Committee of the Whole and open to amendment at any place from anybody who may want to offer an amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it a fact that all of the amendments that have been presented to the pending bill are now disposed of?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They undoubtedly are.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Is that the understanding of the chairman of the committee?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Another parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut will state it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is it necessary that Senators should give notice that they reserve the right to offer an amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly not. This is a new bill, which is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and is open to amendment anywhere.

Mr. OVERMAN. Now, Mr. President, if the Secretary is ready, I should like to have him read the proposed agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 11 o'clock a. m. on the calendar day of Friday, May 11, 1917, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill H. R. 291, the espionage bill, so called, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that from this hour until 11 o'clock a. m. of Friday, May 11, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than one hour upon the bill and any amendments offered thereto, and that after the said hour of 11 o'clock a. m. of Friday, May 11, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill or more than once or longer than five minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. STONE. The order asked for provides that "from this hour" no Senator shall speak more than one hour. That is very indefinite. It ought to be "from the adoption of this order."

Mr. GALLINGER. It is the same thing.

Mr. STONE. No; I beg to express the opinion that it is not the same thing. We might keep on here until the Lord knows when. This hour is 5 minutes to 6 o'clock; and we might not do this until to-morrow morning, and then it would be different.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. The bill we are considering, the Senate bill, has not yet been concluded, and the Senator from North Carolina, in charge, says he thinks he will be able to conclude it to-morrow. I had supposed, from the colloquies that had occurred here previously, that he would finish it to-night. Now, if this bill is to go over until to-morrow and we are to have long debates on this last chapter, those debates on that chapter might run on through the whole day of to-morrow. We have had so many experiences of that kind that for the Senator from North Carolina to say that he expects to conclude it very speedily to-morrow morning, without taking into his confidence 95 of his colleagues on this floor, is merely the expression of an opinion.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no confidence at all. I have nothing to say, except that it is my judgment that that will be done.

Mr. STONE. Well, I know; that is just what I said—that it was the judgment or opinion of the Senator. Now, if we spend the whole day to-morrow in the discussion of this last chapter, and then have to go to voting at 11 o'clock the next day, I do not see what chance there is going to be for anybody to discuss——

Mr. THOMAS. I suggest the substitution of May 12, at 11 o'clock, in place of May 11.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Saturday.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no objection to that, if that will be satisfactory.

Mr. STONE. If the Senator asks if it satisfies me, yes; I will take my chances on that.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then, Mr. Secretary, just insert there "Saturday, May 12," instead of "Friday."

Mr. STONE. And we do that in the hope that we will get through even to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I was not present during this controversy, but I submit to the Chair that we now have a new bill before us, and that that bill is amendable from start to finish.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has made the distinct statement that the bill pending before the Senate is the House bill——

Mr. GALLINGER. Exactly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. For which the Senate committee has offered to substitute the Senate bill as far as it has been agreed upon.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has made the announcement that the bill is in Committee of the Whole; that the House bill is subject to amendment; that any Senator may offer to amend the House bill, and another Senator may offer to amend the amendment; and that a Senator may offer to amend the Senate bill, and that another Senator may offer to amend the amendment of the Senator to the Senate bill. It is in the Committee of the Whole as an entirely new bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the very point I wanted to emphasize, that we are not now confined to a consideration of one section of the original bill but that we have a bill de novo before us.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair wished to make a statement, as the opinion of the Chair, to see if it was disputed.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no question about it at all.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think we ought to go on and continue the consideration of this bill, and then introduce it as a substitute when the bill is completed, and pass it without delay.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina reported the House bill as a substitute, and asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to take it up.

Mr. OVERMAN. I can withdraw that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Senate has given its consent.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senate has given its consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly, and it was laid before the Senate and can only be displaced by unanimous consent or by a motion to proceed to the consideration of some other matter.

Mr. OVERMAN. We need not take up the House bill at all. The bill before the Senate is Senate bill 2. I asked unanimous consent to report the bill from the committee as a substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator asked the Senate to take it up, and the Senate did take it up.

Mr. GALLINGER. And we are considering it now.

Mr. STONE. Can not the Senator by unanimous consent withdraw the report?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly; if the Senator wants to withdraw it and substitute the Senate bill.

Mr. STONE. No; just withdraw the report.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am going to ask unanimous to withdraw that and continue this bill, and do like I had intended from the outset. If Senators want to go on and debate it afterwards, let them debate it. The only course to pursue is to go on with this bill under the unanimous-consent agreement. I withdraw that bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I may have no objection, but I wish to suggest to the Senator from North Carolina that he will not improve the situation in that way, because, when he goes on and perfects the Senate bill and then moves to take up the House bill and moves to substitute the Senate bill as perfected, we will be in exactly the same situation we are in now. The House bill will be open to amendment as the Senate substitute will be open to amendment. So I suggest to the Senator he does not improve the situation at all by changing the present status.

Mr. GALLINGER. We had better let it go as it is.

Mr. WALSH. I do not see why the Senator should want to change the status.

Mr. OVERMAN. I take it for granted if the bill has been considered no Senator will debate the bill when it comes up again after we have perfected the measure.

Mr. WALSH. I feel that the Senator can rely on that and that the Senate will stand to it.

Mr. OVERMAN. We will get it through on Saturday some time if this unanimous consent is given. So I will let it go.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no use to call the roll if there is an objection from any Senator present.

Mr. THOMAS. What is the statement of the Chair?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair said there is no use to comply with the rule and call the roll for a quorum in order to present the unanimous consent if any Senator present is going to object.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. This is not a unanimous-consent agreement which attempts to set a final day for a vote on the bill. Therefore the roll does not have to be called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not know why it is not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It does not limit the hour when we shall vote on the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It certainly does.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It merely limits debate on the bill to 10 minutes for each Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. The Chair supposed it provided for a final vote. It does not seem to so provide.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not think so as I heard it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thought it did.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There is no unanimous-consent agreement proposed that before adjournment on the calendar day of Saturday, May 12, the Senate shall vote upon the bill and all amendments to its final disposition.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not at all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There is no such agreement as that proposed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no agreement as to a final vote on the bill proposed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the Secretary read the agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 11 o'clock a. m., on the calendar day of Saturday, May 12, 1917, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill H. R. 291, the espionage bill, so called, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; and that from the hour of the adoption of this agreement up to the hour of 11 o'clock a. m., of Saturday, May 12, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than one hour upon the bill and any amendments offered thereto; and, further, that after the said hour of 11 o'clock a. m., of Saturday, May 12, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than five minutes upon any amendment offered thereto.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The consideration of the bill might extend for a week before a final vote was reached.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I understand there is an inconsistency there. It provides for a final vote commencing at 11 o'clock Saturday.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No.

Mr. SWANSON. And the latter part of it provides for debate to continue.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It provides that we shall begin to vote on amendments and on the bill to the final disposition, but it does not say that before adjournment on any particular day the bill shall be voted on to a final disposition. There is no time fixed for a final vote on the passage of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is impressed with the fact, and is going to rule on it now, that it requires a call of the Senate to disclose a quorum.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think I shall object, then, to save the calling of the roll. I do not object to limiting debate nor do I object to a unanimous-consent agreement that is intelligible. If we all understood the same thing by the proposed agreement, I would not object to it now.

Mr. OVERMAN. What does the Senator understand?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understand that no time is fixed for a final vote on the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I purposely left that out for the reason that one Senator would not agree to that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well, if the Senator takes that view of it I will not object.

Mr. BORAH. It is not so material what view the Senator takes about it but how the Vice President construes it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think he will construe it. It is for the Senate to construe its own unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. BORAH. One Senator might have a view different from the rest of the Senate, but if the Chair holds that it fixes an hour for a final vote the Senate will likely approve it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It might.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Chair holds that the agreement fixes the hour, then I shall object to the unanimous consent. I do not understand that it does that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has an opinion. The Chair believes that it will be necessary to do just what was done before—that is, that at midnight on the 12th, regardless of any pending amendment or amendments, it will be necessary to vote on the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. In conferring with the Senator from North Carolina I suggested a change in language to meet that very situation. That language is entirely different from the unanimous-consent agreement to which the Vice President now refers. It was changed so that we would not be confronted with that situation. If that should be the ruling of the Chair, then I will object to this unanimous-consent agreement, because I do not want the Senate to be in the situation it was in on the Army bill when we reached the point where important amendments could not be presented.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There can be no doubt about it—"not later than 11 o'clock a. m. on the calendar day of Saturday, May 12, 1917, the Senate will proceed to vote upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill, H. R. 291," the House bill, "through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition."

Mr. JONES of Washington. But it does not say the bill must be disposed of on that day. It simply says that beginning at 11 o'clock speeches shall be limited. But I do not care to argue that, except that I would object to that construction. The legislative day would be all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not know what a unanimous-consent agreement would amount to for a vote if it does not fix any time for a final vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It limits the time in the first instance.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is all I could get, and I think it is all right. I will change the word "calendar" before "day" to "legislative." The Senator does not object to that?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I do not object to that.

Mr. OVERMAN. Strike out "calendar" and insert "legislative."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is it the understanding that there must be a vote on that legislative day?

Mr. JONES of Washington. On that legislative day. It may run into next week.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not care where it runs or when it is.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to understand it. Suppose the Senate declines to take a recess—I do not say that it will—so as to make a legislative day, then it forces a vote on the calendar day, does it not? I object to the unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator object to the unanimous consent?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is no use to call the roll, then.

Mr. CALDER. This afternoon there was filed with the file clerk of this body a petition against the passage of the pending measure. This petition was signed by 1,500,000 representative citizens of the United States. It was gathered during the course of a week's canvass by the newspaper organization of W. R. Hearst. There are still some hundreds of thousands of names signed to similar petitions which it has been impossible to forward to Washington because of intervening distance.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator if the 1,500,000 signers were volunteers or were they drafted?

Mr. CALDER. I understand that they were volunteers.

I have the petition with the signatures here, and I ask unanimous consent to insert the petition in the RECORD without the signatures.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The petition referred to is as follows:

Petition to Congress opposing the espionage bill.

To the Congress of the United States:

Your petitioners earnestly and respectfully ask the Congress not to pass any censorship act that shall extend beyond military and naval news of va ue to the enemy.

The whole country is engaged in the war, and the whole country should be permitted to know the truth about the war.

It is always dangerous in a republic to withhold from the people full knowledge of their affairs or to deprive the press of the right freely to express public opinion.

The censorship provision of the espionage bill now pending in Congress is an assault upon the very foundation of our free institutions—freedom of thought and of speech.

It is un-American, because it tends to put in full effect for the first time in the life of this Republic regulations for the suppression of news and free public discussion—a suppression practiced only under monarchies and autocracies.

It is undemocratic in that it violates the principle enunciated by Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, who declared that government without laws would be better than government without a free press.

It is unrepublican in that it violates the principle of Abraham Lincoln, who said that it was better that public officials should be criticized unjustly than that they should not be criticized at all.

It is unpatriotic in that it violates the spirit, if not the letter, of our Constitution, which provides that "Congress shall make no law * * * abridging the freedom of speech or of the press."

We therefore urge that Congress shall take no step to withhold from the people that full information of the progress and conduct of the war which is necessary for their proper enlightenment, or to deny to the people their fundamental American liberties of free speech, free publication, and a free expression of opinion.

Concealment of military plans and operations during their execution is always necessary, but concealment of the result of those operations, of failures or reverses, or past mistakes, or of incompetence or dishonesty, is inexcusable in a Republic where the people govern and must know the truth in order to govern wisely and well.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will withdraw the objection I made to the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the Senator from Connecticut withdraws his objection, and I ask that it may be agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to understand it. There was a suggestion on the part of the Senator from Connecticut that if it were the legislative day and the Senate refused to take a recess, then we would have to vote on the final passage at 12 o'clock midnight. If that is the understanding of the Senator, I will not consent to it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not know how that could be claimed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We would then be right in the position we were in on the Army bill with important amendments coming up that could not be considered.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will use my influence to prevent that, and I do not think the Senate would take advantage of the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understood the suggestion was that the Senate would have to vote by 12 o'clock Saturday night.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not at all. We could take a recess until Monday morning, and from Monday until Tuesday morning, and from Tuesday until Wednesday morning of next week.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course I do not care about taking a recess. I simply want to provide against the contingency of having this bill come to a final vote when there are important amendments that Senators desire to offer which they can not offer, let alone discuss. That is all. I should like to see the agreement changed so that we might begin the consideration of this bill in the morning and then continue its consideration until it is disposed of.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is practically what the agreement proposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It gives an opportunity for an hour's speech on each proposition.

Mr. OVERMAN. We try to give and take, Mr. President.

Mr. JONES of Washington. With the understanding that the bill is to be disposed of on the legislative day, I will not object.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the Senator withdraws his objection.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Question!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks this calls for a final vote at some time on the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Of course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. So that it is necessary to have a call of the Senate in order to disclose the presence of a quorum.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the roll be called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	Kirby	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Gerry	Knox	Smoot
Borah	Gore	Lewis	Stone
Brandegee	Hardwick	Martin	Swanson
Broussard	Hollis	Nelson	Thomas
Calder	Johnson, Cal.	New	Thompson
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Trammell
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Page	Wadsworth
Fall	Kellogg	Poindexter	Walsh
Fletcher	Kendrick	Shafroth	Williams
Frelinghuysen	King	Sheppard	Wolcott

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. SAULSBURY] because of important business. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. SUTHERLAND responded to his name when called.

Mr. PITTMAN entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina, that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the instructions of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan and Mr. VARDAMAN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I have some assurance from Senators that they think the speeches to-morrow will be very short. I believe, therefore, I will withdraw the request for unanimous consent, and move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 10, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 9, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Clerk, Hon. South Trimble, who caused the following communication to be read:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 9, 1917.

HON. SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House:

I hereby designate Hon. FINIS J. GARRETT to preside over the House for this day.

Yours, CHAMP CLARK.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, offered the following prayer:

O Thou great Spirit whose eternal energy is everywhere potent, help us to do our work fully, completely, patiently; that we may have no regrets for the past and go forward to meet the veiled future with brave and manly hearts, inspired by the incomparable life and character of Thy Son Jesus Christ Our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

BENNETT C. CLARK.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary clerk of the House, Bennett C. Clark, has made application to go into the Officers' Reserve Corps, and I believe is shortly to go into the training camp. I ask unanimous consent—and I do this without his knowledge—that the House grant to him temporary leave of absence, beginning at his convenience, with pay. Of course that will only run until he receives pay, if he does, under the Army appropriation bill in training camp.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that leave of absence with pay be granted the parliamentary clerk of the House for the reason stated. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire of the gentleman from Illinois whether this is to continue indefinitely, or only until the time he receives compensation as a member of the Reserve Corps?

Mr. MANN. Under the law he could not receive both compensations, and when he receives compensation as a member of the Reserve Corps his compensation here would cease.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection?

[Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had further insisted upon its amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, had agreed to the further conference asked for by the House, and had appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. WARREN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following concurrent resolution:

House concurrent resolution 7.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 13) entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes," the clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to omit the figures "$75,000," on page 42, line 16, of said bill, as the same were stricken out by the amendment of the Senate numbered 78, the conference report on said bill and amendments to the contrary notwithstanding.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will report the unfinished business.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 383. A bill to punish the destruction or injury of war material and war transportation facilities by fire, explosives, or other violent means, and to forbid hostile use of property during time of war, and for other purposes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, I am instructed to ask that this bill be passed on the first call, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, asks unanimous consent that this bill may be passed on this call without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CAR SHORTAGE.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of committees. When the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was called,

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I have from the Committee on Commerce only two bills. One of them is of great importance, and we have been receiving demands for its passage from all over the country. It is essential to transportation during the war. It refers to car shortage. I understand, however, that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], who is not here, thinks that we ought to waive the call to-day in behalf of the Committee on Agriculture. While I dislike to postpone so important a bill, if I can do it without prejudice I am willing to do it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman's committee will soon be reached again anyhow.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am perfectly amiable about it, but I do not want to be prejudiced by waiving it. I am perfectly willing if it is thought that we will not lose too much by it and the country will not lose too much.

Mr. CANNON. Which is the best bill and which is the worst bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. Judging from the complaints from commercial centers all over the country, as well as demands for transportation, the car shortage is very, very important. The railroads at this time are pretending to comply with the demands of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but the commission does not report full and faithful compliance. It is important that our bill should be passed as soon as possible.

Mr. CANNON. Then, why not pass it?

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, I have been importuned by others who say that the other bill is more important, and I understand that my leader is of the opinion that I ought to yield.

Mr. CANNON. Has the gentleman any leader when important business comes from his committee?

Mr. ADAMSON. I suppose we can be reached next Calendar Wednesday. What does the other gentleman from Illinois think of it?

Mr. MANN. I do not know; there are not very many bills on the calendar.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not suppose much harm will be done by my waiving it to-day. I have not seen until now the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] on the floor, but I will ask his opinion.

Mr. ESCH. It occurs to me that if the car-shortage bill was passed it might render unnecessary the insertion of certain things in the Agricultural bill that is to come up.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman thinks so and will come over here and help, I will call up the bill.

Mr. ESCH. I do not think it will take long.

Mr. ADAMSON. Very well; Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 328) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce" as amended in respect of car service, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, be further amended as follows:

By inserting in the second paragraph, before the words "and the term 'transportation,'" the words "and the term 'car service,' as used in this act, shall include exchange, interchange, and return of cars used in the transportation of property by any carrier subject to the provisions of this act," so that the paragraph as amended will read as follows:

"The term 'common carrier,' as used in this act, shall include express companies and sleeping car companies. The 'railroad,' as used in this act, shall include all bridges and ferries used or operated in connection with any railroad, and also all the road in use by any corporation operating a railroad, whether owned or operated under contract, agreement, or lease, and shall also include all switches, spurs, tracks, and terminal facilities of every kind used or necessary in the transportation of the persons or property designated herein, and also all freight depots, yards, and grounds used or necessary in the transportation or delivery of any of said property; and the term 'car service,' as used in this act, shall include exchange, interchange, and return of cars used in the transportation of property by any carrier, subject to the provisions of this act; and the term 'transportation' shall include cars and other vehicles and all instrumentalities and facilities of shipment or carriage, irrespective of ownership or of any contract, express or implied, for the use thereof, and all services in connection with the receipt, delivery, elevation, and transfer in transit, ventilation, refrigeration, or icing, storage, and handling of property transported; and it shall be the duty of every carrier subject to the provisions of this act to provide and furnish such transportation upon reasonable request therefor, and to establish through routes and just and reasonable rates applicable thereto; and to provide reasonable facilities for operating such through routes and to make reasonable rules and regulations with respect to the exchange, interchange, and return of cars used therein, and for the operation of such through routes; and providing for reasonable compensation to those entitled thereto."

By inserting in the fourth paragraph the word "rules," followed by a comma, before the word "regulations" in the fourth and sixth lines thereof; the words "the car service," followed by a comma, after the words "the facilities for transportation" in the ninth line thereof; and the word "rule," followed by a comma, before the word "regulation" in the sixteenth line thereof, so that the paragraph as amended will read as follows:

"And it is hereby made the duty of all common carriers subject to the provisions of this act to establish, observe, and enforce just and reasonable classifications of property for transportation, with reference to which rates, tariffs, rules, regulations, or practices are or may be made or prescribed, and just and reasonable rules, regulations, and practices affecting classifications, rates, or tariffs; the issuance, form, and substance of tickets, receipts, and bills of lading; the manner and method of presenting, marking, packing, and delivering property for transportation; the facilities for transportation; the car service; the carrying of personal, sample, and excess baggage; and all other matters relating to or connected with the receiving, handling, transporting, storing, and delivery of property subject to the provisions of this act which may be necessary or proper to secure the safe and prompt receipt, handling, transportation, and delivery of property subject to the provisions of this act upon just and reasonable terms, and every such unjust and unreasonable classification, rule, regulation, and practice with reference to commerce between the States and with foreign countries is prohibited and declared to be unlawful."

SEC. 2. That section 6 of said act to regulate commerce, as amended, be further amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. That every common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall file with the commission created by this act and print and keep open to public inspection schedules showing all the rates, fares, and charges for transportation between different points on its own route and between points on its own route and points on the route of any other carrier by railroad, by pipe line, or by water when a through route and joint rate have been established. If no joint rate over the through route has been established, the several carriers in such through route shall file, print, and keep open to public inspection, as aforesaid, the separately established rates, fares, and charges applied to the through transportation. The schedules printed as aforesaid by any such common carrier shall plainly state the places between which property and passengers will be carried, and shall contain the classification of freight in force, and shall also state separately all terminal charges, storage charges, icing charges, and all other charges which the commission may require, all privileges or facilities granted or allowed, and any rules or regulations which in anywise change, affect, or determine any part or the aggregate of such aforesaid rates, fares, and charges, or the value of the service rendered to the passenger, shipper, or consignee, and any rules, regulations, and practices to be established, observed, and enforced by such common carrier, either individually or jointly with other carriers, with respect to car service, including the classification of cars, the compensation to be paid for the use in car service of any car not owned by it, and the penalties or other sanctions for nonobservance of such rules, regulations, and practices. Such schedules shall be plainly printed in large type, and copies for the use of the public shall be kept posted in two public and conspicuous places in every depot, station, or office of such carrier where passengers or freight, respectively, are received for transportation, in such form that they shall be accessible to the public and can be conveniently inspected. The provisions of this section shall apply to all traffic, transportation, and facilities defined in this act.

"Any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act receiving freight in the United States to be carried through a foreign country to any place in the United States shall also in like manner print and keep open to public inspection at every depot or office where such freight is received for shipment schedules showing the through rates established and charged by such common carrier to all points in the United States beyond the foreign country to which it accepts freight for shipment; and any freight shipped from the United States through a foreign country into the United States the through rate on which shall not have been made public, as required by this act, shall, before it is admitted into the United States from said foreign country, be subject to customs duties as if said freight were of foreign production.

"No change shall be made in the rates, fares, and charges, or joint rates, fares, and charges, or privileges, facilities, rules, regulations, or practices which have been or shall have been filed and published by any common carrier in compliance with the requirements of this section, except after 30 days' notice to the commission and to the public, published as aforesaid, which shall plainly state the changes proposed to be made in the schedule then in force and the time when the proposed changes will go into effect; and the proposed changes shall be shown by printing new schedules or shall be plainly indicated upon the schedules in force at the time and kept open to public inspection: Provided, That the commission may, in its discretion and for good cause shown, allow changes upon less than the notice herein specified or modify the requirements of this section in respect to publishing, posting, and filing of tariffs, either in particular instances or by a general order, applicable to special or peculiar circumstances or conditions.

"The names of the several carriers which are parties to any joint tariff shall be specified therein, and each of the parties thereto, other than the one filing the same, shall file with the commission such evidence of concurrence therein or accepted thereof as may be required or approved by the commission, and where such evidence of concurrence or acceptance is filed it shall not be necessary for the carriers filing the same to also file copies of the tariffs in which they are named as parties.

"Every common carrier subject to this act shall also file with said commission copies of all contracts, agreements, or arrangements with other common carriers in relation to any traffic affected by the provisions of this act to which it may be a party.

"The commission may determine and prescribe the form in which the schedules required by this section to be kept open to public inspection shall be prepared and arranged and may change the form from time to time as shall be found expedient.

"No carrier, unless otherwise provided by this act, shall engage or participate in the transportation of passengers or property, as defined in this act, unless the rates, fares, and charges upon which the same are transported by said carrier and its rules, regulations, and practices with respect to car service have been filed and published in accordance with the provisions of this act; nor shall any carrier charge or demand or collect or receive a greater or less or different compensation for such transportation of passengers or property, or for any service in connection therewith, between the points named in such tariffs than the rates, fares, and charges which are specified in the tariff filed and in effect at the time; nor shall any carrier refund or remit in any manner or by any device any portion of the rates, fares, and charges so specified, nor extend to any shipper or person any privileges or facilities in the transportation of passengers or property, or establish, observe, or enforce any rules, regulations, or practices, either individually or jointly with other carriers, with respect to car service, except such as are specified in such tariffs or prescribed by direction or order of the commission with respect to car service as hereinafter provided for the case of emergency: Provided, That wherever the word 'carrier' occurs in this act it shall be held to mean 'common carrier.'

"That in time of war or threatened war preference and precedence shall, upon the demand of the President of the United States, be given over all other traffic to the transportation of troops and material of war, and carriers shall adopt every means within their control to facilitate and expedite the military traffic. And in time of peace shipments transported for the United States and at its expense and consigned to or by the United States for its own use shall be delivered by the carriers as promptly as possible and without regard to any embargo that may have been declared, and no such embargo shall apply to shipments so consigned.

"Whenever the commission shall be of opinion that an emergency exists in respect of the supply or use of cars for transportation of property, the commission shall have, and it is hereby given, authority, either upon complaint or upon its own initiative without complaint, at once, and, if it so orders, without answer or other formal pleading by the interested carrier or carriers, and with or without notice, hearing, or the making or filing of a report, according as the commission may determine, to suspend the operation of any or all rules, regulations, or practices then established with respect to car service for such time during the continuance of the emergency as may be determined by the commission, and also authority to make such just and reasonable directions with respect to car service, or for the distribution and movement of cars for the transportation of particular commodities or for transportation to or from particular localities during the emergency as in its opinion will best meet the emergency and promote operation of car service in the interest of the public and to the advantage or the convenience and commerce of the people. The directions of the commission as to car service, distribution, and movement during emergency may be made through and by such agents or agencies as the commission shall designate and appoint for that purpose.

"The commission may reject and refuse to file any schedule that is tendered for filing which does not provide and give lawful notice of its effective date, and any schedule so rejected by the commission shall be void and its use shall be unlawful.

"In case of failure or refusal on the part of any carrier, receiver, or trustee to comply with any direction or order with respect to car service, any regulation adopted and promulgated or any order made by the commission under the provisions of this section, such carrier, receiver, or trustee shall be liable to a penalty of $500 for each such offense, and $25 for each and every day of the continuance of such offense, which shall accrue to the United States and may be recovered in a civil action brought by the United States.

"If any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, after written request made upon the agent of such carrier hereinafter in this section referred to, by any person or company for a written statement of the rate or charge applicable to a described shipment between stated places under the schedule or tariffs to which such carrier is a party shall refuse or omit to give such written statement within a reasonable time, or shall misstate in writing the applicable rate, and if the person or company making such request suffers damage in consequence of such refusal or omission or in consequence of the misstatement of the rate, either through making the shipment over a line or route for which the proper rate is higher than the rate over another available line or route, or through entering into any sale or other contract whereunder such person or company obligates himself or itself to make such shipment of freight at his or its cost, then the said carrier shall be liable to a penalty of $250, which shall accrue to the United States and may be recovered in a civil action brought by the United States.

"It shall be the duty of every carrier by railroad to keep at all times conspicuously posted in every station where freight is received for transportation the name of an agent resident in the city, village, or town where such station is located, to whom application may be made for the information by this section required to be furnished on written request; and in case any carrier shall fail at any time to have such name so posted in any station it shall be sufficient to address such request in substantially the following form: 'The station agent of the ——— company at ——— station,' together with the name of the proper post office, inserting the name of the carrier company, and of the station in the blanks, and to serve the same by depositing the request so addressed, with postage thereon prepaid, in any post office.

"When property may be or is transported from point to point in the United States by rail and water through the Panama Canal or otherwise, the transportation being by a common carrier or carriers and not entirely within the limits of a single State, the Interstate Commerce Commission shall have jurisdiction of such transportation and of the carriers, both by rail and by water, which may or do engage in the same, in the following particulars in addition to the jurisdiction given by the act to regulate commerce, as amended June 18, 1910:

"(a) To establish physical connection between the lines of the rail carrier and the dock of the water carrier by directing the rail carrier to make suitable connection between its line and a track or tracks which have been constructed from the dock to the limits of its right of way, or by directing either or both the rail and water carrier, individually or in connection with one another, to construct and connect with the lines of the rail carirer a spur track or tracks to the dock. This provision shall only apply where such connection is reasonably practicable, can be made with safety to the public, and where the amount of business to be handled is sufficient to justify the outlay.

"The commission shall have full authority to determine the terms and conditions upon which these connecting tracks, when constructed, shall be operated, and it may, either in the construction or the operation of such tracks, determine what sum shall be paid to or by either carrier. The provisions of this paragraph shall extend to cases where the dock is owned by other parties than the carrier involved.

"(b) To establish through routes and maximum joint rates between and over such rail and water lines and to determine all the terms and conditions under which such lines shall be operated in the handling of the traffic embraced.

"(c) To establish maximum proportional rates by rail to and from the ports to which the traffic is brought, or from which it is taken by the water carrier, and to determine to what traffic and in connection with what vessels and upon what terms and conditions such rates shall apply. By proportional rates are meant those which differ from the corresponding local rates to and from the port and which apply only to traffic which has been brought to the port or is carried from the port by a common carrier by water.

"(d) If any rail carrier subject to the act to regulate commerce enters into arrangements with any water carrier operating from a port in the United States to a foreign country, through the Panama Canal or otherwise, for the handling of through business between interior points of the United States and such foreign country, the Interstate Commerce Commission may require such railway to enter into similar arrangements with any or all other lines of steamships operating from said port to the same foreign country.

"The orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission relating to this section, being section 11 of the act of August 24, 1912, shall only be made upon formal complaint or in proceedings instituted by the commission of its own motion and after full hearing. The orders provided for in the two amendments to the act to regulate commerce enacted in this section, being section 11 of the act of August 24, 1912, shall be served in the same manner and enforced by the same penalties and proceedings as are the orders of the commission made under the provisions of section 15 of the act to regulate commerce as amended June 18, 1910, and they may be conditioned for the payment of any sum or the giving of security for the payment of any sum or the discharge of any obligation which may be required by the terms of said order."

SEC. 3. That section 15 of said act to regulate commerce as amended be further amended, as follows:

By inserting the word "rule," followed by a comma, before the word "regulation," wherever that word appears in the section.

By inserting the word "rules," followed by a comma, before the word "regulations," where that word appears in the first sentence of the first paragraph of section 15, and after the word "exceptions," where that word appears in the first sentence of the fifth paragraph of said section 15.

By inserting, after the words "affecting any rate, fare, or charge," the words "or the car service," followed by a comma, in the first sentence of the second paragraph.

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after the expiration of 90 days after its passage, except that section 1 and that part of section 2 which, by amendment to section 6 of the act to regulate commerce, as amended, confers authority upon the commission in case of emergency in respect of the supply or use of cars for transportation of property, shall take effect and be in force immediately.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin, who is the author of the bill, to make such explanation as he may desire and answer such questions as may be asked him.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, the bill seems rather formidable, as far as length is concerned, but the new legislation contained therein would not cover more than a page and a half. It is sought in the bill to amend sections 1, 6, and 15 of the interstate-commerce act in order to give the Interstate Commerce Commission full power and jurisdiction over the matter of car service. The new matter which is up for consideration is principally contained on page 9, beginning on line 14 and extending to line 14 on page 10. The substantive feature of this proposed legislation is contained in that one page of the bill.

The matter of car shortage is not of recent development. It has been with us for many years. It is an evil that is seasonal for the most part, occurring in those periods of the year when the shipments of coal and grain are greatest. The car shortage that has been existing ever since March of last year, which has been continuous in fact for a year, may in large degree be attributed to war conditions. While this bill seeks to give added powers to the commission in cases of emergency, it is not merely the emergency of war but the emergency of economic conditions.

There are many causes for car shortage. Among these may be first stated the want of the necessary rolling stock. In testimony before our committee and in testimony before the Newlands joint committee the railroad representatives themselves repeatedly adverted to the fact that, owing to the regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the several State commissions in the matter of rates, sufficient income was not allowed to maintain equipment at a point necessary to meet the conditions of traffic. Mr. Hill, of the Great Northern, said some four years ago that it would require the expenditure of a billion dollars a year to keep our railroads apace with the increasing needs of commerce. That, then, is the first cause of car shortage—the statement that the railroads have not had money enough to buy the necessary equipment. Whether we agree with this contention or not, the fact remains that there is a car shortage.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the gentleman might add that a great deal of the car shortage is due to the awkward method of the movement of trains—leaving them in yards by the railroad companies before delivering them to their destination. Between Joliet and Chicago, where cars are loaded by an individual company and shipped to itself at their own track, a distance of 37 miles, it takes an average of five days to make the round trip of the car, although the car may be loaded within two hours after it is received and unloaded within two hours after it has reached its destination. The movement of trains and the delay in the switchyards of the railroad companies have more to do with the car shortage than anything else, and it is not due to the fact stated by the gentlemen who testified before the committee.

Mr. ESCH. That anticipates another cause of car shortage which I intended to mention.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Did Mr. Hill mean to suggest in his statement that it would take a billion dollars a year for new equipment?

Mr. ESCH. New equipment and to meet the growing needs of commerce.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Additional equipment each year?

Mr. ESCH. New tracks, double tracks, sidings, terminals, and new rolling stock.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. COX. I am asking this question for information, for I do not like to bother the gentleman. What does the gentleman think of the contention of the railroad companies that this car shortage is partly due to so many regulatory bodies, from the Interstate Commerce Commission on down through the various State railway commissions? Does he think their contention is well founded?

Mr. ESCH. I do not think it is well founded, because the Interstate Commerce Commission has not had any such control as would bother them. We are here seeking to give the Interstate Commerce Commission such power as might supplant the power of some State regulatory body. But I was about to give some of the causes of car shortage. Another cause is the lack of sufficient sidings, trackage, terminal facilities, and elevators. There is no question but that all of these enter into the problem of car shortage. Of course, the railroad companies are not supposed to supply all of these facilities. Some of them, like elevators, warehouses, industrial tracks, and so on, must be supplied at the expense of private owners, but trackage, sidings, terminals, and like facilities must be supplied by the carriers. It is true that the tremendous export of food and ammunition from the Atlantic port terminals in the last two and a half years has overtaxed the terminal facilities of those ports, and there has not been much done since the beginning of the war to meet the demand.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman may come to this himself, or may be expecting to come to it, but it seems to me that we were definitely informed last year that the railroads had made an excess of profit over any preceding year of about three hundred and some odd million dollars.

Mr. ESCH. The amount is $601,000,000.

Mr. HARDY. The whole year?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Do the railroads contend that with these great excess profits they have not the means to get the necessary additional cars?

Mr. ESCH. I will state that last fall—I think in November—the railroads of the United States let contracts for car equipment, including locomotives, totaling something like $75,000,000. Whether that will be ample or not I do not know. I doubt it.

Mr. HARDY. That would be about one-eighth of their excess profits for last year?

Mr. ESCH. Of course, they also contend that while the profits of $601,000,000 seem large, they are abnormal, and therefore the fatness of last year should be conserved for the leanness of some subsequent year.

Mr. HARDY. In other words, they do not want to spend the profits they are making, but prefer to declare dividends?

Mr. ESCH. I think that may be so. Another cause of car shortage is the holding of cars on the part of shippers themselves, using the car as a species of warehouse, instead of promptly unloading it. I think that is quite a universal evil throughout the United States, but it is due in some measure to the lack of warehouse and elevator facilities at the terminals.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, unless the gentleman intends to enlarge upon this point, I would like to ask him right here if the shortage upon the Atlantic seaboard is not also due to the fact that we have failed to develop the water frontage in our great harbors, so that the necessary amount of ships can be accommodated at one time, and in consequence of that freight cars are backed upon the tracks for some miles distant while one ship is loaded and can be taken out and another ship put in the berth. And in that connection I refer to the fact that in New York Harbor on frequent occasions during this war you could see a dozen ships at anchor off the Statue of Liberty for a week or 10 days or 2 weeks simply because they have not got the carrying facilities at the docks to accommodate those vessels at one time.

Mr. ESCH. There is no doubt there is a lack of terminal facilities in the great ports.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ESCH. In a moment. One reason being, of course, the tremendous cost of terminal facilities at the great ports, and it may result in having terminals along our coasts constructed at places where land and wharfage and shore rights are cheap. I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would like to inquire whether or not it is the purpose of the amendment contained in this bill to prevent the evil or prohibit the evil of storage on sidings and in cars of, for instance, coal, which seems to be the very reason for the shortage as it is now determined.

Mr. ESCH. We give the commission under the proposed amendment power to expedite the movement of coal.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Why not have a provision in the bill that will specifically compel either the railroads to move the cars within 36 or other hours——

Mr. ESCH. That may be provided for by rules for demurrage or per diem charges to be enforced by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But notwithstanding the demurrage rates, and so forth, that evil did exist last winter greatly.

Mr. ESCH. That is true.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And led to a great deal of suffering by the people.

Mr. ESCH. That is true.

Mr. SNYDER. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is anything in this bill that forces the railroad company itself to unload its own cars and get them back to the starting point? The reason I ask that is this: Within a few days I made a trip to St. Louis and back by way of the Pennsylvania and the New York Central, and, in my best judgment, on careful count during daylight, I counted nearly 10,000 carloads of coal standing—not in operation, but standing on the tracks. Now, my judgment is a large amount of that coal is for the use of the railroads themselves, and there is a crying demand for soft coal particularly throughout the country.

Mr. ESCH. One of the reasons for the car shortage which I stated in this report I have written is the inefficient management and control exercised heretofore by the railroad officials, and as evidence of it is the very evil to which the gentleman has called attention; but I think that all of the cars the gentleman counted were not filled with coal for company use.

Mr. SNYDER. I do not maintain that they were, but it seemed to me they must be, or they would have moved them.

Mr. ESCH. On account of the congestion at port terminals the congestion now extends many miles into the interior, even as far back as a hundred or a hundred and fifty miles, and the sidings are filled with cars destined to port terminals where there is lack of shipping. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I desire to suggest to the gentleman I think it would benefit the whole membership of the House, realizing as we do that the gentleman from Wisconsin is a high authority on this proposition, if he might be allowed to proceed without interruption to his main statement and after that questions might be asked of him if desired. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will yield to me, I would like to ask him one question. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is any provision in this bill to compel railroad companies to pay demurrage to the shippers in case they failed to furnish the cars within the time they were required for the shipment of the goods?

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman means reciprocal demurrage?

Mr. MADDEN. This gives the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to authorize them to charge certain demurrage of the shipper if he fails to unload the car. Ought not the shipper to have a claim against the railroad company in case they fail to furnish the cars?

Mr. ESCH. I have no doubt under the proposed amendment, in case of emergency, the commission could make any rules or regulations that they saw fit that would promote the transit of freight, because the power is very broad, and necessarily so.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think there is anything in this bill that would justify the Interstate Commerce Commission in imposing a tax on the railroad companies for failure to furnish cars while it has adequate power under the bill to impose a tax on the shipper because he fails to unload the car? I think it ought to be reciprocal, and there ought not to be any one-sided, jug-handle law passed. This is a railroad law. It is not intended to do anything for facilitating the movement of commodities. It is intended to increase the price of commodities by giving the railroad companies the right to charge more for freight by the addition of more demurrage.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Wisconsin will remember that other parts of the interstate-commerce law provide with reference to orders to furnish cars.

Mr. ESCH. There is one reason for the car shortage which is probably as well known as any other and that is the lack of ocean-carrying space due to war conditions.

As long as we keep shipping from interior points to the ocean terminals and can not have the ships to take the freight from the port terminals, there is destined to be a very serious congestion. And increased activities of the U-boats, together with the lessened shipment due to the threat of loss by reason of such boats, have simply added to the complexity of the situation along the Atlantic coast. Now, I do not claim that this bill will change that situation very much, but to the Shipping Board is given the task of solving that problem, and we trust that it will be solved.

When the Interstate Commerce Commission was advised on March 1, 1916, that there was a shortage of 19,537 cars, it had already begun to investigate the matter and to suggest methods of relief. When on September 30, 1916, the shortage had reached 60,697 cars, the necessity for prompt action became even more manifest. When on November 1 the shortage had risen to 114,908 cars, the commission authorized Commissioner McChord, in response to many complaints from all parts of the country, to enter upon a general investigation covering all sections of the United States "concerning the supply, exchange, interchange, and return of freight cars, and all rules, regulations, and practices relating thereto, with a view of issuing such order or orders as the commission might deem appropriate." A hearing was held at Louisville, Ky., and witnesses representing substantially all the principal carriers of the country were examined with reference to their supply and use of freight cars. Shippers and consignees were also heard. The evidence disclosed the failure on the part of the carriers to observe the car-service rules of the American Railway Association, which provide for the return of cars to the owning roads. The failure to observe these rules of their own making, on the part of the carriers, became a common practice as the volume of traffic increased. "The misuses of equipment resulted in depriving the owning lines of cars which they had provided for the transportation of coal, grain, perishable commodities, and other articles and diverting such cars from the normal channels to the transportation of other commodities in other territory and reducing in large measure the ability of certain carriers to serve the shippers and consignees of freight located on their lines and the lines of their connections, and in denying to many shippers and consignees such transportation facilities as were necessary to them and such as they would have received if freight cars had been handled in accordance with car-service rules." In contravention of the provisions of the interstate commerce act "embargoes were placed by some lines against the movement of their own coal cars beyond their rails."

As a result of these disclosures, and on November 14, 1916, the carriers were requested by the presiding commissioner "to return foreign open-top cars and refrigerator cars to the owning lines, either loaded or empty, without delay. To this request all the carriers which were represented at the hearing gave their assent and filed severally their instructions for the return of these cars. At the hearing the carriers were requested to lift the embargoes which had been placed against the movement of their own coal cars beyond their rails." The executives of the railroads were requested by the commission to use their utmost efforts to relieve the deplorable conditions found to exist. As a result, the American Railway Association, on November 15, 1916, appointed a conference committee on car efficiency, which was subsequently merged into the car-service committee, to which committee was delegated full authority to handle the car-interchange question, and it proposed to increase the per diem charges on December 1. On that date increased demurrage charges were also to become effective, and it was decided further to put into effect penalties for diversion of and delays to equipment on January 1.

The committee took up its work here in Washington in conjunction with representatives of the Interstate Commerce Commission and issued circulars to the various carriers containing recommendations for the return of equipment to the owning roads. In spite of all these efforts to put a stop to the diversion and misuse of foreign refrigerator cars and coal cars, numerous instances of such diversions and misuse were reported to the Interstate Commerce Commission by its inspectors. The committee of the carriers was not securing obedience to its directions and this, too, notwithstanding the fact that the executives of many railroads had pledged themselves to give effect to the rules and support to the car-service committee in the performance of its duties.

As a result of the inability of the carriers, through the car-service committee, to secure enforcement of their own car-service rules, and the fact that notwithstanding all their efforts only partial progress had been made, the Interstate Commerce Commission, on December 28, 1916, issued an order to the carriers to show cause "why an order should not be entered requiring respondents to return to their owners without diversion or misuse all foreign open-top cars and all railroad owned or controlled refrigerator, heater, ventilator, and insulated cars after being unloaded at destination, either loaded or empty, (a) direct if belonging to direct connections, (b) through the proper home route if belonging to other than direct connections, or in accordance with such rules as may be found reasonable and be prescribed, and to return all other foreign freight cars to their owners in accordance with car-service rules 1, 2, 3, and 4 of the American Railway Association, or to effect a relocation of such cars in accordance with such other rules as may be found reasonable and be prescribed." As a result of the hearing on this order, the commission on January 18 last modified the car-service rules of the American Railway Association in certain particulars and prescribed what should be the reasonable rules thereafter to be followed. These new rules were required to be established on or before February 21 of this year, but owing to a final effort on the part of railroad executives to relieve the situation by sending empty cars in trainload lots from Atlantic port terminals to the West, the commission deferred the time of taking effect of these amended rules to March 15, and a later extension to April 15.

This decision of January 18, 1917, was not the unanimous opinion of the commission, three of the members dissenting on the ground that, based on prior decisions of the commission, especially the decision In the Matter of Car Shortage and Other Insufficient Transportation Facilities (12 I. C. C., 561), decided in January, 1907, the commission did not have power to prescribe general rules relative to interchange of cars, and the assumption therefore on the part of the commission in declaring what car-service rules were just and reasonable and should be enforced was an assumption of legislative powers. The majority, in justification of its decision, through Commissioner McChord, declared that "While all the members of the commission are not in accord with reference to the powers of the commission to make an order in this case (Car Supply Investigation No. 9284, decided Jan. 18, 1917), the wrongs are flagrant, and even if there were doubt as to the commission's power to give full relief by formal order, we think that in the emergency that doubt should be resolved not only in favor of the carriers who are wrongfully deprived of the use of their cars but in favor of shippers and the general public, who would be without remedy if, having the power, we failed to act."

It was because of this doubt in the minds of the commission, the commission being almost evenly divided as to their power to issue the order as to car service, to even enforce the rule which the railroad executives through the car-service commission had voluntarily agreed upon, that the committee felt we should have this legislation in order to remove the last doubt as to the power of the commission to correct the evil of car shortage. Instead of leaving the solution of car shortage to the voluntary agreement of the railroad executives themselves, we thought we should put the punch of law back of the commission, so that there should be enforcement of the rules. [Applause.]

I wish now to call attention to some of the amendments. The amendments to section 1 of the bill are merely verbal and are in the nature of definitions. The term "car service," as you will find on the middle of page 2, is thus defined:

> Shall include exchange, interchange, and return of cars used in the transportation of property by any carrier subject to the provisions of this act.

The next material change in the existing interstate-commerce act is found in the middle of page 5, which requires the rules, regulations, and classifications of the car service to be printed and made public just the same as railroad schedules are now required to be made public under existing law; that notice of changes of such rules must be given 30 days in advance of their becoming operative. The next material change in existing law is found, as I have already stated, in the middle of page 9, extending to the middle of page 10. And it is to that paragraph I wish to briefly call your attention:

> Whenever the commission shall be of opinion that an emergency exists in respect of the supply or use of cars for transportation of property, the commission shall have, and it is hereby given, authority, either upon complaint or upon its own initiative without complaint, at once, and if it so orders, without answer or other formal pleading by the interested carrier or carriers, and with or without notice, hearing, or the making or filing of a report, according as the commission may determine, to suspend the operation of any or all rules, regulations, or practices then established with respect to car service for such time during the continuance of the emergency as may be determined by the commission, and also authority to make such just and reasonable directions with respect to car service, or for the distribution and movement of cars for the transportation of particular commodies or for transportation to or from particular localities during the emergency as in its opinion will best meet the emergency and promote operation of car service in the interest of the public and to the advantage or the convenience and commerce of the people. The directions of the commission as to car service, distribution, and movement during emergency may be made through and by such agents or agencies as the commission shall designate and appoint for that purpose.

It may be contended that the first part of this proposed amendment gives the commission summary power in that it can suspend the operation of any rule or regulation as to car service without notice, without complaint, on its own initiative, without reply. But I will state that almost identical powers are given to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and in practically the same language in reference to the establishment of new schedules, so that we are not here treading upon new ground.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The serious trouble in some parts of the country—I know that it is true in the State of Mississippi, where we ship more stuff out of the State than is shipped into it—is caused by this fact, that in the process of their business the State becomes depleted of cars because the railroads will not willingly return empty cars, and they would rather keep cars where they can be hauled to and fro, where they will get a load both ways. Will this amendment that you have just suggested enable the commission to require the railroad companies to haul those empty cars back to places where they are needed?

Mr. ESCH. I think it will under this language:

> And also authority to make such just and reasonable directions with respect to car service, or for the distribution and movement of cars for the transportation of particular commodities, or for the transportation to and from particular localities during the emergency.

Now, in the gentleman's section they are suffering from a car shortage, so far as the lumber manufacturing interests are concerned, and in fact in some of the Southwestern States the situation with reference to the lumber industry is nothing less than deplorable. Some of the mills have shut down or have threatened to shut down because they can not get cars enough to ship their products. Their yards are full, their orders are more than they can fill; they have but 25 per cent of the necessary cars to ship out their product.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I have been advised that the Gulf & Ship Island Railroad, which is a small railroad in the State of Mississippi, running through the lumber country, has orders for large consignments of lumber to Cleveland, for instance, where they are building the submarine chasers, and to the Brooklyn Navy Yard, and other places where they are building the ships that we are trying to build. They are directed to set out so many cars in one place and so many in another. If they would set out the number of cars they are directed to set out in order to fill these orders, that would leave no cars to carry foodstuffs and groceries from one point to another. It is not because the road has not cars enough. I understand they have from 1,200 to 1,500 cars. The railroads will not bring them back empty. Out of the 1,200 or 1,500 cars they have about 200 available. There ought to be some provision by which they can get those empty cars back, so that they can do business, not simply to penalize the road that keeps them and charge them rent for the cars but to require that the cars be returned so that the lumber can be shipped out. How do you meet that?

Mr. ESCH. I think this power would be broad enough to enable the commission to meet that situation. Take the case of the New Orleans Great Northern, down in the gentleman's section. I believe they have only about 30 per cent of their own cars on their own tracks. The rest have gone out and are held up probably in some eastern port terminal. There should be some power somewhere to equalize that movement and permit the people living on the line of a road to receive fair treatment from that road, especially when the officers of that road want to give their people fair treatment.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman has referred to the power heretofore given to the commission to suspend the taking effect of a new rate.

Mr. ESCH. A new schedule.

Mr. CRAMTON. A new schedule, yes; in comparison with the power here given. Is there not quite a substantial distinction in the fact that heretofore, when the commission has had authority to suspend the taking effect of a new schedule, the old-established schedule would continue in effect, whereas under this provision we are to give the commission authority to suspend not a new rule but perhaps a rule or regulation that has been many years in effect, and without any notice, either to the shippers or the carriers, and allow the commission to put in place of it an absolutely new rule or regulation?

Mr. ESCH. Well, the gentleman must remember that this covers only cases of emergency.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am not speaking necessarily in a spirit of opposition.

Mr. ESCH. I think there is some merit in the gentleman's distinction as between changing and modifying new schedules and changing or suspending rules and regulations as to car service.

Mr. CRAMTON. Instead of continuing established conditions, this brings about new conditions without a hearing.

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I wish the gentleman would explain this proposition: Is the ruling of the commission, in such cases as it shall make a rule, final and conclusive upon the people who are interested? I notice this language, that they shall have authority to make such just and reasonable directions as they may desire. Are they the judges of what is just and reasonable, or do you believe that the person aggrieved might have recourse to the courts to determine whether these regulations are just and reasonable?

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman realizes that this is only amending one section of the interstate-commerce act, and we do not amend those sections of the interstate-commerce act which give the right of appeal and the right to go into the courts where injustice is done, or where there is confiscation of property, and so on. The rights are preserved.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In the gentleman's judgment, that remedy is still preserved?

Mr. ESCH. I think so. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has occupied 31 minutes.

Mr. ESCH. I want to reserve the balance of my time. The balance of the bill after page 10 practically contains no amendment except the insertion of the word "rule" in one case and the word "rules" and the words "or the car service" in section 15 of the interstate-commerce act.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. What change did you make on page 11, in the last paragraph?

Mr. ESCH. There is no change whatever of existing law there.

Mr. WINGO. From line 3 to line 21, inclusive, is that existing law?

Mr. ESCH. That is the existing law, with no change whatever.

Mr. CRAMTON. Are lines 3 to 13, on page 9, existing law?

Mr. ESCH. There is a change in line 9 which was suggested to the committee by Commissioner Hall, in order to remove an ambiguity which existed in that part beginning with line 8 and ending with line 13. That is a passage which was inserted in the Army appropriation bill of last year, I think, and so on his suggestion, in order to make it more definite and certain, we made a slight amendment in the language.

Mr. CRAMTON. Can the gentleman state the nature of that?

Mr. ESCH. The new words are:

Transported for the United States and at its expense and consigned to or by the United States.

With that addition it makes the sentence read:

And in time of peace shipments transported for the United States and at its expense and consigned to or by the United States for its own use shall be delivered by the carriers as promptly as possible and without regard to any embargo that may have been declared, and no such embargo shall apply to shipments so consigned.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. In connection with that language it has occurred to me, in reading it over, that it would perhaps in time of peace authorize shipments of live stock, for instance, absolutely contrary to quarantine regulations, and the same as to nursery stock, and so forth.

Mr. ESCH. I would not anticipate that danger. I doubt whether the Government, shipping for or on its own account, would want to violate any of the quarantine regulations.

Mr. CRAMTON. For instance, an embargo may be placed against certain live stock on account of quarantine because of the foot-and-mouth disease. Under this, in time of peace, if live stock is to be shipped for the United States, it might be shipped without regard to any such embargo.

Mr. ESCH. And that was the law as passed in the Army appropriation bill of a year ago. We did not modify that.

Mr. CRAMTON. That is what I want to know.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman state his opinion as to whether or not there is a real car shortage in this country at the present time?

Mr. ESCH. On April 1, as I recall the figures, the car shortage was something like 143,000 cars.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is it the judgment of the gentleman from Wisconsin that some relief should be granted?

Mr. ESCH. Most assuredly.

Mr. McKENZIE. In order that the railroads may build more cars?

Mr. ESCH. Not only that, but there ought to be relief by requiring the shippers and consignees to load and unload the freight promptly when cars are given to them.

Mr. McKENZIE. I think I fully agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin, but in order to make this bill parallel some bills that we have been passing lately in this House I think it ought to have a provision in it first compelling the railroads to build more cars, and, second, making a large appropriation to build some by the Government.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman has stated that a great deal of this car shortage arises from congestion in ports, because of the lack of ships, which causes an accumulation of cars on sidings even as far back as 150 miles in the interior.

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Did it occur to the gentleman's committee that they might relieve some of that congestion by an emergency measure which would provide that during the existence of this war foreign ships in our ports engaged in round-trip voyages, but going from one of our ports to another, might carry some of this congested commerce from one of our ports to another?

Mr. ESCH. Instead of going by rail?

Mr. HARDY. No; instead of these ships going empty, as they have to do if they are foreign ships, why not let a ship that is going from Baltimore to Galveston, when Baltimore is congested with freight, carry a load of freight from Baltimore to Galveston, even though the ship is under a foreign flag, during this emergency?

Mr. ESCH. That did not occur to our committee, because merchant-marine matters are somewhat beyond our jurisdiction.

Mr. HARDY. But this relates to commerce.

Mr. ESCH. I will say to the gentleman that the suggestion is worth considering.

Mr. HARDY. Certainly at this time it looks as though the cramps on our commerce ought to be removed.

Mr. ESCH. We ought to do everything we can to relieve the situation.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. As I understand the bill it is left optional with the Interstate Commerce Commission to do these things you grant them the authority to do.

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. In view of the statements which the gentleman has made as to the true situation, does he not think it would be better to direct the Interstate Commerce Commission to take cognizance of this situation and act upon it?

Mr. ESCH. This is the full authority they ask of us, and we grant it to them, feeling that they will exercise it to the fullest extent, and to the advantage of the public interest.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. The gentleman has no doubt, then, that the Interstate Commerce Commission will take up the matter immediately?

Mr. ESCH. Most assuredly they will. They have been pressing this legislation for a long time.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman was asked a while ago about the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission to make orders and enforce them.

Mr. ESCH. How much time have I, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope the gentleman will not feel uneasy about his time. He understands this bill, and I hope he will answer fully all questions in regard to it.

Mr. SIMS. Any order that the Interstate Commerce Commission makes regarding this or anything else may be enjoined by the railroads upon the allegation that the commission has exceeded its authority, or that the order if put into effect would be confiscatory, so it would be impossible to know whether or not the order would be resisted.

Mr. ESCH. I stated that we did not seek to amend the other sections of the interstate-commerce act, but that the remedy was left as it has been heretofore.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think that there is great lack of enterprise on the part of the capitalists to build new railroad lines and thereby extending transportation and to develop new territory in our great resourceful country? In 1915 there were only 936 miles of new railroad constructed, and last year I do not believe there were more than 500 miles. Our population is increasing, our industries are expanding, and our present railroad system can not take care of the present travel and freight. That is one reason for the great congestion.

Mr. ESCH. There were 1,000 miles of road built in 1915 and about 1,000 miles, if my recollection serves me, in 1916, whereas the average for the prior 20 years had been between 4,500 and 5,000 miles. The gentleman is right in saying that there has been a very marked dimunition in railroad construction during the last two years.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. The railroads have increased the weight of the rails, the capacity of the cars, and the power of the engines, yet they are unable to meet the demands of the public.

Mr. ESCH. The contention made before the subcommittee very recently was that the fact that they did not build more mileage was due to the fact that they did not have the money.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Due to the fact that the laws are so severe that people will not put money into new railroad projects.

Mr. ESCH. It was also suggested that the dividends paid by the roads prior to 1916 were not such as to encourage investments, and so the roads could not get money to build tracks and cars.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Certainly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Has the gentleman made any study of the actual physical car shortage existing under normal conditions; that is to say, the difference between the number of cars in existence and that which would be expected to carry normal traffic when the transportation is normally distributed and not congested as it now is?

Mr. ESCH. Owing to the phenominal prosperity during the year 1907 there were two periods of car shortage in that year—one during the midsummer months, when the maximum shortage reached 30,370 cars; the other during the last three months of the year, when the shortage on December 24 reached 208,586 cars. During the following years of 1908 and the greater portion of 1909 there was business depression, and the number of idle cars reached on April 29, 1908, a maximum of 413,338. During October and November of 1909 there was a small shortage. During 1911 there was no shortage. In the fall of 1912 the shortage reached a maximum on November 7 of 51,259 cars. During the latter part of October, 1913, there was another small shortage, with no shortage for 1914, the first year of the European war. The surplus of idle cars extended throughout the year 1915, with a maximum on April 1 of 327,084 cars. So normally we have during the greater portion of the year a car surplusage, and the shortage comes only during those periods of the year requiring seasonal movement of crops.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman's answer is clear and convincing, and leads to the proposition that the evil lies in the want of practical distribution.

Mr. ESCH. And oftentimes wise and efficient management of the equipment we already have. That is due to having so many different systems and each system anxious to get the fullest amount of trade and business in order to swell the gross receipts. That is natural.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I have some personal recollection of former conditions, when it was my function and duty to chase empties on other roads stolen from our road.

Mr. ESCH. I have no doubt the gentleman's experience tallies with the experience of witnesses we had before the committee.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Certainly.

Mr. HULBERT. It is a fact that the movement of cars during the shortage since the European war has been toward those points on the Atlantic seaboard where the greatest shipments have been made to European countries.

Mr. ESCH. That is true.

Mr. HULBERT. May I state for the information of the House and the committee that while we have 771 miles of water front in the port of New York, two-thirds of all the water-borne commerce in the city of New York is accommodated upon 7½ per cent of the total water front of the Borough of Manhattan, and that is due to the fact that Congress has failed to provide by sufficient appropriation and adoption of new projects for the approaches to the shore.

The city of New York has been willing to expend, and for the past six or eight years has contemplated an expenditure of upward of $60,000,000 for the construction of docks on East River, N. Y., and yet during that time, although the Army Engineers reported in 1912 that the further improvement of that river under the project adopted in 1868 was deemed economically inadvisable, this Congress has not adopted the project for a greater depth of water to afford sufficient access to the wharves, so that these vessels that are compelled to anchor at the Statue of Liberty until berth accommodations can be afforded could be more expeditiously brought to the piers and the cars waiting to discharge their cargoes could be unloaded and sent back upon the railroads.

Mr. ESCH. The gentleman is on the Rivers and Harbors Committee.

Mr. HULBERT. Yes; and I suppose that is why I am on the Rivers and Harbors Committee. I have been advocating that ever since I have been here, but I have not succeeded yet.

Mr. ESCH. Our committee has no jurisdiction over that. I concede that there ought to be more river frontage to accommodate the ships, but our committee can not deal with that.

Mr. HULBERT. I appreciate that. May I ask a question directly on the bill? In my inquiries in reference to the food supply I have been informed that commission merchants in large cities have more difficulty now in "pick-up" shipments from the interior—that is, from small points of collection—than heretofore, for the reason that the railroads will not fix specific times when, upon notice to the farmers in those communities, such produce as they may deliver may be collected up. What we would like to know is whether there is any provision that will provide for the adoption of a "picking-up system" so that the farmer who lives in a rural community, who may only have six or eight crates of eggs to ship into the nearest city at one time, is afforded an opportunity to get the same facilities for shipment that those have who are able to bring the farm produce into the cities by automobile trucks, where it is picked up at such centers of collection and distribution.

Mr. ESCH. That would be a matter very largely within the jurisdiction of the State, more in the nature of a police regulation, the same as the protection of grade crossings, and so forth.

Mr. HULBERT. That would be true except in the case of an emergency such as we have now, and this, I understand, is emergency legislation.

Mr. ESCH. In some States they have a practice of having certain days of the week for the shipment of live stock and not on other days. That is beneficial in every way to the market, the accommodation of the farmers and the shippers, and the railroads themselves.

Mr. HULBERT. The point I emphasize has not been brought to the attention of the gentleman's committee during the preparation of this measure?

Mr. ESCH. Not that particular thing.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. I have noticed considerable comment in the last day or two about the duplication of passenger service between two large points on different roads. Has there been any consideration by the gentleman's committee on the duplication of trains, the removal of which would relieve the rolling stock and engines, and so forth?

Mr. ESCH. That has been brought to the attention of the Newlands subcommittee, and several witnesses have testified as to the matter of duplication of equipment. Take the case of the roads between Chicago and St. Louis. Five passenger trains go to St. Louis and probably four to Kansas City, five to St. Paul—all leaving Chicago about the same time and arriving at the terminals at the same time, and none of them are full.

A suggestion was made to the subcommittee that there might be a conservation of equipment by authorizing two of the trains to do the whole of that passenger business.

Mr. BORLAND. It seems to me that there is a good deal in that.

Mr. ESCH. Thus relieving the other carriers of that much equipment that could be used in the transportation of freight.

Mr. BORLAND. It seems to me that there is a good deal in that suggestion. Between St. Louis and Kansas City there are five competing railroads and all of them run their own trains between 11 and 12 o'clock at night, getting into the city early the next morning. Each road wants to be in the market for that business, and it runs a train at that hour to accommodate the business men, when probably two trains well equipped could carry all of the business on any average day.

Mr. ESCH. A subcommittee of the Council of National Defense, of which Mr. Willard, I think, of the Baltimore & Ohio, is chairman, has already made recommendations to the various railroads of the United States to cut down their passenger equipment wherever possible, in order to relieve so much equipment, especially the motive power, for the carriage of freight.

Mr. BORLAND. Is there anything in the law that would prevent the railroads from carrying out the project suggested by Mr. Willard, in the reduction of the passenger service? Could they agree to do that by joint action?

Mr. ESCH. There is no law preventing a reduction of the service, if it does not affect the rates.

Mr. BORLAND. Suppose two of the railroads carry all of the business and collect all of the passenger receipts, how would that operate upon the receipts of the other railroads?

Mr. ESCH. The Pennsylvania and the Baltimore & Ohio between here and Chicago are trying to solve that problem as to competitive points. Whether that can be done remains to be seen.

Mr. BORLAND. That would result in some sort of a pooling agreement?

Mr. ESCH. It would; and pooling is prohibited.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand that this measure is intended to give the Interstate Commerce Commission large control over car service, and that it is not intended, I assume, to give the Interstate Commerce Commission any control over the shipment of commodities; that is, any authority relative to the routing or shipment of commodities to a given point.

Mr. ESCH. Under existing law, of course, the shipper has a right to choose the route.

Mr. MONDELL. Just one moment. I have not finished my statement. A bill was introduced some time ago, and I think is still pending before the Committee on Agriculture, proposing to give the Secretary of Agriculture control over shipments, authorizing him to order commodities shipped to a given market. I assume that no such authority or control was contemplated in this bill, but I want to call the gentleman's attention to the language on page 10, beginning in line 2:

And also authority to make such just and reasonable directions with respect to car service—

So far, all plain—or for the distribution and movement of cars for the transportation of particular commodities—

That seems to be reasonably plain—or for transportation to or from particular localities during the emergency—

And so forth.

I assume that the committee did not intend by that language to give the Interstate Commerce Commission any control over the direction of commodities to a given market—over shipments—any authority to say to a shipper, as was proposed in the bill before the Agriculautral Committee, you shall ship to this market or to the other.

Mr. ESCH. I think that language was inserted to meet a condition such as was quite common in the Northwest during the last winter, where cities suffered from a coal shortage, and in some places a municipal lighting plant had only one day or two days' supply of coal. In other places there was a shortage of food products, and it was thought that there ought to be some power to relieve such a situation, because it was emergent in character.

Mr. MONDELL. But the gentleman does not understand that this language would give the Interstate Commerce Commission power to direct a certain shipment to a given point? As I understand it, what you intend to do is to simply give the commission authority over the car service, so that the commission could say in a given case, Minneapolis claims that it is not securing coal for its municipal lighting plant, and you must furnish cars for that service. I do not assume it was intended to give the commission any authority to say that such a shipment should be made.

Mr. ESCH. It says "give direction."

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman will understand how very important a matter it is if the committee proposes to give any authority to demand a given shipment. If we propose to do that it would follow, it seems to me, logically, that we would then be called upon to insure the shipper a market after he reached the designated destination to which he was commanded to make the shipment.

Mr. ESCH. In lines 19, 20, and 21, on page 10, in the penalty paragraph, we say:

In case of failure or refusal on the part of any carrier, receiver, or trustee to comply with any direction or order with respect to car service.

We have defined what "car service" is in section 1.

Mr. MONDELL. So that it was not intended and the gentleman thinks it would not be a fair interpretation of the language that I have read to give the Interstate Commerce Commission control to the extent of ordering a shipment to a given point.

Mr. ESCH. The initiative as to rules and regulations, with reference to car service, is in the carriers, and under this bill such rules and regulations can only be suspended by the commission in case of emergency.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] has one minute remaining, the Chair will state.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I shall reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MANN. How much more time does the gentleman from Wisconsin desire?

Mr. ESCH. I think I have concluded all that I desire to say.

Mr. MANN. I would like to have a few minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman can be recognized in his own time. I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that we are operating, of course, under the Calendar Wednesday rule, and if anyone desires to be recognized in opposition to the measure, he would be entitled to recognition first.

Mr. MANN. I do not think I shall vote against the bill, but if anybody desires to be recognized in opposition I will give way.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think that anyone is opposed to the bill. The gentleman can be recognized for an hour and take what time he pleases. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make an inquiry or so in reference to the bill before I conclude, and I shall not take very much time. There has been a good deal of trouble about car shortage, so called. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] has given us some very valuable information and suggestions in regard to it.

One of the main reasons for car shortage is the slowness of the movement of cars. It takes a long time for a freight car to go from one point to another, and you may pass laws and then more laws, but that will not cure the situation until you give the railroads an opportunity to have money enough to buy sufficient motive power. Shortage is not in the cars, shortage is in the supply of cars for use, because cars are lying on the tracks on their way to destinations for the reason there is not sufficient motive power to move them promptly, and the reason there is not sufficient motive power promptly to move them is because the railroads have not the money or the credit. Of course, we have provided that the railroads shall do their business under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I would not change it. I have done my little part toward increasing the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but it will take more than the passage of bills, it will take more than orders made by the Interstate Commerce Commission to move cars promptly to get them moved. The order of man will not move cars.

If talk would move cars, we would move them very rapidly here, and if issuing orders would move cars they would be moved very rapidly by the Interstate Commerce Commission. They have got to have more money and better credit, because as long as they are without the money they will not buy the locomotives and other necessary motive power, and we might as well know it. Now, having said that much, I would like to make an inquiry about the bill. There is a new provision in the bill with reference to the powers of the commission to make orders, found on pages 9 and 10. These orders are in reference to the supply or use of cars for transportation of property, and so forth. Then it says:

The directions of the commission as to car service, distribution, and movement during emergency may be made through and by such agents or agencies as the commission shall designate and appoint for that purpose.

Will the gentleman from Wisconsin tell us what is intended to be done by that provision?

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, last winter there was a congestion in the city of Detroit, in the yards of Detroit, of 40,000 cars. The Interstate Commerce Commission, under the powers it has now, sent one of its agents—I suppose one of its inspectors—up there to cooperate with the municipal authorities and the local railroad authorities and see what they could do to relieve that congestion. He went up there, conferred with them, and inside of a week they had reduced that congestion quite a considerable amount. Now, I suppose that if this becomes the law inspectors would be sent to help relieve congestions in the various centers where complaint has arisen.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, that is a supposition that is not warranted by the language of the bill. If they want to say that the Interstate Commerce Commission could issue its orders through employees of the commission, it is easy to put that in the English language; but this is through "such agents or agencies as the commission shall designate for that purpose." I take it that the gentleman from Wisconsin did not draw the bill——

Mr. ESCH. I did not draw the language.

Mr. MANN (continuing). But it was drawn by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I take it that the purpose of that is to permit an organization of railroad officials to act as agencies of the commission, which may be proper; but in the next or second paragraph from this is a penalty for anybody who does not obey the directions with respect to car service, and I would like to know whether we propose to put in here that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall authorize a railroad president or two railroad presidents to act as an agency of the Interstate Commerce Commission and make an order relating to some other railroads, and then attempt to penalize the other people because they do not obey the directions of the adverse railroad president. That may be a desirable thing to do. It seems to me it is going a long ways. There is some doubt about how far we can authorize a penalty for the violation of a regulation of the Interstate Commerce Commission itself, which is our agency; but when we undertake to say that we will let the Interstate Commerce Commission create another agency to make penal offenses it is going a long ways, it seems to me. It is a cloudy line. No one can definitely set apart one side from the other as to how far Congress can delegate its legislative powers now, but we have the power to give to the Interstate Commerce Commission under the law that we enact the power to make certain regulations and certain rules and to punish a violation of those rules and regulations in accordance with the law we pass laying down the fundamental principles.

Now, here is Mr. Willard, president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., a great railroad man, now at the head of the subcommittee of the Council of National Defense, desiring to help the country in the management of the railroads, but he is a private individual; yet under this individual he could be authorized to give a direction which some man or some railroad would have to obey with a penalty of $25 a day or more if they did not obey that direction. Now, that is really an autocratic power running to the extreme. Then I would like to make another inquiry, suggested to me by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WHITE]. In this same provision, which is new in the law, the Interstate Commerce Commission is given the power without notice or hearing to suspend the operation of all rules and regulations or practices then established with respect to car service. I think that is not objectionable. Then the language reads, on the top of page 10, "And also authority to make such just and reasonable directions with respect to car service," and so forth. Now, I will defy any Member of this House or anybody else to read the language of that paragraph and express a judgment founded on the person's own belief that he is right as to whether they can make these directions without hearing and without notice or whether they will have to give hearing and notice. Now, I acquit the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of preparing any language which is so indefinite. That was drawn by somebody connected with the Interstate Commerce Commission, probably some bright young attorney, but whoever supervised it did not examine it. It has not been the practice to permit the Interstate Commerce Commission to make orders without notice and without hearing. Now, it may be necessary to give them the power to suspend the operation of rules and regulations without notice and without hearing. It may be desirable to let them make new rules and regulations without notice or hearing, though I doubt it; but nobody can tell from this whether they are given the power or not. And I would like to know, if my friends on the committee have an opinion on the subject, not a hastily expressed opinion, whether it was intended to let these directions with respect to car service or for the distribution or movement of cars for the transportation particularly of commodities, and so forth, to be made without notice and without hearing?

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will yield to anybody who can give me that information.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am not going to assume that.

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman, anyway.

Mr. CRAMTON. I thought perhaps the gentleman might give me some light. I understand the gentleman to assume that the old regulation may be suspended without a hearing?

Mr. MANN. This bill so says.

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes. Then, if the old regulation is suspended without a hearing and the commission has no authority to make a new regulation without a hearing, will not things be left in the air temporarily until such hearing is held, without any regulation?

Mr. MANN. That might be, although they might not need regulation. However, I call the attention of my friend from Michigan to the fact that the right to suspend regulation only relates to the car service, while the authority to make new regulation applies not only to the car service but distribution and movement of cars for the transportation of particular commodities, transportation to and from particular localities, and other very general authority—to promote the operation of car service in the interest of the public and to the advantage or convenience and commerce of the people. I question whether you would pass by unanimous consent practically a bill in this House designed on its face to give to the Interstate Commerce Commission power to make without notice and without hearing any order it thought was to the advantage or convenience and commerce of the people. That is an extremely broad authority. If you should put that into the law, you might just as well repeal all the rest of it, because the rest would be unnecessary.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not the inference that it is to be a reasonable regulation, and if it is a reasonable regulation should they not have that power?

Mr. MANN. There is no inference about it. The bill says it is to be a just and reasonable direction, and so forth. But that does not mean that they will be just and reasonable. That is fixing the power of the commission. We can not give them the unlimited power. That is subject probably to review by the court after the damage is done. That is the power that is given in reference to railroad rates—to fix just and reasonable rates.

Mr. DOWELL. If it was unreasonable and could not be complied with by the companies, of course they would have redress in the courts.

Mr. MANN. They would have that redress if they gave it, with or without notice.

Mr. DOWELL. Of course, that is true.

Mr. MANN. The question is whether you would give to the commission the power offhand. And in practice it amounts to this: Some examiner for the commission, some agent for the commission, some inspector, or perhaps some mere dollar-a-day employee, though that is probably extreme, suggests that the commission do so-and-so. The commission itself does not examine all these orders. They do not know when many of them are issued, and can not know. Shall they give to the commission the power to do all of these things without notice, without hearing, and take a man's property away from him without giving him a chance to be heard at all?

Mr. ADAMSON. I leave the gentleman from Wisconsin to answer the question the gentleman asks; but I wish to call his attention to the fact that this entire paragraph relates to an emergency, and in the very language which the gentleman criticizes it is repeated again, "during emergency," and that the directions or orders issued are simply served upon the party by the agent or agencies "during the emergency." And the word "emergency" is repeated several times. It is not a permanent regulation at all.

Mr. MANN. What is the emergency?

Mr. ADAMSON. There may be frequent emergencies. I do not know what.

Mr. MANN. The Interstate Commerce Commission determines the emergency. It might just as well be left out as put in. That part is pure bunk. It is put in not in good faith but just to look well. The Interstate Commerce Commission says an emergency exists. If an emergency did not exist, there would be no orders issued at all.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. A great many companies are making storage houses of their rolling stock, and cars remain loaded, and there does not appear to be any authority to compel them to unload them and use the rolling stock. They remain loaded for weeks and months, thousands and thousands of cars. Has the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to control that matter?

Mr. MANN. The railroad companies, in the first place, do not use the cars for storage purposes. The gentleman's assumption is wrong. It is the man who owns the freight that uses the car for storage purposes—contrary to the wish of the railroad company—subject to demurrage charges.

Now, it is all very well to say that a man shall be required to unload a freight car within a certain time. The gentleman would not want to have it said, if he had a car of household goods, that it should be unloaded within 10 minutes after it reaches its destination. The shipper wants some time. The time has been probably too long. The time has recently been very much reduced. Of course the only way you can reduce the time for unloading the car is by reducing the free time and then increasing the demurrage charge for the balance of the time.

The gentleman's question does not apply to the railroads. They are trying their best to overcome this, and many shippers are. But human nature is human nature. A man has a car of coal or a train of coal and no place to put it. He will leave it in the cars until he can find a place to put it. Now, how soon he will find a place to put it will depend upon how much it is costing him to keep it in the car. You can not take it out offhand.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. I had reference chiefly to coal.

Mr. MANN. Well, I was talking about coal, supposing the gentleman was talking about coal. The railroads are trying their best to get the coal out of the cars, but they can not unload the coal. They can not dump it alongside the tracks. The only way to reach it is by charging. Of course, one trouble with coal has been that they could not get it to the place where it could be unloaded for lack of motive power.

Now, I want to offer one amendment to this bill, which I am sure will be accepted, and then I will close. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend by inserting before the word "railroad," in line 3, on page 2, the word "term."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 3, before the word "railroad," insert the word "term."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think that is a good amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL rose.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois yield me five minutes?

Mr. MANN. By offering the amendment I lost the floor.

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman from Illinois can yield time to the gentleman from Mississippi, all right.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has lost the floor.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia moves the previous question.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I would like to accommodate these gentlemen.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. ADAMSON. I will amend my motion. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that at the end of 10 minutes——

Mr. MANN. Ask unanimous consent that the previous question shall be considered as ordered at the end of 15 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Very well.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the previous question shall be considered as ordered on this bill and all amendments thereto at the expiration of 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for 10 minutes.

WAR-REVENUE BILL (H. REPT. NO. 45).

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a report to accompany House bill 4280, the war-revenue bill, and I wish to say that we hope to take it up to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina presents a report, which the Clerk will read by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Report from the Committee on Ways and Means, to accompany the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina gives notice that the bill will be called up to-morrow. This report will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW—11 O'CLOCK A. M.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, of course by 11 o'clock to-morrow we may possibly be able to get sight of the bill—not before that. How long is it expected that this bill will be under general debate?

Mr. KITCHIN. I imagine two or three days, anyway. I wish we could get through by Saturday night—the whole thing.

Mr. MANN. Well, I suppose the gentleman from North Carolina would like to get through to-morrow night. Is the bill so bad as that, that you do not want anybody to have a chance to read it? [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. It is so good, in short, that everybody ought to vote for it unanimously without any time being wasted in investigating it at all; it is such a good bill, such a large bill. [Laughter.] Seriously, I have no desire to hurry the matter unduly, but——

Mr. MANN. There should be some general debate, so that gentlemen can have an opportunity to look at the items. Of course, I suppose it will be easier to pass the bill before the country knows what it is than it will be to pass it afterwards. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. I should think that nobody in the country would oppose this bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I can assure the gentleman that probably nobody will oppose it who is not taxed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Most of the protests are already in.

Mr. MONDELL. No; they are still coming.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina, that the House meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning?

There was no objection.

CAR SHORTAGE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, relative to this matter of car shortage, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has called attention to one of the controlling reasons for car shortage, which for some reason or other does not seem to have been widely discussed—at least I have not heard much discussion of it—that is the question of the effect of the movement of trains on the abundance or the lack of cars.

We all realize that the potential capacity of the freight rolling stock in the country could be doubled any day by the carrying out of an order doubling the speed of all freight trains. I am not sure that such an order could be carried out; but there is no doubt but that the speed of some freight trains could be doubled, and the probability is that it would be physically possible to immediately very largely increase the average speed of freight trains.

We have had a curious experience in this country relative to the speed of freight trains. It is a curious fact of our wonderful railway development that as we have progressed and developed and improved the average speed of the movement of merchandise has decreased. Years ago, when the maximum grades of the principal railroads were greater than they are now, when the engines were light, when the rails were light, when the cars were small compared with their present capacity, the speed of freight trains was greater than it is now. A train can only be loaded to a capacity that the engine can handle over the maximum grade. When the maximum grade is high compared with the average grade, the speed on the average grade is very considerable. But as maximum grades were reduced it became possible with the same engine to carry very much heavier loads, and that meant that the average speed of the train was slackened. While the engine must have power enough to carry the train over the maximum grade, it need not carry it over rapidly, and when it is loaded to its capacity that loading slows it and impedes its speed on every up grade. There is a very important economic factor operating there. The net income of a railroad can be increased by decreasing the speed of the freight train; by carrying more tons of freight with the same crew and the same motive power. There is a saving in a slow movement of the locomotive. A locomotive going at 10 miles an hour consumes less coal per ton-mile than a locomotive going twice as fast.

The late James J. Hill was the man who first made a science of maximum tonnage. That policy, inaugurated by Mr. Hill, spread from the Great Northern and its allied lines to the balance of the country. I remember very well when, out in our range country, we would make a shipment of stock, driving it to a shipping point. One of those little engines of that day would pull in with a string of cars, take the stock, and haul it to market at the speed of a passenger train, or at 18 or 20 miles an hour. There is nothing of that kind in these days. The tonnage idea has been carried to a point where the movement of freight has come to be, as I recall it on some roads, as low as four or four and a half miles an hour. A number of years ago we passed a bill here known as the 16-hour law. We passed it in order to relieve men from the awful strain of long hours and to save the public from the dangers that long hours brought. One of the most important effects of that legislation was to speed up the movement of freight, because while under the highest development of the tonnage system trains were frequently loaded so heavily that their average running time over a division was 18 or 20 hours, or even more. With the passage of the 16-hour law it became necessary to cut down the tonnage sufficiently to enable the train to go from division point to division point within 16 hours under ordinary and normal conditions. And so we speeded up the movement of freight. But we still have in the country as a whole a slower movement of freight, according to my understanding, than we had years ago. Well, what are we going to do about it? So far as the public are concerned, they would be very greatly benefited by the speeding up of freight trains. That is particularly true with regard to live-stock trains.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. HAMLIN. May the gentleman have five minutes more? I want to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There was an agreement limiting the time.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] wants five minutes.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I will yield a part of my time to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. No; I do not want the gentleman to yield a part of his time. I ask that I may have five minutes more without taking it out of his time.

Mr. HAMLIN. I make that request, if it can be submitted. I was not aware of any previous agreement limiting the time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By unanimous consent, the previous question has been ordered at the end of 15 minutes. But the Chair supposes this request can be submitted: The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Wyoming be extended five minutes, not to interfere with the gentleman from Mississippi, and that the previous question be considered as ordered at the end of 10 minutes from now. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the gentleman from Wyoming is discussing a very vital proposition now, as to the movement of freight. My information is that formerly the average speed of freight trains was about 18 miles an hour, but that since the heavy engines have been put on, and what the railroad men call a drag, the speed of freight trains has been reduced to about 9 miles an hour on the average.

Mr. MONDELL. My understanding is that it is even less than that.

Mr. HAMLIN. Perhaps so, but that was my information. Now, this is the suggestion I want to make to the gentleman. A very practical railroad man told me that the thing which was really at the bottom of the recent threatened strike was the failure of the companies to move the freight trains rapidly enough, and that if a law should be passed requiring the railroad companies to move every car so many miles every 24 hours after the bill of lading was issued, the whole question would be solved. Has the gentleman thought about that proposition?

Mr. MONDELL. I have thought about it, and the Interstate Commerce Committee have thought of it, because they have had before them at various times bills proposing to give the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to fix a minimum speed per hour, particularly and perhaps exclusively for stock trains. But here is the economic question, as the gentleman will understand; that is the nub of this whole matter. I am not so sure but it would be of sufficient benefit to all the people of the country to have freight moved more rapidly than it is, to justify our compelling such an accelerated movement, with the understanding that the railroads would be paid for it. We all understand that the loading of trains to capacity, and their consequent slow movement, is due to the desire of the railroads to cheapen the cost of the service, or at least to reduce expenses per ton-mile; and if that is carried far enough, so that it becomes the general practice, under our control of railroad rates, the public gets the benefit of it in cheaper rates. Whether the people have gotten all they are entitled to from the reduction in cost I do not know, but this is certain: If the present rates, based on the slow movement of freight are fair, then you must increase the rates if you demand more rapid movement, because more rapid movement costs more money.

Mr. HAMLIN. Now, right at that point, this same gentleman, in whose knowledge of these things I have great confidence, says that the very fact that this slow movement has been inaugurated by the railroads of this country has tended to increase the price of products to the consumer, because of the failure to get these products to the centers of consumption rapidly enough. He says that if they are forced to move these products more rapidly the prices of products will go down to the consumers of the country, because there would not be the scarcity which now often exists.

Mr. MONDELL. That could only be true in the case of perishable products.

Mr. HAMLIN. Yes; it could be true of all products of universal use. This is true even as to coal.

Mr. MONDELL. I think not. So far as ordinary shipments are concerned, grain and products of that sort, we would not cheapen the product any by moving it more rapidly. On the contrary, in so far as the more rapid movement costs more, you would add to the cost of the article.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think the gentleman is wrong about that, because the shortage of cars makes a scarcity of a certain product in the business section of the country. If the products were moved more rapidly these same cars could be emptied and returned and reloaded with other products and shipped to these business centers, and in that way keep the markets supplied which would have the effect of holding down prices rather than increasing them, as you intimate.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is discussing the matter simply from the standpoint of meeting an emergency condition. This movement of freight should be considered aside from the question of a failure to deliver products at some particular place at some particular time, because it is a matter which affects the movement of all freight at all times. If the railroads had cars enough, which they might have and should have under a slow movement of freight as well as under a fast, no such condition as the gentleman suggests would arise. There would not be under that condition of affairs any special gain to the consumer of the product by reason of the fast movement, except in the matter of live stock or a perishable product. There are, however, many ways in which the public generally would be benefited by more rapid movement of freight. The benefits would, I think, be sufficient that the shipper could afford to pay for the slightly higher cost.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to say anything at this time so anxious am I to see this bill pass at the earliest possible moment. I realize that every section of this country is affected by car shortage. Of course, I am not familiar with the situation in other sections, but I am familiar with the section which I in part have the honor to represent.

I live in a section that produces a large amount of lumber. The lumber mills of the South for the past few years have not experienced the degree of prosperity that other industries have, but in the last few months there has been a revival of business, an increase in prices, and they are now manufacturing quite a lot of lumber.

I am informed by men who own sawmills that they have such large stocks of lumber in the yards that the insurance companies are making a demand on them to move the stock, and if they do not the companies threaten to cancel the insurance policies. The manufacturers are helpless, because they can not obtain cars to to get the lumber to the markets of the world. If the insurance companies cancel their insurance policies the banks will stop lending them money to carry on the industries, and thousands of employees of these plants will be thrown out of employment. And I may say that the lumber industry is the largest in my section.

I am informed by a gentleman who represents a district adjoining mine that one mill has already closed down because they can not get cars to ship the lumber, and that 800 employees have been thrown out of work.

I was informed yesterday that the railroad that traverses that section had on the tracks now only about 50 per cent of the cars they own, including the cars from other railroads of the country; that the Illinois Central had only about 60 per cent of the number of cars they own, including those of other roads now on their tracks; that the little railroad that traverses my district for 350 miles, the Gulf and Ship Island, owning 2,800 cars, have on that road, including cars from other roads, only 200 box cars to take care of their business. That is the situation in my section, and I do not know that it is worse in any other section.

I was informed by a vice president of one of the railroads yesterday that he had received a telegram from one of the counties in my district stating that 200 carloads of Irish potatoes were ready to be shipped to market and they could not get the cars. Here we are legislating about foodstuffs and can not get cars to send foodstuff that has already been grown to the markets. In the little place in which I was raised, a great vegetable center, I noticed that last Saturday they shipped 14 carloads of vegetables. In the course of two weeks they will be shipping as many as 50 or 60 carloads of vegetables from that place. All this produce will perish unless they can get the cars. Now what pertains to that section pertains to Florida and other sections throughout the South and other sections of the country. So I think this is a most important bill, giving the Interstate Commerce Commission, as it does, the authority not only to pass these orders but to enforce the orders and command the railroads to send empty cars to those sections of the country where needed so the products can be moved easily and quickly. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Members who have desired to say something on this bill but did not have the opportunity may have five legislative days in which to print remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to print remarks on the subject of this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, there are two or three other bills reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce which I am authorized to call up.

Mr. MANN. There are two or three bridge bills; why not pass them?

Mr. ADAMSON. Gentlemen the other day objected to them.

Mr. MANN. I know, but they can not object to-day.

Mr. ADAMSON. I apprehend that our committee will be reached again pretty soon.

Mr. MANN. I think we ought to pass the bridge bills.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think so, too; but I got the impression that we were somewhat criticized the other day, although they are bills that have always been passed at every session and during all emergencies. I will ask the Clerk to call the bridge bills.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT MORRISON, MINN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first bridge bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 1006. An act authorizing the county of Morrison, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in said county.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of Morrison, in the State of Minnesota, be, and it is hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a highway bridge and approaches thereto across the Mississippi River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in section 8, township 127 north, range 29 west of the fifth principal meridian, and section 32, township 39 north, range 32 west of the fourth principal meridian, in the State of Minnesota, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill H. R. 1679, granting the consent of Congress for the county of Morrison, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in said county, was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT BEMIDJI, MINN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the next bill.

The Clerk called the bill (S. 1007) authorizing the city of Bemidji, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near that place.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the city of Bemidji, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Minnesota, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a highway bridge and approaches thereto across the Mississippi River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation between lots 1 and 2, section 16, township 146 north, range 33 west, fifth principal meridian, in the State of Minnesota, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "highway."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS WABASH RIVER AT VINCENNES, IND.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 2343, granting consent to Ernest B. Denison, A. J. Barchfield, and Ethan I. Dodds to construct a bridge across the Wabash River within or near the city limits of the city of Vincennes, Ind.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia calls up a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to Ernest B. Denison, A. J. Barchfield, and Ethan I. Dodds, their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Wabash River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, within or near the city limits of Vincennes, in the county of Knox, in the State of Indiana, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be null and void unless the construction of said bridge is commenced within two years and completed within five years from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, strike out all of section 2; page 2, line 8, strike out the figure "3" and insert the figure "2."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The Committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the votes by which these three bills were passed and to lay that motion on the table.

The motion was agreed to, and it was so ordered.

CALL OF COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will proceed with the call of committees.

The Clerk proceeded with the call of committees.

DISTRIBUTION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS.

Mr. LEVER (when the Committee on Agriculture was called). Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Agriculture I call up the bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina calls up the bill H. R. 4188, which is on the Union Calendar. The House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4188, with Mr. HAMLIN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are a number of gentlemen who are interested in this bill and who did not know when it was coming up. Would the gentleman from South Carolina think it amiss if I should make the point of no quorum?

Mr. LEVER. I would not. On the contrary, I think it is only fair.

Mr. MANN. I do not object to dispensing with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the first reading of the bill is dispensed with.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-five Members present; not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Barnhart	Flynn	Littlepage	Sabath
Bland	Focht	Lobeck	Saunders, Va.
Brand	Foss	Lundeen	Scott, Pa.
Brodbeck	Fuller, Mass.	Lunn	Scully
Bruckner	Gandy	McAndrews	Sells
Brumbaugh	Gard	McClintic	Shackleford
Capstick	Godwin, N. C.	Magee	Sherley
Caraway	Goodwin, Ark.	Maher	Shouse
Carlin	Griest	Martin, Ill.	Siegel
Carter, Okla.	Griffin	Moon	Smith, Idaho
Chandler, N. Y.	Hamill	Morin	Smith, C. B.
Clark, Fla.	Harrison, Va.	Mott	Stafford
Clark, Pa.	Haskell	Nichols, Mich.	Sullivan
Cooper, Ohio	Hawley	Oliver, N. Y.	Swift
Copley	Hayes	Olney	Tague
Costello	Helvering	Osborne	Taylor, Colo.
Currie, Mich.	Hensley	O'Shaunessy	Templeton
Curry, Cal.	Huddleston	Overstreet	Tinkham
Dale, N. Y.	Hull, Tenn.	Park	Treadway
Dallinger	Jones, Va.	Parker, N. Y.	Van Dyke
Darrow	Kelley, Mich.	Porter	Vare

Eagan	Kincheloe	Robbins	Webb
Eagle	Kitchin	Robinson	Welling
Edmonds	Kreider	Rodenberg	Williams
Fairchild, G. W.	Linthicum	Rowland	Winslow

The committee rose; and the Speaker having assumed the chair, Mr. HAMLIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 4188, finding itself without a quorum, under the rule he had caused the roll to be called, whereupon 317 Members, a quorum, responded to their names, and he reported the names of the absentees to be entered upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its sitting.

The committee resumed its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4188. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for one hour.

Mr. LEVER. I would ask the Chair to notify me when I have used 30 minutes. Mr. Chairman, if I can have the committee to understand that the bill now under consideration does not involve any of the propositions contained in the bill (H. R. 4125) the food-control bill proper, I think we shall expedite the consideration of this bill. I desire to assure the committee that this bill does not contain any provision that looks to the fixing of prices, either minimum or maximum, to the matter of suspending the mixed-flour law or increasing the milling content of wheat, or any proposition for the regulation of boards of trade and speculative bodies, but confines itself to about three basic propositions. The first of these is that we are undertaking in this bill to enable the Department of Agriculture to make a complete, full, and comprehensive food survey of the country in order to ascertain the actual facts as they exist in reference to the food supply of the United States. There is no machinery now existing of a governmental character which has the power to make such a survey. It is true that the Federal Trade Commission does have power with respect to investigating the situation as concerns corporations engaged in interstate commerce, and the sundry civil bill gives the Federal Trade Commission an appropriation of $250,000 to do that work; but the Federal Trade Commission, as I understand the law as it is given to me by those who know, does not have the power to make investigations as to the food situation as it affects individuals, partnerships, and corporations engaged in intrastate as in contradistinction to interstate transactions.

Mr. HELM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. In just one minute. We are undertaking in this bill to broaden the power now existing in the Government to get the facts with respect to the food situation, and we are doing it by giving complete and rather drastic authority, I admit, to the Department of Agriculture to make a survey and report the facts to the country. If we are going to handle the food situation accurately and intelligently we have got, first, to find the basic facts, and we are proposing to do this under the terms of this bill. Now I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HELM. The gentleman has just stated that there is no departmental organization that has the data or facts showing the supply of food on hand or the machinery to assemble that data. Is it not a fact that the Bureau of the Census has recently completed a survey, as the gentleman terms it, of the food products of the United States, showing that there are 59,317 establishments that are either producing or in which the food supplies of the United States are stored?

Mr. LEVER. That may be very true, and yet that is only a nibble of the situation; that is only a very small part of the problem. Fifty-nine thousand three hundred and seventeen establishments would be a very infinitesimal part of the proposition involved in this——

Mr. HELM. No; 59,000.

Mr. LEVER. Yes; even 59,000 would be but a very small part of the proposition. What we are trying to do by this bill is to give authority to the Department of Agriculture, safeguarding it, so that the Department of Agriculture, under the direction of the President, will cooperate with every other branch of the Government to get a real, genuine, comprehensive food survey of this country, which we do not now have.

Mr. HELM. Are we not getting that now through the Bureau of Census?

Mr. LEVER. I think not.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEVER. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is it intended that the information thus secured and collated shall be published?

Mr. LEVER. It is.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not see any provision in the bill requiring the publication.

Mr. LEVER. There is no prohibition against the publication of this information, and it is the thought of the committee, and that thought is in line with the suggestions of the Department of Agriculture, that this information will be made public from time to time.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; but it is quite a different thing, of course the gentleman from South Carolina knows, not to prohibit the publication and to require the publication.

Mr. LEVER. If the——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Under this bill, if it were enacted into law, it would be possible, would it not, to keep that information within the department and then not publish it?

Mr. LEVER. If I may be permitted, I will say this to the gentleman from Wisconsin: If the gentleman from Wisconsin desires to offer an amendment to require in direct terms the publication of this information, I do not think the committee would have any objection, certainly the chairman of the committee would not have any.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana and Mr. BORLAND rose.

Mr. LEVER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. This provides the machinery for a food survey and also provides the Secretary of Agriculture may requisition and take certain property——

Mr. LEVER. Seed.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; seed. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fourth section, page 3, where it says:

> The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to require any person having at his disposal any such seed to furnish the whole or any part thereof to the Secretary of Agriculture.

And so forth.

I would like the gentleman to explain what is meant by the words "at his disposal." For instance, a farmer might have a thousand bushels of wheat at his disposal. He may perhaps dispose of it by seeding it himself or using it for his own individual purposes. Does the gentleman think under this bill the Secretary of Agriculture could take that property?

Mr. LEVER. I do not; and I want to come to that a little later, if the gentleman will permit me; but I will say to him now that the view of the committee is that if a person is found to-day with a large quantity of seeds on hand, beyond his own capacity for planting or useful purposes, and is in the act of hoarding such seeds when the country needs them, then under this bill the Secretary could commandeer them.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There is not anything here providing how that is to be determined. How is it to be determined as to whether he intends it for his own purpose or is holding it for other purposes?

Mr. LEVER. That is a matter of detail that will have to be worked out by somebody in authority.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HULBERT. I notice in section 3 there is a broad authorization to the Secretary of Agriculture, and I wanted to call the attention of the gentleman to these words in line 21:

> And may enter, on any business day during the usual hours of business, any place, including any structure, * * * or other premises except a dwelling house actually occupied exclusively as such.

Now, of course, the gentleman knows in large cities like New York, Chicago, and Philadelphia many of the apartment houses are not occupied exclusively as dwelling houses, but that upon the ground floor of those buildings there are numerous business enterprises located. What effect will that provision of the bill have in respect to houses of that character?

Mr. LEVER. That question was thoroughly debated in the committee, and the bill as originally presented to the committee was amended in the hope that we were making it impossible absolutely for any entry into a house occupied exclusively as a dwelling house. I think under the language of the bill that we might enter into the lower portion of an apartment, as described by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT], but unless the gentleman from New York himself was running a concern on the first floor and occupying quarters above where he kept his books and his confidential information we could not enter the apartment above. That is the view of the committee.

Mr. HULBERT. Of course the gentleman realizes the old Anglo-Saxon maxim that a man's house is his castle?

Mr. LEVER. Exactly.

Mr. HULBERT. And the invasion or right of invasion of a man's home is a matter of serious consequence?

Mr. LEVER. The committee undertook, as nearly as it could, to guard absolutely the sanctity of the dwelling. If the gentleman has any language which he can propose that will make the intent of Congress more certain, there will be no objection to it on the part of the committee.

Mr. HULBERT. This suggestion came to my mind: A man having large agricultural interests might be living in an apartment house in a large city, and in the building in which he resided there might be stores on the ground floor, as is the situation in the cities I have mentioned; and I can not see that there is any language here that will prevent the Secretary of Agriculture invading a man's home or confiscating his property and doing with it what he could not do if that man occupied a private house.

Mr. LEVER. The committee feels that we have absolutely safeguarded that proposition in the language we have included, but if the gentleman can offer any stronger language we will be glad to consider it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LEVER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What was the appropriation in the last Agricultural bill?

Mr. LEVER. About $26,000,000—offhand recollection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And that covers the employment of about 17,000 employees?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; employed in obtaining information and disseminating it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And this bill would carry $18,500,000 more for the employment of how many more people to gather information?

Mr. LEVER. It carries just $7,000,000 less than estimated by the department, and I assume would employ probably 600 or 800 or probably 1,000 people. I have not figured it up.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have heard that this would provide for employment of about 7,000 more people.

Mr. HAUGEN. It will enable the department to employ 7,000 people, including salaries, expenses, and automobiles.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Iowa confirms the information I have.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman got his information from the gentleman from Iowa, I think.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman knows that this question is one that I have raised before, as to whether the Department of Agriculture was not already amply supplied with employees to gather information for the benefit of the public.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I intended to discuss that feature of the bill as we came to it under the five-minute discussion. I desire now to make a general statement of the situation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman intends to cover it, I will not interrupt him now.

Mr. DILLON. I notice this gives very broad powers in reference to taking testimony and the production of books and figures. How long does the gentleman think it would take the department to make this survey?

Mr. LEVER. The testimony of Dr. Brand before the committee was to the effect that he could begin operating under this bill, getting the information provided for in the bill, within six days, and that he ought to complete his investigation within four or five or six months.

Mr. DILLON. Will not the emergency have passed before you obtain a survey through this investigation?

Mr. LEVER. That is a matter of judgment entirely. If this war is to last five or six months only, then the emergency will have passed. If the war is to last two, three, four, or five years, then the emergency will not have passed. That is a matter of individual judgment.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I will yield for a question.

Mr. MORGAN. I notice in section 9, page 6, the paragraph beginning with line 5, there is a paragraph appropriating $4,500,000 "for increasing food production and eliminating waste," and so forth. So that, one object of your bill is to increase food production? I want to ask the gentleman if, in this bill or any other, there is any provision to provide the farmer with better credit facilities for personal loans as a means whereby to increase food production?

Mr. LEVER. There is nothing in this bill, I will say very frankly to the gentleman from Oklahoma, which undertakes to provide better credit facilities to the farmers of the country. That is a question, however, that has been brought to the attention of the chairman of the committee and which the chairman proposes to lay before his committee when we consider the other bill, which we hope to report after we have completed the consideration of it.

Mr. MORGAN. The gentleman is aware of the fact that if our farmers are given better credit facilities—that is, for short-time loans—it will enable them to increase greatly their farming activities.

Mr. LEVER. I am in sympathy with the gentleman from Oklahoma about short-time credits.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I wish to remind the gentleman that under the rules of the House the gentleman has only one hour for debate, which can not be extended. I would like to hear him explain the bill, or have the opportunity to—and I think the Members of the House would, because it is a rather novel idea—without interruption until he concludes his statement.

Mr. LEVER. I thank the gentleman from Illinois for that suggestion.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the Bureau of Markets is now engaged in undertaking to ascertain the food supply of the Nation. It is now engaged in the matter of gathering reports from various concerns as to the food on hand, when it arrives, when it is going out, and all the facts connected with it. It is in touch with quite a number of establishments, but the difficulty has been found to be that the information received from these various concerns is of a voluntary nature, and there is no method of checking up the accuracy of the information sent to the department. Here, for instance, is a concern engaged in the wholesale distribution of eggs. The department now is getting information from that kind of a concern, but the information is entirely voluntary. It may be accurate, or it may be inaccurate. It is fair to say, according to the testimony of Dr. Brand, that in only one case has the department found that inaccurate data were furnished to the department by these concerns that reported, and that was due to a mistake.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. LEVER. In a minute. Now, what we are proposing to do under this bill in the emergency existing here, when it is known by every Member of this House that it is absolutely up to the United States not only to feed the people of our country but to furnish food to our country's allies in this war, is, under such a stress, to get the absolutely accurate facts, so that we may know who has the food, where it comes from, where it is going, and whether or not it is being hoarded and kept out of commerce, to the hurt of a great class of our people in this country, and so forth.

Mr. MADDEN. Would it interrupt the gentleman if I should ask him if this bill contemplates an increase of the cultivated acreage of the country?

Mr. LEVER. It is my opinion, I will say frankly to the gentleman from Illinois, that the passage of this bill will not very largely increase the number of acres cultivated in this country. It may have the result—this bill and the other that we hope to have following soon—of increasing the amount of food products planted in this country, as contradistinguished from certain other kinds of staple crops. I think it will have the result of very largely stimulating the effort of the people of the country to produce those staple articles of food—not much of wheat, because the time is too late now—but beans, peas, potatoes, rice, and the like of that, upon which our armies might be fed.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have the gentleman grant me permission to put into the RECORD right at this point the percentage of lands in the various States that is under cultivation.

Mr. LEVER. I do not know what the gentleman has; but the gentleman's statement, whatever it may be, would not contradict my own proposition. I do not believe you are going very largely to increase the total acreage of production, but I do think that you can very largely increase the total production in certain kinds of crops, and that is what we are undertaking to do.

Mr. MADDEN. It would be very appropriate to have this inserted right here, and it will not take me a minute to do it.

Mr. LEVER. Well, I would rather not be interrupted at this point.

Mr. MADDEN. It is right in line with that.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to ask the gentleman when he expects or hopes to get the information called for by this bill?

Mr. LEVER. As I said in answer to a question propounded by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON], the testimony before the committee was to the effect that the matter of undertaking to get the information should be begun by the Bureau of Markets in six days after this bill becomes a law, and that they ought to have the information desired within three or four or five months.

Mr. HOUSTON. Let me ask the gentleman another question.
Mr. LEVER. Yes.
Mr. HOUSTON. What Department of the Government does the gentleman expect to do this work of gathering these statistics? Does the gentleman expect the Agricultural Department to do that, or the Bureau of the Census, the statistical bureau of the Government?
Mr. LEVER. My idea is that the Department of Agriculture and the Bureau of the Census will very closely coordinate their machinery for getting this information.
Mr. HOUSTON. Does not the gentleman believe that the Bureau of the Census is fully equipped now to do this work at once?
Mr. LEVER. Frankly, I do not.
Mr. HOUSTON. Is it not now engaged in this very work?
Mr. LEVER. The Bureau of the Census gets its facts once in 10 or 5 year periods. The Bureau of the Census does not now have the machinery or the trained men to weigh the facts as they are gathered.
Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman will pardon me, is he not aware of the fact that the census report of 1914 sets forth the very facts that it is proposed to gather by this bill, and it has now the machinery necessary to carry on that work?
Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Tennessee would not want this Congress, or would not want any commission authorized by this Congress, to predicate its action in the way of controlling the food situation of this country during this emergency upon facts gathered in 1914. We want the facts now as they exist at this time, and not as they existed in 1914.
Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman will bear with me, the facts in that report would be of vast service in getting the reports of the conditions to-day.
Mr. LEVER. Undoubtedly; and the Department of Agriculture and the Census Bureau, acting under the authority contained in this bill, would undoubtedly use the facts gathered in 1914 by the census for such purposes as they could make use of.
Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. LEVER. Yes.
Mr. HELM. Is not the Bureau of the Census equipped with the machinery necessary for gathering this data now?
Mr. LEVER. What machinery does the Bureau of the Census have now that is not occupied?
Mr. HELM. What machinery has it now?
Mr. LEVER. Yes; what machinery has it that is not now in use?
Mr. HELM. It has the identical machinery that it had when it took the census of 1910.
Mr. LEVER. Oh, the gentleman knows that the enumerators who took that census have been dismissed and have been forgotten.
Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. LEVER. Yes.
Mr. ANDERSON. I want to call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that there is a great difference between getting the statistics and knowing what they mean.
Mr. LEVER. Exactly. Now, Mr. Chairman, just one word on section 3, which is the section I have been discussing and which gives the authority to make this complete, fundamental, basic survey of the food situation, and that is to say there is no authority in any department of the Government now to do that type of work. There is no machinery that I know of through which any department of the Government at this time can do that work; and yet I believe we all recognize that if we are going to handle the matter of controlling our food supply in this emergency we must have the facts that are undertaken to be sought in this section.
Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. LEVER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas for a question.
Mr. DIES. Is it anticipated by the gentleman from South Carolina that this information will be in hand in time for this Congress to use it in framing legislation?
Mr. LEVER. I am not sure of that, because, unfortunately, I do not know when we are going to adjourn.
Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. LEVER. Yes.
Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is aware of the fact that a short time ago there was an appropriation made of $250,000 to authorize the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation as to food production, and food prices, and costs, and so forth.
Mr. LEVER. Yes.
Mr. MONDELL. Will not that commission, in carrying out the provisions of that act, do very much of the work that is contemplated under this section?
Mr. LEVER. We think that under the item in the sundry civil bill and the item in the agricultural bill proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, we have laid the foundation for getting a good deal of this information; but the gentleman realizes that the activities of the Federal Trade Commission are limited by the powers under which that commission acts.
Mr. MONDELL. Is not this true, that there is bound to be a duplication of work and effort between these two departments of the Government?
Mr. LEVER. On the contrary we propose in this bill that the President shall direct that these various agencies now collecting information shall so coordinate in their activities as to prevent duplication and waste.
Mr. MONDELL. The President is a great man——
Mr. LEVER. Undoubtedly.
Mr. MONDELL. But I will consider him still greater if he can accomplish what the gentleman suggests that he desires to accomplish; that is, to compel two bureaus of the Government to coordinate in doing the same kind of work.
Mr. LEVER. I will say to my friend that the President of the United States is so surprisingly each day becoming greater and greater that we need not be astonished at any great thing he may do.
Mr. MONDELL. Miracles do happen.
Mr. LEVER. Now, Mr. Chairman, section 4 of this bill provides that in restricted areas, where seeds are needed for planting purposes, the Secretary of Agriculture may purchase the seeds for the crop of 1918, store them, and sell them on credit or otherwise, at cost, to such farmers, in such restricted areas as may require them, a small part of the appropriation being made available to take care of any emergency situation that may now exist.
Mr. COX. The gentleman is touching upon the very point I wanted to ask him about. How much of this appropriation, if any, is segregated or set apart to buy seed to take care of emergencies which may arise this year?
Mr. LEVER. The committee has not segregated any specific amount.
Mr. COX. How much is contemplated?
Mr. LEVER. The department contemplates using as much of this appropriation as is shown to be necessary to take care of emergency propositions, not exceeding $75,000 or $100,000.
Mr. COX. It is not the purpose of this bill then to use any part of this money to buy spring wheat seed for the Northwest?
Mr. LEVER. No; unless that is absolutely necessary in the judgment of the Secretary.
Now, I want to call attention to the seed situation. One of the difficulties that we are going to be up against in 1918 is that if the present high prices of seed continue the farmer who ordinarily feeds his oats or his corn to his cattle and his hogs, but saves a certain amount for planting seed, is going to find that it is more profitable for him to feed all of that grain to his stock rather than to keep any in reserve for planting purposes, and it may be that in certain sections of the country the seed for planting purposes may be absolutely exhausted unless the agents of the department, through publicity, lectures, and the like, may convince the people that they must preserve their planting-seed supply. But we can not afford, in this emergency, to depend on those things having the salutary effect that we think they may have. We can not depend upon the fact that in a certain section of the country there will be an adequate supply. Last year we had a great flood which swept across 8 or 10 States and wiped out much of the agriculture of those States. Telegrams are coming to me from those sections and from certain Northwestern sections, saying that production could be greatly increased if they had the seeds, but they do not have them. Now, there is no doubt that there is seed enough in the country. There is no particular shortage in seed for planting purposes in this country, but the seeds are not available in the localities where they are most needed. It is too late to take care of much of that situation, but we can not afford to permit ourselves to be caught in that fix again—next year or the next.
Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. LEVER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois for a question.
Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think the Department of Agriculture could tell the farmer any better than he himself knows just what he ought to do about planting his crops?
Mr. LEVER. If the Department of Agriculture and the agricultural colleges and agricultural experiment stations in this country can not do that in most cases, then they ought to be abolished, and we ought to be run out of Congress for wasting the people's money in supporting them. That is my answer to that.
Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. LEVER. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. One very great difficulty that the farmers in my part of the country are having is the difficulty about getting sufficient help on the farm.

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. In some cases they are obliged to seed down parts of the farm to grass for hay, because they can not get the help to properly cultivate the land.

Mr. LEVER. Yes.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. And that is true of Indiana, as I have been informed.

Mr. LEVER. It is true of South Carolina. It is true of all the country in greater or less degree.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Now, the great problem that farmers are confronted with is the problem of help. The hired man, employed by the month on the farm, is very uncommon and as scarce as hen's teeth.

Mr. LEVER. Let me say to the gentleman from Michigan that the problem of help in this country is a very serious problem. We are proposing to use some of the money appropriated in this bill to put into each State one, two, three, or a dozen men who can, in a measure, assemble and mobilize the labor of that State and use it to the best advantage.

Now, the gentleman knows that this week a farmer in a certain section may need all the labor that he can get to save his crops, and his next-door neighbor may not need it. We desire as far as we can to mobilize the labor in all the States so that we can send it into a community where labor is scarce and where we know the need is great for some of that labor, and we are providing some appropriations for that purpose.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That may be done about harvest time, possibly; but to meet the problem at planting and seed time is also important, and it seems to me very difficult.

Mr. LEVER. It is exceedingly difficult, and the greatest difficulty about the situation is that the planting season is practically over for this year.

Mr. NORTON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. LEVER. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NORTON. I am very much in sympathy with the legislation that will increase the production of this country. I want to say along the line of the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan that in my section of the country I have in mind three agents of the Department of Agriculture. These three young men are receiving salaries of about $2,000 a year each. One is a married man. The three of them made complete failures as farmers. They are running over our section of the country, and one of them is running over the United States gathering information. A great many of the farm boys are working for $40 and $50 a month, and it seems to me more of an incentive for them to leave the farm and try to get one of these easy jobs than it is to remain on the farm.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask the gentleman whether they were selected under the civil service?

Mr. NORTON. I do not know whether they were or not, but I will say this, that that is one of the errors we are liable to fall into. There are 7,000 men to be employed in the Agricultural Department, and it will take them away from productive work and put them into nonproductive work, and somebody has got to pay for it in taxes.

Mr. LEVER. Let me say to the gentleman from North Dakota and to the committee that we are in war. War is wasteful, and we are going to waste some of this appropriation, I suspect.

Mr. NORTON. We need not add to the waste with a bill like this.

Mr. LEVER. We are going to waste some money under the provisions of this bill, unless a miracle should happen. But the question is whether or not the purposes that we seek in this bill are worth the appropriations that we are making in the bill. That is all there is to it.

Now, I have had no opportunity to explain the items of appropriation in this bill, $18,000,000 in round numbers. Let me say what they propose in a general kind of way. They are to be used for the food-survey purposes, which is basically important in my judgment. In addition to that, a part of it is to be used in storing seeds for emergency purposes during the next crop season.

Another portion is to be used in combatting animal diseases—cattle tick, hog cholera, anthrax, tuberculosis, and other diseases that are placing a burden of more than $125,000,000 upon the food supplies of this Nation each year, and I am conservative in that estimate.

Another portion of this fund is to be used for the purpose of organizing counties now unorganized under the agricultural extension act, counties which do not have the county agent system.

We must have in the various agricultural counties of the United States a hub around which the activities of the various agricultural interests of this Nation may revolve. We have 2,800 rural counties in the United States. Thirteen hundred of these are organized and have their county agents, men and women. You know what that work is. It is not necessary for me to explain it. But there are some 1,550 rural counties that have no semblance of an organization. If we are going to bring to this country an agriculture of the highest efficiency of which it is capable, we must furnish it the organization with which to do it. That is the purpose of this bill, and upon that plea I ask you to support it and expedite its passage. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to discuss this bill at this time, but there seems to be so much misunderstanding as to its purposes that I think I may be justified in taking 10 minutes of the time of the committee to discuss one or two of its features.

As the chairman has said, the United States is in war. Practically all of the civilized nations of the world are at war. Some 13 or 14 of them have been at war for nearly three years. The demand of that great war has reduced the food supply of the world far below normal. Europe is undernourished now. Some of its people are upon barest ration of necessities. The United States is going to be during the next year—probably during the next three years—the food banker of the world. We must determine some way, somehow, how much food each one of these warring nations will get out of such surplus as we may be able to raise during the present crop season; how much we can afford to let them have and not starve our own people. As the world food banker, it is absolutely essential that we should have at the very outset an inventory or census of the food supply of the Nation that we may know where that food is, how much of it there is, where it ordinarily goes to, and how it can be best turned into the channels of consumption with reference to needs of this war. All these questions must be determined in an accurate and scientific way. We are going to make a bank account of our national food resources, and from time to time as that national-bank account of food resources is diminished we are going to subtract the amount by which it is diminished from the bank account. And if it increases by production of food products, we are going to add to that bank account. In other words, we propose to keep a food account for the benefit of ourselves, our civilian population, the Army and the Navy, and the people of the world, a bank account of the food supply of this Nation. This is an absolutely necessary essential to measures of food control and to prevent starvation of our own and other peoples. I can not overemphasize its necessity and importance.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I do not know whether my friend is a practical farmer or not. Has he ever farmed any?

Mr. ANDERSON. Some. I do not claim to be a farmer.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. In various parts of the country farms have run down and it is impossible to raise good crops on much of the land. Now, you are proposing to reorganize the agricultural resources of the country under fire. What are you proposing to do about fertilizing the land so that it will produce fair crops?

If you could get our land up to standard in the way of production, you could certainly greatly increase the bank account the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. ANDERSON. I can not discuss in 10 minutes the ways and means by which food production is to be increased.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does this bill provide for any such thing?

Mr. ANDERSON. It provides appropriations by which the Agricultural Department may assist the farmer in every way. It provides appropriations for the prevention of waste by diseases of animals and diseases of plants. While there is no specific appropriation for the furnishing of fertilizer, an effort will be made to increase the fertilizer supply and to let people know where fertilizer is to be obtained if any is available, and I am very frank to say to the gentleman that I am rather doubtful that there is any available at this time.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS. When you take this inventory of our agricultural assets, what benefit will that give in dealing with the question, when the volume of production and consumption is continually changing?

Mr. ANDERSON. We propose to keep track in a broad, general way of the food supply that is taken out by consumption of the great aggregate of our bank account of food products, so that we can know at any time just how much there is in the aggregate and in a particular warehouse in any particular city and how it can be obtained.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. COX. Does not the gentleman believe that all of the information sought to be obtained in the second paragraph in which $4,500,000 is appropriated for the conservation of food through educational methods——

Mr. ANDERSON. What does the gentleman mean by the second paragraph?

Mr. COX. On page 6. Does not the gentleman believe that all of that information could be disseminated and given to the people through the publication of bulletins?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not, and I will give the gentleman an illustration of what I have in mind. In the district which I have the honor to represent there is one county in particular which is very well organized. In that county we have a general farm bureau under the control of the county agent. Affiliated with that general farm bureau are all of the different farm organizations—the cow-test association, the bull association, and all of the different kinds of farm associations. The result of that organization has been positively marvelous in increasing the grain, dairy, and food production in that county. If we could succeed by the methods provided in this bill in organizing every agricultural county in the United States upon the same plan, I think we could increase the ordinary production of the counties of the United States enormously. I am very frank to say that I think there will probably be some waste in these appropriations that can not be avoided.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. COX. I have read the hearings upon this bill, and particularly the gentleman's questions in the committee, which struck me very forcibly. Take one of these items, in which it is proposed to send about 260 men at a salary of about $3.000 a year each. They are to go to the counties already organized, where they have county agents, and these extra men are to talk to the county agents and tell the county agents how they can go out and tell the farmers how they can save food by proper conservation. Does the gentleman not think that such information as that could be supplied by bulletins? In the hearings the gentleman criticized that very severely as a bird-shot process, and I think his criticism was very appropriate.

Mr. ANDERSON. I agree with the gentleman on that. As I said a moment ago, I think that there is some waste in this bill. I recognize, however, that in dealing with a proposition of this kind we have got to deal with it with a view to the kind of organization that we have. We are in a sort of rut, and it is probably true that in this bill we are making the rut longer and broader and wider than it was before, but in the aggregate I think great benefit will result from the additional appropriations carried in the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman admitted a moment ago that he thought there was a good deal of waste in the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. I said I thought there might be some.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the gentleman indicate what percentage of waste he thinks there is, so that we may eliminate it before we pass the bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. Oh, I will leave that to the wise judgment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does not the gentleman think that with an array of food census takers, followed by an array of deputy tax collectors, more of the farmer's time will be taken up than the whole thing will be worth?

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman is proceeding upon a hypothesis that is not justified.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well the Civil Service Commission is asking for 800 deputy tax collectors, and the examinations call for a 75 per cent allowance for adaptability.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have nothing to do with that proposition.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. No; if I have to yield to nonsensical questions, I can not yield any further.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. But mine are not nonsensical.

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not assume to say that my friend from Michigan will ask any such question.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I would like to ask the gentleman a question to demonstrate it.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. FARR. Will not the census of the foodstuffs of the country afford the Government the best means of reaching the food exploiters?

Mr. ANDERSON. Unquestionably.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Now, as a practical man, does not the gentleman from Minnesota understand that the average farmer with the good prices which he is likely to get for what he can produce will have the strongest possible incentive to get all he can out of his soil, and does the gentleman think that our scientific friends who will approach him at very long range will be able to help him very much in increasing his production?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do think so. I think they will be able to help him both in preventing waste from diseases of plants and insect pests of plants; I think they will be able to help him considerably by the prevention of the diseases of animals; I think they will be able to help him in the organization of the general farm operations upon a broader and more scientific basis.

Mr. HULBERT. Will the gentleman yield in reference to the construction of a provision of this law?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. HULBERT. I would like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. ANDERSON. But I would rather yield under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HULBERT. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he believes the provisions of section 2, page 2, would authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to suspend in whole or in part the operations of the present pure food and drug law?

Mr. ANDERSON. I should say not. I should say there are no regulatory features in this bill whatever in the sense that any authority is given to the Secretary of Agriculture or any of his agents to regulate the acts of any individual or any corporation. The purpose of this bill is purely administrative. It is not designed to permit the regulation of the activities of individuals or of corporations. The only purpose of section 2, I will say to the gentleman, is to permit the Secretary of Agriculture to use such agencies as the county agents—and I might say to the gentleman if he is not familiar with it that under existing law there is a sort of dual control over the county agents, and the purpose of this is simply to fortify to some extent the power of the Secretary of Agriculture to use the county agents and the agricultural colleges, and any other agencies that he can use, in obtaining the facts of this food census. It is not designed to permit the regulation of individuals. The only regulatory provisions that are carried in the bill at all are the provisions of section 3 which are only in a sense regulatory.

Mr. HULBERT. Then, I would like to ask the gentleman if he believes section 5 on page 4 would serve to permit the Secretary of Agriculture to suspend in whole or in part the operation of the present pure food and drug law?

Mr. ANDERSON. I should say absolutely not; that the regulations authorized in section 5 are designed to permit the issuance of general regulations relating to the conduct of the men who are in the Department of Agriculture. They are not designed to permit the regulation of the general citizens of the country. I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, there are so many requests for time that I shall only occupy a very small portion of the time at my command, but I desire to refer to a few provisions of the bill. The chairman referred to the provision providing for the purchase of seed and the distribution at cost. If you will read the bill you will find that it reads that it may be distributed free under the provisions of the bill. The bill reads "to furnish them by sale or otherwise." The bill carries $18,510,000.

This money will not be used for the purchase of seed. The seed is already in the ground, and unless it is proposed to dig the newly planted crops out of the ground and replant them, this money will not be needed for seed this spring. But every dollar of it may be used for the employment of experts, and the experts who will be employed are college boys and teachers in the schools.

The experts are not available, and it will be necessary to pick up the college boys and the teachers, many of whom have had no experience, as their time has been occupied in college preparing for other activities. They are now to be employed and sent over the country to instruct the farmers how to farm. I believe all of you will agree that it requires as much training for a farmer as a soldier or any other activities. The proposition is to employ people without experience and send them out to instruct the farmers how to farm. We have 17,000 people in employment now. This will add to it 7,000 more, with an average expense of $2,500 for salaries and expenses.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the employment of these 7,000 men taken from the colleges exempt them from war service under the conscription act we have just passed?

Mr. HAUGEN. Oh, exactly as stated by Uncle JOE the other day, it is necessary to reserve a few for the trenches rather than to hire them and put them in Ford cars and send them out in the country. Crops are not grown either by Ford automobiles or upon the lecture platform. It requires the services of trained men. Now, if it is the purpose of this House, if it is the purpose of Congress and of this administration, to increase the food production in this country, there is a way of getting at it. We have millions and millions of acres of land that can be turned into cultivation. We have public lands; we have patriotic citizens who have tendered their farms to our Government free of charge. There is no trouble about getting the soil. We have the soil; the next thing is the labor. If you will employ the labor and buy the seed and plant and harvest it with this $18,500,000 you can increase our production 100,000,000 bushels of wheat. [Applause.] There is no question about it. A gentleman asked if there was waste in the bill. Yes. Some one has asked the percentage. Can anyone figure it out? Will it be 50 per cent? Yes; probably 75 per cent, when it comes to production. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. I will in just a moment.

To give you an idea of what the people at home think about it I will read from a clipping from my home paper:

It is easy for Congress and the other spellbinders to tell the farmers what to do in the way of increasing crops. They seem to forget that the weather man is the first one to be let into the consultation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we underestimate the industry, the intelligence, and the patriotism of the people on the farm. We underestimate the interest that they take in this matter. I take it that every farmer in the country has as much interest in this matter as we have. He is as much interested in the welfare of this country and to make this war a success as the people who are seeking jobs.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that the clipping I send to the desk be read. It is from the district of the gentleman who has just preceded me [Mr. ANDERSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Says the Albert Lea Standard of April 30: "The Freeborn County Citizen's Auxiliary is doing a great work. Formed only two weeks ago, it has now over 300 members and a complete working organization, and covers every field of the preparedness program. And what is better yet, the men who have been called up for service are all ready and willing to do anything that is asked. This spirit of willingness to work, no matter what the task, is a most encouraging sign, and foretells the usefulness of the auxiliary. With the passage of the bill for selective conscription many duties may be delegated to the organization. These duties will probably involve the gathering of all kinds of statistical information. This information is already being gathered and tabulated, and when the call comes everything will be ready in Freeborn for an instant response."

Mr. HAUGEN. Now, Mr. Chairman, what is being done in Freeborn County is being done practically in every county in this country. Every agricultural college, every State department of agriculture, the Department of Agriculture, and nearly every patriotic man is doing the same thing. Their minds are upon one thing, and that is to increase production in order to feed not only our Army and Navy but our people and allies as well.

Now, the question is, Can or can we not use this money to better advantage? It is $18,500,000, and, as admitted by those who are for the bill, there is much of it to be wasted.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I simply wanted to ask what the farmers have done in this country that they should be so afflicted?

Mr. HAUGEN. Oh, Mr. Chairman, examine the bill, and what does it provide? It gives the Secretary of Agriculture the power to administer oaths, to issue subpœnas, and to compel attendance. If the farmer is occupied otherwise, if he is putting forth an honest endeavor to produce crops and can not spend time to give testimony he can be sent to jail; true, for only two years, and fined only $5,000, or both; that is all. [Laughter.] That is what this patriotic farmer gets. But, gentlemen, when it comes to the speculator, to the gambler, to the manipulator, who puts the prices up sky-high, he has been forgotten. Oh, no; the speculation, the manipulation of prices goes on. The farmer is to be jailed and the gambler, the manipulator, is to be crowned. When we first reported this bill it had in it section 2, which was aimed at the gambler and manipulator, but that bill was withdrawn. It came back without that section. It is here before you to-day, and the proposition is to jail the farmer and to crown the other fellow.

Mr. CURRY of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. CURRY of California. Is there anything in this bill which, if enacted into law, would discourage speculation and would make the cost of foodstuffs cheaper to the consumer than they are at the present time?

Mr. HAUGEN. Not one line, not one word, not one syllable. It has been stricken from the bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HASTINGS. I understand the gentleman is the ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture, and he is discussing a very important bill and criticizing it very severely. I would like to ask him if he has favored the House with a minority report setting forth all the evils of the bill?

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I am submitting my report in a feeble way now. I have done my best. [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Really, is not this a bill to give the Secretary of Agriculture more jobs to fill?

Mr. HAUGEN. About 7,000 jobs; that is all.

Mr. Chairman, I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I approach the consideration of this bill, for one, with a mind open to its reception if its merits can be established. In other words, the opening lines provide that this is for the purpose of effectually providing for the national security and defense in carrying on the war. Anything that tends toward the accomplishment of that purpose has my sincere, earnest, and hearty support.

There are some things which occur to me in reading this bill that, I think, ought to be very carefully considered and either amended or eliminated, so as to perfect the bill for the purpose of voting on it and making it into a law.

Section 3 appears to me to be quite drastic in its provision. It says—that the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to investigate and ascertain the demand for, the supply, consumption, costs, and prices of, and the basic facts relating to the ownership, production, transportation, manufacture, storage, and distribution of foods, food materials—

And so forth. That is a broad commission, involving an inquiry into the most personal affairs of every farmer or producer in the Nation. Whether the committee intends that it shall go forth on that basis or not I am not sure, but it appears to me that some of those words might be eliminated and strengthen the bill. The purpose of this bill is to secure a larger production and aid the farmer in destroying certain insects and other things that impede and hinder his success. Why not confine the bill to those matters and strike out portions of this section, following in that way all the bills of that kind that have been passed—bills which subject a citizen to investigation, to laying bare his personal and private affairs, and bringing them out, and, as it is proposed, publishing them to the country?

There is another evil in this section, and it is to be found in line 15:

The Secretary of Agriculture, and his agents duly authorized therefor, may compel the attendance at any designated place of witnesses from any part of the United States.

In the legislation relating to the jurisprudence of this country the line of demarkation has always been maintained that, except in criminal cases, no such plenary power in serving a subpœna has ever been permitted; and the Members of this House who were here at a former session will recall that when the Clayton antitrust bill was presented from our committee it had in it that same provision, allowing the running of a subpœna all over the United States and compelling a citizen to come from any point to any other point that might be named, and this House unanimously struck it out of that bill upon my motion to amend.

I respectfully submit that while we are anxious to promote the welfare of the country, to aid in the prosecution of the war, let us not move with such celerity or speed that we will override some of the most sacred rights of the individual [applause], but let us preserve and maintain them as far as possible. That should be stricken from the bill. The power to serve a subpœna in any part of the United States and bring a witness thousands of miles to attend a hearing ought not to be given in any civil investigation.

And then, beginning at the middle of line 21, it says:

And may enter on any business day during the usual hours of business any place, including any structure, vessel, vehicle, or other premises, except a dwelling house actually occupied exclusively as such.

He may enter for what purpose? To serve a subpœna? No; because that power exists independently of this bill. What are you to enter? My store, my warehouse, my property. What right have you to invade my individual possessions? Why should the agent of the Secretary of Agriculture be permitted to go into my premises without an object stated, without a purpose to be accomplished? There is none expressed and none implied, unless it be by relation backward to these words, for the purpose of gathering and possessing any "books, letters, papers, or documents." I am sure the membership of this House will hesitate long before they clothe any of these irresponsible agents of the Secretary of Agriculture with a power like that. What, if you pass such laws, would be the use of your constitutional provision against unlawful searches and seizures—a thing that was fought for by our forefathers? What use is it for you to pass laws couched in the language that is contained in this section if you respect these fundamental rights?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. In a moment. Let the gentleman kindly wait until I have finished this criticism. Then I will answer him.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Then, when you come to this section 4, as it is worded—it can be cured by amendment—you find that the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to seize and pay for, at a price to be fixed by himself, your property or mine. That is bad enough. But he is authorized to sell it again at cost. What will become of the various industries of this country in the seed-raising business, an aid to agriculture, wherever they exist? It would put every one of them out of business. There ought to be words inserted there "to purchase and take at not less than the fair market price," and not do, as the bill proposes, turn the citizen over to a litigation in the courts of justice for the recovery of any amount that would be necessary to make a proper compensation to him.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I ought to yield first over here, because I was questioned here first.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] is correct in his statement that the Secretary could give these seeds away, then he could take them at any price he fixed and give them away?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. That certainly would follow.

Now, the other sections of the bill are largely administrative, and I do not desire to present any criticism with respect to them.

Mr. KING. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Yes; surely.

Mr. KING. As I understand it, the gentleman is in favor of the conscription of life, but not in favor of the conscription of property.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. The gentleman totally misapprehends me. I regret that I am not able to express myself so as to make my words intelligible to his mind. I have said nothing of the sort. There is a principle of law which provides that private property shall not be taken without just compensation, even for public purposes, and it is to that principle that I am appealing now. When you come to the question of conscription, I am in favor of the selective draft, as I said upon this floor upon several occasions. Why? Because it is simply a draft, like a check upon a bank account. The Nation has the bank account of the dutiful citizens everywhere, and all that a selective draft does is to issue a check for so much of that reserve fund as it needs to be placed at the Nation's service in the hour of her emergency or in defense of her life. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Surely.

Mr. ANDERSON. The gentleman seemed to take the position there that this bill would permit an unlawful seizure or search or entrance upon property by these officials or agents?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I certainly do.

Mr. ANDERSON. Supposing that some person should refuse to permit the Secretary of Agriculture or his agents to enter upon his premises. Can the gentleman point out in this bill any language under which the Secretary of Agriculture or his agents could enter that building over his protest?

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman permit me to answer the question in the Yankee fashion? Can a court of justice, seeking testimony or information affecting life or property, walk into your premises at will, through its agents, and take what it pleases? No. Even a court of justice in the administration of the law must come in a lawful way and subpœna you to produce at the proper place, and subject to the proper conditions, the information that is sought. Why should not the Secretary of Agriculture be compelled to do the same thing? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from South Carolina yield some of his time now?

Mr. LEVER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. I did not intend to speak upon this bill at all, but the criticisms that have just been made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] I think deserve some attention.

In the first place, in reference to his criticism of section 4, authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase seeds and sell them at cost, the gentleman indicates that in his opinion that authority should be limited to purchasing at their market value and selling at that value. If that is done, why the whole purpose or the whole benefit of section 4, it seems to me, would be lost, because if here is a man that has a corner upon seeds of any kind and he can charge what he chooses and the Secretary is compelled to pay him that market price, which is made by himself and one or two others, how is any benefit to the farmer to be gotten out of this bill?

If there is such a corner, if there is such a speculator, there is no injustice in permitting the Secretary of Agriculture to fix the price, and then let the speculator go into court and recover, if he can, a larger price than is fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture. [Applause.]

I want to say that provision is exactly the provision that we inserted in the naval bill last year, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to fix the price when he took over the plants, and if the owners were dissatisfied with the price, they could go into court and get a larger sum. I take it for granted that the committee in preparing this bill has followed exactly the phraseology that was followed by the Committee on Naval Affairs in the preparation of the naval bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. My suggestion was that the bill would be better if we would provide that he should take it over at a fair market price. Is there any such provision as that?

Mr. LENROOT. I take it that that is what it would mean under ordinary circumstances, if there be a market price.

Now, with reference to the suggestion of the gentleman as to the section with relation to investigation, section 3, I do agree with the gentleman that some amendments would be wise; but I think it would be most unwise to strike out the section entirely. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] has suggested that this bill as now framed reaches the farmer only, but does not reach the speculator. If you strike out section 3, his observation will be correct. But I take it that section 3 will reach the speculator, will enable the Secretary of Agriculture to get the information that he must get if the purpose of this bill is to be carried out. For instance, here is a corner in eggs; and if the Secretary desires to know what is the egg supply of the United States, he will not go to the farmer and examine every farmer in the United States to know whether he has 2 or 3 dozen eggs on hand, but he will go to these storage houses; and he ought to have the right, whether in this exact form or otherwise, to compel the information from the man who has cornered those eggs as to how many he has, and all the information necessary with reference to that.

So with grain in elevators. Without that section, the owner of grain or the elevator owner may refuse to give any information. With that section, he can be compelled to give the data from which the Secretary of Agriculture may be able to get information, so that when he has completed his investigation we will have some accurate knowledge as to how many million bushels of grain there are in the country. And so with other commodities. While the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] is that this section will be used to call the farmer from the field and get all the information from him, I take it for granted that this section will not be used probably in any case, so far as the farmer is concerned, but it will be used to reach the speculator, the middleman, and the distributor, from whom they must get the information if it is to be of value to the country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman from South Carolina use some of his time?

Mr. LEVER. How much time remains?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina has 16 minutes, and the gentleman from Iowa 20 minutes.

Mr. LEVER. I ask the gentleman from Iowa to use some of his time.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, certainly the members of the committee must understand that extraordinary and unprecedented power is granted to the Secretary of Agriculture by the terms of this bill. I call the attention of gentlemen to section 2, that has not been hitherto referred to. The language of that section is that the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to take such measures, to use such means, and to employ such existing or additional agencies of the Department of Agriculture as he finds necessary, and so forth. Certainly no language could be broader or more general than that.

And then we come to section 3 of the bill. Gentlemen say, and especially the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] says, he judges that the extraordinary powers conveyed in this section, of investigation, of enforced information, will not be used except as against the manipulators of food products. But certainly that can not be the intention and purpose of this bill, because, as the chairman of the committee admits, we have already that power in the hands of a separate bureau of this Government, with an appropriation of $250,000 to carry on the investigation, with ample and sufficient powers, with men already in the field. But this, as the chairman of the committee says, is to acquire information from the farmers and from the farm districts of the country with regard to what they may have on hand and to advise them and aid them in their work.

And gentlemen should understand that this measure will not cause the addition of a single acre of cultivated land this year. It will not and can not cause the addition of a single bushel to the crops that are to be raised this year. It is to determine only by these extraordinary powers conferred what the farmer now has on hand, and under the terms of the bill 7,000 agents may be sent all over the country to go into the farm districts to investigate the farmers themselves and compel them to answer, under oath, regarding the number of live stock they have on hand, the number of bushels of grain, the prices, and all about the production—any questions that they may choose to ask. And the compulsory process is of such an extraordinary nature as to make the farmer liable to two years imprisonment in the penitentiary and a fine of $5,000 if he shall refuse to answer the questions satisfactorily.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TOWNER. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY. Does not the very nature of the matters involved indicate that this calling for books and accounts and things of that kind is not intended for the farmer?

Mr. TOWNER. If that be the case, then let us change it so that it will not embrace the farmer. I wonder if the gentleman from Texas would support an amendment of that kind? It not only calls for books and papers, but it even calls for account books or memoranda that the farmer may have. It would even compel him to give up a letter from a tenant that may be sent to him, or for any other book or paper.

Mr. MADDEN. It calls for the farmer himself, does it not?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly. As suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the utterly indefensible power is granted here to call a farmer from the farm in Iowa to come to Washington or to New York City or to any other place in the country before any agent commissioned by the department and compel him to testify to anything the agent may ask him about.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. In view of the last clause providing that he shall be paid mileage, does the gentleman believe that a farmer would be called from the interior part of the country to come to Washington?

Mr. TOWNER. I will state to the gentleman that just exactly such things have been done. When these agents are commissioned and granted such extraordinary power as this it must not be taken for granted that some one will not exercise it.

Mr. LEVER. Would the gentleman be satisfied if it was confined to the State in which he was a resident?

Mr. TOWNER. I think some amendment of that kind ought to be put in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, of course this bill carries power, and if properly distributed I am not afraid of it, because we must recognize that we are living in abnormal times. We are living in times which call for power and concentration of power. I think section 3 of this bill with some amendments added to it, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Iowa, will make it a very important measure. I believe it is fundamentally essential that we should as quickly as possible have a complete food survey of our Nation, to know how much food there is on hand now; to take an approximation of the amount of food that we will produce in this country during the coming season. For that purpose, Mr. Chairman, I would in no way or manner oppose the appropriation for this purpose.

But I am very much afraid that a large part of this money, a large part of the $18,500,000, will not go to produce a single extra bushel of wheat, a single extra bushel of potatoes, a single extra beef, hog, or sheep. In fact, I think the whole purpose and tenor of the bill is to employ a lot of agents to travel around over the United States and tell men that know what to do who have learned their lessons in the hard school of experience, how they can produce more foodstuff and conserve their food better. I want particularly to call the attention of the committee to this language in the bill:

> For increase of food production and the conservation of food by education and demonstrational methods through country districts and resident agents and others, $4,500,000.

If every member of this committee would read the hearings before the committee as given to the committee by Mr. Rawl, of the Department of Agriculture, I do not believe it would agree to this proposition.

He says that it is proposed to employ upward of 1,300 experts at a salary of from $2,500 to $3,000 a year; and what for? To travel over this Nation; and 260 of them to go to various county agents and to have the county agent to go out and tell the farmers how they can conserve the feed supply to the stock. Just imagine a farmer of 40 years' experience, a farmer who has made a success in life, who knows how to feed his stock, who knows how to get the most out of the feed to his stock, and that man being visited by some man graduated at Purdue University in Indiana, telling the farmer that he is wasting his feed, that he is wasting his feed to his horse and cattle and sheep and hogs, and he must take this new method. He is told that by a man that never saw a farm in his life, a man that would not know what a farm was unless he was told it was a farm, whose only qualification is that he holds a diploma as a graduate from Purdue University, in my own State; and I am not saying anything against that school any more than any other.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. KING. Are there not a great many men from State and college universities just going into the field now?

Mr. COX. Of course there are; 260 men designated to do this work, who are not practical farmers but are men born and raised in the cities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we may have 30 minutes additional on both sides.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that that can not be done in committee. We are acting under a rule that the gentleman supported, providing for two hours of general debate.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I did not support the rule.

Mr. MANN. Then we are acting under a rule that the gentleman and I did not support.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, let me suggest that there will be a liberal discussion under the five-minute rule. It was the intention on this side to move to rise after the completion of general debate on this bill this afternoon. And I will also say that I am going to try to enter into a unanimous-consent agreement by which this bill will be made the unfinished business after the revenue bill is out of the way; of course, not to interfere with conference reports, and so forth.

Mr. HAUGEN. This will be the unfinished business next Wednesday.

Mr. LEVER. Yes; but the revenue bill may be out of the way before that time.

Mr. MANN. And the revenue bill may not be finished by Wednesday, but we can make it the unfinished business and it will give greater latitude under the five-minute rule, perhaps.

Mr. LEVER. We all recognize that this is an important bill, and I have no disposition to shut off debate under the five-minute rule, except that I do not think we ought to string it out; I mean reasonable debate.

Mr. HAUGEN. I know the gentleman wants to be fair about the matter.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, what I had in mind was that this debate is not dilatory, that it goes to the heart of a very important subject.

Mr. LEVER. I recognize that fact, and I am sure there is no disposition here to delay the passage of this bill, and I think we can come to a working agreement under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HAUGEN. If that is the understanding, that the committee shall rise immediately after the conclusion of general debate, that arrangement can be made later. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that I do not find myself able to support the survey feature of this bill. My judgment is that we have reached the point where there ought to be an end to this sort of appropriations. The question that confronts Congress in passing upon this matter ought to be, What are we going to do with the information, and what may we find out that we do not now know with reference to our ability or necessity for dealing with this farm-product matter? When this investigation is completed it will be ascertained that the food supply of the country is short. Do we contemplate an embargo against the nations that are engaged with us in this war? Certainly we do not. Are we to take over the food of the Nation and distribute it? There is no intimation that that is even remotely contemplated. What are we going to do with the information after we get it? What can we do with it? By the time it is taken the wheat harvest will be partly completed and production and consumption will all the while have been in operation. But, after all, what will we do with the information we get? We will do with it just what we have done with information that we have spent millions of dollars to obtain heretofore, namely, put it in a book and then put it away in a cubby hole somewhere, and these farmers who do need constructive service now in getting a fair share of the value of what they produce, help in getting their products to market, will pay the tax. We are going to do one of two things. We are going to take 7,000 men from production, who are farmers, or we are going to send 7,000 men into the field who do not know anything about the business. We are going to give the Secretary of Agriculture power to expend $18,000,000, a large part on the investigating and producing end, and as a representative of a great agricultural State I am getting pretty tired of having the Nation presume that the farmers of the country have not got sense enough to produce, and leaving them helpless when they come to sell. We need more food; we do not have to investigate to learn that. We can secure more food much better by helping the farmer to get a better profit than we can by sending some Government agent snooping around his cow lot to see whether or not old Bossie has added one more to the cow family, and then sending the farmer a bill for the visit. We know we have not too much food. We need more. Profit is the effective stimulus. That is what the farmer operates for. [Applause.] The farmers of America have always taken care of their part of this job, and I have never been guilty of trying to soft soap them in my life. I have a definite situation in my home community. The Dallas News of two or three days ago carried in it a statement that the commercial truck growers in that community were plowing up their spinach for which they could not find a market. That spinach is worth $3.50 per barrel here. What do we propose to do? We propose to send some town fellow down there to tell them how to raise more spinach and take a survey of what they have on hand. [Laughter.] I am willing to go to the limit, gentlemen, but——

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I do not know very much about this bill, but where does the gentleman get the idea that they are going to send town men, utterly ignorant of this business, down there to tell these farmers what to do?

Mr. SUMNERS. My statement was that we will take 7,000 farmers from the field of production or we will send 7,000 town people there.

Mr. LEVER. Does the gentleman think that 7,000 farmers out of 6,000,000 will affect the situation very much?

Mr. SUMNERS. It is according to how far you proceed along that line. Seven thousand farmers ought to raise something. [Laughter and applause.] I know we have reached the point where we figure that $18,000,000 do not amount to much, and perhaps 7,000 people do not amount to much. We are thinking in billions, and I recognize that it is pretty hard for me to get down to thinking in thousands and millions myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDY. Then, if the gentleman will permit, the gentleman is not certain that they are going to send clerks and bookkeepers from towns to do this work?

Mr. SUMNERS. Oh, no.

Mr. HARDY. I thought the gentleman said they were.

Mr. SUMNERS. Oh, no.

Mr. OVERMYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS. Yes; for a question.

Mr. OVERMYER. The gentleman indicated that he thought the money spent for this food survey might be wasted because the information would not be used. Did my friend read the testimony of Dr. Taylor before the committee, who spent last year in Europe?

Mr. SUMNERS. No; I did not read the doctor's testimony.

Mr. OVERMYER. He said that Germany, Italy, France, and England, who had made food surveys, each considered it the best expenditure of money they had made during the war, and the most important conservation proposition they could have engaged in.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I seldom inflict myself on the House, but being a member of this committee, I have felt that it is my duty to make some statement with reference to my viewpoint as to the legislation contained in this bill. This is purely and strictly an emergency proposition, and I would not be candid with the House if I did not say that, as to the various items of expenditure here, the discretion is left very largely with the administrative force in our Department of Agriculture, and of necessity it has to be so left. In our annual appropriation bill we inspect each item to know where the money is going to be spent, but now we have an emergency—our food supplies are running low, crop seasons are advanced, and we must act quickly. One of the most important items in this bill is the provision relating to the taking of a census of the food supply now in our country. It was disclosed by the hearings that all the European nations at war have taken such census, and their representatives tell us the value of this work can not be overestimated. They have been able to conserve the stock of food on hand in the various nations. No man can approximate what the food supply of our country is, and we must know. I want to submit to you there is a propaganda going on that has thrown our people into a panic. I notice from the papers of my district—and papers from all over the country as to that—that certain farmers and other citizens——

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. In a moment; not now. One of whom I have in mind, went into the market the other day and bought 90 sacks of flour, which he can not use in three years, and stored it for future contingency. That is going on throughout the length and breadth of the country. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Is it not true the testimony the gentleman had in reference to the European conditions was in reference to countries where the supply of land was very limited——

Mr. YOUNG. That is true.

Mr. JONES of Texas. And it might not apply to this country, where we have a great deal of land that is not cultivated?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. No; we can get the information, as it is on hand, just the same here as anywhere else. It is only a question of machinery. Take my colleague from Texas, Mr. SUMNERS. He says he is against the waste of money taking statistics of this kind on the ground that there has been much waste in years past along that line, and yet I dare say that my colleague from Texas will not stand on this floor and say to you that he would repeal the law, the best statistical law on the books to-day, that goes after the production of the cotton of this country and which shows every bale that we make, where it is, etc. [applause]; and he would not dare to stand on this floor and say that he would repeal the law that goes after the production of cotton seed and the foodstuffs that come from the seed. These statistics, accurately made and widely circulated, are of incalculable value in handicapping the cotton gambler in his efforts to beat down the price of the great crop of the South that goes forth to bless the world with food and clothing. Let me say to you gentlemen a word as to the food value of cottonseed products. Two-thirds of the weight of the cotton in the seed is food product either directly or indirectly. You use cottonseed oil every day at your hotel and in your homes, and you do not know it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. We know that.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. You are using that as an oil for cooking your bread, and you do not know it. You use it every day as butter, and you do not know it.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. We do.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Before long you will be using a good deal of cottonseed meal made into flour, and you will not know it. Do not let these recitations alarm you; all these articles of diet are chemically pure and healthful. Now we would not repeal those laws relating to cotton production because we get good information, and it is of practical benefit. The war is on; and it is absolutely essential, if we are going to use all the power at our command, to know what the food supply is. Let me tell you we have heard much as to what is the first line of defense in this great war and in our preparations for this great war. Some say it is the Navy and some say it is the Army; but we are awakening to the fact that this time the farmer is the first line of defense [applause], and this war is going to be won or lost on the ability of the nations involved to meet the demands for food. [Applause.] Now, is it not important for us to have information as to our own resources and know where to strike and how, if we are to be equal to the emergency.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I have not the time. How are you going to spend the money? I will tell you. Take the greens that my good friend from Texas talks about, what do you call them, spinach? People have gone crazy about this back-yard gardening proposition. It is all right, but still that is a perishable crop; and I will tell you where this appropriation comes in with respect as to it, perishable as it is. Eleven hundred girls from one of the industrial colleges at Denton, Tex., will be graduated in a few days, and they have volunteered their services to go out in the different counties of Texas and help teach the farmers' wives, those who do not know—and many do not—how to preserve these perishable products and make a permanent food store of such perishable products. [Applause.]

These perishable crops can not be depended on by the farmer as a safe marketing proposition, as everybody knows. But important, nevertheless, while they last, for our population can consume some, being healthful, good diet. While we are consuming these perishable crops we are not consuming the staple nonperishable products that our armies here and our allies abroad need so badly.

Thus with proper agitation among our people and information as to preserving the surplus so that the surplus of the perishable may be added to the storehouse for future use, great economical savings will be had.

That runs through all the productive capacity. And if you are going to use the perishable crops, you have got to go to the farmer and let him know the importance of preserving his surplus. I know what I am talking about. My district is wholly agricultural. The people are patriotic. They go to work early in the morning and do not quit until late at night. You want to take information to them that will enable them to preserve the products that have heretofore gone to waste. For example, potatoes, the drying process; fruits, the drying process; perishable products, the canning process. Let the graduates, such as these 1,100 Denton girls, from the industrial colleges, go into the communities from which they have been sent to school—and, as a rule, they are the daughters of the farmers of the country—and take that kind of information back home, and you will wisely spend this money and add to our food storehouse.

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman think the students at the agricultural colleges have not learned anything there by their training?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. They are the men that are going to use some of this money. If the Secretary is wise—and I think he is—that is the class of people he will put in the communities of the country.

The meat-supply question is an important proposition not only in this emergency but even when we are normal. One of the most serious things connected with the food supply of the Nation is the rapidly exhausting of the herds of both swine and cattle. We are giving $500,000 of this money to take care of the hog cholera, and $500,000 to take care of the cattle tick. My State has something like 7,000,000 head of cattle to-day. It is the greatest cattle State in the Nation, and yet we have not solved the tick proposition until now. Up to this date the money we have spent has been in an educational way, and I know what it is because I have gone through it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEVER. I yield three minutes more to my friend.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I undertook to make a speech on that proposition and put it in the hands of every farmer in my district. It stirred up some of the leading farmers as to the importance of it. They called a meeting in one county and adopted plans, left it to a kind of local option on the question, and allowed the citizens to say whether or not they would undertake the proposition of getting rid of the cattle tick. They had 50 farmers selected from the various communities, and they went around trying to educate their neighbors. When the election came off, to everybody's astonishment, knowing what we knew and what the Government had taught us as to the simple process of getting rid of this destructive pest, they voted that proposition down. What did we do next? We took it up with the legislature of the State. We now make it a compulsory proposition. The State is divided up into zones, and every man in Texas will be forced under penalty of the law to adopt the dipping process, and in another four years, the outside limit, Texas with its 7,000,000 head of cattle will be free from this pest, and instead of the 7,000,000 head of cattle that we contribute to the consuming world, we will make it three times 7,000,000 head. [Applause.] That is the kind of work that is being proposed in this bill. There may be waste in it, but it is emergency. We have done the best we could, and I plead with you from a patriotic point of view to grant this sum, small as compared with the total we are appropriating here, to the first line of defense, and I believe that you will see beneficial results from it, and may God have mercy on the administrative officer who wastes or wrongfully dissipates this trust fund that we freely give to win this war and save starving humanity. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, if the Congress of the United States will do something to insure the farmer that he will receive a fair price for his farm products you need not worry for a moment but that he will produce at the maximum of his power. The farmers of this country are not more ignorant than any other class of our citizens, but it seems that the presumption that they are is taken for granted to a large extent in the make-up of this bill. I believe that this bill, by proper amendments, gives opportunity for extending substantial and beneficial legislation of some real benefit to the American farmer. My section of the country is a great grain and stock raising territory. In my State alone in an ordinary year we raise upward of 150,000,000 bushels of wheat. Men who make the most and the easiest profits out of that wheat do not live in the State at all and do not bend their backs or callous their hands to produce from mother earth a bushel of this wheat. They live in the so-called commercial centers—in St. Paul, Minneapolis, Chicago, and New York. Through present defection and bad economic and trade systems these men prey upon and rob, on the one hand, the producer of our wheat, and, on the other hand, the consumer of flour and other wheat products. Hundreds of men who have never done a lick of work to raise a bushel of wheat, by the mere process of speculating on the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis and on the Board of Trade of Chicago, make more profits out of our wheat crop than do the farmers of North Dakota. They live far better, and they have more of the pleasures and luxuries of life than do our farmers, who toil early and late to produce this wheat. This condition is not right, and it should not under our Government and laws be permitted to continue.

I believe that in this bill there should be added a provision that will do away with the speculation that is being carried on throughout the country in grain and in food products, and I propose to offer such amendment when the bill is considered for amendments. I firmly believe that no man or set of men should be allowed to make an easy and luxurious living by price juggling, price gambling, and speculation in products that have been produced by the frugal, hard-working farmers, farm laborers, farmers' wives, and farmer boys and girls of this Nation.

Another thing that I believe should be provided for in this bill and in this connection is storage plants, where grains and other food products can be stored for future sale and consumption, and the farmers paid a reasonable price for these products—a price that will give them reasonable compensation for their hours of hard labor and a fair percentage of profit on the money they have invested in their farm lands and in their farm machinery and farm equipments.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORTON. I have but a moment.

Mr. BORLAND. For a brief question?

Mr. NORTON. No; I have not the time.

Mr. BORLAND. I just wanted to ask the gentleman if he had read the bill H. R. 2145, which provides for all the things the gentleman has suggested?

Mr. NORTON. If it provides for that, I shall certainly be very much in favor of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. One moment. It is true that the bill provides for that, but it provides for no appropriation and provides for no penalty. It simply makes it unlawful.

Mr. NORTON. It is high time that Congress does something real and practical to put an end for all time to gambling and price speculation in grains and other food products.

Mr. LEVER. That is the reason why the gentleman objects to this bill?

Mr. HAUGEN. This is different. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for eight minutes.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of any proposition calculated in a sensible way to increase and conserve the food supply of the Nation. I am likewise in favor of any proposition that will curb the avarice of men who are now increasing the prices of the necessaries of life, and I hope we may have some concrete bill that will attempt to accomplish these results. I do not believe this bill will accomplish either of these results.

I am glad, for one, that the Department of Agriculture is at last determining what it should do. Its real function does not seem to be real clear to those in charge of this department. Eighteen months after the outbreak of the European war, when the question of the food supply of the Nation was one of the greatest questions before not only the people of America but the people of the world, the Department of Agriculture, through the head of its Bureau of Farm Management, testifying before the House Committee on Agriculture in February, 1916, said that the problem of the department was not one of underproduction; that the Department of Agriculture had made mistakes in trying to get men to raise 100 bushels of corn where 50 grew before, and that the Department of Agriculture had been guilty of attempting to stimulate production, but that the real problem was to see to it that the farmer received an increase in price for his product. Then under that plan we were appropriating millions to decrease production in order to increase the price. Now, after about a year, that policy is cast aside and a new policy is inaugurated, and the problem now is to appropriate $18,000,000 out of an empty Treasury—to do what? To stimulate production where, less than a year ago, there was overproduction. Yes; it is estimated that it will take 7,000 men—this bill will create 7,000 jobs; 7,000 men will be exempted from military service; 7,000 men paid by the Government not to help production but to hinder and delay production.

You are a farmer going to town with a load of wheat or a load of cotton, and you meet one of these boys from the town who is going out to find out how much cotton or wheat you have. You are 6 miles from town, and he says, "Go back to the farm with me and show me your books, or you will go to jail."

If you will turn over the 7,000 men herein provided for to help do the work so much needed on the farm, you will stimulate more production than you will by appropriating this large sum of money. Seven thousand inquisitors will be able to keep on an average 7,000 farmers from doing their work, and what will be the net result? It is a grave question if it will increase production at all; the question is not alone one for the Department of Agriculture to determine.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] secured the adoption of an amendment to the sundry civil bill giving the Federal Trade Commission $250,000 and the power to investigate the question of foods. How many departments are to handle this investigation? It is proposed to make a survey under this bill. When will that survey be taken? Why, it will be taken within a few months. It will be of the food supplies then existing. How much of that food will be in existence in 6 months or 12 months from then; how much will be added to that food supply by this year's crop? What value will that kind of a survey be to the people of the United States? Of what value will it be when completed?

There seems to be a lack of coordination between the executive departments of the Government to increase production. The Department of the Interior is sending out notices to the press asking men to take up and cultivate the unused public lands of the United States. A constituent of mine, a public-spirited man, wrote in and wanted to take up some of the advertised public lands, and all I could get from the Department of the Interior was a bulletin issued on a subject that referred him to semi-arid lands. No greater crime can be committed than to send the farmers who can produce to cultivating these arid lands that produce nothing.

So far as prices are concerned, the question in most cases could be solved if we would enforce the laws that we now have. But we are not enforcing the laws already on the statute books. In 1910, according to the reports of the Attorney General, we commenced eight civil suits to enforce the Sherman antitrust law. In 1916, after the Clayton bill was on the statute books, intended to strengthen that law and to place more people and corporations amenable to its violations, you commenced but one. But that is not all. In 1910 we commenced 66 criminal suits to enforce the criminal provisions of the Sherman antitrust law. How many do you think you commenced last year? Only one.

Mr. HOWARD. And that is not finished yet.

Mr. GOOD. No. It will likely be dismissed. In 1910 we secured 35 convictions under the criminal provisions of the Sherman antitrust law. [Applause.] How many did you get last year? Only two.

There never was a time in our entire history when there was greater need for law enforcement.

Mr. Chairman, I have a letter here, just received to-day, stating that the manufacturers of my State are compelled to pay $3.50 for steam coal, and the concern that has cornered the market on all the steam coal in that section buys it at a price ranging from 85 cents to $1 per ton.

Corn, for example, sold in Iowa 90 days ago for 90 cents a bushel. To-day it is largely in the elevators, and the price is $1.50 a bushel. There is no attempt to-day by the Department of Justice to enforce the law against such unlawful acts, no attempt to make arrests and to get a conviction. It is an easy thing to pass these laws. It is an easy thing, apparently, to make these large appropriations. A few days ago we passed a law conscripting the boy from the farm, to send him to the Army, to the trenches maybe. To-morrow, I understand, there is to be reported a bill that will lay a tax on practically every farmer to help support that boy in the trenches. And now you are taking out of the Treasury $18,500,000 to provide 7,000 jobs to hamper the farmers of the United States, and it will greatly hamper them. The point I am trying to make is this, that this bill will not add one bushel of corn or wheat to the world's supply, but it is only going to provide 7,000 useless jobs, and to exempt 7,000 men from military service. It will subject the farmers to inquisitorial powers of the Government, and these powers will necessarily in many instances be invoked by men without farm experience or knowledge of agriculture.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Has the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] used all his time?

The CHAIRMAN. He has used all his time.

Mr. LEVER. I yield the remainder of my time, six minutes, to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I understood my friend from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] awhile ago to say that there were plenty of laws on the statute books now to stop food monopoly if they were enforced. Yet, if I am not very much mistaken, he has recently introduced a bill to provide for the fixing of prices on pretty nearly every necessity of life. If the gentleman really thought that there were enough laws on the statute books, he would not be here introducing that bill.

But the great difficulty with my friend from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is that he makes these spirited attacks upon everything that is proposed in this House and usually winds up by voting for a Democratic measure in the interest of the American farmer. [Applause.] I think he will wind up in this case in the same way. Apparently he misses the real purpose of this bill.

Mr. GOOD. No; the real purpose of it is to provide 7,000 jobs. I did not miss the purpose of it at all.

Mr. BORLAND. I heard the gentleman repeat that several times. The gentleman misses entirely the real purpose of this bill. The situation that confronts us to-day is—and will the gentleman be serious for a moment to look at it—that this country is to be the food market of the world for the next three years. Every pound of food in this country to-day, or that can be produced in this country for the next three years, is going to count in the great war for the victory of democracy. The very purpose of this bill is to see how much of such ammunition we have on hand at this time. Whether we have an opportunity now to increase the food supply for the current season or not is more than doubtful. I know nothing about the part of the bill which provides for the purchase and distribution of seeds, but I do know that it is absolutely essential at this time to take a complete and accurate account of the stock on hand in the way of food. If there is any one message that has been brought to us by those distinguished men who have come to us from the men who are fighting the same battle that we are fighting, it is that the visible supply of food now in the world must be mobilized and its resources determined in order to win the present war. The only fear I have for the American farmer is that when conditions come back to normal again he may not be able to adjust himself from the enormous demands existing at the present date.

You will find that this bill will be followed by a measure practically to marshal all of the food supplies of the United States. One of the greatest features of this bill is the one criticized by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], and from a purely technical standpoint criticized very ably, and that is the part of the bill which gives inquisitorial powers to go into the grain elevators and packing houses and cold-storage plants and find out where the food is being stored to-day. I undertake to say that a very liberal number of those places are in the district which I represent.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Can not that be as successfully done under the power of subpœna as by allowing anybody to go into everybody's place of business and handle their papers?

Mr. BORLAND. It is not a question of handling papers. It is a question of inspecting a list of the actual products on hand in those establishments. I want to say that I think a liberal number of those establishments are in the district which I represent, and yet the men who own and operate those establishments are no more entitled to the consideration of this House or of the Government than are the great army of wageworkers in this country who must produce the other necessities of life, and must live from this food supply while they are doing it.

Every wage earner in this country is interested, as every farmer is interested, aye, and more than the farmer is interested, in seeing that every bit of food is available for the great industrial population of the country. This is not purely a farmer's bill. It is a bill affecting the great industrial enterprises of the country, the factories that produce the munitions of war, the support of the Army, the support of the Navy, the support of the merchant marine on the seas, and the war vessels. All of it depends on the first line of defense, the American farmer, who is, in the feeding of this vast army, engaged in winning this war.

We shall this year have to impound and marshal all the food we have. It has been a short year. The State of Kansas, the banner wheat State in the Union, is 50,000,000 bushels short in the crop this year. I have heard my friend from South Dakota say that they raised 150,000,000 bushels of wheat in his State. I have heard no such statistics, and they did not raise it this year. We are short four or five million bushels of wheat in the country. All that we have on hand must be marshaled not only for the use of this Nation but for the use of the two great nations, France and England, with whom we are fighting side by side. Next year we must have a banner crop in this country, so that there will be no shortage of food to win the great war for democracy. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the first paragraph of the bill.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMLIN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4188, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill, H. R. 4188, may be made the unfinished business at the completion of the revenue bill, not to interfere with conference reports.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that House bill 4188 may be made the unfinished business after the revenue bill is disposed of, not to interfere with conference reports. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Reserving the right to object, I have a little bill reported here from the Committee on Mines and Mining, and I would like to ask, if no one has any objection, that it might be given a privileged status.

Mr. MANN. Not to-night. This request will not interfere with the gentleman in any way.

Mr. FOSTER No; it was only to get it ready to call up that I make the request.

Mr. MANN. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Mr. FOSTER. This bill seems to be important. It is really no use for us to save grain in an elevator which might be blown up by some mischievous man who chooses to do a thing of that kind. I would like very much, if I could, to have it understood that it may be given a privileged status when it does not interfere with matters of greater importance.

Mr. MANN. I think we ought not to make that arrangement now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 3932 may have a privileged status.

Mr. MANN. For the present I will object.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing certain correspondence.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEVER. In submitting my request for unanimous consent I assumed that the revenue bill would come up, although I had no information about it. Assuming that it does not come up to-morrow, under my request would the bill be unfinished business to-morrow?

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. LEVER. I do not think it would in the way I have put the proposition.

Mr. MANN. We will find out to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire if the revenue bill has been reported.

Mr. MANN. It has; and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] said that he would call it up to-morrow.

RIVERS AND HARBORS BILL (H. REPT. NO. 46).

Mr. SMALL, chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, by direction of that committee, reported a bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of said public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, which, with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. MANN reserved all points of order.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that any members of the committee who desire to do so may have the right to file minority views within three days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that members of the Rivers and Harbors Committee may have three days in which to file minority views. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 13. An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution and bill of the following title:

S. J. Res. 42. Joint resolution authorizing the President to take over for the United States the possession and title of any vessel within its jurisdiction which at the time of coming therein was owned in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen, or subject of any nation with which the United States may be at war, or was under register of any such nation, and for other purposes.

S. 1845. An act to authorize PETER GOELET GERRY to enter into a contract with the Secretary of the Navy, in behalf of the United States, for the use of the steam yacht Owera.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I submit for printing under the rules the conference report on the bill (H. R. 14) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 47).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, having met, after full and further free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, and 4, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 6 of the bill strike out all on line 18 and in lieu thereof insert the following: "38 privates, first class, and 38 privates, $15,080"; and Senate agree to the same.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on:

The House receded from its disagreement to Senate amendment No. 1, providing extra pay for 19 enlisted men instead of for 13, as provided in the House bill. Although without authority, as the matter was not in conference, the conferees took the liberty of striking out the words "76 privates at $15 each per month, $13,680," and substituting therefor "38 privates, first class, and 38 privates, $15,080." This change was made upon the recommendation of the Engineer Department, which stated that the language originally used would tend to disrupt the present organization.

The House receded from amendments 2 and 3, authorizing the President to appoint William Harold Kehoe and Clyde R. Altman, late cadets at the Military Academy at West Point, to the position of second lieutenant of Infantry and to place them on the retired list with the pay of a retired second lieutenant.

REPORT OF THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION ON PERE MARQUETTE AND CINCINNATI, HAMILTON & DAYTON RAILROADS (H. DOC. NO. 137).

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the printing as a House document, to be distributed through the folding room, of 4,000 copies of the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission on their investigation of the financial history of the Pere Marquette Railroad and the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Railroad.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to have printed as a public document 4,000 more copies of the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission upon the Pere Marquette and the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Railroads.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman's request is to print the document as a House document and that 4,000 additional copies be printed to be distributed through the folding room.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think it is 4,000 copies.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to have it printed as a House document, 4,000 copies to be distributed through the folding room.

Mr. MANN. The law provides how House documents are printed.

Mr. CRAMTON. My desire is not to exceed the $500 limit. I would say, in this connection, that a resolution to similar effect has been pending before the Committee on Printing, and I have had several consultations with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART], who, owing to the absence of at least one member of his committee from the city, has not been able to get his committee together. I am taking this action this afternoon, however, with his consent and approval.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the special use for printing these reports?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, an investigation was made of the Pere Marquette upon the request of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in 1914, as the result of a resolution introduced in the House by me.

Mr. FOSTER. That is true, but what is the use of having so many copies printed of this report now?

Mr. CRAMTON. Simply because it has cost the Government a large amount of money to make the investigation and it is the most thorough financial investigation ever made of any railroad company in the country.

Mr. FOSTER. It has been printed.

Mr. CRAMTON. In a limited quantity by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I have had a large number of calls for it, and I am not able to supply them, and I think various Members, especially those from Michigan and Ohio, will have calls for them. The conclusions of the commission are of the utmost importance in connection with the present problems affecting transportation matters in this country.

Mr. MANN. I would like to make this suggestion to the gentleman. This document when printed will be in demand mostly in Michigan, or in Michigan and Ohio. Members from the South, and probably from farther West, will never use any of the documents in the folding room. Why does not the gentleman endeavor to get copies printed so that they may be distributed to those who want them and have them distributed through the document room?

Mr. CRAMTON. It would be agreeable to me to have them go to the document room.

Mr. MANN. That is where they ought to go.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not know about that.

Mr. CRAMTON. But in the event they go to the folding room I shall not hesitate to ask those Members who are not interested in the matter to assign their copies to me.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman, in justification of having this printed, said that it is a document of importance in its bearing on the general situation, and if that is true, I do not see why it belongs only to the States of Ohio and Michigan.

Mr. MANN. That is where the demand will mostly come from.

Mr. SHERWOOD. How voluminous is the document?

Mr. CRAMTON. It is a pamphlet of about 260 pages. It is now in type and made up, and I have taken the precaution to ask them to hold it so that there will not be any expense for typesetting and making up, and this request will come under the $500 limit.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned to meet at 11 a. m. to-morrow, Thursday, May 10, 1917.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 10, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, God of Nations, God of hosts, we are lifting our hearts to Thee at the beginning of this day's work that we may get the Divine point of view and be found to be in harmony with the Divine plan. We can only measure these great problems of human life under the limitations of the powers that Thou hast committed to us. We can not see far the sequence of history. We can not solve that great problem which lies just ahead of us. O God, give us that inestimable gift of Thy Holy Spirit which added to our human powers will guide and direct our steps after the order of the Divine counsel. Help us to work out the problems of state according to the Divine program. For Christ's sake. Amen.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1006) authorizing the county of Morrison, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in said county.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1007) authorizing the city of Bemidji, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near that place, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House disagrees to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3673) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the acts of August 4, 1914, August 15, 1914, March 3, 1915, and September 7, 1916, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GLASS, Mr. PHELAN, and Mr. PLATT managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 328. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," as amended, in respect to car service, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 2343. An act granting consent to Ernest B. Denison, A. J. Barchfield, and Ethan I. Dodds to construct a bridge across the Wabash River within or near the city limits of the city of Vincennes, Ind.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 1845. An act to authorize PETER GOELET GERRY to enter into a contract with the Secretary of the Navy, in behalf of the United States, for the use of the steam yacht Owera;

H. R. 13. An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes; and

S. J. Res. 42. Joint resolution authorizing the President to take over for the United States the possession and title of any vessel within its jurisdiction, which at the time of coming therein was owned in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen, or subject of any nation with which the United States may be at war, or was under register of any such nation, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, which will be incorporated in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

The concurrent resolution is as follows:

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Honolulu, Hawaii, April 28, 1917.

Honorable PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, at the request of the Ninth Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, house concurrent resolution No. 31.

Very respectfully, LUCIUS E. PINKHAM,
Governor of Hawaii.

(Inclosure.)

Concurrent resolution.

Whereas it is the sense of the House of Representatives of the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii that section 421 of the Revised Laws of Hawaii, 1915, wherein, among other things, it is provided that the yearly rental for homestead held under right-of-purchase lease shall be at the rate of 8 per cent of the appraised value thereof, should be amended so that such yearly rental shall be reduced to the rate of 6 per cent; and

Whereas said section 421 of the Revised Laws of Hawaii, 1915, can only be amended by the Congress of the United States, inasmuch as the same was made a part of the organic act by reference: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, respectfully requested and petitioned to amend said section 421 of the Revised Laws of Hawaii, 1915, so that the yearly rental for homestead held under right-of-purchase lease shall be at the rate of 6 per cent of the appraised value of such homestead, instead of at the rate of 8 per cent; and be it further

Resolved, That the governor of the Territory of Hawaii be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Interior of the United States, the President of the Senate of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Unied States, and the Delegate to Congress from Hawaii.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Hawaii, April 23, 1917.

We hereby certify that the foregoing resolution was adopted in the House of Representatives of the Territory of Hawaii on April 23, 1917.

H. L. HOLSTEIN,
Speaker House of Representatives.
EDWARD WOODWARD,
Clerk House of Representatives.

THE SENATE OF THE TERRITORY OF HAWAII,
Honolulu, Hawaii, April 25, 1917.

We hereby certify that the foregoing resolution was adopted in the Senate of the Territory of Hawaii on April 25, 1917.

CHAS. T. CHILLINGWORTH,
President of the Senate.
O. P. SOARES,
Clerk of the Senate.

Mr. McLEAN. I present a memorial signed by Henry W. Farnum, professor of economics, and others of the faculty of Yale University, which contains many valuable suggestions relating to the pending revenue measure. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORIAL OF AMERICAN ECONOMISTS TO CONGRESS REGARDING WAR FINANCE.

We, the undersigned, teachers of political economy, public finance, and political science in American universities and colleges, respectfully urge upon Congress to adopt the policy of taxation rather than that of bond issues as the principal means of financing the expenditures of our own country in the war on which it has embarked.

The taxation policy is practicable. It will prevent the price inflation which must result from large bond issues. It is demanded by social justice. It will increase the efficiency of the Nation in the conduct of the war.

The argument in support of these statements is briefly as follows:

THE TAXATION PLAN IS PRACTICABLE.

The taxation policy is practicable, because the current income of the people in any case must pay the war expenditures. The choice between bond issues and taxation is merely a choice whether the Government shall take income with a promise to repay those who furnish it or take income without such promise. The actual arms, munitions, and other equipment and supplies for use in the war, except to the small extent that they have been stored up in the past, must be produced now, during the war itself, not after the war, and moreover must be produced by our own people. The policy of borrowing within the country itself does not shift any part of the Nation's burden of war expenditures from the present to the future. All it does is to make possible a different distribution of the burden among individuals and social classes, to permit repayment to certain persons who have contributed income during the war by other persons after the war. If the people can support the war at all, they can do it on a cash basis. Borrowing creates nothing. Except by borrowing abroad, which we can not do, we can get nothing which we do not ourselves produce.

It may be necessary for a month or two at the outset to issue a limited amount of bonds, pending the collection of increased taxes, but beyond these, which might well be made repayable within a year, no necessity for bonds exists.

TAXATION PREVENTS PRICE INFLATION.

The taxation policy and no other will enable the country to escape the enormous evils of further inflation. The present high level of prices in Europe and America is primarily due to the war bonds and the paper money issued abroad. If the United States joins on a huge scale in this policy of borrowing, prices are bound to become far higher still.

Price inflation is harmful even in times of peace. During a war it is disastrous. It increases the cost of conducting the war. It postpones victory and thus adds to the war's toll of lives as well as to its money expenditures. By every bond issue the Government enhances the prices it must pay, and thus creates the need of more bonds. The policy works against itself.

Moreover, inflation of prices works injustice between different classes of society. The burden rests chiefly upon wage earners and salary receivers, whose pay never rises as fast as prices, and upon those who receive fixed or contractual incomes. The hardship which millions of our people are already suffering from the increased cost of living will be made many fold greater if the Government issues billions of dollars of bonds to finance the war.

The manner in which bond issues inflate prices may be briefly explained. The bond policy increases the amount of bank credit, which is equivalent in effect to an increase in the currency.

For example, if the Government takes $1,000 from a man in taxes his credit or purchasing power is lessened to the same extent as the Government's is increased. On the other hand, if the Government borrows $1,000 from him the quantity of purchasing power in existence is greatly increased. He now has a bond worth $1,000 on which he can and very often will borrow at the bank. Say he borrows $800; to lend him $800 the bank does not have to give up 800 actual dollars. Instead it gives him a deposit account of $800, and inasmuch as most of those who present checks do not ask for actual cash, but have their checks credited to their deposit accounts, the bank can keep this $800 in checks floating by setting aside, say, only $200 of actual cash. In other words, this bond-issue transaction has resulted in increasing the Government's credit by $1,000, in decreasing the man's credit by only $200, and in decreasing the bank's money by only $200; that is, there has been a net increase of credit currency—checking-deposit accounts—of $600, in contrast with no net increase if taxes had been adopted instead of bonds.

If the man had given up his money in taxes he would have ceased to compete with the Government and other buyers of commodities and labor to the extent of $1,000, but when the Government gives him a bond for his payment he is still enabled to compete to the extent of $800. The purchasing power of society as a whole has increased by $600. This inevitably forces up prices.

The above illustrates the result of a bond issue that is taken by the public. As a matter of fact, if bonds are issued a large part of them will be taken by banks. It is likely that the Federal reserve banks will buy these bonds wholesale by giving the Government checking accounts to the extent of the bonds. This causes immediate inflation to the full amount of the checking accounts thus created; that is, inflation to 100 per cent instead of to 60 per cent of the bond issue, as outlined in the illustration above.

As the Government draws checks on these bank accounts to meet its requirements the banks will try to recoup themselves by retailing the bonds to the public. To the extent that they succeed the bonds get into the hands of the ultimate investor with the resulting inflation already described. In so far as the banks are successful in this distribution they are almost certain to issue bank notes on the basis of bonds left in their hands, and these notes will cause inflation even worse than that due to the checking accounts of the public based on bond collateral.

JUSTICE DEMANDS THE TAX POLICY.

The policy of taxation for war expenditures is demanded by justice. Apart from the injustice arising from price inflation, the policy of paying for the war by bond issues gives property a preference over life; it deals unjustly as between citizen and citizen. The question of taxation versus bonds is not merely one of economics; it is one of morals, of right against wrong.

This war is a great social enterprise. The American people have undertaken it as a people. The future welfare of the country as a whole is involved; the future welfare of every citizen is involved. It is the duty, therefore, of every citizen to share in war's burdens to his utmost. For some the duty is to fight; for others to furnish money. For all the duty is without limit of amount. The citizen who contributes even his entire income, beyond what is necessary to subsistence itself, does less than the citizen who contributes himself to the Nation.

The man who goes to the front can not be paid back the life or the limb he may lose. The man who stays at home should contribute his just share of the money cost without expectation of repayment. That the soldier or sailor who gives himself to his country should, if he be so fortunate as to return, be taxed to pay interest and repay principal to him who has contributed the lesser thing, money, is a crying injustice. If conscription of men is just and right, conscription of income is the more so; conscription of both is just and right when the Nation's life and honor are at stake.

TAXATION WILL INCREASE WAR EFFICIENCY.

The policy of taxation for war expenditures will increase the efficiency of the Nation in the war. Its effect in keeping down the cost of the war has already been pointed out. Its effect on the spirit of the people is still more important. The general recognition of the justice of requiring everyone, according to his ability, to share the burdens of war, will bind the people together; the sense of injustice in the policy of borrowing will tend to drive them apart, to array class against class. Our soldiers and sailors will fight loyally in any case, but their spirit will be the more indomitable if they feel that every man who stays at home is serving the country to the utmost with his substance. An America in which every citizen without discrimination, is called upon to do and to give all that he can, all that his powers permit, will be a united America, and a united America is bound to be victorious.

SUGGESTED FORMS OF TAXATION.

Without entering into details, concerning which opinions may differ, we recommend that, among the tax measures to be adopted for the war period, the following should be included:

(1) A tax which will take substantially all of the special war profits.

(2) A material lowering of the present income-tax exemption.

(3) A drastic increase in the rates of the income tax, with a sharper progression in rates as incomes become larger.

(4) High consumption taxes on luxuries.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have a resolution from the City Council of Seattle, Wash., urging legislation to guarantee producers of food products minimum prices for their products, and also legislation protecting the consumers from exploitation by middlemen and speculators. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUSTING. I present resolutions adopted at a patriotic mass meeting of citizens at Edgerton, Wis., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Edgerton, Wis., patriotic resolutions.

Whereas the Government of our country has entered into a titanic military struggle with a great world power which may demand the concerted outpourings of the Nation's best in treasure and men and the loyal cooperation of all its citizens to bring to victorious conclusion, making apparent to all of us the great necessity to conserve the food supply of the country and to enhance the production of the necessities of life and to economize in their use as we have never had to do in this land of plenty; and

Whereas we recognize the present war as primarily a death grapple between military despotism and free democratic governments, and believe that upon this country, the world's greatest exponent of freedom, equality, and humanity, logically rests an obligation not only to preserve her own honor and her own flag untarnished, but to champion the vital cause of popular liberty throughout the earth; and

Whereas we realize the indispensable necessity of maintaining one citizenship, one allegiance, and one flag, and will not tolerate disloyalty among the residents of our community, yet we desire to value at their true worth the many citizens of German birth who have gained our deepest regard by years of residence among us, and we express our belief that the great majority of these foreign-born Americans are true patriots and that they will contribute of their substance and their lives in the defense of a Nation as dear to them by adoption as it is to the majority of us by birth, even though in so doing they must make the added sacrifice which most of us can not measure or comprehend of pledging themselves to aid in making war on their own kinsmen: Therefore

Resolved by the residents of this community, That we individually pledge ourselves to the earnest endeavor to produce in gardens and on farms more of the necessities of life than ever before, and all that it is within our power to produce, and that we pledge ourselves to the elimination of waste in the food supply of the community; and

Resolved further, That we urge our young men to enlist in the service of their country and petition the governing bodies of the Nation to provide adequate means of support for the dependents of breadwinners absent from their homes in the country's cause.

Resolved further, That we pledge ourselves unhesitatingly and unreservedly to the support of the Government of the United States of America and to its President and its Congress, without regard to race or color or creed or political belief, and to uphold and maintain any measures or actions which they may see fit to enact to bring the war to a successful conclusion as speedily as possible, and pledge ourselves to uphold and further any plans or policies which they may inaugurate within the country to aid in this consummation and for the public weal.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Patriotic resolution, Montello, Wis.

Resolved, That we, the people of Marquette County, Wis., in patriotic meeting assembled, at Montello, Marquette County, on the 4th day of May, 1917, hereby pledge ourselves to furnish such aid and assistance to the Nation, State, and any other county organization or defense league as may hereafter be demanded:

First. By the encouragement of more efficient production of food products;

Second. By way of aid and assistance to the Red Cross organization;

Third. By way of encouragement of recruiting and enlistment in our Army and Navy; and

Fourth. By way of organization of the people of the entire county into a unit of service ready to respond with treasure and men to the needs and demands of our country; and be it further

Resolved, That we recognize the patriotic, intelligent, unselfish devotion and magnificent leadership of our President, the Hon. Woodrow Wilson; and be it further

Resolved, That we fully recognize and appreciate the able, efficient service of our worthy junior Senator in the patriotic stand that he has taken in upholding the hands of our worthy President, and the fearless, whole-hearted, and single devotion to our country and our country's needs; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be mailed to the Hon. Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, and the Hon. PAUL O. HUSTING, junior Senator from the State of Wisconsin.

Mr. SHIELDS. I present a resolution passed by the Centenary Methodist Episcopal Church South, at Chattanooga, Tenn., and also a resolution adopted at a mass meeting at Athens, Tenn., in regard to food products and national prohibition. I ask that the resolutions may be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., April 30, 1917.

Hon. JOHN K. SHIELDS and
Hon. K. D. MCKELLAR,
Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIRS: Yesterday Centenary Methodist Episcopal Church South, whose membership numbers 1,400, held a church conference at the 11 o'clock service, and the following resolution was adopted unanimously:

"Whereas the prime minister of Great Britain, Lloyd-George, stated recently that the United States of America had never gone to war save for the cause of liberty; this great statesman but uttered the truth of history when he paid our country this high tribute and honor;

"Whereas for human liberty throughout the world America has entered the world war, and this country of ours must feed the world as well as feed its own people;

"Whereas food products must be conserved; there must be an elimination of waste; and everything useful for food must be diverted into channels where it may be used for feeding the country;

"Whereas millions of bushels of corn, barley, and rice and millions of gallons of molasses are being used by distillers and brewers—it is stated that last year at least $150,000,000 of foodstuffs were used by distillers and brewers of intoxicating liquors; and

"Whereas in times like these, not to speak of the fact generally, the man who would convert grain into drink is untrue to his country; he would be taking food from the mouths of men, women, and children; emergency legislation should be passed to prohibit absolutely the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the President and the Congress are hereby earnestly petitioned to take such action as shall be necessary to prevent the use of grain or other foodstuffs by distillers or brewers; let our great country stand for bread and against liquor."

As the chairman and the secretary of the church conference, we were requested to forward to you a copy of the resolution, and we take pleasure in inclosing it.

Very respectfully, your obedient servants,

J. W. MOORE, Chairman.
E. L. SWICK, Secretary.

ATHENS, TENN., April 30, 1917.

In a patriotic mass meeting held here on Sunday afternoon, April 29, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the United States has been drawn into the great world conflict now being waged; and

"Whereas the shortage of food supplies has been ascertained by our Government; and

"Whereas speculators are taking advantage of the conditions and have raised the prices on the necessities of life and are now fixing the prices of future supplies so high as to place a real burden upon the wage earners and, in many instances, deprive them of the necessities of life: Therefore be it

"Resolved by the citizens of Athens, McMinn County, in a mass meeting—

"First. That we most earnestly request our Congressman, Hon. JOHN A. MOON, and our United States Senators from Tennessee, Hon. J. K. SHIELDS and Hon. K. D. MCKELLAR, to vote for and use their influence for the passage of a bill regulating immediately the prices of the necessities of life.

"Second. That we earnestly request their very best efforts for the passage of a bill prohibiting the distillation of all grains so much needed at the present time to supply our people with food and avoid the real suffering which must follow the diverting of more than 600,000,000 bushels of grain into worse than useless channels."

Mr. FRANCE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Dorchester County, Md., pledging support to the President and praying for governmental aid in conserving and making more efficient the supply of farm labor, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of the Head Camp of the Woodmen of the World of Virginia, Minn., pledging support to the President, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Minneapolis, Minn., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Federated Trade Assembly of Duluth, Minn., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit speculation in foodstuffs and the fixing of a maximum price on such goods, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. THOMPSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Kanopolis, Kans., praying for national prohibition as a war measure and for the protection of military camps from vice, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Piqua, Kans., praying for the prohibition of the consumption of food products in the manufacture of intoxicating liquor, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. WARREN presented a petition of Bighorn Lodge, No. 628, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, of Sheridan, Wyo., praying for certain changes in the income-tax laws, etc., to produce the revenue to pay the war expenses, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Council for National Defense of Goshen County, Wyo., praying for national prohibition as a war measure and for the enactment of legislation to protect the food supply, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WEEKS presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KNOX presented resolutions adopted by congregations of sundry churches in the State of Pennsylvania, and of sundry manufacturers of Warren, Pa., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LEAGUE OF THE CROSS CADETS.

Mr. PHELAN. I desire to have printed in the RECORD, if there is no objection, a communication from a military company of San Francisco, Cal., volunteering their services.

Mr. SMOOT. Did I understand the Senator to say that it is a communication from some one in San Francisco offering his services to the Government?

Mr. PHELAN. It is a communication addressed to me from the First Regiment, League of the Cross Cadets, an organization of young men of San Francisco, declaring their intention to offer their services to the Government. I think it is a manifestation of their patriotic purpose and as a compliment to it rather than as information to the Senate I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator said it was from an individual. We all get thousands of such letters and we always refer them to the Navy Department or the War Department.

Mr. PHELAN. I can understand the objection of the Senator, but this is an organization equipped, uniformed, and ready for service.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., May 3, 1917.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

First Regiment, League of the Cross Cadets, offers services to country as unit attached to regular service, subject to examination and acceptance. If permitted, could muster full regiment past and present officers and men. Many have already joined Regulars. Balance awaiting answer this wire.

WABASH RIVER BRIDGE, INDIANA.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Commerce. I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 2106) to authorize the county of Cass, in the State of Indiana, to construct a bridge across the Wabash River east of the city of Logansport, at a point known as Cedar or Rock Island in said Wabash River, and I submit a report (No. 34) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed by third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

AMENDMENT TO PENDING BILL.

Mr. ASHURST submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 291) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

THE NECESSITY FOR NATIONAL ORGANIZATION.

Mr. FRANCE. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask may be read at length, and I desire to make a few remarks as to the purpose of the measure after it has been read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 59) authorizing the President to enroll, according to age, status, and occupation, all male citizens, or male persons not alien enemies, between the ages of 18 and 45, inclusive, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to enroll, according to age, status, and occupation all male citizens, or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 18 and 45, inclusive; all such citizens or male persons to be liable for military or national service in such manner as may have been or may hereafter be provided by law: Provided, That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to enroll all such citizens or male persons in the following classes according to age: Those of the ages from 18 to 20, inclusive, to be enrolled and denominated the "cadet corps"; those from 21 to 27, inclusive, to be enrolled and denominated as the "first line of defense"; those from 28 to 35, inclusive, to be enrolled and denominated the "second line of defense"; and those from 36 to 45, inclusive, to be enrolled and denominated the "first reserve corps."

For carrying out the purposes of this resolution there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, available immediately and until expended, such sum as may in the judgment of the President be necessary.

Mr. FRANCE. Mr. President, I refrained from any discussion of the Military Establishment bill, S. 1871, and the amendment which I offered to that bill because I was most anxious to see that measure advanced with the utmost possible speed to its enactment into law, but I deem it to be my duty to trespass somewhat upon the time of the Senate in order that I may discuss the subject matter and the purpose of the amendment which upon a previous occasion I submitted to your deliberation and which, in a slightly modified form, I now offer as a joint resolution.

The Military Establishment bill which passed the Senate, while drawn in recognition of those principles which have been tested and approved by the experience of this war, falls far short, in my judgment, of extending the application of those principles to the large and complex necessities of the present grave emergency. To this subject I desire to address myself as simply and as briefly as I may.

Sir, I hope that I have had no delusions about this war. I know that I have not shared many of the delusions which have been so generally and popularly expressed. I believe that I did not underestimate the many dangers of the situation upon which we entered on the 4th day of April last. I cast my vote for war because through the unrelenting iron walls of most unfortunate circumstance there was no other door. It is needless now to discuss the cause or the purpose of this war. We are all agreed that it is not to be a war of aggrandizement. Empires may wage such wars, but so absolutely incompatible in their natures are war and democracy that this Republic can never be justified in seizing weapons in any cause less holy than that of her own preservation. This is a war of self-defense. That can be its only justification. When it is realized, as soon it will be, by all our people that this is such a war, then they will arise without coercion or compulsion to meet the great occasion.

To me this war was no holy war until we entered it; now it has become such. I shall not weary you with my philosophy of history, but I do not believe, Mr. President, that we have stumbled on to this day down the blind paths of chance. There are no accidents in history. There would be no propriety in my attempting any expression of my conception of America's place in history and of the full part which our Republic should play in this the supreme crisis of the world's affairs. I must say, however, that I do not subscribe to any of the doctrines of materialism. I do not regard the universe as a fortunate or unfortunate but wholly fortuitous aggregation of forces. I do not see in history a series of disconnected and unsignificant acts. On the contrary, I believe that beneath all the seeming incoherence and confusion, the clamor and the uproar, the clash of arms, the conflict of armies, the shouting and the tumult, the onslaught and the retreat, beneath all the vast ebb and flow of human events, a divine purposiveness moves resistlessly on to the achievement of great and ethical ends. History reveals an endless striving, a great becoming, an orderly evolution. As we read history we find nothing static; all is dynamic and progressive. I believe that the logical and necessary culmination of a great series of historic movements was the establishment upon the Western Hemisphere of this Republic and that the signing of the Declaration of Independence marked the climax of long ages of failing and yet fruitful experimentation in the science of government, and that this act was also the harbinger of the new epoch to come in the history of mankind. The fathers of our Republic believed this, and he indeed is blind who can not see the inspiration in their words and works. In those early hazardous and trying days the careful deliberation of their acts subjected them to many a charge of incapacity and cowardice, but theirs was but the caution which conscientious statesmen in this country must ever exercise when controlled by the realization that into their keeping has been placed the sacred trust, the priceless heritage of that new democracy which is to be preserved and perpetuated by themselves and their sons for all humanity, for all time.

We deemed it to be our duty to declare war, and by so doing we decreed to hazard perhaps all that this Republic signifies in the vast scheme of history. The safety of our institutions, the genius and the mission in the world of this great democracy are all the ultimate stake. The hour for the supreme testing of our institutions has come. I have but one anxiety and that is that our people shall now be brought to face the hard realities and see things as they are, for when they shall do this they will meet the pending crisis with all of their innate capacity and heroism. We voted for war and now we should prepare to wage war, calmly, with clear vision, with purposes defined, with system, with science, with exact information, with perfect organization, with all the accumulated might and power of this great Republic. Only in that direction now do peace and safety lie. It is not the time to be stampeded into haste and rashness. We must act with deliberation, with precision, in order that the established and proven principles of our constitutional government, in all their wonderful pliability and adaptability, may be, without violence, shaped and applied to the achievement of these new ends.

We have pledged all of our resources to this war in what we hold to be a just cause. It is now for us to liberate, organize, and effectively utilize all of our vast latent and potential energies, and dedicate them to this great undertaking. For modern war there is no precedent. Gen. Joffre is reported to have said "The knowledge of war which we had three years ago is of no present practical value," and this is true not only of purely military operations but of all the collateral industrial activities which are directed to the same end. War as it is now waged is the unnatural and monstrous offspring of a new science and of that marvelously increased capacity for social and national organization which has been developed by mankind, most notably since the close of the last Franco-Prussian War.

While it is extremely important to raise at once sufficient military and naval forces, I feel that we are in immediate danger of overlooking, in the consideration of our war measures, the one great outstanding fact which has been demonstrated by this war, and that fact is this: War is no longer merely a combat between the armed forces of the belligerent powers. It has become in a large and literal sense a conflict between the nations themselves, each nation struggling as a mighty unit. The necessities of war on so huge a scale, for terrene, for munitions, for tonnage of ammunition and ordnance, for supplies, for food, for men, are so seemingly unlimited and so absolutely imperative that every form of national energy, resource, and reserve must be drawn upon and utilized to the very uttermost. War has become a grim, prolonged, supreme death grapple between national organizations themselves, organizations which have been so developed in some instances that all of the national strength and weight is made available for use with the greatest possible effectiveness.

War has passed from the physical into the mental stage, from the individual into the social, for science has supplanted physical strength, and the valor of troops at the front is all in vain unless supplemented and supported by an unwearying, unfailing cooperation between the civilian citizens of the nation, all of whom must be animated by a like high patriotic purpose and imbued with the same spirit of service and sacrifice.

This war can not be scientifically conducted, nor can we hope to bring it to a successful termination unless we quickly lay the broad foundations upon which we are to construct our complete national organization. So now as we have provided for a Military Establishment we must prepare to place back of it, to supply and support it, a unified and efficient Nation.

Germany by national organization has secured among her citizens a unification of purpose, a cooperation of effort, a social solidarity and efficiency which has enabled her to set up a new standard of national preparedness, a standard which we can emulate and approximate without, if we act with wisdom, any sacrifice of the cherished principles of our democracy. Social organization is not incompatible with democracy. On the contrary, true democracy is perfect social cooperation. I believe it to be one of the chief missions of America to demonstrate, now and for the future, to the world that efficiency, liberty, and social justice can all be successfully blended in the fabric of that finer democracy which is our ideal and aim. This war will not have been altogether in vain if in its fires our Nation can be purified of the dross of inefficiency and wastage, and if we can be welded into a better and stronger social and national unity. We have heard during recent weeks much vague and indefinite discussion upon the subject of agricultural, social, and industrial preparedness. Mobilization and organization are words upon every lip. In that inspiring address of President Wilson to his fellow countrymen, on April 16, he eloquently calls attention to the need of cooperation, summing up his stirring appeal in the often-quoted words "We must all speak, act, and serve together."

But, Senators, words, appeals, a common desire to serve are not enough. One hundred million people can not act together unless organized for harmony of action. We must, if we would efficiently cooperate, have the machinery which will make possible efficient cooperation. The task of supplying this machinery is a large but not a very difficult one. The first step toward securing it is a universal enrollment for State and National service of all of our men between the ages of 18 to 45 years, by name, age, status, and occupation. I need not try to prove to you, Senators, familiar as you are with the principles of organization that it is impossible to form an organization before you know who are to be the component parts. We invoke no new principle in organizing our Nation. Industrial, social, fraternal, political, and national organizations all follow the same lines. The plan which I am urging is not theoretical. It has been proven in Europe to be preeminently practical and useful. This complete enrollment for national service could take place at the same time as the partial registration for the selective draft and without any resulting delay to it.

The designations which I have suggested in the joint resolution which has been read—I shall be very glad to have it modified in any way. I know the principle of it is absolutely sound, and that it is a principle which must be adopted before this war is over. I only hope that it may not be adopted too late—to repeat, the designations which I have suggested for the various classes into which those to be enrolled are to be divided indicate but slightly how the classes might be employed. Members of the "cadet corps," made up of those from 18 to 20, would be subject, under a system of universal training which we shall probably enact into law in the near future, to a certain number of hours of military drill and such broader training as might be later considered collateral thereto. From the "first line of defense" the selective draft would be made, while those not drafted from this class—those of the "second line of defense" and those of the "reserve corps"—would be registered chiefly for organization purposes, although some military drill might be voluntarily undertaken.

The Military Establishment bill as passed is, in my opinion, defective, because it makes liable for military service only those between the ages of 21 and 27, and the wording of the section is equivalent to giving notice that those younger or older are not to be considered even liable to be called to serve their country in any capacity at this the most critical time in our history.

I desire to illustrate, as briefly as I may, how such a general enrollment could be made of the utmost practical value. It is important to keep in mind that the enrollment which I propose is to be made with a classification according to occupation. The paramount problem of this war is beyond question the maintenance of the food supply of the world and particularly that of the allied nations. I agree with the Senators who have said that this is no time for hysteria, but I desire to say that it is much less a time for such complacency and self-deception as may prove fatal. There is, to be sure, room for some difference of opinion upon the present food situation, but a somewhat casual investigation, begun last February, has convinced me that the food situation in the allied countries and in our own is, to say the least, most disturbing. Two factors will determine the outcome of this war—food supply and national organization. A victory in this war will be secured by those nations which create the best national organizations and which most successfully solve the vital problem of the food supply. We should be warned by this time, Senators, that superior numbers and greater potential national resources will not be sufficient to enable us to overcome our enemies. I desire to say that with all the emphasis of which I am capable; I say it as one who knows the organization of the German Empire from having lived therein.

The superior numbers must be organized and all of the latent natural and national resources must be actually employed. Up until the present time Germany has demonstrated, without doubt, that she has the most efficient military and national organization of all of the belligerents, and there are clear indications that she may, if she has not already done so, solve her food problems more satisfactorily than the allied powers, including ourselves, can solve ours.

It is a most common error to assume that the food problem in this country is fundamentally a problem of distribution. It is very easy when the cost of food unreasonably increases to charge it to the system of distribution, and to then enact legislation which will make possible the criminal prosecution of conspicuous figures who are engaged in some of the many departments which have to do with food distribution. The food-supply problem, made so acute by this war, is not a new problem. It is as old as the history of government.

The Senator from Mississippi, Senator WILLIAMS, in discussing this subject the other day very aptly said:

> It is the bent of all civilized countries as they become more and more civilized to become more and more industrial and less and less agricultural.

This is true. The senior Senator from Mississippi might have added, what I believe he would have added, in a fuller discussion of this question, that the decline of agriculture in any country is the first certain symptom of a beginning of national decadence. This was true of Rome, and it will always be true. Washington said:

> It will not be doubted that, with reference either to individual or national welfare, agriculture is of primary importance. In proportion as nations advance in population and other circumstances of maturity this truth becomes more apparent and renders the cultivation of the soil more and more an object of public patronage.

A prominent statesman and economist has said that "wars are not won with powder and shot but with wheat."

It would not be an exaggeration to say that the present prowess of Germany which has astounded the world can, in a sense, be attributed to the fact that Bismarck was a farmer. If it had not been for the agrarian policy inaugurated and fostered by him, a policy which in spite of her enormous industrial development has maintained Germany's status as one of the great agricultural countries of the world, the central powers would have been starved and crushed in the first eight months of the war. True statesmanship must ever look to the far future, and Bismarck said, early in his career:

> Whenever I have come forward on behalf of landed property it has not been in the interest of the proprietors of my own class but because I see in the decline of agriculture one of the greatest dangers to our permanence as a State.

The rising cost of food in this country during recent years is no mystery, for it is due to causes which are only too evident to anyone who will give this subject even a superficial study. The decline of agriculture in this country during recent years has reached most alarming proportions. I am speaking of conditions which prevailed before the war and which, in certain respects, have been aggravated by it. Since 1870 there has been a marked decrease in the relative number of those engaged in tilling our soils. The natural deterioration of soils, the increase in farm wages, the mounting cost of all of the raw materials and machinery which the farmer must buy, besides many other factors, have caused a steady shrinkage in agricultural profits and a consequent continuous relative decline in agricultural production.

As the senior Senator from Mississippi said—

> For the last 30 or 40 years the powers of the world have been engaged in legislation the end of which was to hothouse out of agriculture into manufacturing the labor and consumers.

I can not go further into this great subject, and it must be enough to say that we enter into this war with the smallest food reserve in the history of the country and absolutely unprepared in that most important phase of preparedness, our agricultural activities.

I do not wish to exaggerate, but it would be criminal negligence in me, with the opinions which I hold, to underestimate the gravity of the situation.

There is a very serious shortage in the food supply of this country, such as can only be relieved by the production, during this season, of extraordinary crops, and while there has been an almost unlimited amount of agitation and discussion of the means by which such extraordinary production might be secured, no practical and systematic methods have been adopted. Precious time has been wasted, and all possibility of securing even an average crop of wheat has been lost. To anyone who will examine the figures it will be apparent that only by supreme efforts, and by unusual good fortune, can we prevent actual famine, with all its grizzly train of evils, from raising its hideous head over other lands and over our own. It would seem that the only means for preventing such a famine—and I use the word advisedly—as the world has never known is the planting in this country of an unprecedented acreage in corn, since corn must be, beyond a doubt, the chief grain food of ourselves and our allies between now and the next harvest. Since the subject of the next probable crop of wheat has been discussed in the Senate, and as the figures bearing upon the present and future wheat supply afford a very good illustration of the necessity for an immediate plan of action, I shall submit very briefly some figures for your consideration.

The winter-wheat crop for 1916 was 481,744,000 bushels. The spring-wheat crop for 1916 was 158,142,000 bushels. The total wheat crop for 1916 was 639,886,000 bushels.

The average condition of winter wheat on April 1, 1917, was 63.4 per cent as against 78.3 per cent of normal on April 1, 1916, and as against 86.2 per cent, the average condition for the past 10 years on April 1. Based upon this and other considerations, the Bureau of Crop Estimates predicts a winter-wheat crop this year of 430,000,000 bushels. The Bureau of Crop Estimates, in its report of May 1, predicts a crop of winter wheat for this year of only 366,116,000 bushels, or 63,884,000 bushels less than the report April 1.

On the basis of the crop report of the 1st of May, the following are the indications for the total crop of 1917: If the spring-wheat crop is the same as the spring-wheat crop of 1916—158,142,000 bushels—we would have for the year 1917 a total wheat crop of 524,258,000 bushels. If the spring-wheat crop is equal to the five-year average for the spring-wheat crop—

233,571,000 bushels—we would have a total wheat crop of 599,687,000 bushels. Even if the spring-wheat crop this year should equal the phenomenal spring-wheat crop of 1915—351,854,000 bushels—we would have a total wheat crop of but 717,970,000 bushels. Based on the April estimate, if the spring-wheat crop is the same as the spring-wheat crop of last year we shall have for the year of 1917 a total crop of only 588,142,000 bushels. If we should be fortunate enough to secure a spring-wheat crop equal to the average yield for the past five years—233,571,000 bushels—we would have a total crop of 663,571,000 bushels. This is more than we have any reason to expect, as there seems to be no indication of any substantial increase of spring-wheat acreage.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to call his attention to the fact that the spring-wheat crop was two-thirds a failure last year, 1916?

Mr. FRANCE. I will answer that. I was just coming to that point.

If we assume the very best possible production of spring wheat, under ordinary conditions—a crop equal to the bumper crop of 1915, which was 351,854,000 bushels—we would then have a total crop of only 781,854,000 bushels. Such a crop as this is totally inadequate to meet the present situation. Assuming that we have a spring-wheat crop equal only to last year's, there will not be enough wheat in this country for our own needs, since we require between 600,000,000 and 650,000,000 bushels for all purposes, including seed. With the spring-wheat crop this year equal to the five-year average we would have only about 63,571,000 bushels for export. If we have a record-breaking spring-wheat crop, equal to that of 1915, which would give us a total crop of 781,854,000 bushels, we would have probably not much more than 131,854,000 bushels for export.

It is, of course, very difficult for you to comprehend these figures unless you have them before you. Perhaps all of you are familiar with them. I will say, however, that these figures are of absolutely vital importance as we consider our more active entrance upon this war.

In all human probability the amount of wheat available for export out of this year's crop will be somewhat less than 70,000,000 bushels and not more than 100,000,000 bushels, while our exports from the 1914 crop were 332,460,000 bushels, and from the 1915 crop they were 243,097,000 bushels. Thus it will be seen that we are in no position to take care of the probable needs of England and France, as far as wheat is concerned.

The total wheat crop for 1916 was 639,886,000 bushels, of which we have exported, up to February, 1917, 135,491,000 bushels, leaving a balance for the year for all purposes of 504,395,000 bushels. It is to be assumed that for the balance of the year the allies will require at least 90,000,000 bushels more of wheat, which would further reduce the total for the year for home consumption and for seed to the figure of 414,395,000 bushels, or approximately 200,000,000 bushels less than our actual requirements. This would indicate that there will be a very serious shortage of wheat before the next crop is available, and only by drawing upon reserves, which are not visible and which can not be computed, will we have enough wheat to carry us until that time. The statement made some months ago by an eminent authority on wheat that the masses of the people would be living upon corn bread before the next crop of wheat was ready for grinding was entirely justified by the available figures, although there may be some invisible reserves which will carry us over.

The necessity for a systematic and scientific campaign to insure an enormous corn crop, if a most serious shortage of grain food is to be avoided next year, must be obvious. The crisis can not be met by the small-garden movement, which, while in itself commendable, may obscure the imperative necessity for systematic national effort.

In the face of such a lack of foodstuffs we must remember that less than one-third of our tillable land is ordinarily tilled, the remainder not being put under cultivation because, chiefly, of the shortage of labor and the unprofitableness of farm operations upon the relatively less fertile farm lands of the first-settled portions of our country. While about two-thirds of our tillable land is idle because of the lack of men to till its acreage, it is quite probable—although we have no accurate figures available—that there are more than 2,000,000 absolutely idle men in this country.

Senators, I do not wish to unduly alarm the country, but we dare not close our eyes to the fact that because of the present food situation alone, without even considering the aggravation of that situation by submarine operations, the cause of the allies is in a most serious situation.

Sir, we can not hope to win this war against the perfect national organization of Germany with a national inefficiency which produces such an intolerable condition. I have said that there is no mystery in connection with the high cost of food. We all know that gold is but a barometer by which the abundance or scarcity of those articles indispensable for the preservation of life is indicated. It takes more gold to buy relatively less quantities of food because there is not and there has not been any sufficient general production of food in this country for several years, and this is because the production of food under usual conditions has become relatively unprofitable. Food speculators have taken advantage of the situation which a national inefficiency has created, these speculators being powerless to create any shortage themselves in the face of an abundant store.

To complete my illustration, a national enrollment by occupation would put in the hands of the Government the name and address of every farmer and every farm hand in the country, and it would be simple to devise quickly the machinery by which the Government could at once get into direct touch with our farmers for the giving and securing of suggestions and information. Within a very short time after the enrollment the most definite information could be secured with reference to the acreage which farmers contemplated seeding to corn. This whole work could be done so that vast tracts of land, particularly in the South, could be used for corn this year and for the raising of other food grains instead of for the production of other crops not so vitally necessary to the preservation of the Nation. This agricultural organization would, of course, of necessity be formed by counties and States. Every farmer and every farm laborer should be enrolled in the agricultural reserve corps. Awards of merit might be devised for those who, in this line of endeavor, rendered signal service. The general enrollment, would, moreover, give us accurate data with reference to the unemployed; and with this information, which would make possible long-needed extensions and improvements of our State and National employment bureaus, much could be accomplished without either the draft or coercion toward curing unfortunate conditions. A further consideration of the subject will enable you to suggest how the same methods could be applied in connection with other industries and to meet different kinds of agricultural and industrial emergencies.

I have already taken up too much time, and in closing I would repeat that it is my most profound conviction that this great national emergency can not be successfully met without efficient national organization, which organization can not proceed until we have a complete enrollment of the citizens of the Nation. It is a large task, but not a novel one, for the precedents for such an undertaking are both abundant and assuring.

I realize that my presentation of the subject has been most incomplete and fragmentary, because I have not been able to take sufficient time to prepare such more extended presentation as the importance of the subject deserves. With all the earnestness of which I am capable I plead for national organization, and urge the Senate to accept this measure, which provides for the first indispensable stage.

The problem of securing by constitutional means such effective organization as will make possible, now and in the future, the fuller realization in our national life of the American ideal and purposes of government is, of course, the one great problem for our country's statesmanship. I must not longer now discuss that question, for I would close with what I deem to be a most practical observation.

The central powers have hoped to triumph over much superior forces because of their more powerful and almost perfect organization. This Republic is devoted to the pursuits of peace. She has entered upon this war only to defend herself, to struggle and sacrifice for the prompt reestablishment of order in the world, and for the creation of conditions which will form the basis for an early and enduring peace. She is resolved to become no party to schemes of aggrandizement or world domination.

If, while declaring that we hold fast to our expressed ideals, we adopt a method of national organization the supreme value of which has been demonstrated by this war, the effect upon the immediate course of events must be profound. It will be "the handwriting on the wall" to Germany and to all the nations of the earth that it is vain for them to battle longer for ideals less exalted than our own. It will reveal to them that the great Republic beyond the Atlantic has not only the ideals and plans for world democracy but that she has the courage, the self-control, and the practical capacity to maintain those ideals, and to stand among the nations as the impartial and invincible champion of justice and of right. It will inform them in unmistakable terms that if the time shall come when she must stand alone, she is strong enough to stand for these great principles, unbowed by any storm of war. Let us announce our devotion to this cause by calling to the national service our 20,000,000 men. I know that when our men shall learn the meaning and the mission of that call, they will come forth a mighty host, with joy and courage radiant upon their faces. We must not forget that, in a sense, America must ever stand alone in her own peculiar responsibilities and in her own individual mission.

Every age has had its seer and leader among the nations. Democracy is the spirit of our time, and America must be the Nation to interpret it and to demonstrate it to the world. We must not be diverted from our course by cross currents swift and strong. We must steer on by this great star of our own destiny, and lead the other nations by its light.

Sir, we are embarked upon a great adventure. Let us as an organized, efficient Nation rise greatly to meet all of its grave perils and emergencies; and may we not fail to see and measure up to the possibilities and opportunities which I trust may soon come for such a service as no nation yet has rendered to mankind.

I must apologize for taking so much of the time of the Senate. I would not have done so if I had not felt that this was a matter of supreme importance which should be brought to your attention.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

THE COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.

Mr. SIMMONS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 59), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance or any subcommittee thereof be, and hereby is, authorized, during the Sixty-fifth Congress, to administer oaths; to employ a temporary clerk, at $4 per diem, and a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee or any subcommittee thereof may sit during the sessions or recess of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 328. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," as amended, in respect of car service, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

H. R. 2343. An act granting consent to Ernest B. Denison, A. J. Barchfield, and Ethan I. Dodds to construct a bridge across the Wabash River within or near the city limits of the city of Vincennes, Ind., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1007) authorizing the city of Bemidji, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near that place, which was, on page 1, line 6, to strike out the word "highway."

Mr. NELSON. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I submit the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). The conference report will be received and lie on the table.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That in view of the existing emergency, which demands the raising of troops in addition to those now available, the President be, and he is hereby, authorized—

"First. Immediately to raise, organize, officer, and equip all or such number of increments of the Regular Army provided by the national defense act approved June 3, 1916, or such parts thereof as he may deem necessary; to raise all organizations of the Regular Army, including those added by such increments, to the maximum enlisted strength authorized by law. Vacancies in the Regular Army created or caused by the addition of increments as herein authorized which can not be filled by promotion may be filled by temporary appointment for the period of the emergency or until replaced by permanent appointments or by provisional appointments made under the provisions of section 23 of the national defense act, approved June 3, 1916, and hereafter provisional appointments under said section may be terminated whenever it is determined, in the manner prescribed by the President, that the officer has not the suitability and fitness requisite for permanent appointment.

"Second. To draft into the military service of the United States, organize, and officer, in accordance with the provisions of section 111 of said national defense act, so far as the provisions of said section may be applicable and not inconsistent with the terms of this act, any or all members of the National Guard and of the National Guard Reserves, and said members so drafted into the military service of the United States shall serve therein for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged: Provided, That when so drafted the organizations or units of the National Guard shall, so far as practicable, retain the State designations of their respective organizations.

"Third. To raise by draft as herein provided, organize and equip an additional force of 500,000 enlisted men, or such part or parts thereof as he may at any time deem necessary, and to provide the necessary officers, line and staff, for said force and for organizations of the other forces hereby authorized, or by combining organizations of said other forces, by ordering members of the Officers' Reserve Corps to temporary duty in accordance with the provisions of section 38 of the national defense act approved June 3, 1916; by appointment from the Regular Army, the Officers' Reserve Corps, from those duly qualified and registered pursuant to section 23 of the act of Congress approved January 21, 1903 (32 Stat. L., 775), from the members of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States, from those who have been graduated from educational institutions at which military instruction is compulsory, or from those who have had honorable service in the Regular Army, the National Guard, or in the Volunteer forces, or from the country at large; by assigning retired officers of the Regular Army to active duty with such force with their rank on the retired list and the full pay and allowances of their grade; or by the appointment of retired officers and enlisted men, active or retired, of the Regular Army as commissioned officers in such forces: Provided, That the organization of said force shall be the same as that of the corresponding organizations of the Regular Army: Provided further, That the President is authorized to increase or decrease the number of organizations prescribed for the typical brigades, divisions, or army corps of the Regular Army, and to prescribe such new and different organizations and personnel for army corps, divisions, brigades, regiments, battalions, squadrons, companies, troops, and batteries as the efficiency of the service may require: Provided further, That the number of organizations in a regiment shall not be increased nor shall the number of regiments be decreased: Provided further, That the President in his discretion may organize, officer, and equip for each Infantry and Cavalry brigade three machine-gun companies, and for each Infantry and Cavalry division four machine-gun companies, all in addition to the machine-gun companies comprised in organizations included in such brigades and divisions: Provided further, That the President in his discretion may organize for each division one armored motor car machine-gun company. The machine-gun companies organized under this section shall consist of such commissioned and enlisted personnel and be equipped in such manner as the President may prescribe: And provided further, That officers with rank not above that of colonel shall be appointed by the President alone, and officers above that grade by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: Provided further, That the President may in his discretion recommission in the Coast Guard persons who have heretofore held commissions in the Revenue-Cutter Service or the Coast Guard and have left the service honorably, after ascertaining that they are qualified for service physically, morally, and as to age and military fitness.

"Fourth. The President is further authorized, in his discretion and at such time as he may determine, to raise and begin the training of an additional force of 500,000 men organized, officered, and equipped, as provided for the force first mentioned in the preceding paragraph of this section.

"Fifth. To raise by draft, organize, equip, and officer, as provided in the third paragraph of this section, in addition to and for each of the above forces, such recruit training units as he may deem necessary for the maintenance of such forces at the maximum strength.

"Sixth. To raise, organize, officer, and maintain during the emergency such number of ammunition batteries and battalions, depot batteries and battalions, and such artillery parks, with such numbers and grades of personnel as he may deem necessary. Such organizations shall be officered in the manner provided in the third paragraph of this section, and enlisted men may be assigned to said organizations from any of the forces herein provided for or raised by selective draft as by this act provided.

"SEC. 2. That the enlisted men required to raise and maintain the organizations of the Regular Army and to complete and maintain the organizations embodying the members of the National Guard drafted into the service of the United States, at the maximum legal strength as by this act provided, shall be raised by voluntary enlistment, or if and whenever the President decides that they can not effectually be so raised or maintained, then by selective draft; and all other forces hereby authorized shall be raised and maintained by selective draft exclusively; but this provision shall not prevent the transfer to any force of training cadres from other forces. Such draft as herein provided shall be based upon liability to military service of all male citizens, or male persons not alien enemies who have declared their intention to become citizens, between the ages of 21 and 30 years, both inclusive, and shall take place and be maintained under such regulations as the President may prescribe not inconsistent with the terms of this act. Quotas for the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, or subdivisions thereof, shall be determined in proportion to the population thereof, and credit shall be given to any State, Territory, District, or subdivision thereof, for the number of men who were in the military service of the United States as members of the National Guard on April 1, 1917, or who have since said date entered the military service of the United States from any such State, Territory, District, or subdivision, either as members of the Regular Army or the National Guard. All persons drafted into the service of the United States and all officers accepting commissions in the forces herein provided for shall, from the date of said draft or acceptance, be subject to the laws and regulations governing the Regular Army, except as to promotions, so far as such laws and regulations are applicable to persons whose permanent retention in the military service on the active or retired list is not contemplated by existing law, and those drafted shall be required to serve for the period of the existing emergency unless sooner discharged: Provided, That the President is authorized to raise and maintain by voluntary enlistment or draft, as herein provided, special and technical troops as he may deem necessary, and to embody them into organizations and to officer them as provided in the third paragraph of section 1 and section 9 of this act. Organizations of the forces herein provided for, except the Regular Army, shall, as far as the interests of the service permit, be composed of men who come, and of officers who are appointed from, the same State or locality.

"SEC. 3. No bounty shall be paid to induce any person to enlist in the military service of the United States; and no person liable to military service shall hereafter be permitted or allowed to furnish a substitute for such service; nor shall any substitute be received, enlisted, or enrolled in the military service of the United States; and no such person shall be permitted to escape such service or to be discharged therefrom prior to the expiration of his term of service by the payment of money or any other valuable thing whatsoever as consideration for his release from military service or liability thereto.

"SEC. 4. That the Vice President of the United States, the officers, legislative, executive, and judicial, of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, regular or duly ordained ministers of religion, students who at the time of the approval of this act are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools, and all persons in the military and naval service of the United States shall be exempt from the selective draft herein prescribed; and nothing in this act contained shall be construed to require or compel any person to serve in any of the forces herein provided for who is found to be a member of any well-recognized religious sect or organization at present organized and existing and whose existing creed or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed or principles of said religious organizations, but no person so exempted shall be exempted from service in any capacity that the President shall declare to be noncombatant; and the President is hereby authorized to exclude or discharge from said selective draft and from the draft under the second paragraph of section 1 hereof, or to draft for partial military service only from those liable to draft as in this act provided, persons of the following classes: County and municipal officials; customhouse clerks; persons employed by the United States in the transmission of the mails; artificers and workmen employed in the armories, arsenals, and navy yards of the the United States, and such other persons employed in the service of the United States as the President may designate; pilots; mariners actually employed in the sea service of any citizen or merchant within the United States; persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment or the effective operation of the military forces or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency; those in a status with respect to persons dependent upon them for support which renders their exclusion or discharge advisable; and those found to be physically or morally deficient. No exemption or exclusion shall continue when a cause therefor no longer exists: Provided, That notwithstanding the exemptions enumerated herein, each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia shall be required to supply its quota in the proportion that its population bears to the total population of the United States.

"The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to create and establish throughout the several States and subdivisions thereof and in the Territories and the District of Columbia local boards, and where, in his discretion, practicable and desirable, there shall be created and established one such local board in each county or similar subdivision in each State, and one for approximately each 30,000 of population in each city of 30,000 population or over, according to the last census taken or estimates furnished by the Bureau of Census of the Department of Commerce. Such boards shall be appointed by the President and shall consist of three or more members, none of whom shall be connected with the Military Establishment, to be chosen from among the local authorities of such subdivisions or from other citizens residing in the subdivision or area in which the respective boards will have jurisdiction under the rules and regulations prescribed by the President. Such boards shall have power within their respective jurisdictions to hear and determine, subject to review as hereinafter provided, all questions of exemption under this act, and all questions of or claims for including or discharging individuals or classes of individuals from the selective draft, which shall be made under rules and regulations prescribed by the President, except any and every question or claim for including or excluding or discharging persons or classes of persons from the selective draft under the provisions of this act authorizing the President to exclude or discharge from the selective draft 'Persons engaged in industries, including agriculture, found to be necessary to the maintenance of the Military Establishment, or the effective operation of the military forces, or the maintenance of national interest during the emergency.'

"The President is hereby authorized to establish additional boards, one in each Federal judicial district of the United States, consisting of such number of citizens, not connected with the Military Establishment, as the President may determine, who shall be appointed by the President. The President is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to establish more than one such board in any Federal judicial district of the United States, or to establish one such board having jurisdiction of an area extending into more than one Federal judicial district.

"Such district boards shall review on appeal and affirm, modify, or reverse any decision of any local board having jurisdiction in the area in which any such district board has jurisdiction under the rules and regulations prescribed by the President. Such district boards shall have exclusive original jurisdiction within their respective areas to hear and determine all questions or claims for including or excluding or discharging persons or classes of persons from the selective draft, under the provisions of this act, not included within the original jurisdiction of such local boards.

"The decisions of such district boards shall be final, except that, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe, he may affirm, modify, or reverse any such decision.

"Any vacancy in any such local board or district board shall be filled by the President, and any member of any such local board or district board may be removed and another appointed in his place by the President, whenever he considers that the interest of the nation demands it.

"The President shall make rules and regulations governing the organization and procedure of such local boards and district boards, and providing for and governing appeals from such local boards to such district boards, and reviews of the decisions of any local board by the district board having jurisdiction, and determining and prescribing the several areas in which the respective local boards and district boards shall have jurisdiction, and all other rules and regulations necessary to carry out the terms and provisions of this section, and shall provide for the issuance of certificates of exemption, or partial or limited exemptions, and for a system to exclude and discharge individuals from selective draft.

"SEC. 5. That all male persons between the ages of 21 and 30, both inclusive, shall be subject to registration in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the President; and upon proclamation by the President or other public notice given by him or by his direction stating the time and place of such registration it shall be the duty of all persons of the designated ages, except officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army, the Navy, and the National Guard and Naval Militia while in the service of the United States, to present themselves for and submit to registration under the provisions of this act; and every such person shall be deemed to have notice of the requirements of this act upon the publication of said proclamation or other notice as aforesaid given by the President or by his direction; and any person who shall willfully fail or refuse to present himself for registration or to submit thereto, as herein provided, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction in the district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, and shall thereupon be duly registered: Provided, That in the call of the docket precedence shall be given, in courts trying the same, to the trial of criminal proceedings under this act: Provided further, That persons shall be subject to registration as herein provided who shall have attained their twenty-first birthday and who shall not have attained their thirty-first birthday on or before the day set for the registration, and all persons so registered shall be and remain subject to draft into the forces hereby authorized, unless exempted or excused therefrom as in this act provided: Provided further, That in the case of temporary absence from actual place of legal residence of any person liable to registration as provided herein such registration may be made by mail under regulations to be prescribed by the President.

"SEC. 6. That the President is hereby authorized to utilize the service of any or all departments and any or all officers or agents of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, and subdivisions thereof, in the execution of this act, and all officers and agents of the United States and of the several States, Territories, and subdivisions thereof, and of the District of Columbia, and all persons designated or appointed under regulations prescribed by the President whether such appointments are made by the President himself or by the governor or other officer of any State or Territory to perform any duty in the execution of this act, are hereby required to perform such duty as the President shall order or direct, and all such offices and agents and persons so designated or appointed shall hereby have full authority for all acts done by them in the execution of this act by the direction of the President. Correspondence in the execution of this act may be carried in penalty envelopes bearing the frank of the War Department. Any person charged as herein provided with the duty of carrying into effect any of the provisions of this act or the regulations made or directions given thereunder who shall fail or neglect to perform such duty; and any person charged with such duty or having and exercising any authority under said act, regulations, or directions, who shall knowingly make or be a party to the making of any false or incorrect registration, physical examination, exemption, enlistment, enrollment, or muster; and any person who shall make or be a party to the making of any false statement or certificate as to the fitness or liability of himself or any other person for service under the provisions of this act, or regulations made by the President thereunder, or otherwise evades or aids another to evade the requirements of this act or of said regulations, or who, in any manner, shall fail or neglect fully to perform any duty required of him in the execution of this act, shall, if not subject to military law, be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction in the district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than one year, or, if subject to military law, shall be tried by court-martial and suffer such punishment as a court-martial may direct.

"SEC. 7. That the qualifications and conditions for voluntary enlistment as herein provided shall be the same as those prescribed by existing law for enlistments in the Regular Army, except that recruits must be between the ages of 18 and 40 years, both inclusive, at the time of their enlistment; and such enlistments shall be for the period of the emergency unless sooner discharged. All enlistments, including those in the Regular Army Reserve, which are in force on the date of the approval of this act and which would terminate during the emergency shall continue in force during the emergency unless sooner discharged; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to shorten the period of any existing enlistment: Provided, That all persons enlisted or drafted under any of the provisions of this act shall as far as practicable be grouped into units by States and the political subdivisions of the same: Provided further, That all persons who have enlisted since April 1, 1917, either in the Regular Army or in the National Guard, and all persons who have enlisted in the National Guard since June 3, 1916, upon their application, shall be discharged upon the termination of the existing emergency.

"The President may provide for the discharge of any or all enlisted men whose status with respect to dependents renders such discharge advisable; and he may also authorize the employment on any active duty of retired enlisted men of the Regular Army, either with their rank on the retired list or in higher enlisted grades, and such retired enlisted men shall receive the full pay and allowances of the grades in which they are actively employed.

"SEC. 8. That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is authorized to appoint for the period of the existing emergency such general officers of appropriate grades as may be necessary for duty with brigades, divisions, and higher units in which the forces provided for herein may be organized by the President, and general officers of appropriate grade for the several Coast Artillery districts. In so far as such appointments may be made from any of the forces herein provided for, the appointees may be selected irrespective of the grades held by them in such forces. Vacancies in all grades in the Regular Army resulting from the appointment of officers thereof to higher grades in the forces other than the Regular Army herein provided for shall be filled by temporary promotions and appointments in the manner prescribed for filling temporary vacancies by section 114 of the national-defense act approved June 3, 1916; and officers appointed under the provisions of this act to higher grades in the forces other than the Regular Army herein provided for shall not vacate their permanent commissions nor be prejudiced in their relative or lineal standing in the Regular Army.

"SEC. 9. That the appointments authorized and made as provided by the second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth paragraphs of section 1 and by section 8 of this act, and the temporary appointments in the Regular Army authorized by the first paragraph of section 1 of this act, shall be for the period of the emergency, unless sooner terminated by discharge or otherwise. The President is hereby authorized to discharge any officer from the office held by him under such appointment for any cause which, in the judgment of the President, would promote the public service; and the general commanding any division and higher tactical organization or territorial department is authorized to appoint from time to time military boards of not less than three nor more than five officers of the forces herein provided for to examine into and report upon the capacity, qualification, conduct, and efficiency of any commissioned officer within his command other than officers of the Regular Army holding permanent or provisional commissions therein. Each member of such board shall be superior in rank to the officer whose qualifications are to be inquired into, and if the report of such board be adverse to the continuance of any such officer and be approved by the President, such officer shall be discharged from the service at the discretion of the President with one month's pay and allowances.

"SEC. 10. That all officers and enlisted men of the forces herein provided for other than the Regular Army shall be in all respects on the same footing as to pay, allowances, and pensions as officers and enlisted men of corresponding grades and length of service in the Regular Army; and commencing June 1, 1917, and continuing until the termination of the emergency, all enlisted men of the Army of the United States in active service whose base pay does not exceed $21 per month shall receive an increase of $10 per month; those whose base pay is $24, an increase of $8 per month; those whose base pay is $30, $36, or $40, an increase of $6 per month; and those whose base pay is $45 or more, an increase of $5 per month: Provided, That the increases of pay herein authorized shall not enter into the computation of continuous-service pay.

"SEC. 11. That all existing restrictions upon the detail, detachment, and employment of officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army are hereby suspended for the period of the present emergency.

"SEC. 12. That the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army, is authorized to make such regulations governing the prohibition of alcoholic liquors in or near military camps and to the officers and enlisted men of the Army as he may from time to time deem necessary or advisable: Provided, That no person, corporation, partnership, or association shall sell, supply, or have in his or its possession any intoxicating or spirituous liquors at any military station, cantonment, camp, fort, post, officers' or enlisted men's club, which is being used at the time for military purposes under this act, but the Secretary of War may make regulations permitting the sale and use of intoxicating liquors for medicinal purposes. It shall be unlawful to sell any intoxicating liquor, including beer, ale, or wine, to any officer or member of the military forces while in uniform, except as herein provided. Any person, corporation, partnership, or association violating the provisions of this section or the regulations made thereunder shall, unless otherwise punishable under the Articles of War, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment for not more than 12 months, or both.

"SEC. 13. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, empowered, and directed during the present war to do everything by him deemed necessary to suppress and prevent the keeping or setting up of houses of ill fame, brothels, or bawdy houses within such distance as he may deem needful of any military camp, station, fort, post, cantonment, training, or mobilization place, and any person, corporation, partnership, or association receiving or permitting to be received for immoral purposes any person into any place, structure, or building used for the purpose of lewdness, assignation, or prostitution within such distance of said places as may be designated, or shall permit any such person to remain for immoral purposes in any such place, structure, or building as aforesaid, or who shall violate any order, rule, or regulation issued to carry out the object and purpose of this section shall, unless otherwise punishable under the Articles of War, be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment for not more than 12 months, or both.

"SEC. 14. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby suspended during the period of this emergency."

And the Senate agree to the same.

GEO. E. CHAMBERLAIN,
G. M. HITCHCOCK,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
S. H. DENT, Jr.,
W. J. FIELDS,
PERCY E. QUIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further bills or resolutions, morning business is closed.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 291.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 291) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask for the adoption of the unanimous-consent order which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed order.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that after the adoption of this order speeches upon House bill 291 during the present calendar day and the calendar day of Friday, May 11, shall be limited to one hour each on the bill, the substitute, or amendments thereto, and no Senator shall speak more than once on the bill or the substitute or any amendments thereto.

It is further agreed that after the calendar day of Friday, May 11, unless the bill is otherwise disposed of, no Senator shall speak more than once, or more than 10 minutes upon the bill, the substitute, or any amendments thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? [A pause.] The Chair hears none, and the unanimous-consent agreement is entered into.

The bill is in the Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. The question is on the committee amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The committee amendment proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert certain words.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are a number of Senators who are interested in the amendments that will be offered to this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. Nobody is interested in this. This is a substitute committee amendment to the House bill, and therefore I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. CUMMINS. It will be all over, then, if we do that. It would not be open to amendment at all.

Mr. OVERMAN. The bill would then be open to amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Not in the Committee of the Whole. For that reason, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hollis	Norris	Sterling
Beckham	Husting	Overman	Stone
Borah	James	Owen	Swanson
Brandegee	Johnson, Cal.	Page	Thomas
Broussard	Jones, N. Mex.	Phelan	Thompson

Gallinger	McKellar	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
Gerry	McLean	Smith, Md.	Wolcott
Hale	Martin	Smith, Mich.
Harding	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Hardwick	New	Smoot

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is detained on official business.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. SAULSBURY], who is absent on account of very important business. I will let this announcement stand for the day, although he may be here later.

Mr. GERRY. I have been requested to state that the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] is absent on account of official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] on account of illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, what is the pending amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is to strike out the House text and substitute Senate bill 2 as amended. As some Senators were not here at the time, perhaps it would be advisable for the Chair to state that a unanimous-consent agreement has been entered into limiting the debate for to-day and to-morrow to one hour.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to give notice that I shall move to strike out all after the word "years," on page 37, line 5, down to and including the word "imprisonment," on line 18 of the same page, being what is popularly known as paragraph (c) of section 2 of Chapter II, the chapter on espionage.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator who has the bill in charge if we are now on Chapter XII?

Mr. OVERMAN. We are on the whole bill now.

Mr. BORAH. I understood that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] was going to offer an amendment to Chapter XII.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will offer it now if in order.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to address some remarks to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No amendment has yet been offered. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia is in order.

Mr. FLETCHER. An amendment has been offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to strike out subsection (c) on page 37.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; he simply gave notice that he would offer it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I offer the following amendment, then.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 38, lines 2 and 3, strike out the words "of a seditious, anarchistic, or treasonable character" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Advocating or urging treason, insurrection, or forcible resistance to any law of the United States.

Mr. JONES of Washington. On what page of the bill as reported is that?

Mr. HARDWICK. There is a difference in the print, I understand, and I do not know just where.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On page 66.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; Chapter XII begins on page 66, and it would be in lines 2 and 3 on page 67.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated as it will come in at that point.

The SECRETARY. On page 67, line 2, after the word "matter," strike out the words "of a seditious, anarchistic, or treasonable character" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Advocating or urging treason, insurrection, or forcible resistance to any law of the United States."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Georgia very kindly yields to me to offer in writing the amendment of which I gave notice.

Mr. HARDWICK. In addition to the motion that I have submitted it is my purpose to move, when that is disposed of, to strike out section 1 of the chapter, section 3 of the chapter, and section 5 of the chapter. I think the Senator in charge of the bill will agree to the pending amendment; I hope he will; and also to the motion to strike out section 3; and also to the motion to strike out section 5; but I do not believe he will agree to the proposition to strike out section 1. That is the only difference as far as I understand his attitude.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator will offer them separately?

Mr. HARDWICK. I am going to offer them separately, and I wish to explain exactly what the amendment means and what it will be if the Senate acts either one way or the other, according to the plan I have suggested.

The language in section 2 is:

SEC. 2. Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book, or other publication, matter or thing, of any kind, containing any matter of a seditious, anarchistic, or treasonable character, is hereby declared to be nonmailable.

Mr. President, I have moved an amendment substituting for the words "of a seditious, anarchistic, or treasonable character" the words "advocating or urging treason, insurrection, or forcible resistance to any law of the United States." I will state the reason why I have suggested that modification.

In conferring upon executive officers arbitrary power it is most important, where we confer it at all, that the power should be as sharply limited and as clearly defined as human language can limit and define it. The words "of a seditious, anarchistic, or treasonable character" are words in which there is large room for construction. Something that would not be accounted treason under the principles of law applicable to this question might be said to be, with some show of plausibility and reason, of a treasonable character. Something that might not amount to sedition or insurrection under the law and jurisprudence of this country might be said to be of a seditious or insurrectionary character.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will state to the Senator that if he offers that as a separate amendment I do not object to it.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the first one?

Mr. OVERMAN. I will accept that amendment. I am glad to accept it.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then we agree on that, and of course I do not care to discuss it any further. If we use language that is already defined by the courts and has a precise and fixed meaning in the jurisprudence of every civilized country, there is less room for abuse of power than if this doubtful, vague language were left in.

Mr. BORAH. Now, I wish to ask the Senator——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The amendment has not been voted on.

Mr. BORAH. I thought the amendment had been disposed of.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no objection to the amendment, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. HARDWICK. If there is no objection, let it be adopted. I am glad to know that the Senator in charge of the bill is agreeable to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). The question is on the amendment presented by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARDWICK. I move to strike out section 3.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no objection to striking out section 3.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 67 strike out lines 4 to 9, inclusive, being section 3, in the following words:

SEC. 3. The Postmaster General may, upon evidence satisfactory to him that any person, concern, association, or company is engaged in using the mails for the circulation or dissemination of any matter by this act declared to be nonmailable, forbid the use of the mails by any such person, concern, association, or company.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is adopted.

Mr. HARDWICK. I move to strike out section 5 of the chapter.

Mr. OVERMAN. I myself moved to strike out that.

Mr. HARDWICK. All right. The Senator can move the amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I asked to have it stricken out and I think it has been stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina moves to strike out section 5, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 67 it is proposed to strike out lines 20 to 23, being section 5, in the following words:

SEC. 5. An order of the Postmaster General forbidding the use of the mails in any case under the provisions of this chapter shall be subject to review by injunction proceedings instituted in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sections 3 and 5 have been stricken out.

Mr. HARDWICK. I move to strike out section 1, on page 66. Before I submit that motion I wish to say that the Senator from North Carolina has already consented to modifications that very materially improve this chapter and will make it a great deal less objectionable than it was as presented here, and it is one that I think possibly we can afford to vote for, even if this amendment does not prevail. Still I believe the amendment I now offer ought also to prevail, and I will tell Senators why.

I want to make it unlawful to mail matter of any kind urging or advocating treason, insurrection, or forcible opposition to any law of the United States. I want to make matter of that sort not only nonmailable but I want to make it a crime to mail it or attempt to mail it. I want to punish the man who mails that sort of matter, who uses the United States mails to send that sort of matter through the country.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, my attention was diverted when the first amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia was presented. It reads "forcible resistance to any law of the United States"?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. Would not the Senate be quite willing to add "or of any State"? We should not be permitting the circulation of matter through the mails that would advocate the forcible violation of any law of a State.

Mr. HARDWICK. I certainly would be willing to accept that, but I want to suggest this thought to the Senator's mind: Ought we to deal at all with State matters in dealing with a purely Federal function?

Mr. WALSH. I venture to present the fact that we are making a provision concerning the use of the mails, and we simply deny to anyone the use of the mails for the purpose of circulating matter advocating a resistance to the laws of the United States.

Mr. HARDWICK. I believe the Senator is right about it, on first impression, and I will make no objection to that addition. If the Senator will make that suggestion later, I will vote for an amendment proposing it. The action we have already taken removes many of the most objectionable features of this chapter, in my opinion. Still, I must confess, Mr. President, I am always reluctant to give to any executive officer the right to take arbitrary action, according to his arbitrary opinion about matters of this sort. When it comes to convicting a person of treason, of insurrection, of urging forcible resistance to any law of the United States, and to incorporate the suggestion of the Senator from Montana, of any State as well, it does seem to me that before a man is convicted of conduct of that sort the issue ought to be determined in the courts of the country by a jury of his peers, and the questions of fact ought to be presented and determined there. That is the constitutional system of this country, and it is one of the sacred and fundamental rights of English-speaking peoples and of all peoples where free government prevails.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask the Senator a question in regard to section 1 and also with reference to section 2 as it has been amended. It says "every letter, writing, circular." Also, section 2 says "every letter, writing, circular, postal card," and so forth. How is the Postmaster General going to determine what the contents of a letter are? How is he going to ascertain that fact?

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course, this would have been true under section 3 if it had remained in the bill; there would be general power to exclude all the mail of such person in the future. Of course, when a person sends that sort of matter through the mail, written to an addressee who might give the department information of it, then the Postmaster General, under the authority of section 3, would hold that hereafter that person can not use the mail for any purpose.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield to me? Does he find authority in the bill for the Postmaster General to open any letter or paper or anything else?

Mr. HARDWICK. There is none; not in the express language of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Then what is the meaning of the bill when it says "every letter"?

Mr. OVERMAN. It makes it a crime to send through the mail a letter of a treasonable character urging people to sedition, just like letters I have here now, which are treasonable in their nature.

Mr. HARDWICK. I expect the Senator from Idaho has this point in mind. Of course, that could not be determined unless they looked into the letter before it is mailed, and of course it would not then be admitted to the mail.

Mr. OVERMAN. Certainly, when the man has received the letter—

Mr. HARDWICK. It is already carried in the mails.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator in charge of the bill or the Senator from Georgia contend that under section 1 the Postmaster General could open the mails and find out the contents of the letter?

Mr. OVERMAN. He is authorized to do that.

Mr. BORAH. What I am trying to find out is whether or not this is supposed to be a dead letter or simply depends upon the possibility of finding the letter after it has reached the addressee and has been thus exposed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Under section 3 authority was given to open the letters and stop them.

Mr. HARDWICK. But when it has been discovered that a man has once committed this offense, then under section 3, in the future, all access to the mails could be denied him.

Mr. BORAH. Let us see about section 1. It says here:

SECTION 1. Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book, or other publication, matter, or thing, of any kind, in violation of any of the provisions of this act, or intended or calculated to induce, promote, or further any of the acts or things by any provision of this act declared unlawful, is hereby declared to be nonmailable matter and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier.

That can not have reference to a letter after it has passed through the mails and has reached the addressee. That has reference to a letter which is offered for carrying purposes, and it presupposes that some one will investigate the contents of that letter to find out whether or not it is mailable.

Mr. OVERMAN. The cream of this section is that it declares unlawful the things that are mentioned.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think clearly it is not a question of ascertaining before the letter is mailed whether or not it is nonmailable. If the letter, after it is delivered, comes into the hands of the Post Office Department by the action of the addressee or in some other way, and if upon examination of that letter it is found that it is a letter which is nonmailable under this proposed law, then the person mailing it is subject to prosecution, and he is to be tried for that offense.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will read the language.

Mr. BORAH. That is not what section 1 says, it seems to me.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Idaho will yield to me——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. The section says:

Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book, or other publication, matter, or thing, of any kind, in violation of any of the provisions of this act—

What provisions? The provisions as amended on motion of the Senator from Georgia—or intended or calculated to induce, promote, or further any of the acts or things by any provision of this act—

That is, the provision contained in this section as amended on motion of the Senator from Georgia. The other portion provides the penalty—or further any of the acts or things by any provision of this act declared unlawful——

Mr. BORAH. It reads further, "is hereby declared to be nonmailable."

Mr. OVERMAN. It reads further—is hereby declared to be nonmailable matter and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier.

Such matter ought not to be conveyed; but the provision does not authorize anybody to open letters.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely; but how do you provide for ascertaining whether or not a letter contains nonmailable matter, except by opening the letter?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from Idaho, I think, has struck the very kernel of the matter, and I am going to discuss that very proposition in a moment.

Mr. STERLING. I desire to say to the Senator from Idaho or to the Senator from Georgia——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. That the provision of the Federal statute in regard to obscene or lascivious literature contains practically the same expression. It makes matter of that kind contained in a letter, a circular, a print, or an engraving nonmailable matter. Turning over to the statute relative to lotteries, gift enterprises, and other prohibited matter, the statute is in this language——

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator read the language? I should like to see whether the concluding sentence of this section of the bill is contained in the language of the statute.

Mr. STERLING. Very well. I wish to call attention to the section of the statute relative to obscene matter, which is as follows:

Every letter, packet, or package, or other mail matter containing any filthy, vile, or indecent thing, device, or substance, and every paper, writing, advertisement, or representation that any article, instrument, substance, drug, medicine, or thing may, or can be, used or applied * * * for any indecent or immoral purpose; and every description calculated to induce or incite a person to so use or apply any such article, instrument, substance, drug, medicine, or thing, is hereby declared to be nonmailable matter and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier.

In regard to lotteries, I may state, without reading it, that the language is somewhat different.

Mr. BORAH. I am myself familiar with both those statutes.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, the statute which he has before him contains the exact authority in point and is in the precise words, even including the last sentence, which was in the main the most objectionable thing in the previous laws of this character which we have enacted. In the lottery statute and the statute against obscene and lascivious matter, the provision was that they should be nonmailable, and should not "be carried in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier."

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will allow me, I desire to have read into the RECORD in the hearing of the Senate the construction which the Postmaster General has placed on this section, in calling attention to this chapter, which is in the same language as previous statutes.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will ask the Secretary to read the letter which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SOLICITOR,
Washington, May 7, 1917.

Hon. LEE S. OVERMAN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have read in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Saturday's proceedings the discussion in the Senate with respect to the chapter of the so-called espionage bill, Senate bill No. 2, relating to the Post Office Department. I will not presume to discuss what the policy of Congress should be with respect to the matters covered by the discussion in the Senate, but it seems proper for me to call your attention to certain points in regard to which there seems to be an erroneous impression.

There is nothing to be found in the pending bill which in express terms authorizes the opening of sealed communications from the time they are dropped in the United States mails until they are actually delivered to the addressees, and there is nothing in existing law which authorizes such opening of sealed communications except sections 3936 and 3938 of the Revised Statutes. The first-named section provides as follows:

"The Postmaster General may regulate the period during which undelivered letters shall remain in any post office and when they shall be returned to the dead letter office; and he may make regulations for their return from the dead letter office to the writers when they can not be delivered to the parties addressed."

The other section provides for the registration and return of valuable inclosures and of letters of value or importance to the party addressed or to the writer. These sections have been uniformly construed by the Post Office Department to authorize the opening of this particular class of sealed matter for the purposes specifically set forth in the statutes. No other class of sealed matter is authorized to be opened while in the United States mails. On the contrary, section 5890, Revised Statutes, now 195 of the Criminal Code, provides as follows:

"Whoever, being a postmaster or other person employed in any department of the Postal Service, shall unlawfully detain, delay, or open any letter, postal card, package, bag, or mail intrusted to him, or which shall come into his possession, and which was intended to be conveyed by mail, or carried or delivered by any carrier, messenger, agent, or other person employed in any department of the Postal Service, or forwarded through or delivered from any post office or station thereof established by authority of the Postmaster General; or shall secrete, embezzle, or destroy any such letter, postal, card, package, bag, or mail; or shall steal, abstract, or remove from any such letter, package, bag, or mail, any article or thing contained therein, shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both."

Sections 3892 and 5469 Revised Statutes, now 194 of the Criminal Code, provides as follows:

"Whoever shall steal, take, or abstract, or by fraud or deception obtain, from or out of any mail, post office, or station thereof, or other authorized depository for mail matter, or from a letter or mail carrier, any letter, postal card, package, bag, or mail, or shall abstract or remove from any such letter, package, bag, or mail, any article or thing contained therein, or shall secrete, embezzle, or destroy any such letter, postal card, package, bag, or mail, or any article or thing contained therein; or whoever shall buy, receive, or conceal, or aid in buying, receiving, or concealing, or shall unlawfully have in his possession, any letter, postal card, package, bag, or mail, or any article or thing contained therein, which has been so stolen, taken, embezzled, or abstracted, as herein described, knowing the same to have been so stolen, taken, embezzled, or abstracted; or whoever shall take any letter, postal card, or package out of any post office or station thereof, or out of any authorized depository for mail matter, or from any letter or mail carrier, or which has been in any post office or station thereof, or other authorized depository, or in the custody of any letter or mail carrier, before it has been delivered to the person to whom it was directed, with a design to obstruct the correspondence, or to pry into the business or secrets of another, or shall open, secrete, embezzle, or destroy the same, shall be fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both."

The inviolability of the seal of letters and other first-class mail matter has always been strictly observed by the Postal Service. Inspectors in their work of detecting crime are not even permitted to examine letters which are opened by authority of law in the dead-letter office. I may add that during the present national exigency many suggestions have been made to the Postmaster General with respect to the advisability of having opened and inspected certain classes of sealed communications, and to his uniform reply that there was no authority of law for so doing, he has been urged to ask Congress for such specific authority. This he has declined to do, and I know, and am authorized to state, he is seriously opposed to such legislation.

It was contended in the discussion Saturday in the Senate that the fact that certain matter under seal was made nonmailable by the bill carried with it the necessary implication that some one was authorized to break the seal and determine the character of the matter. I do not think that such construction could properly be placed upon the language of the bill. It is a well-settled principle of statutory construction that where the legislative body has once dealt with a particular question and disposed of it in clear and unambiguous language, such as the statutes above quoted, with respect to the opening of mail, no subsequent statute of a general nature and in general terms can be construed to modify or repeal the specific provisions of the former statute. (Lewis' Sutherland on Statutory Construction, secs. 274, 275; United States v. Gear, 44 U. S., 131; Ex Parte Crow Dog, 109 U. S., 570; Petri v. Creelman Lumber Co., 199 U. S., 497; Reed v. The United States, 211 U. S., 529; in re Rouse, Hazard & Co., 91 Fed., 101; Great Northern Ry. Co. v. The United States, 155 Fed., 945 (affir. 208 U. S., 452), and cases there cited.)

This identical question was discussed in the House on last Friday and an amendment was proposed to the effect that nothing contained in the section should be construed to authorize the opening of sealed communications; but after some discussion, the general concensus of opinion appearing to be that there was no necessity for such provision, the author of the proposed amendment voluntarily withdrew it. There would appear to be no objection to such an amendment if deemed desirable, although it would seem to be entirely unnecessary.

The effect of the chapter relating to the mails in the pending bill is to make certain classes of matter unmailable. Under existing law second, third, and fourth-class matter, which is not under seal, is subject to inspection by postmasters, and if found to be nonmailable is taken from the mails and disposed of under the Postal Laws and Regulations. Unsealed matter prohibited by the pending bill would be treated in the same way. Under instructions from the Postmaster General if a postmaster has no doubt that the matter is nonmailable he may act upon his own responsibility. If he is in doubt he asks for instruction from the law officer of the department, submitting a copy of the questionable matter. As to all nonmailable matter under seal covered by the pending bill it would go as in the ordinary course of other first-class matter through the mails and be delivered, notwithstanding the fact that it was nonmailable in character, but it being nonmailable a criminal offense would be created by it being sent through the mails, and upon complaint of the person receiving it or upon any other satisfactory proof that it had been sent through the mails, the sender would be liable to indictment and to punishment for such misuse.

The foregoing represents the view and attitude of the Post Office Department in regard to the matter under discussion, and I trust that you will not think it out of place for me to put this information in your hands in this shape for such use as you may see fit to make of it.

Very truly, yours,

W. H. LAMAR, Solicitor.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the pending section, as I said a moment ago, is in the terms of both the lottery statute and the statute against obscene literature——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish merely to make an observation in respect to the communication which has just been read from the desk, regarding the practices of the Post Office Department.

I make no question, sir, but that the law has been correctly stated; but I do raise the question as to whether it has been the uniform practice of the Post Office Department to keep within the law. Under another administration I brought to the floor of the Senate a large number of letters addressed to me which had been opened in transit. They were passed around and examined by Senators. There was not any room for doubt, Mr. President, that the statutes had been violated by officials of the department in inspecting the contents of those letters. I had addressed a large number of letters to postal employees with regard to certain abuses in the service and certain acts of interference with their rights. The replies to those letters were opened in transit, and I exhibited upon this floor the evidence of the plain violation of the law.

It is all well enough for the department to quote these statutes for the protection of sealed mailable matter. The statutes are well understood. But they are not always observed. And when they are violated—as I personally know they have been by department officials—there is little or no redress for the citizen whose rights have been invaded. It would be next to impossible to prove who of the great force in the department handling and having access to the mails had opened letters in transit. Hence the statutes protecting mail may afford very little protection to the citizen.

For these reasons Congress ought to be very careful about enlarging the powers of department officials in dealing with the mail of the private citizens.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Wisconsin was not in the Chamber probably a few days ago when I had read a communication from the department. The Senator says that the instance to which he referred occurred under the last administration.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I said it occurred under another administration.

Mr. OVERMAN. "Another administration." I had read into the RECORD a few days ago a statement as to the policy of this administration, under which practices of that kind have been abolished.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was in the Chamber when that communication was read.

Mr. OVERMAN. That kind of thing has not been done under this administration.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But conceding that this administration has not violated the laws, that it has observed these statutes enacted for the protection of the privacy of sealed mail matter, does not meet the objection I make. This administration may not last any longer than its present term of office. I am inclined to think that we are writing upon the statute books at this time and in this session many laws that are likely to be quite effective in putting an end to the service of the present administration at the end of its term of office.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, Mr. President, I want to conclude what I have to say about this matter, and I can do so in just a moment.

There is not the slightest reason on earth to retain section 1 in this bill unless the purpose is through inspectors or in one way or another to stop certain mail from being transmitted before the question is decided by any court.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator has stated the exact purport of this section. It can not have any reason for existence in reality unless it is proposed to examine the mail.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is it, of course. There is no other reason for it at all. Why? Because section 1 provides—and that is the section I have moved to strike out—

> Every letter, writing, circular, postal card * * * intended or calculated to induce, promote, or further any of the acts or things by any provision of this act declared unlawful is hereby declared to be nonmailable matter.

I am going to stop there and read no more of section 1. Section 2 says that these same things, and defines the things, namely—

> Every letter, writing, circular, postal card * * * containing any matter urging or advocating treason, insurrection, or forcible resistance to any law of the United States is hereby declared to be nonmailable.

What is the need of repeating that language? Section 1 has no earthly significance; it has no reason in this bill, unless it means that power more than that advocated by the Senator from North Carolina is conveyed and is intended to be conveyed by it.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. That does not make the act unlawful.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, it does; and I will tell the Senator why.

Mr. OVERMAN. It does not make it unlawful at all.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I merely want to ask a question there.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will yield to the Senator in a moment. I will come right back to that. I am going to show you why. Now, leave out section 1 and what do you get? Section 2, which would become section 1, and which would read:

Every letter * * * containing any matter urging or advocating treason, insurrection, or forcible resistance to any law of the United States is hereby declared to be nonmailable.

Section 2, which is the old section 4:

Whoever shall use or attempt to use the mails or Postal Service of the Government for the transmission of any matter declared by this chapter to be nonmailable shall be fined—

Or "imprisoned." Now, there is the complete statute without any more, without the addition of a single word, without the conferring of a single unnecessary power.

Section 1, I say, therefore, has no meaning. The only thing in section 1 that is not in section 2 is this, the last sentence:

Is hereby declared to be nonmailable matter—

You notice I stopped there before—and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier.

Now, that is the only reason for section 1. It is the only excuse for its existence. It is the only necessity whatever for it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think the Senator has not quite grasped the full meaning of section 1. It covers the whole act. The language is "in violation of any of the provisions of this act."

Mr. HARDWICK. Is there anything in this act except section 2?

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator is thinking of the chapter, I am afraid. It does not say "in violation of any of the provisions of this chapter"; it says "in violation of any of the provisions of this act," meaning the whole act, from beginning to end.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, well, if that is true, then undoubtedly it ought to go out. I thought it meant "chapter." Does the Senator construe that to mean everything in the whole act and not just in this chapter?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is the question of whether you want to prohibit going through the mails any matter which purposes a violation of the law as defined in this act.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from North Carolina construes this to mean the chapter, and he drew it and brought it here.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is nothing else in the bill except this mail matter.

Mr. HARDWICK. In this chapter.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is a great deal in this bill besides this mail matter.

Mr. HARDWICK. There is not a Senator of the United States, in my judgment, who would vote for that broad a proposition—not one—at least I think not. I hope not.

Mr. FLETCHER. Well, here is the exact language. It says "act." It does not say "chapter."

Mr. HARDWICK. I know, but it means "chapter." We would not put a blanket provision like that in any law we would enact; at least I hope not.

Mr. OVERMAN. It ought to be amended in that respect.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator does not mean that?

Mr. OVERMAN. When it was sent to us, it was sent to us as a separate act, and we put it in here as a chapter.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; as a chapter. That is what the language means; and if it meant what the Senator from Florida thought it meant, he would not vote for it to save his life. It would be all the more objectionable.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is not a question of what I think about it. That is the exact language of the section.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, I know; but the Senator from North Carolina has explained how that happened. These propositions were brought here as separate acts, and then they were made into chapters, and when this consolidation took place they ought to have changed the verbiage so as to make this provision refer only to the acts prohibited in this particular chapter and not in the entire act, consisting of some 12 separate and distinct chapters, most of which have no direct and immediate connection with each other.

Mr. FLETCHER. I called attention to the fact that the Senator seemed to think that section 1 and section 2 were practically identical.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, they are. The Senator from Florida can see, with that explanation, why the mistake was made.

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course, if we should strike out the word "act" and insert "chapter," the situation would be entirely different.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let us correct that right now. I suggest that we amend it by making it read, on line 20, "any provision of this chapter."

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Presiding Officer feels that he must admonish Senators. We have had as many as three Senators talking at once, and it is hard on the reporters. The Senator from Georgia is recognized. Does he yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. I just wanted to suggest, if I may be permitted to do so—I do it with some hesitancy, too—that the Senator from North Carolina withhold that proposition for the time being, and not agree to substitute the word "chapter" for the word "act."

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course, that can be done later; and it will be done and ought to be done if this section is retained at all, because we do not want to confer on any executive department of this Government a blanket power of this sort, that may cover a thousand things to which our attention is not specifically directed in this connection. I hope no Senator on either side of this Chamber would vote for such a proposition. It means, of course, as the Senator from North Carolina suggests, "chapter" instead of "act"; but it was put here "act" because these chapters all came in as separate acts, and were finally consolidated.

Now, giving it that construction, what have you got? You are up against this proposition: Section 1 means nothing on earth more than what section 2 already means and what section 2 will mean without it, unless it is given a different signification by the concluding words:

And shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier.

Now, of course, if those words are not construed to give to the inspectors of the United States the power to pry into the mails, the power to decide in advance questions that ought to be decided by courts and juries in this country, then there is no reason on earth for keeping section 1 in the bill.

The Senator from North Carolina thought, I am afraid, that the bill would be left unbalanced and incomplete if we struck out section 1. It would not, unless these words have a meaning different from what the letter of the Postmaster General gives them.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I agree that the construction of the Senator from Georgia is right about it. It would stop from going through the mails, according to his amendment, treasonable matter, matter arousing the people to insurrection and violence. That is what it means, I think, as the Senator says it does; and that is what I want to stop.

Mr. HARDWICK. I understand; but the other section will stop that.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; it will not.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, there is this difference: The concluding words in section 1 could be construed by the Post Office Department, if it construes them in the way that it says in this letter it will not, and if it construes them differently from the way it has construed similar language in other statutes, to authorize the prying into and opening of letters and other matter, hunting for evidence to see whether this law is being violated or not. I am not for that. I am opposed to that. I am opposed to any such policy as that. I am opposed to conferring any such power as that. What I want to do is to declare that it shall be unlawful to send any matter of this kind, advocating or urging treason, insurrection, or forcible resistance to any law of the United States or of any State, if the sensible suggestion of the Senator from Montana is adopted, also; and then, when that is declared, I want to say that if people violate this law, they shall not be tried and condemned by the Post Office Department, but they shall be tried in the courts of the Republic and before juries of their peers. I do not care what a man is charged with, whether it is treason, insurrection, or anything else; that right ought to remain to him forever. It is fundamental; it is constitutional. We ought not to commit to anybody else the power to take any action of a drastic character with respect to this sort of a matter, in advance of a court's decision, and the verdict of a jury.

Now, I do not know whether section 1 should be kept in the bill if it is to be given a construction that authorizes mail of all sorts to be pried into in a hunt to discover whether or not this law is being violated. If it does not mean that—and the Postmaster General says it does not, and contends that he has never construed these other statutes which are in identical verbiage, as the Senator from South Dakota pointed out, with this bill—if it does not mean that, then there is no reason for the section in the bill.

If it does mean that, then there is still less reason for us to retain it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I quite agree with the argument of the Senator from Georgia, that section 1 can have no effect at all, and can be of no practical worth, unless it presupposes that you are to get inside of these letters in some way.

The section is as follows:

Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book, or other publication, matter, or thing, of any kind, in violation of any of the provisions of this act, or intended or calculated to induce, promote, or further any of the acts or things by any provision of this act declared unlawful, is hereby declared to be nonmailable matter and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier.

Now, that can not contemplate the discovery of the contents of the letter after it shall have passed through the mails and gone into the hands of the addressee. It must contemplate, if it is to be effectual and to work out any results, an investigation as to the contents of that letter at some time after it has left the hands of the writer and before it finally leaves the post office. This is not a statute which declares it an offense to mail such literature. If so, you might very well say that it was contemplated that the addressee might deliver up the letter and thereby inform the department, and the department could proceed under the criminal law to prosecute; but this is purely a nonmailing statute and nonmailable literature, and all that it seeks to do is to render it nonmailable. You can not render it nonmailable for its contents unless you know what its contents are, and you can not know what its contents are unless you break the seal before the time when it is no longer to be carried in the mails at all.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HUSTING. The Senator's objections to that section, of course, only apply to sealed letters?

Mr. BORAH. Precisely.

Mr. HUSTING. They would not apply to the other writings, circulars, postal cards, and so forth, the contents of which could be readily discovered before the time they were put into the mails?

Mr. BORAH. My argument at the present moment only applies to that which is sealed, either a package or a letter. Anything that is closed by seal would come under the purview of my present statement.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator possibly what this is trying to reach? There are headquarters or bureaus that are constantly sending out letters that are identical in their substance and in their form. Even the envelopes are identical. I want to say that for the last year and a half I have been the recipient of letters coming from a certain bureau, and I know without looking in them what is inside them. That is, I know where they emanate from. I am merely suggesting that the authorities know these bureaus, know the kind of stuff they are sending out, and, in fact, it is no secret, and perhaps this is designed merely to reach the propaganda and reach it in such a way as would not constitute a violation of the postal laws.

I merely suggest that as perhaps what we are trying to arrive at.

Mr. BORAH. Well, it is possible that an institution would become so notorious in the mail that is being sent out, by reason of the fact that the contents had been gathered up from the addressees, and so forth, that it had established a character with reference to that kind of literature; and in that instance it might be possible to proceed without actually breaking the seal. But if that were true they could be just as well prosecuted under the other section of the statute, because you have the conclusive evidence.

Mr. HUSTING. I just want to say to the Senator that I believe that section 1, as I construe it, providing as it does that all letters, and so forth, in violation of any of the provisions of the act are declared to be nonmailable, is much broader than section 2. I should construe this as meaning what it says—that anything in violation of the provisions of this act is unmailable, because it is the desire to cover this propaganda, as I understand it, and to cover all violations of the provisions of the various chapters of this act.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senator who has charge of this bill to the statement of the Supreme Court in the case of Ex parte Jackson (96 U. S.), the principle of which, it seems to me, has not been observed in drawing this bill, particularly with reference to section 1. This is a question of nonmailable matter before the court, and the court says:

In their enforcement a distinction is to be made between different kinds of mail matter, between what is intended to be kept free from inspection, such as letters and sealed packages subject to letter postage, and what is open to inspection, such as newspapers, magazines, pamphlets, and other printed matter, purposely left in a condition to be examined. Letters and sealed packages of this kind in the mail are as fully guarded from examination and inspection, except as to their outward form and weight, as if they were retained by the parties forwarding them in their own domiciles. The constitutional guaranty of the right of the people to be secure in their papers against unreasonable searches and seizures extends to their papers, thus closed against inspection, wherever they may be. Whilst in the mail they can only be opened and examined under like warrant issued upon similar oath or affirmation, particularly describing the thing to be seized, as is required when papers are subjected to search in one's own household. No law of Congress can place in the hands of officials connected with the Postal Service any authority to invade the secrecy of letters and such sealed packages in the mail, and all regulations adopted as to mail matter of this kind must be in subordination to the great principle embodied in the fourth amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, that is what I contended. The Postmaster General had not the right, or would not have the right, and he says he would not, to open any sealed packages. He stated that, and I say under the law he can not do it; and this only makes it a crime for a man to send treasonable matter through the mails. But as to papers and things like that, I think he has the right to stop them, and they are what we want to stop. It is the treasonable papers, papers with treasonable matter in them, that are denounced by the statute.

Mr. BORAH. Of what possible advantage can section 1 be, as stated by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], when it does not do anything but declare that certain matter is nonmailable?

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. It says that every letter "is hereby declared to be nonmailable" if it has certain contents.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is right.

Mr. BORAH. And the contents can not be known.

Mr. OVERMAN. They can be known at one end of the line.

Mr. BORAH. They can be known at the other end of the line.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why, of course they can.

Mr. BORAH. But, of course, the nonmailable matter has passed by at that time.

Mr. OVERMAN. It says to the citizen of the United States that any man who writes a letter containing treasonable matter, or matter calculated to arouse the people to insurrection or anarchistic doctrines, shall not be allowed to mail it. If he mails it, he violates the law, and it is made a crime here in section 4.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HUSTING. I want to call the Senator's attention to section 4 of this bill, which, it seems to me, provides that, as follows:

Whoever shall use or attempt to use the mails or postal service of the Government for the transmission of any matter declared by this chapter to be nonmailable, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

That contemplates the punishment of the offense of putting nonmailable matter into the mails, even though it had not been intercepted or stopped; in other words, in case some one had received what is declared to be, under chapter 1, an unmailable piece of matter or an unmailable letter.

Mr. BORAH. That is just precisely what the chapter ought to be, and nothing more. It ought to provide a punishment for those who shall have been convicted of mailing such matter; but it ought not to assume to put it into the power of the Postmaster General, or anyone else, to say that a sealed letter or a sealed package shall be nonmailable.

Mr. HUSTING. Nonmailable, seditious, treasonable, unlawful matter is punishable under section 4.

Mr. BORAH. Section 4 and section 2 are complete within themselves.

Mr. HUSTING. I merely want to say once more, if the Senator will permit me, that section 1 is broader and likewise provides for the punishment of those who mail nonmailable matter, punishable likewise under section 4.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, precisely the same provision is made in section 2.

Mr. HUSTING. I can not agree with the Senator. I think section 1 is broader than section 2, because it relates to individual acts.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from North Carolina has already explained it.

Mr. HUSTING. I can not accept the interpretation of the Senator from North Carolina. It is still in the bill, and my understanding of that section is that it is broader.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, am I speaking under a limit of time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho has the floor and is speaking in his own time.

Mr. BORAH. I would not object to being interrupted if I were not speaking under a limit of time, which I understand is the case.

Mr. President, I have said upon this particular phase about all that I desire to say. The Senator who has the bill in charge says that it is not intended to confer any such power. In the letter which we have just had read from the solicitor I understand he says it does not give express power. The writer of the letter disclosed his capacity for a proper distinction when he said it does not give express power because it does inevitably give implied power if we are going to make the statute workable at all.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not wish to trench upon the Senator's time, but I wish to remind him that Congress has previously passed statutes using plain and simple phraseology which have gone through a wonderful transformation under the construction afterwards given to them by the courts, either by making them say what we never intended them to say or by the addition of words which had been expressly declared previously not to be in the act. What I am afraid of is that in the enactment of this measure we may, by construction by the department and afterwards by the courts, give a power which under their construction we never intended to give, but which once given can not be withdrawn.

Mr. BORAH. I will simply add, without, of course, referring to the present incumbents of office, that the most dangerous thing in legislation is to leave a statute with any looseness whatever which is to be construed by the head of a bureau or a department. A construction is always indulged in to get as much power as is possible under any possible construction which can be given to it. That is the characteristic of a bureau in a bureaucratic form of government, regardless of those who happen to hold the office at the particular time. If some gentleman happens to hold it who regards it as essential to keep within the letter of the law, he is generally such an exception to the rule that it does not establish any precedent for his successor to follow.

Mr. THOMAS. I am reminded that a clause in the revenue act of 1913, which made an exception of incomes——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inquire of the Senator from Colorado if he is speaking once in his own time.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall occupy the Senate only for a moment in illustration of the suggestion which I made to the Senator from Idaho. I will illustrate what I had in mind by a clause in the tariff law of 1913, in the income-tax chapter, where an exemption of 5 per cent of the gross value of ore taken from the mines was allowed because of the character of the mines as an offset against income. The words "gross value," in their application by the Treasury Department, were held to be "net value," a process of reasoning which I have never been able to accept. That is but one of many of a number of instances which I have observed in the course of a few years past, both from the department and from the courts that will compel me to vote against this chapter in toto. I think it ought to go out.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I merely wish to remind the Senator again that this is copied from two statutes now upon the statute books as read by the Secretary, one in regard to obscene matter and the other relating to nonmailable matter. What we want to stop is literature and papers of the kind that I want to put in the RECORD; and I put it in the RECORD so that the Senators may see the kind of stuff that is going through the mails. I think everybody has discovered it.

I have a letter here from a distinguished North Carolinian, a very prominent man, who belongs to the Quaker Church. Of course they take him to be an easy subject and they are sending him communications which I think are treasonable. I ask to put his letter in the RECORD now. Let it be read in order that Senators may hear what he has to say to the secretary of this organization. I want the Secretary to read also what I have marked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

HIGH POINT, N. C., May 9, 1917.

PAULINE K. ANGEL, Secretary,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MISS or MADAM: I have received several communications from your organization making various suggestions in opposition to our Government.

I wish to state plainly to you that I have no sympathy with your methods. I have a profound faith in the judgment of our great President, Woodrow Wilson, and sincerely believe that it is the patriotic duty of every citizen of the United States to give him his or her loyal support. I further believe that the ends you profess to be working for will be obtained sooner and more permanently by giving support to the President and Congress, and I further believe that your efforts to divide and dissipate public sentiment at this time is giving comfort to our enemies, and the tone of your letter seems to me little short of treason.

Please take my name off your mailing list, for I believe you are hindering and not helping the real cause of a permanent peace.

Yours, very truly,

W. T. PARKER.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say that they asked also for names all over my State, and to every name they can get they send literature of the character which I ask the Secretary to read. Let him read the paragraph marked and then on the next page.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the marked paragraph.

The Secretary read as follows:

I inclose a copy of our war-time program on the basis of which we are working to build up a national organization. The enemy is organized. We can not hope to win the battle until we are equally well organized.

Mr. OVERMAN. Now, let the Secretary read the program near the bottom of the next page.

The SECRETARY. Under date of May 1, "War-time program," there is a subheading, "Our immediate program," which reads as follows:

OUR IMMEDIATE PROGRAM.

1. To oppose by all legal means any and all forms of compulsory military training and service.

2. To fight for the complete maintenance in war time of the constitutional rights of free speech, free press, and assembly.

3. To organize the people throughout the United States for international fellowship after the war; cooperating actively with similar organizations of the people in other countries.

Mr. OVERMAN. Now, read the fourth paragraph.

The Secretary read as follows:

4. To demand full publicity by the Government of all agreements or understandings with other nations; and exact statements in advance of the terms on which the United States will make peace.

Mr. HARDWICK. What is there wrong in that? That is the constitutional right of the humblest citizen of the United States.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask the Secretary also to read the further correspondence marked.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE ARIZONA SOCIALIST BULLETIN,
Phoenix, Ariz., March 28, 1917.

Workers, refuse to take up arms against the workers of any country. If the Government forces you into the Army use their guns against them to overthrow their power and to emancipate yourselves from slavery.

Mr. OVERMAN. Now, I ask the Secretary to read the other paper sent to the desk.

The Secretary read as follows:

THREE FLAGS.

At the time when the masses of Europe are busy with insane destruction, when every corner is full of horrors and sorrow, when for almost three years blood is streaming incessantly, at this very time the American capitalists are busy making fortunes.

European blood is turned into gold here and is ever pouring into the insatiable pockets of American capitalists.

The rich are triumphant!

Yet they are ever more enthusiastic now, scenting bloody gold in their own country. They feel that the sharp sword, already existing, will sooner or later descend upon the heads of the working class. And new streams of blood turned into gold will pour into their incombustible safes.

The rich are triumphant!

While triumphing they decorate their luxurious homes, banks, and offices with national flags: "America, I love you."

Wall Street, too, is not asleep. This beautiful nook where millions wrung out of the workers are safeguarded, where blood turned into gold is lying in heaps—blood of European and American workers.

Wall Street! The symbol of deceit, violence, crime, plunder, depravity. The place where the dollar reigns supreme; where every swindler, every base dealer can become the ruler of millions only because he is able to fool and rob at the stock exchange.

This corner is unusually decorated with national flags that speak of the protection of national pride, honor, democracy.

The rich are triumphant!

And in the poor quarters, there where are sheltered the creators of the wealth of the world, where the raw material is prepared, where labor creates gold and the nonsensical luxuries for the rich; in that section where numbers of unfortunate laborers roll in the mire; where poverty, hunger, cold, ignorance, disease, prostitution reign supreme; where people lead the most loathsome existence; there, in these dirty, horrible quarters, the national flags hang also.

But alas, here are two flags.

One colored with stars and stripes, and side by side a black one with a white inscription: "Men wanted for the Army." That is, food for the cannon is wanted to protect the colored, useless rag.

What is the significance of a national flag?

Every national flag is a symbol of bondage, oppression, an attack on other nations, rape, force, and fratricide.

Before us is the American flag. On it are represented 48 stars; that is, 48 States, in each of which blood of the workers was shed because they dared to demand a better living. In each of these States the capitalists, under the guise of the national flag, shot down women and children unmercifully, crushed with the heel of the soldier and policeman every free impulse of the worker.

We well remember the bloody baths to which the workers of Colorado were treated by Rockefeller; also Ludlow, West Virginia, Bayonne, and other places.

Every stripe of this flag represents the shooting down of numbers of men who struggled to free the workers. We will remember the Chicago martyrs who were hung under the American flag. We remember the poet, Joe Hill, who was shot by the American capitalists. We also remember Caplan and Schmidt, imprisoned for life; the brothers McNamara and the tragedy in San Francisco resulting in the death sentence of Thomas Mooney. And many more things we remember.

All this is happening under the American flag, which we are called upon to protect.

What a brazen lie, what hypocrisy!

Comrades!

Is it possible that even one of us will join the Army to protect this dirty rag?

No; a thousand times no.

We well understand that the time is not far off when the masses of all nations will wake up, gather together their national flags, and burn them. And out of the smoke will rise the black flag, the flag of strife and vengence, the flag of contempt and hatred to the whole existing régime. On it will be written with burning red letters—

Mr. OVERMAN. In addition I want to state, as I said the other day, that the Senator from Louisiana had some letters circulated in his State urging the colored people of that State—and I suppose all through the South——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the Senator had better take it all out of the RECORD instead of putting more in the RECORD.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator objects, I will take it out.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not object; I merely make the suggestion.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; let it go in the RECORD. Here were papers circulated all through the South urging negroes to rise up against the white people during this war.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me ask the Senator whether the laws of the United States are not now ample, and the laws of the States as well, to meet that situation?

Mr. OVERMAN. How? By stopping it from going through the mails?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. How? What is the law now that prevents it from going through the mails?

Mr. THOMAS. Let me assume there is nothing, certainly the transmission of such matters through the mails is indicative of a conspiracy or is indicative of an act of which the thing circulated is evidence, and certainly the laws of the State of North Carolina, the laws of Georgia, and the laws of the other Southern States will be found ample to meet that evil. If it be said these were conspiracies having their origin elsewhere, the laws of extradition can be invoked.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator think that such matter ought to go through the mails?

Mr. THOMAS. I do not, but as I said the other day, in attempting to meet a difficulty of that kind which we can not discriminate against and mention specifically in a law we are apt to inflict a far greater injury upon a hundred million people by giving a power to the Post Office Department that can be utilized, and during war time probably will be utilized, in such a way as to produce a far greater evil than the evil which is sought to be prevented. That is my fear about the operation of this proposed enactment.

Mr. OVERMAN. It applies to nonmailable matter, treasonable in character, anarchistic in character, matter that is trying to arouse the people to insurrection.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, of course I realize what the Senator and the committee are trying to do, and it is most commendable. I realize that they have done the best they could to meet the situation. I am satisfied that if I were to attempt—although I am an objector—to prepare something as a substitute for it in order to eliminate from the phraseology used the things which I fear may result from its enactment into legislation my task would be quite as hopeless as that of the committee seems to have been. But I am not willing, if the larger evil is involved in a lesser one, to strike a blow at the lesser one when the result of it would be to increase the larger. For instance, if a burglar is in a great building in New York or a great building in this city I should hate to set fire to the building in order to secure the arrest of the burglar, in order to apprehend the criminal that the law demands; and yet this attempted legislation appeals to me as something of that sort. In the effort to arrest the creation of one crime we are apt to make all the people of the United States criminals under this law.

Mr. OVERMAN. Would not the same argument the Senator makes against the passage of this law apply to the law preventing obscene literature or lottery tickets going through the mails?

Mr. THOMAS. No, I think not; because obscenity is susceptible of a definite understanding or meaning. Treason is not; it never was. Treason depends upon a statute. I defy anyone to give a comprehensive definition of sedition or anarchy. If there was a concrete thing susceptible in phraseology of exact definition so that we could meet that evil, yes; but you might as well try to detect that coloring in the ocean which makes the water blue to the eye but which does not appear at all when a small portion of it is examined in a vessel as through a law of this kind to make it applicable to concrete things and concrete conditions.

Mr. OVERMAN. What the Senator might think was obscene matter I might not.

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, no; the legal definitions of the term are well known.

Mr. OVERMAN. So are the legal definitions of every word in this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. I have never yet been able to find a comprehensive definition of such general terms as sedition or anarchy. Many years ago a republic was regarded as anarchistic.

Mr. OVERMAN. That has been stricken out.

Mr. HUSTING. Before the Senator gets from that subject, may I invite his attention to this fact? I am in possession of what purports to be a true copy of resolutions adopted by the Socialist Party of St. Louis some time ago, and among other things the resolutions provide, in substance—and these are majority resolutions adopted—for mass resistance to the draft if one should be instituted. The term "mass resistance" in socialistic parlance, as I understand it, means assembly, forcible resistance, rioting, and things of that kind; in other words, mass resistance means forcible resistance to the draft. I am also informed upon good authority that there is being circulated among the Socialists of the United States a referendum which, if adopted, will stand as the policy of the Socialist Party.

I merely cite that as an instance of something that is now going on in the country by which the Socialist Party, or the representatives of the party assembled in St. Louis, is counseling forcible resistance to the draft when it shall be instituted. Before this discussion is ended I am going to have this set of resolutions entered in the RECORD.

Mr. OVERMAN. Along that line I wish to say I am informed that patriotic postmasters all over this country are informing the Postmaster General here that matters of this kind are being mailed of a most treasonable and outrageous character, and they want to know what to do, whether to stop them or not. I could bring loads of this stuff in here, but I do not want to encumber the RECORD. At this very day and during the war people are having this stuff sent to them, arousing their minds against the Government. Are we going to let that go on or are we going to stop it?

Mr. BORAH. Of course, we all agree that certain kinds of material which we have been discussing ought not to go through the mails, yet at the same time it is perfectly useless to talk about stopping the dissemination and interchange of thought and views upon these questions among the people of the United States, and the more you dam up the stream the more liable you are to have a flood when it breaks over.

They tried this proposition during the Civil War, and it is conceded now that every effort made at that time to suppress a free expression upon questions with reference to the draft and other questions wrought a greater evil than would have resulted if their discussion had been permitted.

Mr. OVERMAN. We ought to stop this stuff from going through the mail. The Postmaster General admits, as he has said in this letter, that he is not authorized to do it, and he wants this authority.

Mr. BORAH. Just a word. One of the wise things——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho has already spoken once on this amendment.

Mr. BORAH. I was not in the Chamber when the unanimous-consent agreement was adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It provides that no Senator shall speak more than once on any amendment, and the Senator has already spoken.

Mr. BORAH. I shall ask a question of a Senator, then, at some other time.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I hope that section 1 of Chapter XII will remain in the bill just as it is.

This section has been the subject of some severe criticism. It has been urged that it is unconstitutional, that it confers unprecedented powers on the head of the Department, that it violates or will lead to a violation of the rights and liberties of the individual. So far no section of the bill has been more vigorously condemned unless it is that part of section 2 of the espionage chapter commonly called the censorship provision.

The section under consideration forbids the use of the mails for the purpose of inducing, promoting, or furthering the violation of any of the many offenses described in the preceding sections of the bill. The offenses are all offenses against the United States—the Federal Government. The mails are an instrumentality of the General Government. Is it proper or reasonable that Congress having, in the public interest, and for the national safety, and within its constitutional authority, declared certain acts to be crimes against the United States should at the same time proceed to declare that the mails over which it has control shall not be used to aid in the commission of such crimes? I think this is a fair statement of the proposition involved. These protests against restrictions upon individual liberties, this fear that in the stress of war we may do something that will imperil that liberty, I heartily appreciate, but I am solicitous to know whether there will be in the enactment of this section any real danger to liberty and whether the criticisms and protests so eloquently made will stand the test of reason.

I shall not have time to cover the whole ground by any means, but I propose to examine a few of the sections of the bill, point out briefly the nature of the offense set forth, and then submit the proposition as to whether section 1, relating to the use of the mails, is reasonable and justifiable.

The first offense described in the bill is one which arises from a violation of the proclamation or Executive order of the President or of the rules or regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury made in pursuance of such proclamation or order. The occasion for the proclamation is best stated in the terms of the bill itself:

> Whenever the President of the United States shall by proclamation or Executive order declare a national emergency to exist by reason of actual or threatened war, insurrection, or invasion, or threatened disturbance to the international relations of the United States.

It is then on the making of such proclamation or order that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and empowered to make, subject to the approval of the President, rules and regulations governing the anchorage and movement of vessels, foreign and domestic, in the waters of the United States, to inspect such vessels, to place guards on the same; and if necessary to preserve such vessels from injury, or if necessary to prevent obstruction or injury to any harbor or waters of the United States, or if necessary to secure the obligations of the United States under the law of nations, the Secretary of the Treasury is, by the terms of the bill, further empowered with the consent of the President to take possession and control of such vessels and to remove therefrom the officers and crew.

The offense consists in the refusal or failure by any owner, agent, master, or person in charge, or member of the crew of any such vessel to comply with the proclamation or order of the President or any regulation, rule, or order of the Secretary of the Treasury, or the obstruction or interference of the exercise of any power conferred upon the Secretary. The commission of the offense is limited by the terms of the bill to the persons named. The commission of the offense involves seizure and forfeiture of the vessel to the United States, it involves punishment as for an infamous crime.

Let us remember the conditions and the elements of the offense and ask ourselves the question as to whether the mails of the United States should be open and free for any communication from one person to another for the purpose of inducing, promoting, or furthering this grave offense, an offense committed in violation of a proclamation and of regulations made in a case of great emergency or to avert possible or probable national danger and to secure the public safety. What is our answer? Should the United States mails be used to further the commission of this offense?

Offense No. 2 is another offense relating to vessels within the territorial waters of the United States. It can be committed by the owner or master or any other person in charge or command of any private vessel, foreign or domestic, or by any member of the crew of such vessel. The offense itself consists in willfully causing or permitting the destruction or injury of such vessel or willfully permitting such vessel to be used as a place of resort for persons conspiring to commit a crime against the United States or in violation of the treaties of the United States or of the obligations of the United States under the law of nations or knowingly to permit such vessels to be used in violation of the rights of the United States under the law of nations. The penalty; the seizure and forfeiture of the vessel so used and the punishment of the owner, master, or person in charge or command thereof by fine and imprisonment.

There then is the law, meant to protect ships in our ports from wanton, willful destruction, meant in a time of peril and of need to protect transportation facilities, meant to protect the commerce for a hungry world, meant to enable us to fulfill our sacred treaty obligations or our obligations under the law of nations.

What is your answer? Shall the mails of the United States, this great instrumentality of government for the convenience and welfare of the people, be made a vehicle to circumvent the law, to aid conspirators and traitors in violating the law? That is the simple question, as it occurs to me, with reference to nearly every offense named in this act.

Now come—passing over this briefly, and I shall not undertake, of course, to discuss all of these numerous offenses—the offenses under the famous espionage chapter of the bill. The first relates to the attempt to obtain information respecting the national defenses (now note the words), "With intent or knowledge that the information to be obtained is to be used for the injury of the United States or to the advantage of any foreign nation." Anyone who commits any of the acts specified in the first subdivision of section 1 of said chapter shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years or both. Numerous acts are specified, any one of which will constitute the offense, but the essential thing is that the acts are committed in the attempt to secure information to be used to the injury of the United States, to secure information respecting the national defenses to be used to the injury of the United States or to the advantage of any foreign nation.

Subdivision (b) of said section makes it an offense subject to like penalty to make or obtain or attempt to make or obtain copies, sketches, photographs, and so forth, of anything connected with the national defense with the like intent or knowledge that the information so obtained is to be used to the injury of the United States or to the advantage of any foreign nation.

Subdivision (c) of the same section is directed against the act of receiving or obtaining or agreeing or attempting or aiding another to receive from any person or from any source any document, writing, code book, signal book, sketch, photograph, and so forth, of anything connected with the national defense, with the like intent or knowledge that the information thus afforded is to be used to the injury of the United States or to the advantage of any foreign nation, and the person committing such offense is, under the terms of the bill, to be punished as in the other cases provided. It might be said that none of these acts of espionage are strictly treasonable, since they do not involve the levying of war against the United States; nor do they necessarily involve, although I think they may involve, the adhering to the enemies of the United States and giving them aid and comfort. If not strictly treasonable, they are all acts, when committed with the knowledge and intent defined in the bill, which approach the treasonable, because they relate to information in regard to the national defense obtained that the same might be used to the injury of the United States or to the benefit of a foreign nation. It is difficult to conceive of the information being used to the injury of the United States without its being of advantage to a foreign nation between which and our own Nation there is a state of war, actual or imminent.

What objection can there be to prohibiting the use of the mails of the United States for the purpose of inducing, promoting, or furthering any of such treasonable or near treasonable acts? Many of these acts belong to that peculiar category of acts in the commission of which the mails would be most likely to be used—in the transmission of writings, plans, sketches, photographs, and so forth, and communications and directions in regard to the procurement of the same. With the Government supreme in the matter of the transmission, regulation, and control of the mails, why should it not exercise its power in the interests of national safety and deny the use of the mails to the furtherance of any treacherous scheme which in any way imperils that safety?

The next two subdivisions of section 1 of the espionage chapter are related to the foregoing. They refer to the possession or control of documents, photographs, signal books, sketches, code books, prints, and so forth, relating to the national defense and the communication of the same or their contents to any person not lawfully entitled to receive them and to the refusal to deliver the same to any officer or employee of the United States entitled to receive them and to permission wrongfully given for the removal of the same from its proper place of custody in violation of a trust, and so forth. For any such act or omission, the party guilty is subjected to a fine of not less than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years. The element of intent or knowledge that the information to be used to the injury of the United States or advantage of any foreign nation is omitted from these two subdivisions.

But it must be remembered that the writing, signal books, code books, and so forth, described in these subdivisions all relate to the national defense; that their absolute secrecy, so far as any foreign nation is concerned, may be absolutely vital to the success and safety of that defense at any time. The revelations made of the network of German espionage in this country from the time of the beginning of the war and before, the extreme anxiety of German emissaries to know the extent of our national resources and our national defenses, illustrate the necessity of strictly safeguarding all information of the character described in these subdivisions, and Congress would be remiss in its duty unless it prescribed severe penalties for willfully communicating or transmitting such information to any person not entitled to receive it or who, even through gross negligence, permits the same to be removed from its proper place of custody. If anything should, by law, be made criminal negligence, it is the act or omission described in subdivision (e).

Is it unreasonable that in a matter of so much importance to the national welfare Congress should deny the use of the mails of the United States to those unlawfully seeking or furnishing such information?

Mr. President, I forbear taking up the other offenses named in this bill, but they are, in the main, we may say, of the same general character. If the use of the mails should be prohibited with reference to inducing or promoting one offense, it should be to all the rest.

Why, Senators, shall we do less for the General Government in the enforcement of its laws than we are willing to do for the States in helping them to enforce theirs? The mere publication of any obscene or indecent print, writing, model, or figure is not made an offense against the United States. It is an offense only against the laws of the State in which committed. It is to aid in the observance and enforcement of the State law that the use of the mail for the transmission of offensive publications is denied.

Again, the maintenance of a lottery or gift enterprise is prohibited by no law of the United States, but I venture that every State in the Union now makes, under severe penalty, the lottery business unlawful. To forbid the carrying of lottery tickets by mail is to supplement and fortify the State law, but the control and regulation of the mails is an exclusively Federal function, and most properly is that function exercised as an aid to the State and to good morals of the people of the State as they find expression in the State laws.

It is a State law, which provides for the most part a mere civil remedy against the fraud within its jurisdiction by which its citizens or others are injured; but the Federal statute prohibits the use of the mails in the furtherance of fraudulent enterprises carried on within a State.

What Congress has done in aid of the prohibition laws of the various States is analogous to the situation here, and but recently we enacted a law forbidding the use of the mails to carry liquor advertisements into those States which prohibited such advertising.

What reason exists for not protecting the General Government by denying the use of the mails for the purpose of inducing or aiding in the violation of Federal law?

Referring to what was said this morning, Mr. President, about the peculiar language of section 1, Chapter XII, prohibiting the use of the mails for any communication intended to induce, promote, or further any of the crimes named in this act, the expression used providing that this matter shall be nonmailable is essentially the same as that in the Federal statute relating to obscene matter; it means the same thing exactly as does the language in the lottery statute; it means the same thing exactly as does the language of the Federal statute in regard to the promotion of frauds through the mails.

It has been urged here in opposition to this measure that the Postmaster General will have the right to intercept mail, to break the seal and open the mail, to read the mail, and thus interfere with the business and liberties of the individual citizen. Mr. President, under the lottery statute, under the obscene-literature statute, under the fraud statute, the Postmaster General is not directed, is not commanded, and is not even authorized to open the mail of anybody in order to prevent a violation of any of those several statutes. Senators in their opposition to this section seem to assume that section 1 is meaningless and absolutely without force unless the Postmaster General has the authority to open mails generally or to direct the opening of mails as they pass through the various post offices of the country. Nothing can be further from the truth. Again and again have convictions been had for using the mails with intent to promote a fraudulent enterprise; likewise convictions for using the mails to permit lottery or gift enterprise schemes, without the opening of the mails but upon the testimony furnished by some one who saw the letter mailed or by the party to whom the mail was sent and to whom it was delivered by the postmaster.

The statute has been read here this morning at the instance of the acting chairman of the committee in charge of the bill, showing the penalties visited upon post-office authorities, agents, and clerks in interfering or tampering with the mail, and in any case under this statute the opening of the mail or any of it by the Postmaster General or by any postmaster in the United States under his direction, he not having been authorized to open it, would be at his peril.

A man of straw is set up in an argument of that kind. As I have said, practically the same language is used in regard to other Federal statutes, and no substantial charge has yet been made to the effect that the power has been abused, or rather that the Postmaster General has assumed a power that he did not have under a like statute.

So, Mr. President, it appeals to me as most reasonable that in the class of offenses described in this act aimed, as they are, at the national defense and safety, treasonable in character, as many of them are, the use of the mails, that great instrumentality of government, should be prohibited to those who, through them, would promote and further crimes of this kind against the Government.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, before the Senator concludes, will he permit me to make an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. Chapter XI, section 1, provides for the issuance of search warrants to discover any papers "intended to be held, secured, or used in violation of or in aid of a violation of any penal law of the United States." What does the Senator interpret the phrase "penal law" to mean? Does it include the violation of any of the excise laws, the internal-revenue laws, the laws relating to the income tax, or the laws relating to the elections of the country? I allude to sections of the United States Statutes under which certain prosecutions have been had, notably in Terre Haute, Ind. Does the term "penal law" include such laws or others?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, not having given particular study to the word "penal" as used here, and knowing, too, that it is perhaps susceptible of different constructions, I am inclined to think that it not only includes criminal statutes, properly so called, but that it includes those statutes in which a penalty, as, for example, a forfeiture, is imposed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Or fine or imprisonment?

Mr. STERLING. I think so. That would be my view.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I think the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] applies the right interpretation when he says that it would include any act containing a penal section. It would include all of the internal-revenue laws of the country and all of the laws relating to customs duties. It would include the laws relating to the income tax, to the returns made or required to be made under the income-tax law, and generally all excise laws. It would include any of the provisions of the revenue act passed at the last session of the Sixty-fourth Congress. It would include any violation of the election laws of the United States; it would include all violations contrary to the section relating to conspiracies against the United States in which any two or more persons who combine to do an act injurious to the United States shall be deemed to have violated the portion of the statute in which this section is found. Under that section certain persons were indicted in Terre Haute, Ind., and convicted. It was an interpretation applied for the first time in those cases of an illegal act in elections committed so as to injure the United States. It was contended that corrupt elections or practices at the general election in November, 1912, were injurious to the United States. Possibly the gentleman who drew the original bill, which afterwards passed into the law, many district attorneys who interpreted and applied it, and some courts, after its passage, did not think that this section related to illegal elections; but it was so applied by Judge Anderson in the Terre Haute cases, in the trials held at Indianapolis, and the judgments imposed were sustained by the court of appeals for the seventh district in an opinion written by Judge Alschuler, of Chicago, in the court of appeals, concurred in by his associate judges. It was held that corrupt practices at elections for United States officers had injured the United States, and so had violated that provision. So it would include in the penal statutes certain acts that refer to the November elections. It might have referred to things that occurred in November, 1916. I refer to these matters because this widens considerably the scope of the supposed violations referred to in this bill.

The bill heretofore considered by the Senate before striking out all after the enacting words and substituting the House bill had even a wider application than the present section. Section 1 of Chapter II, the section referring to the same matter before the Senate in the original Senate bill No. 2, refers to the violation of any law of the United States. That has been somewhat narrowed or limited by the phrase "violation of any penal law of the United States." I am seeking to interpret the phrase "penal law," so that we may properly know the scope of this section before it shall finally pass into the statutes of the United States.

I have indicated by a very cursory reference to certain general statutes, not apparently, but which really are, within the scope of this bill, the very wide territory covered by this expression.

Relating now to the part of the bill referring to the use of the mails, it is provided in section 1, Chapter XII, that "every letter, writing, circular, postal card," and so forth, describing many other forms of written matter, "or thing, of any kind, in violation of any of the provisions of this act, or intended or calculated to induce, promote, or further any of the acts or things by any provision of this act declared unlawful," shall be nonmailable, to summarize it.

The section I have referred to in Chapter II provides for the issue of search warrants "to discover any property or papers, held, secured, or used, or intended to be held, secured, or used, in violation of or in aid of a violation of any penal law of the United States." I would have no objection, Mr. President, to extending the penalty to any act, any property, or any document to be used in aid of or in giving comfort to an enemy in time of war; but not only does this section cover the particular inhibition named but it covers a vast scope of penal statutes or sections that are penal in character in the revenue laws, both as relating to the internal revenue and the customs revenue, the election laws, conspiracies, and a great many other statutes of the United States containing provisions that are penal in character and providing for either fine or imprisonment, some of them merely misdemeanors and some of them made felonies.

So this provision covers a great deal more than the punishment of those adhering to or giving aid and comfort to the public enemy in time of war. It goes further than the punishment of mere treason. I am willing to support all reasonable measures designed to punish treason, designed to punish or to prohibit the performance of acts that will give any material help to the enemy in time of war. What I now inquire is the practical application of section 1 of Chapter XII in connection with the sweeping language in section 1 of Chapter XI, "in violation of any penal law of the United States."

Section 1 of Chapter XI provides not only that a search warrant may be issued upon complaint and affidavit in the usual way but that any premises or persons may be searched to discover any property or papers held or intended to be held not only for the maintenance of the public enemies, or giving them encouragement, but papers or premises intended to be used in violation of any penal law of the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCUMBER. Going to the genesis of that word as used in this particular section, the Senator will remember that as the bill was introduced in the Senate it read in this way:

In aid or violation of any law of the United States.

That meant civil laws of the United States and criminal or penal laws of the United States, and it was thought, on a discussion in the Senate, that it ought to be limited to those laws which were of such gravity as to be denominated criminal laws or for which a penalty had been established. Therefore, the use of the word "penal" was simply restrictive of the law as it was introduced in the first instance.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; the Senator, I think, is correct about that. That is the way I would interpret the language, and I think that is what it fairly means, and that the change was made for that purpose. I think it ought to be further restricted so that it would confine the inhibited acts to what is ordinarily comprised in the word "treason" or in adhering to the public enemies in time of war and giving them material assistance or information.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois, he undoubtedly having considered the several acts or offenses described in this bill, whether there would be objection to limiting it, considering the nature of the offenses described in the bill, to those offenses?

Mr. SHERMAN. I should be very glad if it would be limited in that way, so that we might in this bill provide punishment for treason. I think the public have in mind, and I think many of the Senators have in mind, the definition and punishment of acts which constitute treason. Now, under the guise of that, somebody has drawn this bill and presented it here. It was not drawn by Senators entirely. The inspiring motive came from elsewhere, and the language of the bill came from somewhere else. Under the cover of the indignation and the public spirit there is against acts which constitute treason they have enlarged the provisions of the proposed law until it embraces many things that relate only to the ordinary penal laws that are in operation in time of peace.

If it were limited to acts that are treasonable in character, I would have no criticism. I think if it were merely treasonable acts we could constitutionally as well as properly, in view of the circumstances, go further than we could in ordinary times; that the seizure of persons, the search of places, and the seizing of property and documents might properly in times of war go much further than in times of peace, and still I think the courts would find a way to interpret and apply such laws as being within constitutional limitations. However, when we undertake to go beyond what is ordinary treason, and to apply to the laws that are civil in character, with penal sections in them, provisions of this kind, to extend search warrants to such cases, and to make the papers that are connected with such violations of the ordinary laws in time of peace nonmailable, we are attempting, under the guise of public peril, to legislate in matters that are purely private and that are made for the purpose of safeguarding persons and property in time of peace.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will have in mind the fact that the remedy, if it may be called a remedy, by search warrant has been largely extended by special statutes. For instance, search warrants are allowed in cases of obscene publications, in cases of gambling, and for the purpose of seizing liquor sold in violation of the law, so there seems to be some tendency to extend the use of the search warrant to other offenses.

Mr. SHERMAN. In proper cases search warrants may be used.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. We have those laws independently of the pending bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. No; we have not, independently of statutes—United States statues, of course.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is impossible to make a record when two Senators are talking at once. To whom does the Senator yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. To the Senator from Colorado, until he concludes his inquiry.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to add to what has been said by the Senator from South Dakota that such statutes are ample for those particular purposes, and no Federal law is needed.

Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. STERLING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield first to the Senator from South Dakota, and afterwards I will yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I did not cite these cases as examples of Federal statutes at all, but to show that in our States and State legislation the tendency is to extend the use of the search warrant.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply wanted to suggest to the Senator that that whole matter was debated at length when that section was before the Senate before, and it was sustained practically, as I understood the arguments, upon the assumption that inasmuch as the States provided for search warrants in almost every class of crime or proposed crime, the United States Statutes should be sufficiently broadened to allow the use of search warrants for the discovery of any intended criminal offense against the United States as well in peace as in war times; and that was the basis on which it was adopted before.

Mr. SHERMAN. I heard a large part of the discussion; not all of it. I wish to say in that connection—not with any desire of going over the arguments again, because it serves no useful purpose here—that I make to that the same objection I made to the other proposed measure in this bill. In all of the conditions or the threatened acts that are sought to be reached by this additional legislation, if they relate to treason or to acts that encourage the public enemy, I am not disposed to criticize a fair extension of the right of search warrants so as to apprehend any threatened commission of the crime of treason. I think, as the Senator from South Dakota has said, that if we can search for counterfeit money, counterfeting apparatus, nonmailable matter, such as lottery tickets, obscene literature, and the like, if this bill were confined to acts that constitute treason if executed, or that contemplate by some person or number of persons the perpetration of acts which, if executed, would constitute treason, search warrants might properly issue in such cases in anticipation of the commission of the crime, in order to prevent it.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, just one suggestion, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. Many of these offenses will not be, perhaps, committed by any who can commit treason, because the persons do not owe allegiance to the United States to begin with, and it is only a person who owes allegiance in the first place that can be guilty of treason. I think present conditions or very recent conditions in our country, anyhow, in regard to the work of certain spies and emmissaries would go to show that, and that with reference to persons of that class search warrants should issue, although because of alienage they could not be convicted of treason.

Mr. SHERMAN. Aliens not citizens of the United States, or those who have not declared their intention to become citizens—by the way, the Army bill includes as subject to military service those who have declared their intention to become citizens, although not taking out their final papers, so that narrows the class of aliens somewhat—but aliens are subject to the municipal law of the sovereignty in which they live. If any existing law or any law enacted in this Congress or hereafter should be broken by an alien, he is liable. If there is any statute either of the State or of the United States Government now broken by an alien, he is liable to punishment. He is not exempt by reason of the mere fact that he owes his allegiance to some other sovereignty. The only thing is that he would not himself be guilty of treason, because he owes us no allegiance, as stated by the Senator; but he can be fully punished, to the extent of death or any term of imprisonment in the penitentiary or any fines or forfeitures that may be sought to be inflicted upon him, if he violates the law of the country in which he is found. If, however, a citizen of this country commits the same act, it may or may not be treason, according to the nature of the final wording of this bill, or under existing laws.

I doubt very much whether there is any law in this country at the present time that would punish anybody for treason outside of State laws. I think that was pretty fully ascertained at the close of the Civil War. There was a good deal of talk about prosecuting Jefferson Davis when he was confined at Fortress Monroe. Horace Greeley, who was then the editor and principal owner of the New York Tribune, signed Jefferson Davis's bail bond, and he was set at liberty. The question was about the prosecution of many of those who had borne arms against the United States, or held office in the Confederate Government, and had been arrayed, by their civil acts, against the maintenance of the Union. There was, it is sufficient to say, no prosecution for treason growing out of the Civil War. There was no statute in existence, many good lawyers said at that time, that would punish anybody for treason, although setting up a separate government known as the Confederate States of America and levying war against the United States would be as much treason, if statutes had existed at that time or any law known to our Constitution had been violated, as if a citizen now gave help to the public enemy.

So I anticipate that it takes some kind of affirmative legislation to create the crime of treason in this country, even as against a citizen of the United States. What I do not approve, so far as I have a voice in the matter, is that these violations are not confined to treason. The matter that is to be excluded from the mails refers back to the violation of the various sections and inhibitions of the printed bill. If it should refer merely in the bill to the violations for treason, I might reconcile myself with the support of such a measure. It does not, however. It is sought to put that on a level with nonmailable matter, such as lottery tickets, and other matters that I need not enumerate. That is true; but the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has very properly called attention to the fact that all those matters are now sufficiently provided for by law.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. WALSH. I think it is altogether regrettable, if the Senator will pardon me for so saying, that we should go back and thrash over these matters that we supposed had been disposed of. The suggestion that the Senator makes was all talked over at that time. It was discussed here, and the sentiment of the Senate was taken upon it. The trouble about it is that it is not taken care of by local laws. At the time the search-warrant chapter was before the Senate attention was called to the fact that crimes are often committed in this country in places under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, and you can not prosecute those crimes under the local statutes, and you can not have a search warrant under any local or State statute.

Take an Indian reservation, for instance. Property is stolen on an Indian reservation and is held on an Indian reservation. You can not get out any search warrant under the local laws to seize that property. That matter was all talked of and discussed here and debated until the Senate finally reached a conclusion upon the matter.

So, Mr. President, with reference to the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois now about confining this matter of search warrants to cases of treason. It was shown at that time that the laws of the various States now permit a search warrant to seize property that is intended to be used in the violation of law, of a penal law particularly; and we simply want to give to the Federal authorities exactly the same right to issue search warrants that is given by general statutes to States. I fear the Senator from Illinois was not here when that subject was debated.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will say to the Senator that I read it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I was not in condition at that time to hear everything.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, at that time the attention of the Senate was called to——

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust I do not lose the floor. This is not in the nature of an interrogatory, but I apprehend the rule will not be very strictly applied.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rule will not be enforced until some Senator asks that it be enforced.

Mr. WALSH. The attention of the Senate at that time was called to the penal code of the State of California, which is the basis of the code of practically every Western State, which provides that—

> A search warrant may be issued to seize property when it is in the possession of any person with the intent to use it as a means of committing a public offense.

Now, if the State of California and every other Western State authorizes the issuance of a search warrant to seize property that is to be used in the commission of a public offense, why should not the Federal law authorize the issuance of a search warrant to seize property to be utilized in the commission of a public offense against the United States?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I was not aware, in my virgin ignorance, that any discussion had foreclosed and settled beyond a peradventure, before a final roll call on a bill, any matter of discussion here. I was laboring under the somewhat frivolous impression that in an open forum and in the United States Senate no Senator settled for me the discussion of the provisions of any penal statute, and I think so yet; and I deny the right of any Senator or combination of Senators to foreclose by discussion my right, when I get the floor, to say what I think about certain provisions. I will get to this matter about your State laws in a moment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. I rose to speak to the Senator, because I know that he does not always hear what transpires in the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is correct; but I can still read the English language and understand rudimentary expressions.

Mr. WALSH. I simply feared that the Senator was not aware that the subject had been debated and discussed and a vote been taken upon that question.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was in executive session, a part of it. All that was published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I heard, and some of my friends, who are Members of the Senate, gave me fairly accurate reports of what I did not hear. I think I am fairly well informed about the proceedings in executive session, although I was not here during all of them; and sometimes I could not, because of what I hope is a temporary infirmity, it is true, hear the arguments that were offered. But however that may be, I have not understood that these matters have been finally disposed of. I know of no conference by Republican Senators seeking to foreclose all further action upon this measure, and if there had been such a conference it would not bind me. I would still do as I pleased. I do not apprehend, if that is so, that any conference of Democratic Senators could bind me. In fact, whatever might have been done in executive session—and I did not understand that that could be talked about——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois further yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. I want to correct the Senator. The discussion did not take place in executive session at all. The search-warrant chapter was discussed and debated and voted upon in open session.

Mr. SHERMAN. All of that I have read long before this, and it is "love's labor lost." I supposed something had taken place here in executive session of great pith and moment, that was of such paramount importance that it could not be discussed by vulgar tongues and heard by vulgar ears. Therefore, I was willing, for my part, to be instructed. I have not heard anything yet that has added to the light that might be shed upon this particular question.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, the Senator is aware also that we are now discussing another bill, which was introduced yesterday as a substitute.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMAS. And, consequently, nobody could be foreclosed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have understood that all after the enacting words were stricken out and the House bill was inserted. That was done in order to expedite legislation, or was supposed to be done for that purpose.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senate bill was inserted.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

The conditions under which search warrants may be issued under the statutes of various States lend no significance to the proposed legislation in this bill. The search warrants of different States are for certain enumerated crimes that are defined in the criminal codes of the several States. Under existing State statutes, even if they are to be construed in harmony with acts of Congress, and the act of Congress might be supplementary, if we could adopt the laws of the States, as we sometimes do codes of procedure or matters of written pleadings, it might be that that would supplement the matter somewhat. Penal laws can not be so enacted usually. But that is not intended by this bill. It is said that there is nothing known to existing United States statutes under which treason can be punished, and that it is sought to provide that by extending the right of issuing search warrants and of declaring certain crimes to be violations of the laws of the United States.

Suppose that to be the condition. We must first declare, in a statute to be made here and in the House, what the crime of treason is. I do not care how much it has been discussed here; this is the first time I have had the floor on this question, and I do not intend to take it again, unless it is necessary in explanation of what I say here this afternoon. There is no crime of treason now. Assume that. It is sought by the bill to create such a crime and to issue search warrants so that such crime may be prohibited and properly punished. If that be the intention, then write this bill so as to define treason and provide for its punishment. So write the bill that search warrants shall then be limited to taking documents and searching the places and persons so as to prevent or punish the commission of treason. Then you have limited the bill considerably.

I undertake to say that I can not use the United States mails under the section on nonmailable matter if it should become a law. Under section 1 of Chapter XI, extending search warrants to all of the penal laws of the United States, I will write a letter that will be nonmailable and will express my solemn convictions upon such a section if it be enacted into a statute. There are the excise laws. When a cigar box is used, the excise laws require the retail dealer to cancel the revenue stamp on the lid of the box or on the box itself when he breaks the package. Not to do so is punishable by a fine. There is a similar provision with regard to the use of a stamp on a beer barrel, and punishment is prescribed for allowing it to be taken off or not to be canceled at the time it is used, and in like manner with all malt or alcoholic liquors. Suppose I have in my safe the evidence on which I could be convicted, if I be a saloon keeper, of not canceling one of the stamps on the cigar box or some original container of intoxicating liquor. I have violated, it is true, the excise laws of the United States. Suppose I have not made a correct return of my income tax. Suppose I violated the election law last November, the section referred to in the Terre Haute (Ind.) prosecutions, and that the ballots or the correspondence or telegrams or memoranda are in my safe in my office at home or in the city of Washington in the Senate Office Building. It is a violation of a penal law of the United States. It is in no way connected with the war question. As the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] suggested, they are laws that were enforced before war was declared, relating to the ordinary civil affairs of the country, having penal provisions for fine, imprisonment, jail, or penitentiary, running all the way from misdemeanors to felonies.

Now, with these in mind, suppose some irresponsible man in the United States attorney's office in the fifth internal-revenue district of Illinois, in which I live, swears out on me a search warrant. It is put in the hands of a deputy marshal or a marshal. He goes to my place of business, and whether I am present or absent makes no difference. He breaks down my office door, he blows open my safe, he abstracts my papers. He takes from my safe all stocks, bonds, securities, and investments of every kind, and impounds them in a court room in the custody of a clerk of the United States district court. He keeps them there at pleasure until the United States attorney has me indicted, gets ready for trial, and tries me, and uses my papers so taken against me.

Not one step under the provisions of this section has been taken under any war measure or under any changed condition brought about because of the declaration of war. It is a condition that existed whether war was declared or not. It is a part of the ordinary civil and penal procedure of the country in time of peace.

Under those conditions what are the rights of a citizen of the United States? I say here with a due sense of the responsibility that if I am in my law office under the provisions of section 1 of Chapter XII, and advice is sought, I know how to give it. If a client's private papers are to be abstracted, if his safe is to be broken open, if his desk is to be rifled, if his person is to be seized when he is charged with crime other than treason, if his pockets shall be searched, the contents of his pocket removed and impounded to be used as evidence against him; if a client under those conditions, Mr. President, asks me for advice, I will give it. I will tell him to load his firearms and shoot any United States marshal who crosses his threshold for such purposes, if he desires to proceed to that extremity. That is the kind of advice I will give him in my office, and it is the kind of advice I will write him in a letter and put in the United States mail if he asks me for advice by mail.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, the Senator is familiar with the provisions of section 3, under which a warrant under certain conditions may be served in the nighttime, and under such a warrant a man's house may be invaded and his wife's wardrobe and other articles of clothing, her bureau, and all those articles of furniture which are common in a domestic dwelling can be subject to search in the nighttime, independently of the illustration which the Senator has given as to what may occur to a man at his office.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly. Mr. President, there is no limitation in the bill as to the time the search or seizure is to be made, either of the place or property or the person. Under the arbitrary provisions of this bill any man's wife may be taken under a warrant sworn out by an irresponsible person in the United States attorney's office and searched at night, his home may be broken down, if this bill be good law, and every paper in his house may be removed and impounded and offered in evidence against him on an offense that may be punishable by death under the provisions of other chapters of the bill.

That is the kind of a bill that is written here and carried far beyond the war measure. It is not merely a question of punishing a person in defending against the public enemy, but under the guise of this very necessary thing, and about which I apprehend there will be no substantial difference of opinion here, there is the most irresponsible exercise of power sought to be used that has ever been seen proposed in the Senate Chamber since it was organized.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. I feel loath to interrupt the Senator again to say to the Senator that the necessity for a statute in relation to search warrants did not address itself to the Judiciary Committee in connection with the war at all.

The necessity for a statute of that character was impressed upon us by reason of a bill introduced by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] more than two years ago. From that time down to this we have been endeavoring to frame a search-warrant statute. The statute before us although it was incorporated in the general bill originated before the war began, and was not intended at all to apply only to war conditions. It arose before the war was entered on.

Mr. SHERMAN. The mere fact——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me a little further?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. I think the Senator in studying the first section of the bill will scarcely want us to take seriously the views that his papers can be rifled. The only paper that can be taken like the property that can be taken is a paper or property, not that contains evidence that the crime is going to be committed, but that it is actually used or to be used in the commission of the crime.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to any evidence of that kind.

Mr. WALSH. That is the statute.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill is not so written. That is the difficulty.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator is arguing upon the basis that it is not, but a study of it will prove that it was. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], I think, perhaps has some views upon that subject which he expressed the other day. It was carefully studied by him and I think he is satisfied that that is the case.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill as it is now inserted after the enacting words contains no such limitations, and especially the part that relates to the nonmailable matter, which relates back to all the penal provisions of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, I am speaking now about the search-warrant statute, not the nonmailable statute. The proposed search-warrant statute reads——

Mr. SHERMAN. I have that before me.

Mr. WALSH (reading)—

> A search warrant may be issued in conformity with the provisions of this act for the purpose of searching any premises or person to discover any property or papers held, secured, or used, or intended to be held, secured, or used, in violation of or in aid of a violation of any law of the United States, or of a treaty of the United States, or of the rights or obligations of the United States under the law of nations.

The very paper, just like the very piece of property, must be intended to be used in the commission of a crime. It is not the evidence that the crime was committed at all that the statute refers to.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator has read correctly the section to which the nonmailable section refers, because it refers back to all the other sections, to any provision of the bill. So it necessarily includes Chapter XI, does it not?

Mr. WALSH. Chapter XI does not define any offense at all, except in paragraph——

Mr. SHERMAN. In section 1, Chapter XII.

Mr. WALSH. Section 1 does not define any offense at all. Section 7 of that chapter defines an offense; that is all.

Mr. SHERMAN. Section 1 uses the following language:

> Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book, or other publication, matter, or thing, of any kind in violation of any of the provisions of this act, or intended or calculated to induce, promote, or further any of the acts or things by any provision of this act declared unlawful, is hereby declared to be nonmailable matter, and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier.

This section is not a penal section, except it excludes from the United States mails any of the matter that is in violation of the provisions of the bill, and that goes back over Chapter XI and all the preceding chapters in which there is any prohibited thing, any prohibited act, or any prohibited document.

The search-warrant provision applies in express terms to "papers used * * * in violation of any law of the United States." This relates specifically to past acts. The offenses are completed and documentary evidence in the possession of the accused is sought to be taken by such a warrant. It is not merely papers that relate to contemplated crimes not yet committed.

To recur now to the language of section 1 of Chapter XI, it not only refers to the newly created offenses under the provisions of this bill, but it refers to any penal statute of the United States.

Now, keeping that in mind, I am going back to where I left off the application under many penal statutes or penal sections in civil law which are in force by way of prosecution, by information or indictment on the criminal side of the district courts. There are a multiplicity of things that are referred to and prohibited now, without any regard to the provisions of this bill. The search warrants contemplated by this section are carried over to existing law, and the provisions of the search warrants that are now illegal are sought by this bill to be made illegal upon acts committed in violation of laws that exist at this time and which have existed for many years, not in a state of war but in a state of peace. This application is sought to be made, and not only the penal laws but for a violation of a treaty of the United States.

I have no criticism to make of that. I would not. Some violations inevitably would be made that would disturb our international relations or would interfere with our ability to successfully conduct our war, or in violation of the rights or obligations of the United States under the law of nations.

I would like to stop here a moment and ask if any Senator in the United States Senate knows what the law of nations is to-day. There is not a diplomatic authority in Parliament, not one in the French Chamber of Deputies; there is not an international authority in this country that knows what the international law of the world is to-day. Who can tell what it is on submarines? Who can tell what it is on the use of aircraft or poison gas or poisoning water or food or glass bullets or the law against killing noncombatants? Who knows? You refer to The Hague convention and to various declarations made at different capitals of Europe in the last 15 or 20 years. The law of nations depends upon the nation that is furnishing the interpretation. What we insist is the international law; England, our ally, insists it is not. What is the law of nations on the shipment of peaceable merchandise to a neutral country? We say it is one thing, and England says it is another.

A short time ago a malster in Chicago was under contract to deliver a large quantity of malt in Argentina, which was to be used in the brewing of beer. That is a neutral country. It is all in the Western Hemisphere. It touches no part of the troubled waters of the danger zone created by any order in council or by any imperial decree of the Prussian Government. After we leave our marginal waters every league that a vessel makes in pursuing her appointed voyage is on the open sea of the world until she reaches the marginal waters of the Republic of Argentina.

What was done? Great Britain interdicted the shipping of the cargo—prohibited it. No letters of assurance could be obtained from the British Legation in this capital. The malster was unable to deliver his merchandise because of this embargo laid by a foreign power, now our ally. I am not particularly attempting to promote the brewing of beer. I vote dry myself all the time, both here and at home, but it is merchandise. It was forbidden to be delivered. The embargo stopped its delivery. The contract was turned over to another, who was agreeable to England, who filled the contract at considerable loss to the Chicago malster. The foreigner pocketed the profits. Great Britain is extending her trade in Argentina at our expense and, as I think, in violation of international law; but her admiralty court and her authorities interpret it to be strictly within her right as a belligerent nation.

If we were tried in the courts of England under this section, we would be guilty. If we were tried in the courts of the United States, nobody can tell at this time whether we would be guilty or innocent. We would go to the State Department. We would obtain an interpretation. It would be read as authority; it would be filed in the brief submitted to the court; and we would try to ascertain what the international law of the world was. We would find when we summed it up that the strong nations of the world make the international law of the world to suit their sovereign powers. If we were strong enough, we can make any law and ingraft it as a section in the international law of the world.

Here is a violation in section 1 of chapter 11 that is so indefinite, so vague, so perambulating, so open to construction that I am not willing to enact in penal form any such section. All penal laws are sufficiently difficult of application in specific cases that arise, and this would be made doubly so.

I now wish to return to what I was adverting a while ago. I was temporarily turned aside from it. It is on the nonmailable portion of what might be my correspondence. Does anyone think, under this section, that by a search warrant not connected with treason or any misprision of treason or anything connected with the public enemy in the war in which we are engaged a search warrant can be taken out on my premises and my person and property searched, and both my property and my papers and myself seized for anything not connected with treason or giving aid and comfort to the public enemy? I think not. This bill is in here anew. Whatever discussion has been made of that is connected with the nonmailable provision of the section in question, in the last chapter, and that opens up, by its wide terms, every penal provision or every prohibition there is in any of the substitute bills after the enacting words.

If that be a proper restriction in penal law of the United States, my office can be searched in my absence and all my papers can be taken. For my part, if a client asks me whether that is a valid regulation, if it goes into the United States statutes, I propose to tell him if the offense charged is not connected with treason or in aid of the public enemy it is an invalid section of the law. I propose to advise him by letter or orally if in my office that such a provision is invalid, that he has a right to resist a United States marshal by force to protect the privacy of his home, the sanctity of his person, or his wife, and the protection of his private papers against unwarrantable seizure under the law of the land, superior to the puny fiats of Congress made by the people when they adopted the organic charter under which we live and superior to any attempted artifice or extension of laws in violation of the personal rights secured by the Constitution under which we live. He can carry that defense of his personal property to the extent he sees fit; that is a matter for the person advised; but my own opinion is if he carries it to the stage of inflicting death upon the marshal or deputy marshal seeking to break into his house and take away his papers to be used against him, or to search his person, he is acting strictly within his rights and it is not murder, and he ought to be acquitted under the laws of my country. That is sought to be made, however, a bill worthy to be passed by this Congress.

Many years ago, when John Wilkes was seized under a John Doe warrant, this was settled as a part of the constitution of the mother country. His desk was rifled, his private papers were taken, he was accused of criminal libel in publishing what was known as No. 45 of the North Briton, a paper that criticized many acts of the Government. In the criminal proceedings instituted against him under writs issued under the seal of the secretary, carrying authority equivalent to our Secretary of State at that time, the papers were taken out of his desk and they were sought to be used against him. They were excluded from admission as testimony by the court. He sued the high constable, representing the Crown, for damages. He recovered damages. They were illegally seized.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois has exhausted his hour. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to strike out section 1 is before the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I wish to speak briefly upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK]. I should like to say, without intending to be critical at all, that there are many provisions of the bill which everyone considers, I think, as exceedingly meritorious—provisions that are urgent in their character. We ought, if possible, to expedite the final disposition of the bill, and every Senator ought to be moved, as it seems to me, to assist in perfecting the bill rather than concerning himself with pointing out defects in it without any constructive suggestions in connection with his criticism.

The particular provision under consideration in relation to postal regulations has met with much virulent condemnation. It has been charged that these provisions are violative of the fundamental principles of liberty; that they run counter to our notions of freedom, and that they are entirely unheard of in any of the legislation of this country.

I have before me a copy of the Postal Laws and Regulations, and referring to page 479 thereof I find that nonmailable matter embraces obscene matter made nonmailable by express provision of statute, libelous and indecent matter—bear in mind libelous matter is nonmailable—lottery matter, fraudulent matter, and publications which violate copyrights granted by the United States. All these already are made nonmailable, and, Mr. President, being made nonmailable it is of course within the power of the officers of the postal department to refuse transmission of matter of that character through the mails.

Now, what is proposed by section 1 of the chapter under consideration? I am very glad the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has come into the Chamber, because I want to say a word with respect to some criticism he makes of this chapter. I was inviting the attention of the Senate, I will repeat for the information of the Senator, to the fact that under existing law as disclosed by the work I hold in my hand, the Postal Laws and Regulations, the following is nonmailable matter: Obscene matter, libelous and indecent matter—libelous matter, bear in mind—lottery matter, fraudulent matter, and publications which violate copyrights granted by the United States. Being thus nonmailable the officers of the Postal Department are authorized to exclude this matter from the mails, and by an express permission of the statute to which the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] invited our attention, and to which I shall advert presently, the officers of the Post Office are directed not to transmit any such matter nor to deliver to anybody to whom it may be addressed. Accordingly we intrust to the Postmaster General and his subordinates the right to say whether a certain letter transmitted through the mails is a libel upon me.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WALSH. He is authorized likewise to determine whether matter which is transmitted through the mails is in violation of a copyright which I have. He is authorized under the existing law to determine whether certain matter transmitted through the mails is calculated to defraud; and we all know that it is sometimes the most difficult thing for a court to determine whether particular matter is condemned by that statute or not.

I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. How does the Postmaster General determine the contents of a letter prior to the time that it reaches the addressee?

Mr. WALSH. I am going to speak of that in just one moment, if the Senator will pardon me, and if I do not I shall be glad to have him again direct my attention to it.

Section 1 of the chapter under consideration provides, and provides only, that any matter which is put into the mail, the putting of which into the mail constitutes an offense under this act, shall be nonmailable. In other words, that the mail shall not be used for the purpose of committing the crimes denounced by this proposed act, which we are endeavoring to pass, nor shall any matter be mailable which is intended or calculated to induce or excite the commission of those crimes. I dare say that even the Senator from Idaho will not insist that matter of that kind ought to be allowed to go through the mails.

Now, I will answer the question of the Senator from Idaho. The Senator from Idaho finds no means of determining whether or not the matter is of the character denounced by the statute except by opening the envelope before it reaches the person to whom it is addressed.

Mr. BORAH. No; the Senator from Idaho does not take that positioin; but the Senator from Idaho says that he discovers in this particular statute no means provided except that of the opening of the mails. There is a method by which it can be done, of course, but it is not provided for in this bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, it will be agreed upon all hands that the proof in such cases is not easy at all. What I want to say in this connection is, that there is nothing in this proposed statute which in any way militates against the general statute, which makes it a crime upon the part of anyone, except an employee of the dead-letter office, to open any envelope for the purpose of determining what is in the mail; but, Mr. President, I am going to propose an amendment which will leave the proposed statute not subject to the general law, but will expressly provide as we provided in the case of these other statutes.

Now, let me answer the Senator from Idaho. It does not by any means follow that, when we declare that matter which is libelous or indecent shall not be mailable, we authorize the opening of letters for the purpose of determining whether or not they contain that kind of matter. You could very easily conceive that there is a corporation or an association of persons or an individual engaged in sending out letters generally that are nonmailable under the provisions of section 1 of this proposed act; and that the Government has ingratiated into the business of that company some member of its investigating force. He knows just exactly what is in such letters. Those letters go into the post office, and he, knowing that they constitute the commission of a crime, the people who send those letters and put them in the mail are immediately arrested and subjected to trial and prosecution. Would the Senator from Idaho, however, then say that those letters ought to be permitted to go broadcast throughout the country?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho has taken no such position as that at all. The Senator from Idaho made the simple inquiry, how, under this proposed statute, the Postmaster General could acquire the information as to the contents of the letters except by opening them? I conceded in my argument that there might be cases in which certain institutions had established a character with reference to the kind of mail which they were sending out, such as the Senator from Montana is now referring to, by which the Postmaster General could be sufficiently certain to stop them. I do not contend that that might not be true with reference to numerous institutions; but so far as this proposed statute upon its face is concerned, so far as any provision therein contained is concerned, what provision is there which authorizes the examination of the contents of such letters except that of opening them?

Mr. WALSH. There is not the authorization of opening the envelope or examining it. The proof must be secured in some other way than by opening the letter.

Mr. BORAH. Then the Senator from Montana and I are not disagreeing.

Mr. WALSH. Just a moment. Why should we put into this proposed statute the particular way in which the evidence shall be secured?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, I rose not for the purpose of entering into a controversy with the Senator, but for the purpose of proposing an amendment, which I think will make him quite willing to accept the provisions of this bill.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will pardon me, just one suggestion; then I shall not interrupt him again, although it is always an advantage to interrupt the Senator, because it makes the discussion more pointed as to the matter in which we are engaged in discussing.

Mr. WALSH. I do not object at all.

Mr. BORAH. But when this bill was introduced in the Senate, as it came here it had in it this section:

SEC. 3. The Postmaster General may, upon evidence satisfactory to him that any person, concern, association, or company is engaged in using the mails for the circulation or dissemination of any matter by this act declared to be nonmailable, forbid the use of the mails by any such person, concern, association, or company.

Now, I say that that section was in direct violation of the fourth amendment to the Constitution, because there is only one way in which the Postmaster General can secure such information, except where general reputation has been established, and that is by a search warrant, the same as if he should undertake to find a letter upon my person and to examine the contents of it.

Mr. WALSH. But section 3 has gone out of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. WALSH. I am discussing section 1, and I am insisting that under section 1 no authority is given to open any mail; and it is a crime under the general statute to open the mail even for the purpose of discovering whether or not it contains nonmailable matter.

But, Mr. President, in these statutes, which declare a particular kind of matter as nonmailable, the precaution has been taken of inserting a clause which expressly forbids that, and I think it would be quite wise to insert a similar provision in the section now under consideration.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to suggest to the Senator from Montana that the search-warrant chapter and the postal chapter, taken together, do furnish a way in which a letter can be seized. Undoubtedly a search warrant could be issued and the letter seized in the hands of a postmaster or in the hands of a letter carrier. I ask the Senator what would become of the letter when so seized? Would there not be a right to open it under those circumstances, and is it not contemplated that it will be opened under those circumstances?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am not prepared to say whether or not a search warrant would authorize such seizure. I dare say it would; I see no reason at all why it should not.

Mr. President, one of these statutes prohibits the transmission through the mails of instruments that are used in the commission of crimes. We have now a statute which prevents the transmission through the mails of opium, for instance. It is denounced as a crime to transmit opium through the mails. Now, suppose one of the opium inspectors has information that a certain individual has mailed a package containing opium to be sent to some one; he goes before a judge or a United States commissioner, and he swears out a search warrant, in which he avers that that particular letter, mailed by that particular person, is now in the mails and contains opium, and he asks for a search warrant to search and seize that letter. Why should he not have it?

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not argue the matter. We have no search-warrant process now that would authorize anyone to seize the mails in the hands of the postmaster or the carrier. It is now proposed to enlarge the search-warrant process so that any mail matter of which it is alleged that it violates any statute of the United States, or is in aid of the violation of any statute of the United States, may be seized and opened.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I think that we get a little confused by tangling up these two chapters of the bill. I am addressing myself to section 1 of Chapter XII. I am calling attention to the fact that it does not authorize the opening of mail at all for the purpose of determining whether or not the letters contain nonmailable matter. The proof that the matter is nonmailable must be secured in some other way. But lest anybody should attempt to assume authority to open the mail, I propose an amendment, and I intend to call attention to the general nonmailable-matter statutes. Take the statute in reference to obscene matter.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me?

Mr. WALSH. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. KING. It might explain the question suggested if I should read merely a line or two from the case of Ex parte Jackson:

The constitutional guaranty of the right of the people to be secure in their papers against unreasonable searches and seizures extends to their papers, thus closed against inspection, wherever they may be. Whilst in the mail they can only be opened and examined under like warrant, issued upon similar oath or affirmation, particularly describing the thing to be seized, as is required when papers are subjected to search in one's own household.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am interested in the statement of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that no right exists to open the mails. In the case of a fraud order, which is frequently issued, does the Senator from Montana understand that the post-office inspectors do not open such mail?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, Mr. President, I do not understand anything of the kind. In fact, we all know—it was disclosed in the debate here—that some years ago the private letters of a Senator of the United States were opened by the inspectors, and that a high officer of the Government boastfully referred to the fact that that had been done.

Mr. REED. Yes; Mr. Roosevelt. But I do not think the Senator from Montana caught the import of my question or else I do not quite catch the import of his answer.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I answer the Senator, yes. My information is that such letters have frequently been opened.

Mr. REED. I think it is the custom. I think whenever Mr. Post Office Inspector concludes that he wants to open anybody's mail, he just opens it; and if he has made a mistake and got hold of something that has no evidence of any character in it which he wants, he seals the letter up. I think he frequently seals it up, sends it on to its destination, watches, then, to see what transpires, gets the reply letter, and opens it. I think such inspectors flagrantly violate the law with reference to all of these matters at all times. I am inclined to the view that it would be a good deal better to provide a legal means for opening such mail than to permit the present illegal practices.

While I am on my feet, however—not that I am speaking in a controversial spirit at all—the Senator gave an illustration a few moments ago of something in this line: Suppose that opium is being sent through the mail, and suppose that an inspector has reason to believe that opium is being so sent through the mail, and it becomes necessary to open the mail, and he accordingly makes application before a proper officer under this bill and has the mail opened, thus disclosing the existence of the opium. The Senator inquires what is there wrong about that. We must all answer in that supposed case, where the opium is in the mail and where the crime is actually being committed, there is nothing wrong in detecting the crime. The difficulty that I see is this—and I can express it by changing the illustration: Suppose that a post-office inspector, desiring to see my mail, proceeds to open my mail under the pretext that he thinks I am sending through the mail some criminal message. The power to examine it is so likely to be abused that I think we ought in granting it to be very careful.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Senator of course is talking about the search-warrant statute.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, if I may interject myself into the discussion at this point, I confess myself ignorant of any law which authorizes the post-office inspectors to open the mail passing in the course of correspondence between citizens of the United States. Is there any statutory authority for that?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; it is just the other way.

Mr. WALSH. The statute expressly forbids it.

Mr. STONE. My colleague stated—and that is what startled me a little bit—that he had no doubt that inspectors of the Post Office Department exercised the prerogative of opening the mail of a citizen sent one way, and, if they found nothing criminal in it, would seal it up, let it go, and watch the developments, and possibly open the reply to it, and so on. Now, how does an inspector get possession of such letters for such purposes without the cooperation of postmasters or mail carriers? An inspector has no possession of mail in transit from the time it is dropped in the post office until it is delivered; and so, if he takes letters and opens them, it must be done with the consent and aid of other post-office officials. I am just wondering if in these blessed United States an espionage of that kind is being practiced at this day, and has been practiced for years in the past. My colleague seems to think that is true. Now, if that is true, and there is no statutory authority for it, it must be a felony. Is there no remedy for it?

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Missouri may not have been present when I stated that it was disclosed here quite a good many years ago—some 8 or 10 years ago, according to my recollection—in the course of the debates in the Senate that the private letters of a Member of this body were thus opened by an inspector.

Mr. STONE. What was done with the inspector?

Mr. WALSH. Not a thing.

Mr. STONE. Was he known individually?

Mr. WALSH. I am not sure that it was ever disclosed what particular inspector had done it.

Mr. STONE. I was not present when the Senator spoke; but I am deeply interested in this development, for it is news to me. How was it known that an inspector of the Post Office Department did this, and how did the post-office inspector happen to secure the opportunity to open the letters?

Mr. WALSH. The details have escaped my recollection. I am not familiar with them.

Mr. STONE. Did the Senator ever read the details of the incident?

Mr. WALSH. I was not a Member of this body at that time. I speak simply from my recollection of the newspaper reports of what transpired here in the Senate.

Mr. STONE. Of course, I am not catechizing the Senator. I thought perhaps he knew the details.

Mr. WALSH. I speak only from a general recollection of the incident.

Mr. STONE. The Senator thinks that intolerable and inexcusable, does he not?

Mr. WALSH. It was a plain violation of the law.

Mr. STONE. Yes; a plain violation of the law and a violation, it seems to me, that demonstrates an evil that ought not to be tolerated. Now, mind you, I am not talking of what might be done in extraordinary and perilous times, but even in the most extraordinary and perilous times, unless the law of the land authorizes it. I think any man who invades the mail of the United States in that high-handed manner ought to be sent to the penitentiary, and if any official whose duty it is to prosecute him does not do so, he ought to be sent to the penitentiary.

Mr. WALSH. I am sure, Mr. President, that the Senator from Missouri understands that I am neither attempting to justify nor to excuse any such procedure.

Mr. STONE. I am sure of that.

Mr. WALSH. Indeed, I arose for the purpose of proposing an amendment which would expressly forbid any practice of that character.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, while we are on this subject, if the Senator will pardon me, and since I am in some degree responsible for its intrusion here, I will say to the Senator that I have known through my connection with offices that have indirectly——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I understand that my time is very rapidly slipping away, and I trust the Senator will be brief.

Mr. REED. Certainly. I will not interrupt the Senator any further.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I was about to invite the attention of the Senate to the provisions of existing law in relation to nonmailable matter. One of the statutes forbids the circulation through the mails of certain classes of drugs and advertisements of such drugs. Then, it is provided:

> * * * And every description calculated to induce or incite a person to so use or apply any such article, instrument, substance, drug, medicine, or thing is hereby declared to be nonmailable matter and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier.

I find exactly the same provision of law with reference to lottery advertisements, lottery tickets, and everything of that kind, which are declared to be nonmailable, and the mailing of matter of that kind is declared to be punishable. And then section 484 provides:

> All matter the deposit of which in the mails is by this act made punishable is hereby declared nonmailable.

That includes obscene matter, indecent literature, libelous matter, matter that is violative of copyright, fraudulent matter, and all that kind of thing. But, Mr. President, the statute continues:

> But nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize any person other than an employee of the Dead Letter Office, duly authorized thereto, to open any letter not addressed to himself.

I am sorry the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] has left the Chamber. I was going to ask him if his objection to this section would not be entirely obviated by the incorporation in it of an amendment in the language of that statute? However, Mr. President, I offer that amendment to section 1 of the chapter under consideration, as follows:

> Nothing in this section shall be so construed as to authorize any person other than an employee of the Dead Letter Office, duly authorized thereto, to open any letter not addressed to himself.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that there is an amendment pending to strike out the section.

Mr. WALSH. A motion to strike out?

Mr. CUMMINS. A motion to strike out the section.

Mr. WALSH. Then I presume my motion would be in order, because we have a right to perfect the section before the motion to strike out is in order.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know whether that rule is applicable in the case simply of a motion to strike out or whether it is limited to a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is simply a straight motion to strike out section 1.

Mr. WALSH. I inquire of the Chair whether I am not correct in assuming that before that motion could be put my amendment to perfect the section would be in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the opinion of the Chair. He does not know whether it is the law or not.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, what is the ruling of the Chair?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not know whether that is the law or not; but it seems to the Chair that if any Senator wants to perfect the text before the motion to strike out is submitted he ought to have an opportunity to do so. That ought to be the law.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that is eminently equitable, anyway.

Mr. SMOOT. But it is not the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair holds the amendment of the Senator from Montana to the text in order.

Mr. BORAH. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 1, Chapter XII, it is proposed to add the following:

> But nothing in this act shall be so construed as to authorize any person other than an employee of the Dead Letter Office, duly authorized thereto, to open any letter not addressed to himself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs upon the motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to strike out section 1 as amended.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest the absence of a quorum before we vote on that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	McKellar	Smith, Mich.
Bankhead	Hardwick	Myers	Smoot
Beckham	Hollis	Nelson	Stone
Borah	Husting	New	Sutherland
Brandegee	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Swanson
Broussard	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Thomas
Calder	Kellogg	Page	Thompson
Cummins	Kendrick	Phelan	Trammell
Curtis	Kenyon	Pittman	Underwood
Fletcher	King	Poindexter	Vardaman
France	Kirby	Reed	Wadsworth
Gallinger	Knox	Robinson	Walsh
Gerry	La Follette	Shafroth	Williams
Gronna	Lewis	Sheppard	Wolcott

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending question is the motion of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to strike out section 1.

Mr. BORAH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). Owing to the absence of my pair, the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], I withhold my vote.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I wish to announce, and have the announcement stand for the day, that I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], and that pair is transferred to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES]. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WEEKS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. I find that he is not in the Chamber, and I therefore withdraw my vote. I wish to announce also that my colleague [Mr. LODGE] is unavoidably detained from the Chamber.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. As I do not know that he would have voted as I have upon this subject, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. KELLOGG (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted inadvertently. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. MYERS (after having voted in the negative). I observe that my pair, the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], is not present. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. STERLING. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] and vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the negative). I notice that the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has not voted. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. VARDAMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]; and

The Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD] with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—28.

Borah	Gronna	La Follette	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Hale	New	Smoot
Calder	Hardwick	Norris	Sutherland
Cummins	Johnson, Cal.	Page	Thomas
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Townsend
France	Kenyon	Sherman	Vardaman
Gallinger	Knox	Smith, Ariz.	Watson

NAYS—39.

Ashurst	Husting	Overman	Stone
Bankhead	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman	Swanson
Beckham	Kendrick	Poindexter	Thompson
Broussard	King	Pomerene	Trammell
Chamberlain	Kirby	Reed	Underwood
Fletcher	McCumber	Robinson	Wadsworth
Gerry	McKellar	Shafroth	Walsh
Gore	Martin	Sheppard	Williams
Harding	Myers	Shields	Wolcott
Hollis	Nelson	Sterling

NOT VOTING—29.

Brady	Hitchcock	McLean	Smith, Md.
Colt	Hughes	Newlands	Smith, S. C.
Culberson	James	Owen	Tillman
Dillingham	Johnson, S. Dak.	Penrose	Warren
Fall	Kellogg	Ransdell	Weeks
Fernald	Lane	Saulsbury
Frelinghuysen	Lewis	Simmons
Goff	Lodge	Smith, Ga.

So Mr. HARDWICK's amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to call up the amendment which I offered this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 37, in line 5, after the word "years," it is proposed to strike out the semicolon and down to and including the word "imprisonment," on line 18, in the following words: "and (c) whoever, in time of war, in violation of reasonable regulations to be prescribed by the President, which he is hereby authorized to make and promulgate, shall publish any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with, or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense calculated to be useful to the enemy, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the amendment is aimed at subdivision (c) of section 2 of Chapter II of the bill. I made a similar motion when the other bill was before the Senate, which was defeated. At the same time the provision of the section was very materially modified by an amendment offered by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and accepted.

I said, at the time the other amendment was before the Senate, practically all that I have to say upon the subject, and I shall not weary the Senate by its repetition. It is true that the amendment as it now stands is very much better than the section as reported by the committee; but it is still obnoxious to me, and largely because it enables the President to establish regulations the violation of which, without regard to the question of intent, is made a very serious crime, punishable by a heavy penalty and by a long period of imprisonment as a maximum.

I am aware, Mr. President, of the need for some power on the part of the President to make regulations with regard to certain matters which may become of importance as this war proceeds, and without which we might be exposed to considerable injury, or at least be face to face with a menace which the President might feel powerless to meet without some provision in this or some other bill giving him authority to make regulations to meet the crisis should it present itself; but I do not think the authority should be as broad as that which is covered by the objectionable part of the section.

Yesterday the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] offered an amendment to the bill to which I have given considerable attention to-day, the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] having directed me to it, with a view of meeting the possible emergency which might confront the administration and going as far as would seem to be essential if we are able at all to anticipate the general course of events. Upon conferring with the Senator from Iowa, he has expressed willingness that I should offer his amendment, with some changes, as a substitute for the verbiage which my amendment is designed to do away with. I will read the amendment of the Senator from Iowa with the additions that have been suggested, the principal one coming from the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who is one of the strong advocates of the bill.

This amendment provides that—

In time of war the President is hereby authorized to prescribe and promulgate rules and regulations for the purpose of preventing the disclosure to the public, and thereby to the enemy, of information with respect to the movements, numbers, description, and disposition of any of the armed forces of the United States in naval or military operations, or with respect to any works intended for the fortification or defense of any place—and whoever in time of war shall willfully violate any such rule or regulation shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, however, That no such rule or regulation shall apply to the proceedings of the Congress of the United States nor to the debates therein.

The last phrase being the suggestion of the Senator from Montana—

It will be seen that this inhibition is very broad, but it is at the same time specific, something which is always desirable in statutes, when it is possible to be specific. It arms the President with power to protect the movements of troops in all land and naval operations. It also gives him ample power, by regulation, to throw the same mantle of protection around fortified places generally. Now, that is something to which the press could not well object, and I do not think they would object, and which at the same time is sufficiently comprehensive to anticipate any possible situation not covered by the laws and for the safeguarding of which the announcement of a regulation might be necessary.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator, with his permission, if the last proviso in the text is also included in the substitute?

Mr. THOMAS. No; not in my motion.

Mr. HARDWICK. Ought it not to be included, or will the Senator strike that out?

Mr. THOMAS. My attention has not been called to that, but I think that should remain.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I say that the amendment which has just been suggested by the Senator from Colorado is substantially the amendment that I offered——

Mr. THOMAS. Why, it is the Senator's amendment. I lay no claim to its authorship.

Mr. CUMMINS (continuing). That I offered to the chapter before it was adopted, before we passed it, when we were considering the Senate bill. It does not strike out the proviso about comment or criticism.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is offered as a substitute——

Mr. CUMMINS. It is only offered as a substitute down to that point.

Mr. THOMAS. It is only offered as a substitute for that part of the section which includes and ends with the word "imprisonment."

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator give the page and line?

Mr. THOMAS. It is subdivision (c), down to the proviso on line 18. It begins on line 5, page 37.

Mr. OVERMAN. Page 37, line 5?

Mr. THOMAS. Down to and including the word "imprisonment" on line 18 of the same page.

Mr. OVERMAN. The amendment does not say that, however. The amendment just says "insert," without stating the place.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What line and page?

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator, in drawing the amendment, said "insert," without stating where.

Mr. CUMMINS. If I had offered the amendment I intended to point out the place in the bill to which the amendment would apply. I will do it now for the information of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I just want to get it straight. I am inclined to accept it.

Mr. CUMMINS. It begins immediately after the word "years," in line 5, page 37.

The VICE PRESIDENT. One moment. The Chair has just a little compassion for the Reporter of the Senate. It is impossible for him to take this conversation. There are half a dozen Senators speaking.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to get it straight.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, perhaps I was guilty of audible conversation just then——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not ask him to yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, Mr. President, I will yield the floor myself, because I have said practically all that I care to say. I want to amend my motion, which is simply a motion to strike out, by adding to it a motion to substitute for the part stricken out the amendment of the Senator from Iowa as amended, or rather with the changes which have been suggested.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment as modified.

The SECRETARY. On page 37 of the House bill, beginning on line 5, after the word "years," it is proposed to strike out the semicolon and all of the bill down to and including the word "imprisonment," on line 18, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

In time of war the President is hereby authorized to prescribe and promulgate rules and regulations for the purpose of preventing the disclosure to the public, and thereby to the enemy, of information with respect to the movements, numbers, description, and disposition of any of the armed forces of the United States in naval or military operations, or with respect to any works intended for the fortification or defense of any place; and whoever, in time of war, shall willfully violate any such rule or regulation shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, however, That no such rule or regulation shall apply to the proceedings of the Congress of the United States, nor to the debates therein.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, so far as I am able to do so, I will accept this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment——

Mr. STONE. Well, wait; I do not want it accepted.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Montana.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from North Carolina is not able to accept this amendment, and I object to his accepting it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I hope the proponent of this amendment will be moved to take out that provision which in terms excepts the debates here in Congress. I do not care anything at all about it, but I think it is hardly in keeping with the dignity of the Senate to enact a provision of that character.

That was not the reason why I rose, however, Mr. President. I rose simply to call the attention of the Senate to one of the things which those of us who are advocating this portion of the bill would like to see curbed to some extent. I am going to read this because quite a good many of the Members of this House, and I daresay of the other House, believe that there is no necessity whatever of any legislation upon this subject; that the press of the country may be trusted not to print anything whatever that ought to be kept in inviolate secrecy.

One of the leading metropolitan papers of the country printed on last Sunday the following:

NARROWS CLOSED BY GREAT NET OF STEEL—NEW YORK HARBOR PROTECTED AGAINST ATTACK BY SUBMARINES IN THE NIGHT.

New York Harbor is now protected at night by a steel net, which is stretched across the channel from Fort Wadsworth on the Richmond side to Fort Hamilton on the Brooklyn side. The net has a 900-foot "gate" or section which is opened in the morning so as to permit ships to enter or depart. At night the harbor is sealed absolutely and no vessel, except a warship, can pass.

The big net was dropped into position early yesterday morning by a force of workmen from the navy yard. Three tugs and three lighters, chaperoned by the odd looking old monitor Amphitrite, worked busily for two hours before the submarine bar was finally got satisfactorily into place. It was no easy job, because the various sections of the great steel mesh approximate a mile in length and practically touch the shores on either side of the Narrows. The net is anchored strongly at the bottom and a line of buoys keeps its top at or near the surface of the water.

For the present it will be kept in position only between sunset and sunrise. All merchant ships are barred from leaving or entering the harbor in the night. Hitherto destroyers have sentineled the port gates and have been busy stopping this vessel and interrogating that. Hereafter the work of the destroyers will be made much easier. The net will do more work than half a dozen of Uncle Sam's vicious mosquitoes. Beginning last night all vessels making for the harbor were compelled to anchor outside, the Ambrose Channel Lightship being designated as a suitable place. At daybreak or soon after the net "gate" will be opened and the vessels will be permitted to flow through.

The construction of the net—

To this I invite the special attention of the Senate:

The construction of the net had been one of the Navy Department's big secrets. Yesterday Government officials declined to discuss it, except to say that it had been put in place and that similar action is being taken at other ports.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What was the paper?

Mr. WALSH. I do not think it is necessary to disclose the paper, but I think all will agree that the less that kind of information is thus published the better it will be.

Mr. THOMAS. I think the amendment which I have offered will cover that and similar publications, and, in order to get it properly before the Senate, I move its adoption.

Mr. WALSH. I am sure the amendment of the Senator does cover it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the Senator from Colorado says he will strike out the last clause.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. STONE. I do not quite understand the idea of moving the adoption of an amendment which is pending. That is the very question before the Senate.

Mr. THOMAS. I will withdraw the suggestion for the present.

DEATH OF HON. JOSEPH BENSON FORAKER.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I am sorry to announce to the Senate the very regrettable news of the death of ex-Senator Joseph Benson Foraker, who represented the State of Ohio in this body from 1897 until 1909.

I know that those in this body who had the satisfaction of serving with him will testify that his 12 years of public life in the Senate were characterized by very notable contributions to the debates of this body, by a very worth-while constructive work in the legislation of the Nation, always marked by his notably admirable personal character and the fine qualities of his noble manhood.

It would not be becoming here perhaps to allude to his distinguished services as governor of the great State of Ohio and his still more youthful services in the war for the preservation of the Union, but from boyhood to his 71 years or more his life has been distinguished by high character, great courage, abiding honesty, and most able and brilliant public service; and I can believe that in his great and inspiring personal and political leadership he has made a contribution to the good of both State and Nation which will leave him a memory that most nobly befits a man of his character and ability.

I do not know the custom, Mr. President, but I have thought because of his distinguished character and his very exceptional services it would at least be becoming in me to call the attention of the Senate to his death.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, following several precedents already established by the Senate, I move, as a mark of respect to the memory of the late Senator from Ohio, that the Senate do now adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 11, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 10, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, to whom we are indebted for life and all that makes it dear to our hearts and to whom the devout of every age have turned for inspiration and guidance, so we come in faith and confidence praying for inspiration that we may be guided to a happy solution of all the great and complicated problems which confront us. Give us wisdom, strength, and courage that we may meet all the exigencies of the hour and quit ourselves like men worthy of such preferment. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 3673) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the acts of August 4, 1914, August 15, 1914, March 3, 1915, and September 7, 1916, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to substitute therefor the bill (S. 1796) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the acts of August 4, 1914, August 15, 1914, March 3, 1915, and September 7, 1916, had requested a conference with the House of Representatives upon the bill and amendment, and had appointed Mr. OWEN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. MCLEAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I ask to take from the Speaker's desk the bill H. R. 3673, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 3673, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I believe there is only one Senate amendment, and that is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a new bill. I have the Senate amendment in my hand, and have glanced over it very hastily, but as the Senate amendment is entirely a new bill it is impossible to tell by casual glance at it by one who is not thoroughly familiar with the subject what the Senate proposition is.

Mr. GLASS. It is not an entirely new bill.

Mr. MANN. It is an entirely new bill in form. It is a substitute.

Mr. GLASS. I have not had time to examine all of the Senate amendments.

Mr. MANN. There is only the one amendment.

Mr. GLASS. I have not had time to examine the Senate amendment, which contains many provisions.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. If the gentleman will permit, let me say one word, there was an amendment offered by Senator HARDWICK that is an amendment to the original amendment.

Mr. MANN. That is all incorporated. There is only one Senate amendment, as it comes to us. What the change may be in that shape, of course one can not tell without very careful examination. I do not know whether there is anything in it that ought to be submitted to a vote of the House in any way or not.

Mr. GLASS. The Senate amendment reduces the reserve requirements with the Federal reserve banks to 6 per cent instead of 7 per cent, as the House bill does.

Mr. MANN. Are there any new features?

Mr. GLASS. It contains a provision authorizing the exchange of Federal reserve notes for gold, which, in my view, involves a reduction of the commercial security behind the Federal reserve notes by 40 per cent. It contains a provision relating to the custody of all the securities with the Federal reserve agent. It contains a provision relating to the bond to be given by the assistants to the Federal reserve agent—somewhat different from the House provision. It contains a provision relating to check collection and exchange charges, and various other provisions that I have not had time to examine.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman recall whether there is any other entirely new matter, apart from the subject matter in the House bill?

Mr. GLASS. I think the chief new matter is that relating to the exchange of Federal reserve notes for gold.

Mr. MANN. I shall not object.

Mr. BORLAND. Reserving the right to object, a good many, I think, would be interested in that amendment about the exchange charges on checks. Would it be possible for us to have a separate consideration of that in the House? My understanding is that that went out repeatedly in this House as not germane to that particular bill. It seems to me it ought to be taken up as a separate matter.

Mr. MANN. It is not possible to get a separate vote on any proposition except by instructions to the House conferees, because it is all one Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RAGSDALE. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point the objection came too late. The Chair had said there is no objection, I think.

The SPEAKER. No; I think not.

Mr. MANN. It is not a Union Calendar bill.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I move to disagree to all the Senate amendments and ask that the conference asked for be granted.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 3673. An act to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended by the acts of August 4, 1914, August 15, 1914, March 3, 1915, and September 7, 1916.

Mr. CANNON. Is the Senate amendment in print?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. It is in the RECORD this morning.

Mr. CANNON. Nobody, in this light, can read it in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. I can furnish my colleague in four or five minutes with a copy of it by sending to my office. It is in print.

Mr. CANNON. I may be able to get it at the document room.

Mr. MANN. No. I have a copy of the engrossed Senate amendment, but it is not available otherwise.

Mr. RAGSDALE. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Until this bill is printed, can it be referred to conference except upon a vote of the House?

The SPEAKER. He can ask to do what he has asked to do by unanimous consent. The gentleman moves to take this bill from the Speaker's table.

Mr. CANNON. After all, Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will indulge me, I do not know what is in this Senate amendment.

Mr. MANN. I think it would be wise to let it go over until morning and have it printed.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman from Virginia say?

Mr. GLASS. I would be very glad if we could proceed with the matter, Mr. Speaker. I have been here on this matter now for three weeks constantly, and I would like to get through with it. The Senate amendment is printed in the RECORD.

I will explain to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] just what the Senate amendments are. The chief Senate amendment, the new matter, is authorizing the Federal Reserve Board to exchange Federal reserve notes for gold, which, as I stated, involves the reducing of the commercial security behind the Federal reserve notes about 40 per cent. The reserve required by the Senate bill with the Federal reserve bank is only 6 per cent, as against 7 per cent required by the House bill. There is a provision in the Senate amendment authorizing certain charges on check collections.

Mr. CANNON. What certain charges?

Mr. GLASS. Charges not exceeding one-tenth of 1 per cent.

Mr. CANNON. On collections?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; on collections.

Mr. CANNON. What do you mean—collections through the Federal reserve bank, or through all banks?

Mr. GLASS. Through all banks.

Mr. CANNON. Well, will the House have an opportunity to vote on that amendment to-day?

Mr. GLASS. There is but one amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I know, but do you mean an opportunity to consider it after the whole thing is in print, either by putting it over until to-morrow or by a report from the conference committee without an agreement?

Mr. GLASS. There is no way by which it can be separately considered, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that; but there is a way by which the conferees can be instructed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. CANNON. Well——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well! [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I do not know. Why not at this stage of the proceedings?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Because this is before the stage of disagreement. That motion is only in order when I offer it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. I think the House is entitled to some assurance that it can intelligently consider the Senate amendment; and while I do not desire to delay by objection, I am not sure but that time would be saved by letting it go over until to-morrow morning, and in the absence of that, at least the House ought to have an opportunity before it is tied up by a conference report, in what we all hope will be the closing hours of the session [applause], when it can not be very intelligently considered, although it might contain much that the House is not in fact in favor of.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the gentleman that the only new provisions upon which there might be any division of opinion at all are the provisions that I have just indicated.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. In my judgment the House is not for that amendment or for the provisions in the Senate amendment.

Now, while I think the gentleman from Virginia knows more about this matter than anybody else in the House—and I measure my words when I say that—and I prize his opinion highly, yet this covers a large country and a very large part of the business of the country, and I do not believe the House, for instance, is for the last amendment that the gentleman speaks of, limiting to one-tenth of 1 per cent the charge for collections between 25,000 and 30,000 banks.

Mr. GLASS. That is all that the American Banking Association itself asked for.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will it not be in order, after this motion of the gentleman from Virginia has been adopted and before the conferees are named, for any gentleman to move to instruct?

The SPEAKER. Not at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. ADAMSON. I say after the motion is adopted and before the conferees are appointed?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia moves to take this bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. MANN. The Senate amendment must be read before that is voted on.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That section 4 of the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, be amended by striking out the sentence reading as follows: 'One of the directors of class C, who shall be a person of tested banking experience, shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board as deputy chairman and deputy Federal reserve agent, to exercise the powers of the chairman of the board and Federal reserve agent in case of absence or disability of his principal,' and by adding in place thereof the following:

"'Subject to the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal reserve agent shall appoint one or more assistants. Such assistants, who shall be persons of tested banking experience, shall assist the Federal reserve agent in the performance of his duties and shall also have power to act in his name and stead during his absence or disability. The Federal reserve agent may require such bonds of his assistants as he may deem necessary for his own protection. Assistants to the Federal reserve agent shall receive an annual compensation to be fixed and paid in the same manner as that of the Federal reserve agent. One of the directors of class C shall be appointed by the Federal Reserve Board as vice chairman to exercise the powers of the chairman of the board in case of the absence or disability of the Federal reserve agent; in case of the absence of the chairman and vice chairman, the third class C director shall preside at meetings of the board.'"

"SEC. 2. That section 9 of the Federal reserve act be amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 9. Any bank incorporated by special law of any State, or organized under the general laws of any State or of the United States, desiring to become a member of the Federal Reserve System may make application to the Federal Reserve Board for the right to subscribe to the stock of the Federal reserve bank organized within the district in which the applying bank is located. Such application shall be for the same amount of stock that the applying bank would be required to subscribe to as a national bank. The Federal Reserve Board, in accordance with such rules and regulations and subject to such conditions as it may prescribe, may permit the applying bank to become a stockholder of such Federal reserve bank.

"'In acting upon such applications the Federal Reserve Board shall consider the financial condition of the applying bank, the general character of its management, and whether or not the corporate powers exercised are consistent with the purposes of this act.

"'Whenever the Federal Reserve Board shall permit the applying bank to become a stockholder in the Federal reserve bank of the district its stock subscription shall be payable on call of the Federal Reserve Board, and stock issued to it shall be held subject to the provisions of this act.

"'All banks admitted to membership under authority of this section shall be required to comply with the reserve and capital requirements of this act and to conform to those provisions of law imposed on national banks which prohibit such banks from lending on or purchasing their own stock, which relate to the withdrawal or impairment of their capital stock, and which relate to the payment of unearned dividends. Such banks and the officers, agents, and employees thereof shall also be subject to the provisions of and to the penalties prescribed by section 5209 of the Revised Statutes, and shall be required to make reports of condition and of the payment of dividends to the Federal reserve bank of which they become a member. Not less than three of such reports shall be made annually on call of the Federal reserve bank on dates to be fixed by the Federal Reserve Board. Failure to make such reports within 10 days after the date they are called for shall subject the offending bank to a penalty of $100 a day for each day that it fails to transmit such report, such penalty to be collected by the Federal reserve bank by suit or otherwise.

"'As a condition of membership such banks shall likewise be subject to examinations made by direction of the Federal Reserve Board or of the Federal reserve bank by examiners selected or approved by the Federal Reserve Board.

"'Whenever the directors of the Federal reserve bank shall approve the examinations made by the State authorities, such examinations and the reports thereof may be accepted in lieu of examinations made by examiners selected or approved by the Federal Reserve Board: Provided, however, That when it deems it necessary the board may order special examinations by examiners of its own selection and shall in all cases approve the form of the report. The expenses of all examinations, other than those made by State authorities, shall be assessed against and paid by the banks examined in the same manner and at the same rate that national banks are assessed for such expenses.

"'If at any time it shall appear to the Federal Reserve Board that a member bank has failed to comply with the provisions of this section of the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board made pursuant thereto, it shall be within the power of the board after hearing to require such bank to surrender its stock in the Federal reserve bank and to forfeit all rights and privileges of membership. The Federal Reserve Board may restore membership upon due proof of compliance with the conditions imposed by this section.

"'Any State bank or trust company desiring to withdraw from membership in a Federal reserve bank may do so, after six months' written notice shall have been filed with the Federal Reserve Board, upon the surrender and cancellation of all of its holdings of capital stock in the Federal reserve bank: Provided, however, That no Federal reserve bank shall, except under express authority of the Federal Reserve Board, cancel within the same calendar year more than 10 per cent of its capital stock for the purpose of effecting voluntary withdrawals during that year. All such applications shall be dealt with in the order in which they are filed with the board. Whenever a member bank shall surrender its stock holdings in a Federal reserve bank, or shall be ordered to do so by the Federal Reserve Board, under authority of law, all of its rights and privileges as a member bank shall thereupon cease and determine, and after due provision has been made for any indebtedness due or to become due to the Federal reserve bank it shall be entitled to a refund of its cash paid subscription with interest at the rate of one-half of 1 per cent per month from date of last dividend, if earned, the amount refunded in no event to exceed the book value of the stock at that time, and shall likewise be entitled to repayment of deposits and of any other balance due from the Federal reserve bank.

"'No applying bank shall be admitted to membership in a Federal reserve bank unless it possesses a paid-up unimpaired capital sufficient to entitle it to become a national banking association in the place where it is situated under the provisions of the national-bank act.

"'Banks becoming members of the Federal Reserve System under authority of this section shall be subject to the provisions of this section and to those of this act which relate specifically to member banks, but shall not be subject to examination under the provisions of the first two paragraphs of section 5240 of the Revised Statutes as amended by section 21 of this act. Subject to the provisions of this act and to the regulations of the board made pursuant thereto, any bank becoming a member of the Federal Reserve System shall retain its full charter and statutory rights as a State bank or trust company, and may continue to exercise all corporate powers granted it by the State in which it was created, and shall be entitled to all privileges of member banks: Provided, however, That no Federal reserve bank shall be permitted to discount for any State bank or trust company notes, drafts, or bills of exchange of any one borrower who is liable for borrowed money to such State bank or trust company in an amount greater than 10 per cent of the capital and surplus of such State bank or trust company, but the discount of bills of exchange drawn against actually existing value shall not be considered as borrowed money within the meaning of this section. The Federal reserve bank, as a condition of the discount of notes, drafts, and bills of exchange for such State bank or trust company, shall require a certificate or guaranty to the effect that the borrower is not liable to such bank in excess of the amount provided by this section, and will not be permitted to become liable in excess of this amount while such notes, drafts, or bills of exchange are under discount with the Federal reserve bank.

"'It shall be unlawful for any officer, clerk, or agent of any bank admitted to membership under authority of this section to certify any check drawn upon such bank unless the person or company drawing the check has on deposit therewith at the time such check is certified an amount of money equal to the amount specified in such check. Any check so certified by duly authorized officers shall be a good and valid obligation against such bank, but the act of any such officer, clerk, or agent in violation of this section may subject such bank to a forfeiture of its membership in the Federal Reserve System upon hearing by the Federal Reserve Board.'

"SEC. 3. That the first paragraph of section 13 be amended so as to read as follows:

"'Any Federal reserve bank may receive from any of its member banks, and from the United States, deposits of current funds in lawful money, national-bank notes, Federal reserve notes, or checks and drafts payable upon presentation, and also, for collection, maturing notes and bills; or, solely for purposes of exchange or of collection, may receive from other Federal reserve banks deposits of current funds in lawful money, national-bank notes, or checks upon other Federal reserve banks, and checks and drafts, payable upon presentation within its district, and maturing notes and bills payable within its district; or, solely for the purposes of exchange or of collection, may receive from any nonmember bank or trust company deposits of current funds in lawful money, national-bank notes, Federal reserve notes, checks and drafts payable upon presentation, or maturing notes and bills: Provided, Such nonmember bank or trust company maintains with the Federal reserve bank of its district a balance sufficient to offset the items in transit held for its account by the Federal reserve bank.'

"SEC. 4. That the fifth paragraph of section 13 be, and is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"'Any member bank may accept drafts or bills of exchange drawn upon it having not more than six months' sight to run, exclusive of days of grace, which grow out of transactions involving the importation or exportation of goods; or which grow out of transactions involving the domestic shipment of goods, provided shipping documents conveying or securing title are attached at the time of acceptance; or which are secured at the time of acceptance by a warehouse receipt or other such document conveying or securing title covering readily marketable staples. No member bank shall accept, whether in a foreign or domestic transaction, for any one person, company, firm, or corporation to an amount equal at any time in the aggregate to more than 10 per cent of its paid-up and unimpaired capital stock and surplus, unless the bank is secured either by attached documents or by some other actual security growing out of the same transaction as the acceptance; and no bank shall accept such bills to an amount equal at any time in the aggregate to more than one-half of its paid-up and unimpaired capital stock and surplus: Provided, however, That the Federal Reserve Board, under such general regulations as it may prescribe, which shall apply to all banks alike, regardless of the amount of capital stock and surplus, may authorize any member bank to accept such bills to an amount not exceeding at any time in the aggregate 100 per cent of its paid-up and unimpaired capital stock and surplus: Provided further, That in no event shall a bank accept for any one person, company, firm, or corporation to an amount equal at any time in the aggregate to more than 20 per cent of its paid-up and unimpaired capital stock and surplus.'

"SEC. 5. That section 16, paragraphs 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, be further amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"'Any Federal reserve bank may make application to the local Federal reserve agent for such amount of the Federal reserve notes hereinbefore provided for as it may require. Such application shall be accompanied with a tender to the local Federal reserve agent of collateral in amount equal to the sum of the Federal reserve notes thus applied for and issued pursuant to such application. The collateral security thus offered shall be notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or acceptances, rediscounted under the provisions of section 13 of this act, or bills of exchange indorsed by a member bank of any Federal reserve district and purchased under the provisions of section 14 of this act, or bankers' acceptances purchased under the provisions of said section 14, or gold or gold certificates; but in no event shall such collateral security, whether gold, gold certificates, or eligible paper, be less than the amount of Federal reserve notes applied for. The Federal reserve agent shall each day notify the Federal Reserve Board of all issues and withdrawals of Federal reserve notes to and by the Federal reserve bank to which he is accredited. The said Federal Reserve Board may at any time call upon a Federal reserve bank for additional security to protect the Federal reserve notes issued to it.

"'Every Federal reserve bank shall maintain reserves in gold or lawful money of not less than 35 per cent against its deposits and reserves in gold of not less than 40 per cent against its Federal reserve notes in actual circulation: Provided, however, That when the Federal reserve agent holds gold or gold certificates as collateral for Federal reserve notes issued to the bank such gold or gold certificates shall be counted as part of the gold reserve which such bank is required to maintain against its Federal reserve notes in actual circulation. Notes so paid out shall bear upon their faces a distinctive letter and serial number, which shall be assigned by the Federal Reserve Board to each Federal reserve bank. Whenever Federal reserve notes issued through one Federal reserve bank shall be received by another Federal reserve bank, they shall be promptly returned for credit or redemption to the Federal reserve bank through which they were originally issued or, upon direction of such Federal reserve bank, they shall be forwarded direct to the Treasurer of the United States to be retired. No Federal reserve bank shall pay out notes issued through another under penalty of a tax of 10 per cent upon the face value of notes so paid out. Notes presented for redemption at the Treasury of the United States shall be paid out of the redemption fund and returned to the Federal reserve banks through which they were originally issued, and thereupon such Federal reserve bank shall, upon demand of the Secretary of the Treasury, reimburse such redemption fund in lawful money or, if such Federal reserve notes have been redeemed by the Treasurer in gold or gold certificates, then such funds shall be reimbursed to the extent deemed necessary by the Secretary of the Treasury in gold or gold certificates, and such Federal reserve bank shall, so long as any of its Federal reserve notes remain outstanding, maintain with the Treasurer in gold an amount sufficient in the judgment of the Secretary to provide for all redemptions to be made by the Treasurer. Federal reserve notes received by the Treasurer otherwise than for redemption may be exchanged for gold out of the redemption fund hereinafter provided and returned to the reserve bank through which they were originally issued, or they may be returned to such bank for the credit of the United States. Federal reserve notes unfit for circulation shall be returned by the Federal reserve agents to the Comptroller of the Currency for cancellation and destruction.

"'The Federal Reserve Board shall require each Federal reserve bank to maintain on deposit in the Treasury of the United States a sum in gold sufficient, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the redemption of the Federal reserve notes issued to such bank, but in no event less than 5 per cent of the total amount of notes issued less the amount of gold or gold certificates held by the Federal reserve agent as collateral security; but such deposit of gold shall be counted and included as part of the 40 per cent reserve hereinbefore required. The board shall have the right, acting through the Federal reserve agent, to grant, in whole or in part, or to reject entirely the application of any Federal reserve bank for Federal reserve notes; but to the extent that such application may be granted the Federal Reserve Board shall, through its local Federal reserve agent, supply Federal reserve notes to the banks so applying, and such bank shall be charged with the amount of notes issued to it and shall pay such rate of interest as may be established by the Federal Reserve Board on only that amount of such notes which equals the total amount of its outstanding Federal reserve notes less the amount of gold or gold certificates held by the Federal reserve agent as collateral security. Federal reserve notes issued to any such bank shall, upon delivery, together with such notes of such Federal reserve bank as may be issued under section 18 of this act upon security of United States 2 per cent Government bonds, become a first and paramount lien on all the assets of such bank.

"'Any Federal reserve bank may at any time reduce its liability for outstanding Federal reserve notes by depositing with the Federal reserve agent its Federal reserve notes, gold, gold certificates, or lawful money of the United States. Federal reserve notes so deposited shall not be reissued, except upon compliance with the conditions of an original issue.

"'The Federal reserve agents shall hold such gold, gold certificates, or lawful money available exclusively for exchange for the outstanding Federal reserve notes when offered by the reserve bank of which he is a director. Upon the request of the Secretary of the Treasury the Federal Reserve Board shall require the Federal reserve agent to transmit to the Treasurer of the United States so much of the gold held by him as collateral security for Federal reserve notes as may be required for the exclusive purpose of the redemption of such Federal reserve notes, but such gold when deposited with the Treasurer shall be counted and considered as if collateral security on deposit with the Federal reserve agent.

"'Any Federal reserve bank may at its discretion withdraw collateral deposited with the local Federal reserve agent for the protection of its Federal reserve notes issued to it, and shall at the same time substitute therefore other collateral of equal amount, with the approval of the Federal reserve agent, under regulations to be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board. Any Federal reserve bank may retire any of its Federal reserve notes by depositing them with the Federal reserve agent or with the Treasurer of the United States, and such Federal reserve bank shall thereupon be entitled to receive back the collateral deposited with the Federal reserve agent for the security of such notes. Federal reserve banks shall not be required to maintain the reserve or the redemption fund heretofore provided for against Federal reserve notes which have been retired. Federal reserve notes so deposited shall not be reissued except upon compliance with the conditions of an original issue.'

"All Federal reserve notes and all gold, gold certificates, and lawful money issued to or deposited with any Federal reserve agent under the provisions of the Federal reserve act shall hereafter be held for such agent, under such rules and regulations as the Federal Reserve Board may prescribe, in the joint custody of himself and the Federal reserve bank to which he is accredited. Such agent and such Federal reserve bank shall be jointly liable for the safe-keeping of such Federal reserve notes, gold, gold certificates, and lawful money. Nothing herein contained, however, shall be construed to prohibit a Federal reserve agent from depositing gold or gold certificates with the Federal Reserve Board, to be held by such board subject to his order, or with the Treasurer of the United States for the purposes authorized by law.

"SEC. 6. That section 16 be further amended by adding at the end of the section the following:

"'That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to receive deposits of gold coin or of gold certificates with the Treasurer or any Assistant Treasurer of the United States when tendered by any Federal reserve bank or Federal reserve agent for credit to its or his account with the Federal Reserve Board. The Secretary shall prescribe by regulation the form or receipt to be issued by the Treasurer or Assistant Treasurer to the Federal reserve bank or Federal reserve agent making the deposit, and a duplicate of such receipt shall be delivered to the Federal Reserve Board by the Treasurer at Washington upon proper advices from any Assistant Treasurer that such deposit has been made. Deposits so made shall be held subject to the orders of the Federal Reserve Board and shall be payable in gold coin or gold certificates on the order of the Federal Reserve Board to any Federal reserve bank or Federal reserve agent at the Treasury or at the Subtreasury of the United States nearest the place of business of such Federal reserve bank or such Federal reserve agent: Provided, however, That any expense incurred in shipping gold to or from the Treasury or Subtreasuries in order to make such payments, or as a result of making such payments, shall be paid by the Federal Reserve Board and assessed against the Federal reserve banks. The order used by the Federal Reserve Board in making such payments shall be signed by the governor or vice governor, or such other officers or members as the board may by regulation prescribe. The form of such order shall be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury.

"'The expenses necessarily incurred in carrying out these provisions, including the cost of the certificates or receipts issued for deposits received, and all expenses incident to the handling of such deposits shall be paid by the Federal Reserve Board and included in its assessments against the several Federal reserve banks.

"'Gold deposits standing to the credit of any Federal reserve bank with the Federal Reserve Board shall, at the option of said bank, be counted as part of the lawful reserve which it is required to maintain against outstanding Federal reserve notes, or as a part of the reserve it is required to maintain against deposits.

"'Nothing in this section shall be construed as amending section 6 of the act of March 14, 1900, as amended by the acts of March 4, 1907, March 2, 1911, and June 12, 1916, nor shall the provisions of this section be construed to apply to the deposits made or to the receipts or certificates issued under those acts.'

"SEC. 7. That section 17 be, and is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"'SEC. 17. So much of the provisions of section 5159 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and section 4 of the act of June 20, 1874, and section 8 of the act of July 12, 1882, and of any other provisions of existing statutes as require that before any national banking association shall be authorized to commence banking business it shall transfer and deliver to the Treasurer of the United States a stated amount of United States registered bonds, and so much of those provisions or of any other provisions of existing statutes as require any national banking association now or hereafter organized to maintain a minimum deposit of such bonds with the Treasurer is hereby repealed.'

"SEC. 8. That section 19 be amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"'SEC. 19. Demand deposits within the meaning of this act shall comprise all deposits payable within 30 days, and time deposits shall comprise all deposits payable after 30 days, all savings accounts and certificates of deposit which are subject to not less than 30 days' notice before payment, and all postal savings deposits.

"'Every bank, banking association, or trust company which is or which becomes a member of any Federal reserve bank shall establish and maintain with its Federal reserve bank reserves as follows:

"'(a) If not in a reserve or central reserve city, as now or hereafter defined, it shall hold and maintain with the Federal reserve bank of its district actual net reserves equal to not less than 6 per cent of the aggregate amount of its demand deposits and 3 per cent of its time deposits.

"'(b) If in a reserve city, as now or hereafter defined, it shall hold and maintain with the Federal reserve bank of its district actual net reserves equal to not less than 10 per cent of the aggregate amount of its demand deposits and 3 per cent of its time deposits.

"'(c) If in a central reserve city, as now or hereafter defined, it shall hold and maintain with the Federal reserve bank of its district an actual net reserve equal to not less than 13 per cent of the aggregate amount of its demand deposits and 3 per cent of its time deposits.

"'Every member bank shall maintain in its own vaults an amount of specie or currency equal to at least 4 per cent of its demand deposits less the amount of those reserves with the Federal reserve bank which are in excess of the minimum reserves required by this section.

"'No member bank shall keep on deposit with any nonmember bank a sum in excess of 10 per cent of its own paid-up capital and surplus. No member bank shall act as the medium or agent of a nonmember bank in applying for or receiving discounts from a Federal reserve bank under the provisions of this act except by permission of the Federal Reserve Board.

"'The required balance carried by a member bank with a Federal reserve bank may, under the regulations and subject to such penalties as may be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board, be checked against and withdrawn by such member bank for the purpose of meeting existing liabilities: Provided, however, That no bank shall at any time make new loans or shall pay any dividends unless and until the total reserve required by law is fully restored.

"'In estimating the reserves and the cash in vault required by this act, the net balance of amounts due to and from other banks shall be taken as the basis for ascertaining the bank deposits against which reserves with Federal reserve banks and cash in vault shall be determined.

"'National banks or banks organized under local laws located in Alaska or in a dependency or insular possession or any part of the United States outside the continental United States may remain nonmember banks, and shall in that event maintain reserves and comply with all the conditions now provided by law regulating them; or said banks, except in the Philippine Islands, may, with the consent of the Federal Reserve Board, become member banks of any one of the reserve districts, and shall, in that event, take stock, maintain reserves, and be subject to all the other provisions of this act.'

"SEC. 9. That that part of section 22 which reads as follows: 'Other than the usual salary or director's fees paid to any officer, director, or employee of a member bank and other than a reasonable fee paid by said bank to such officer, director, or employee for service rendered to such bank, no officer, director, employee, or attorney of a member bank shall be a beneficiary of or receive, directly or indirectly, any fee, commission, gift, or other consideration for or in connection with any transaction or business of the bank,' be, and hereby is, amended and reenacted so as to read as follows:

"'Other than the usual salary or director's fee paid to any officer, director, employee, or attorney of a member bank, and other than a reasonable fee paid by said bank to such officer, director, employee, or attorney for services rendered to such bank, no officer, director, employee, or attorney of a member bank shall be a beneficiary of or receive directly or indirectly any fee, commission, gift, or other consideration for or in connection with any transaction or business of the bank: Provided, however, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed to prohibit a director, officer, employee, or attorney from receiving the same rate of interest paid to other depositors for similar deposits made with such banks: And provided further, That notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or other evidences of debt executed or indorsed by directors or attorneys of a member bank may be discounted with such member bank on the same terms and conditions as other notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or evidences of debt upon the affirmative vote or written assent of at least three-fourths of the members of the board of directors of such member bank.'

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is entitled to an hour.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to discuss the matter. I move the previous question on the motion.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] to take this bill from the Speaker's table and disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Motion by Mr. McFADDEN:

"I move that the managers on the part of the House be instructed to agree in conference to the substance of the following provision in the Senate amendment, being the last five lines on page 8 and the first five lines on page 9, which read as follows:

"'Provided, Such nonmember bank or trust company maintains with the Federal reserve bank of its district a balance sufficient to offset the items in transit held for its account by the Federal reserve bank: Provided further, That nothing in this or any other section of this act shall be construed as prohibiting a member or nonmember bank from making reasonable charges, in no case to exceed 10 cents per $100 or fraction thereof, based on the total of checks and drafts presented at any one time, for collection or payment of checks and drafts and remission therefor by exchange or otherwise.'"

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order at this time.

The SPEAKER. Why not?

Mr. GLASS. The conferees have not been appointed.

The SPEAKER. I know; but if you are ever going to instruct them at all, you must instruct them before they are appointed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The stage of disagreement has not yet been reached.

Mr. MANN. We have disagreed to the Senate amendment and the Senate has insisted on its disagreement. The stage of disagreement has been reached.

Mr. WINGO. That is the pending motion—to disagree.

The SPEAKER. The disagreement has been adopted.

Mr. WINGO. It has not been adopted. The previous question has been ordered.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker submitted the motion, and it was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no doubt about the parliamentary rule. The stage of disagreement has not been reached until after a free conference and the two Houses have not been able to agree.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman is clear off his base.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, well, I am not clear off my base. The gentleman may fool some people on that side, but he can not deceive me.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will know better if he thinks, and he is foolish to talk in that way.

The SPEAKER. Only one at a time. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York on this point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Until after the managers on the part of the House and the managers on the part of the Senate have attempted to agree and have reached the stage of disagreement, it is not in order to instruct the conferees. The very same question came up on the Philippine bill. I made the motion, but nobody raised the question of order. The situation was the same. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and myself discussed it thoroughly and were in agreement as to what would happen if the point of order was interjected. The stage of disagreement has not been reached between the two Houses in this matter.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I will give the Speaker information.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be very glad to get it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. On the Philippine bill, to which the gentleman from New York refers, I suggested to him to offer a motion to instruct the conferees before the stage of disagreement had been reached. There was a case where the House had amended a Senate bill and before the stage of disagreement had been reached the conferees were instructed by a motion, which was subject to a point of order; but that is not this case. This is a case where there is a House bill with a Senate amendment, upon which amendment the Senate has made an insistence, and the House has disagreed to the Senate amendment, and we have reached the stage of disagreement. It is not conferees who disagree. It is the Houses of Congress which disagree. I have stated the case correctly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has not stated the case correctly.

Mr. MANN. I remember the circumstance, because in the immigration bill some years ago, when the House struck out all of the Senate amendments and inserted the House bill, a motion was made to instruct the conferees, and I made the point of order that the motion was not in order because the Houses were not in disagreement, and that the action of one House would not put the two Houses in disagreement. The Speaker sustained the point of order. That was what I called to the attention of the gentleman from New York on the Philippine bill; but here both Houses have acted, and they are in disagreement.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are not.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman, when he stops to think, will know I am right about it. He is too good a parliamentarian to say that they are not in disagreement, when both Houses have disagreed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have not.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman just happens to be wrong; that is all.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have not disagreed in the present instance. There is no disagreement when the Senate sends an amendment over here with the request for a conference before action by the House.

Mr. MANN. When both Houses have ordered conferees, they are in disagreement. Otherwise they could not order a conference.

Mr. GARNER. Has the motion to disagree been agreed to?

Mr. MANN. It has been agreed to, and the Speaker will find in the Manual—not on this point—what the Speaker already knows, that the motion to instruct the managers should be offered after the vote to ask for or agree to a conference and before the managers are appointed. That is the present situation.

The SPEAKER. It is this way: If they can not be instructed now, they never can be.

Mr. MANN. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. All the Members who have been here any length of time know that when a conference report is brought in here it is almost absolutely impossible to beat it. The Members hesitate about it, and therefore the point of order made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is overruled. The question is——

Mr. WINGO. The disagreement has not yet been reached, because the Chair has never put the question on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to disagree.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken. The previous question was never moved on this, and was never put.

Mr. WINGO. If the Speaker will pardon me, I know the gentleman from Virginia moved the previous question.

Mr. MANN. It was not put.

Mr. WINGO. As soon as the Chair put it, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] offered a motion, and the query at once arose in my mind as to whether he knew what he could do under that.

The SPEAKER. I do not know anything about what the gentleman from Pennsylvania knew. What I know is that the motion to disagree was put and carried.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. ADAMSON. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then I was correct in my assumption a few minutes ago that after the disagreement was ordered and before the conferees were appointed they could be instructed.

The SPEAKER. That is exactly what the Chair has held.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am much obliged to you.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is under no obligation. [Laughter.] The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] to instruct the conferees.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. GLASS) there were—ayes 111, noes 63.

Mr. GLASS. I demand the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BORLAND. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is none. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors——

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be again read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. In a minute. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Before he does that, without objection, the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] will be reported again.

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. MCFADDEN was again read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 240, nays 118, answered "present" 4, not voting 69, as follows:

So the motion to instruct the conferees was agreed to.

The following pairs were announced:

Until further notice:

Mr. GANDY with Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota.

Mr. TALBOTT with Mr. BROWNING.

Mr. DALE of New York with Mr. HASKELL.

Mr. BRUCKNER with Mr. CHANDLER of New York.

Mr. BUCHANAN with Mr. CLARK of Pennsylvania.

Mr. CARLIN with Mr. COSTELLO.

Mr. COADY with Mr. CURRIE of Michigan.

Mr. EAGLE with Mr. DAVIS.

Mr. FLYNN with Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD.

Mr. GREGG with Mr. GEORGE W. FAIRCHILD.

Mr. HAMILL with Mr. FOCHT.

Mr. HUDDLESTON with Mr. FRANCIS.

Mr. KEY of Ohio with Mr. GRAY of New Jersey.

Mr. LITTLEPAGE with Mr. HAWLEY.

Mr. MCANDREWS with Mr. HAYES.

Mr. MAHER with Mr. KEARNS.

Mr. MARTIN of Illinois with Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY with Mr. KREIDER.

Mr. POU with Mr. MCCULLOCH.

Mr. ROMJUE with Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania.

Mr. SABATH with Mr. MORIN.

Mr. SEARS with Mr. PRATT.

Mr. SHOUSE with Mr. RODENBERG.

Mr. SULLIVAN with Mr. SIEGEL.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado with Mr. SMITH of Idaho.

Mr. WALTON with Mr. TINKHAM.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD with Mr. WINSLOW.

Mr. OLNEY with Mr. WOODYARD.

Mr. SCULLY with Mr. ZIHLMAN.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I voted "yea," but I find I am paired with the gentleman from South Dakota, Mr. GANDY, and I will withdraw that vote and answer "present."

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. SMITH of Idaho, is prevented from being present to-day on account of critical illness in his family.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

The Chair appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. GLASS, Mr. PHELAN, and Mr. PLATT.

RECRUITING THE NATIONAL GUARD (H. DOC. NO. 136).

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed as a House document the order of the War Department of May 5, 1917, with reference to the recruiting of the National Guard, and that 5,000 additional copies be printed, to go to the folding room.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the order of the War Department touching the recruiting of the National Guard be made a public document and that 5,000 extra copies be printed, to go to the folding room. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, how long is the order and what is the need of it?

Mr. CALDWELL. The order is very short. It will probably be in the shape of a folder. It has not been made public by the War Department, but it is something necessary for the information of the National Guard and people who want to organize additional units.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including a statement adopted at a mass meeting of the Friends of Irish Freedom.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE REVENUE BILL.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that 12,500 copies of the revenue bill, H. R. 4280, together with the report, be printed, 2,000 copies to go to the document room, 8,000 copies to the folding room, and 2,500 copies to the Committee on Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unannimous consent that 12,500 copies of the revenue bill be printed, 8,000 copies to go to the folding room, 2,000 copies to the document room, and 2,500 copies to the Committee on Ways and Means. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes. Pending that, I would like to see if we can not come to some agreement in respect to the time for general debate.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina that I have requests already for about eight hours of general debate, and they have only commenced coming in. I wish that we could run along under general debate without any agreement at all until we see where we can land. I think we can spend some two or three days in general debate.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be divided between that side and this, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] to control one half of the time and I to control the other half.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that general debate be controlled one half by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. Is there objection?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I will say that both the gentleman from North Carolina and myself are going to support the bill, but I will be glad to alternate the time with gentlemen who want to speak against the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I suppose the gentleman from North Carolina would also yield to gentlemen who are opposed to the bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It is quite evident that we can not finish general debate upon this bill to-day, and it seems to be equally evident that we can not finish it to-morrow. Why would it not be a good plan to run right along to-morrow into a night session, with an effort to finish general debate by Saturday night?

Mr. KITCHIN. I was in hopes that we could finish the general debate in two days and begin under the five-minute rule on Saturday morning.

Mr. MANN. That is impossible, I think.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let us, then, get unanimous consent to close general debate on Saturday night when we adjourn.

Mr. MANN. I do not think we had better make any agreement now, but let us have an understanding that we will run along to-morrow night.

Mr. KITCHIN. We will run on to-morrow and Saturday morning, and as to-morrow night——

Mr. MANN. I think we ought to have at least three days on this bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, would not the gentleman from Illinois rather have more extended debate under the five-minute rule when active amendments are offered than to have such long general debate when no one is in the Chamber listening to it? Is it not more effective?

Mr. MANN. I am not so sure about that. I think if we have three days general debate that we ought to have three days debate under the five-minute rule. That is about all we can stand on that.

Mr. GARNER. Would not two days under general debate be all that you could stand?

Mr. MANN. No; I could stand a week of that and not be hurt at all.

Mr. GARNER. No; because you do not have to stay in the Chamber.

Mr. MANN. But I do stay in the Chamber.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let us try it for a couple of days.

Mr. KITCHIN. We will run along and see.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman then sit to-morrow night?

Mr. KITCHIN. We will see how we get along.

Mr. MANN. But Members ought to know.

Mr. KITCHIN. We do not know.

Mr. MANN. If you do not say before the day is over, you will have to keep a quorum if you try it.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would be willing, and I reckon everyone else would, if we could close debate Friday night.

Mr. MANN. I do not think we can close debate on Friday night.

Mr. KITCHIN. We will just see how it goes along. We do not know whether we will hold to-morrow night or not. I am not inclined to stay to-morrow night.

Mr. MANN. Members who want to talk and get in before will not want to stay, but Members who have the right to talk and do not get in will want to stay. Of course, the Ways and Means Committee gets in any time it pleases.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, that is not the situation at all.

Mr. MANN. It is the situation.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the House should want to stay I shall have no objection to staying here until 10 or 11 o'clock to-morrow night; but we do not want to agree now that we shall hold a session to-morrow night. The House may be so broken down it would rather not do it. If there is any inclination of Members to have a night session, I am perfectly willing to have it to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina that he control one-half of the time in general debate and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] control the other half, with the understanding that the gentleman from North Carolina is to yield a reasonable amount of time to those who are opposed to the bill and that the gentleman from Michigan shall do the same?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if he ought not to include in his request that debate be confined to the bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I will ask that, too.

Mr. MANN. I shall object to that.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina that he and the gentleman from Michigan shall control the time in general debate?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4280, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 4280, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill may be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I can not finish my remarks to-night, and I would rather have the opportunity to make a connected and continuous speech. Will the gentleman from North Carolina put on somebody who will occupy the time for the remainder of to-day? I would thank him very much if he would, and I will go on in the morning.

Mr. KITCHIN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW—11 A. M.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 31 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 11, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, recommending an increase in the pay of certain civilian employees at the Military Academy (H. Doc. No. 134); to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, recommending that records of proceedings of examining boards for promotion of officers of the Navy may be finally acted on by the Secretary of the Navy instead of the President (H. Doc. No. 135); to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. ADAMSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 4050) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 48), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. KALANIANAOLE: A bill (H. R. 4347) to further regulate the leasing of land in the Territory of Hawaii; to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. EVANS: A bill (H. R. 4348) for the enlargement of the Federal building at Butte, Mont.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4349) providing for the enlargement of the Federal building at Missoula, Mont.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4350) giving the right to an additional homestead to all persons who have exhausted or who shall exhaust their original right of entry through the purchase of Indian lands; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4354) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Anaconda, in the State of Montana; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4355) to increase the limit of cost for the Federal building and site therefor at Billings, Mont., and to authorize the provision of quarters for United States courts in said building; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. RANDALL: A bill (H. R. 4356) to conserve the agricultural food products of the United States and to prohibit their manufacture into alcoholic liquors, except in certain cases, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By the SPEAKER (by request): Memorial from the Legislature of the State of Michigan, favoring national prohibition amendment; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KALANIANAOLE: Memorial of Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, requesting Congress to amend section 421 of the revised laws of Hawaii; to the Committee on the Territories.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BARNHART: A bill (H. R. 4357) granting an increase of pension to Thomas J. Clark; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4358) granting an increase of pension to James Miller; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4359) granting an increase of pension to John Kinney; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CLAYPOOL: A bill (H. R. 4360) granting an increase of pension to Sanford Smith; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. EVANS: A bill (H. R. 4361) for the relief of A. J. Lowary; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. HASTINGS: A bill (H. R. 4362) granting a pension to Thomas Lee; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 4363) granting a pension to Mary M. Fessler; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SHERWOOD: A bill (H. R. 4364) granting an increase of pension to John E. Spangler; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STEVENSON: A bill (H. R. 4365) to increase the pension now being paid Henry Langley; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4366) to increase the pension now being paid to Mrs. Hessie M. McCarley; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4367) to grant a pension to Lawrence Hubschman; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WELTY: A bill (H. R. 4368) granting an increase of pension to John W. Barnett; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 11, 1917.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our lives are in Thy hands. Thou hast taught us that Thou hast in view the making of a completed and perfect life. Thou dost bid us bide Thy time and put our trust in Thee. We come before Thee with the mighty problems of life. We come with our hearts full of anxiety and unrest; yet we triumph through our faith. We believe that out of the strife and toil of life will come the peace and calm of a victory that is higher than the victory that this world wins—the establishment of peace and order among men and the establishment of a universal brotherhood. Guide us, we pray Thee, with a divine passion to fulfill God's great plan of life. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. OVERMAN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think probably we would save time by having a quorum. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brady	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Smith, Mich.
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Smith, S. C.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. My colleague [Mr. LANE] is absent owing to illness.

Mr. HUSTING. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] is necessarily absent. He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is detained from the Senate on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

ESTIMATES OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War, submitting a special estimate of appropriation under the head of appropriation, "Pay, etc., of the Army," for temporary employment of messengers for headquarters of the several territorial departments, districts, divisions, and brigades, and service schools, $72,000 (S. Doc. No. 27), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates of appropriations for contingent expenses, Treasury Department, furniture, etc., $10,000; contingent expenses, Treasury Department, file holders and cases, $4,000; and contingent expenses, Treasury Department, miscellaneous items, $3,000, etc. (S. Doc. No. 26), which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MANUFACTURE OF CONVICT-MADE GOODS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting reports from the consuls at Alexandria, Egypt; Saloniki, Greece; Venice, Italy; and Madras, India, relative to the extent to which prisoners, paupers, or detained persons are utilized in the production or manufacture of the commerce of various countries, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, which will be incorporated in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Territories.

The joint memorial is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY FOR THE TERRITORY OF ALASKA,
Juneau, Alaska, April 28, 1917.

Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
Vice President of the United States, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: By direction of the Alaska Territorial Legislature, now in session, I am sending you herewith a certified copy of senate joint memorial No. 7.

Yours, very respectfully, CHARLES E. DAVIDSON,
Secretary of Alaska.

Senate joint memorial 7.

To the President of the United States, United States Senate, and House of Representatives.

We, your memorialists of the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, do most respectfully request that—

Whereas there are in the Territory of Alaska very extensive and valuable oil fields, the principal of which are: (1) Katalla-Chilkat, (2) Nuchawak, (3) Yakatage, the former containing 26½ square miles; the second 4½ square miles and the third 21½ square miles, but in all 52½ square miles, which is only a small fraction of the known area of oil lands, all of which have been thoroughly investigated and reported upon by the most competent oil experts in the United States. These reports show very rich yields, high-grade product, and easily accessible territory, being on the coast of Alaska near Kayak Island; numerous heavy surface seepage of oil at Katalla meadow, Burl's Creek, the Barrett Claim, and Chilkat, all in the Katalla field and the Yakatage, Yukon, and Cathleen Creeks all in the Nuchawak field and at Oil, Crooked, Poul, and Johnstone Creeks in the Yakatage field; and

Whereas the laboratory tests of the samples taken from these oil fields show a very high percentage of distillate and gas oil; and

Whereas the people of Alaska residing in close proximity to these fields use annually more than 7,000,000 gallons of distillate and gasoline in the general course of their industrial and maritime pursuits for which they are forced to pay exorbitant prices, owing to long distances from point of supply and heavy demand for product; and

Whereas as these oils are seeping away and going to waste without any possibility of ultimate recovery: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, your memorialists, would respectfully urge that your honorable body give earnest attention to the formulation of a plan leasing these oil lands according to the terms of the bill (H. R. 406) or on the usual basis of one-eighth royalty or under whatever provisions or restrictions you may deem it proper to impose. Thereby releasing to the people of Alaska and the entire western coast of the United States a product of one of our richest resources of which there is at this time dire need; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy hereof be presented to the President of the United States the Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, to the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands in the United States Senate, to the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands in the United States House of Representatives, the Delegate to Congress from Alaska, and the Secretary of the Interior.

DEAR SIR: By direction of the Alaska Territorial Legislature, now in session, I am sending you herewith a certified copy of senate joint memorial No. 8.

Yours, very truly, CHARLES E. DAVIDSON,
Secretary of Alaska.

Senate joint memorial 8. (By Senator Sutherland.)

To the Secretary of War, the Signal Service Bureau, and the Congress:

Your memorialists, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska in session assembled, do most respectfully represent—

That the section of Alaska embracing the valley of the Kuskokwim River is rapidly developing into an important commercial section of this Territory;

That the mining and fishing industries have now reached a stage where more rapid communication with the other business sections of Alaska, as well as with the United States, is necessary;

That at present there is no means of communication with the outside world furnished the residents of the Kuskokwim Valley other than the inadequate overland mail service:

Therefore your memorialists do most respectfully request that a wireless telegraph station be established at Bethel or some other station on the Kuskokwim River;

And your memorialists will ever pray.

House joint memorial 7. (By Mr. Coombs.)

Petition to the Congress of the United States for the appropriation of sufficient funds for the establishment and maintenance of an insane asylum and sanitarium within the Territory of Alaska, for the purpose of caring for the insane of the Territory and the abolition of the present contract system at Morningside, near Portland, Oreg.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress of the United States assembled:

Your petitioners, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, represent as follows:

That the system now in vogue of caring for the insane of the Territory of Alaska under contract with an asylum and sanitarium located near Portland, Oreg., is productive of great harm to the unfortunate inmates of said sanitarium, and that for many years last past numerous complaints have been filed with the legislature, with the governor of the Territory and other Territorial officials, and with various organizations in the Territory, which said complaints have all been investigated from time to time, and the facts set forth therein have been fully verified; that persons of unimpeachable veracity have been interviewed who have personally visited the said sanitarium and asylum and talked with many of the inmates and investigated the conditions which exist in said institution, and such information has disclosed the fact that the care and treatment of the insane patients of the Territory of Alaska has been commercialized, to the great detriment, both physical and mental, of all the insane who have been committed to said institution. It has been proved to the entire satisfaction of the legislature and of the other officials of the Territory of Alaska that an absolute lack of any humanitarian spirit in the conduct and management of said asylum prevails; that quarters provided for the inmates are wholly inadequate; that the sanitary conditions are bad, and that there is absolutely no regard for the welfare of the patients; that there is not sufficient space nor room for the patients to enjoy sufficient fresh air in inclement weather, and that no provision is made for physical exercise for those patients who are able to exercise, except when employed by the institution for its own profit.

It has been brought to the attention of your petitioners that many of the inmates of this asylum when committed have been suffering from very mild forms of mental derangement, and that by continued confinement in this institution their condition has become greatly worse until they become hopelessly insane and physical and mental wrecks.

Your petitioners desire to again call your attention to the report of a committee of the House of Representatives of Alaska of the second session of the Alaska Legislature, dated March 24, 1915, a copy of which is hereto attached and made a part of this petition.

Wherefore, your petitioners pray that the contract system for the caring of the insane of Alaska be abolished, and that an institution for the care of the Alaska insane patients be established in Alaska at some convenient and desirable location, any number of which can be obtained where the climate and facilities are conducive to the proper treatment, care, and welfare of the insane patients; and it is

Resolved by the Third Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Alaska, That this petition be forwarded to Congress of the United States with an urgent request that the same be given immediate consideration and that immediate steps be taken for the abrogation of the present contract system and for the establishment of an asylum and sanitarium for the insane in the Territory of Alaska. It is further

Resolved, That the secretary of the Territory of Alaska be, and he hereby is, instructed to forthwith transmit copies of this memorial and petition, properly authenticated, to the President of the United States, to the Secretary of the Interior, and to the Delegate to Congress from Alaska.

The joint memorial is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY FOR THE TERRITORY OF ALASKA,
Juneau, Alaska, May 1, 1917.

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE,

DEAR SIR: By direction of the Alaska Territorial Legislature, now in session, I have the honor to send you herewith a certified copy of house joint memorial 11.

Yours, very truly, CHARLES E. DAVIDSON,
Secretary of Alaska.

House joint memorial 11. (By Mr. T. C. Price.)

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, do most respectfully and earnestly represent that—

Whereas by law residents of Alaska are permitted, among other things, to kill each year a certain limited number of game food animals, including moose, deer, caribou, and sheep; and

Whereas certain fees, in some cases almost prohibitive in character, are charged to residents of Alaska on shipments outside of all trophies of such food game animals above described; and
Whereas great waste results from carrying out of such policy in that the heads of such animals have to be cast away; and
Whereas a check on such shipments could continue to be kept by a shipping permit being required to be taken out on each shipment out of the Territory: Now, therefore,

The Legislature of the Territory of Alaska, in this their third session assembled, respectfully urges upon the Congress of the United States an amendment to the act of May 11, 1908 (35 Stats. L, 102), permitting the free shipment of trophies of the above-named food animals by residents of the Territory out of Alaska, subject, however, to permit or license through the United States customhouse, such trophies not to exceed in number for each person the limit of any particular class of animals permitted by law to be killed during the proper season.

House joint memorial 12. (By Mr. Allan.)

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Your memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of Alaska, most respectfully represent that—

Whereas the Seward Peninsula is one of the greatest gold-producing sections of Alaska, its total output almost totaling $100,000,000, and contains the largest and richest auriferous deposits in America; and
Whereas the development of such deposits has been retarded and the production of gold has been greatly curtailed by the excessive cost of transportation from tidewater points to the interior due to the lack of roads; and
Whereas vast deposits of low-grade gold-bearing gravel necessitate the use of hydraulic mining and dredging and the construction of roads is an imperative necessity for the hauling of machinery and fuel; and
Whereas the interior of the Seward Peninsula is rich not only in placer gold but has immense deposits of gold-bearing quartz and also copper, tin, antimony, iron, graphite, coal, tungsten, and nearly every minor metal known, and such deposits have been prospected to the extent as to demonstrate that they exist in paying quantities; and
Whereas the roads that have been constructed on the Seward Peninsula by the Alaska Road Commission have been of inestimable value in its development, yet such roads, being limited in extent owing to the limited appropriations, are insufficient to supply the needs for transportation facilities in the Seward Peninsula, which is in area larger than the State of New York; and
Whereas owing to storms and ice conditions mail service and transportation of goods via the circuitous coast route to Candle and Arctic ports is extremely uncertain and dangerous; and
Whereas the construction of a trunk-line post road from Nome, the distributing point of the peninsula, to Candle via the Kougarok and Imnachuk mining districts will open up the greater part of the interior and is an absolute necessity to the development of this great mining country: Now, therefore,

The Senate and House of Representatives of the Territory of Alaska most earnestly pray that an appropriation be made sufficient to build and construct a trunk-line post road from Nome to Candle in the Seward Peninsula via the Kougarok and Imnachuk mining districts.

Your memorialists will ever pray.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution of the National Association of State Universities, which will be incorporated in the RECORD.

The resolutions are as follows:

NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF STATE UNIVERSITIES,
Burlington, Vt.

Resolutions.

The National Association of State Universities in special meeting assembled announces that the State universities, believing that they represent the spirit and sentiment of their several States, are ready to put all their institutional resources—material and human—at the disposal of the National Government in the service of the country for the entire period of the war on which our Nation has entered.

This declaration of patriotic purpose is made without any reservation whatsoever, and means that the State universities, as public institutions, are to be used to the utmost limit of their possibilities in faculties and equipment for the preparation of efficient soldiers, for the training of skilled educational, scientific, technical, and professional workers and for the conduct of all scientific instruction that may aid in the successful prosecution of the war.

Therefore the President of the United States and his advisors, and the Congress, are hereby notified that the State universities of America are willing to undertake the readjustment of their curricula and the rearrangement of all their activities, in time and content, so far as may be necessary, to bring to ultimate triumph the righteous conflict for universal democracy.

Unanimously adopted at Washington, D. C., the 4th day of May, 1917.

Attest:

GUY POTTER BENTON, President.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of Washington Council, No. 1, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Germantown, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit speculation in foodstuffs, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the congregation of the First Unitarian Church of Pittsburgh, Pa., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented petitions of the Commonwealth Club, of Seattle, and of the City Council of Seattle, Wash., praying for the enactment of legislation to guarantee a minimum price for this year's crops, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. CURTIS presented a petition of Larrabee Post, Grand Army of the Republic, of Russell, Kans., praying for increased pensions, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the students of the Western Dental College, of Kansas City, Mo., praying for the establishment of a dental corps in the Army, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Young Men's Christian Association of the State of Kansas, praying for national prohibition as a war measure and for the protection of soldiers from vice, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McLEAN presented petitions of sundry citizens of Branford, Orange, and New Haven, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 71, International Molders' Union, and of the Central Labor Union, of Hartford, Conn., praying for an investigation by the Federal Government of the explosion during the San Francisco, Cal., preparedness parade of July 22, 1916, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Connecticut State Council of Defense, praying for the enactment of legislation to save daylight and to provide standard time for the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I present a telegram from W. A. McRae, State commissioner of agriculture of Florida, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TALLAHASSEE, FLA., May 9, 1917.

Hon. PARK TRAMMELL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The agricultural question is paramount. Can not exemptions be made of the expert help of the agricultural departments where their knowledge and assistance are essential to handling the food question promptly and successfully in this department? It will deprive it of a great proportion of expert and trained assistance which can not be replaced in months or years. I strongly urge and advocate those exemptions. Under the present stressed conditions can not you and Senator FLETCHER consult with the President and Secretary Houston and secure these exemptions? It should be done in all the States.

W. A. MCRAE,
Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I present resolutions adopted at the Florida State convention of educators, indorsing the Susan B. Anthony amendment to the Constitution, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions indorsing the Susan B. Anthony amendment passed at the Florida State convention of educators.

Whereas we men and women, composing the State convention of county superintendents of education, school principals, and school-board officials, meeting this 26th day of April, 1917, at Lake City, Fla., believe in the loyalty, courage, and devotion of the women of our State, affirm our desire to see long-delayed justice done them during this trying time when war is actually upon us, attest our conviction that love of liberty is a natural instinct inherent in the human race, no less in women than in men, we do affirm a deep sense of gratitude to our women of the South who stood so nobly by us during the trying times of the Civil War: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we urge the President of the United States to speak to the leaders of the majority party in Congress, asking them to pass on to the several States for ratification, as a war measure, the amendment enfranchising all the women of our country, known as the Susan B. Anthony amendment; and be it further

Resolved, That we call upon the Florida delegation, both in the Senate and House, to help secure by every means in their power the adoption of the Anthony amendment; and be it still further

Resolved, That the entire Congress be urged to pass the amendment at the earliest possible moment as a war measure, so that the women of our Nation may have, added to their sense of loyalty and their willingness to serve their country, the deep sense of personal appreciation that will follow recognition by their Government and that the Government prove to them that the men of America deem them as worthy of trust as they do of sacrifice; and be it finally

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States, the party leaders in both Houses of Congress, and the entire Florida delegation with the request that the resolutions be read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

W. N. SHEATS,
State Superintendent Public Instruction, Chairman.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I present a telegram from the Blue Poster Advertising Co., of Gainesville, Fla., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GAINESVILLE, FLA., May 10, 1917.

Senator TRAMMELL,
Washington, D. C.:

Proposed tax on poster advertising business will work undue hardship on the poster men of Florida, with other tax and license they now have to pay, and drive many out of business. Help us save our business by reducing same.

BLUE POSTER ADVERTISING CO.,
ARCHIE W. BLUE.

Mr. TRAMMELL presented a petition of Cuesta, Rey & Co., of Tampa, Fla., suggesting a system of taxation on cigars, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a memorial of the Shoe and Leather Reporter and the Shoe Retailer, of Boston, Mass., remonstrating against an increase in second-class postage rates, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Abbott Auto Co., of Derry, N. H., remonstrating against a tax on the gross sales of automobiles, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. SWANSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3330) to temporarily increase the commissioned and warrant and enlisted strength of the Navy and Marine Corps, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 36) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2337) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes," relative to enrollments in the Naval Reserve Force, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 35) thereon.

RELIEF OF OWNERS OF MINING CLAIMS.

Mr. WALSH. From the Committee on Mines and Mining, I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 33) to relieve the owners of mining claims who have been mustered into the military or naval service of the United States as officers or enlisted men from performing assessment work during the term of such service. As this is a matter which probably will not consume any time and can be considered without opposition, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which require that on each mining claim located after the 10th day of May, 1872, and until patent has been issued therefor, not less than $100 worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made during each year, shall not apply to claims or parts of claims owned by officers or enlisted men who have been mustered into the military or naval service of the United States, so that no mining claim or any part thereof owned by such person which has been regularly located and recorded shall be subject to forfeiture for nonperformance of the annual assessments until six months after such owner is mustered out of the service or until six months after his death in the service: Provided, That the claimant of any mining location, in order to obtain the benefits of this resolution, shall file, or cause to be filed, in the office where the location notice or certificate is recorded, within 90 days from and after the passage and approval of this resolution, a notice of his muster into the service of the United States and of his desire to hold said mining claim under this resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. STERLING:

A bill (S. 2251) granting a pension to Henry L. Henrysen (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHAFROTH:

A bill (S. 2252) for the relief of the city of Pueblo, Colo.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 2253) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to study the application of machinery to the various processes of the farm; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

A bill (S. 2254) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to make further survey of the Pecos River and Valley in Texas and New Mexico to determine the feasibility and cost of an irrigation project thereon; to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 2255) granting an increase of pension to Hannah Hagan (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CURTIS: A bill (S. 2256) granting an increase of pension to Nannie Johnson Veale;

A bill (S. 2257) granting an increase of pension to John R. Merideth; and

A bill (S. 2258) granting a pension to John Preston Fairchild (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 2259) for the relief of Jacob Samuel Weaver (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SMITH of Maryland:

By Mr. SWANSON:

A bill (S. 2265) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay interest and expenses incurred to and by the owners of lots, pieces, or parcels of land acquired by the United States for the enlargement of the Capitol Grounds; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 2266) authorizing the President to recommission in the Regular Army as additional numbers certain former officers; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 60) authorizing and directing the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics of marriage and divorce; to the Committee on the Census.

PUNISHMENT OF MONOPOLIES.

Mr. GORE. I am directed by the subcommittee of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to introduce the following bill, and I suggest that it be referred to that committee. I also ask that it be printed in the RECORD. It is one of the emergency measures.

The bill (S. 2263) to provide further for the national security and defense, to conserve foods, feeds, and fuels, and to prevent monopolies, conspiracies, and other evil practices respecting the same, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That by reason of the existence of the state of war there is a national emergency, and it is essential for the national security and defense further to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution and to facilitate the movement of foods, feeds, and fuel, hereafter in this act called necessaries, for the Government and people of the United States, and to protect them against injurious speculation, manipulations, and controls affecting such supply, distribution, and movement. For such purposes the powers, authorities, obligations, and prohibitions hereinafter set forth are conferred and prescribed.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to investigate and ascertain the demand for, the supply, consumption, costs, and prices of, and the basic facts relating to the ownership, production, transportation, manufacture, storage, and distribution of foods, food materials, feeds, seeds, fertilizers, agricultural implements and machinery, and any article required in connection with the production, distribution, or utilization of food. It shall be the duty of any person, when requested by the Secretary of Agriculture, or any agent acting under his instructions, to produce books, letters, papers, documents, or reports, or to answer correctly, to the best of his knowledge, all questions necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this section. Any person who shall refuse or willfully neglect to produce such books, letters, papers, documents, or reports, or who shall refuse or willfully neglect to answer any such question, or who shall willfully give answers that are false, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Agriculture may, from time to time, establish and promulgate standards for grade and other classification of foods, food materials, feeds, seeds, other agricultural products, and fertilizers, hereafter in this section called commodities, by which their quality and value may be judged or determined, and standards for receptacles for commodities, by which the capacity of such receptacles may be judged or determined, and may make regulations governing the marks, brands, and labels used or to be used upon receptacles for commodities, for the purpose of showing the name and address of the producer or packer and the quality, nature, or quantity of the contents, and for the purpose of preventing deception with reference thereto. Before promulgating any standard under this section the Secretary of Agriculture may make such investigation and hear such representatives of trade interests concerned as he deems essential. Whenever the Secretary of Agriculture deems it essential to establish a standard for any commodity or receptacle, and a standard therefor shall then be effective under any act of Congress, such standards shall be promulgated as the standard for such commodity or receptacle under this section. Whenever any standard for grade or other classification of any commodity becomes effective under this section, no person thereafter shall pack for sale, offer for sale, consign for sale, or sell any such commodity by any grade or other classification other than that of such standard: Provided, That any person who packs for sale, offers for sale, consigns for sale, or sells any such commodity without regard to grade or other classification shall specifically describe such commodity or plainly mark the receptacle thereof in accordance with the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, in such manner as to indicate that such commodity is ungraded or unclassified. Whenever any standard for a receptacle becomes effective under this section no person thereafter shall pack for sale, offer for sale, consign for sale, or sell, in a receptacle, any commodity to which such standard for a receptacle is applicable, unless the receptacle conform to the standard, subject to reasonable variations therefrom permitted in the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, or unless the receptacle be so different in form, shape, and capacity as upon ordinary observation clearly to be distinguishable from the standard. Whenever any regulation governing the marking, branding, or labeling of a receptacle for a commodity becomes effective under this section, no person thereafter shall pack for sale, offer for sale, consign for sale, or sell any such commodity in a receptacle to which such regulation is applicable, except in accordance with such regulation. This section shall not apply to offers for sale, consignments for sale, or sales in the original package of foods or feeds imported from a foreign country. Any person who violates any provision of this section, or of the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture thereunder, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment for not exceeding one year, or both.

SEC. 4. That whenever the Secretary of Agriculture shall ascertain and publicly announce that any specified mixture of wheat, wheat flour, or other wheat product with any other cereal or cereal flour or other material of vegetable origin is wholesome and economically fit for food, such mixture, if marked or labeled so as plainly to disclose the kinds and relative amounts of the ingredients of the mixture and prepared in accordance with regulations made by the Secretary of Agriculture, shall not be deemed to be adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of the act of June 30, 1906, as amended, commonly known as the food and drugs act, or to be subject to the provisions of the act of June 13, 1898, as amended, commonly known as the mixed-flour law.

SEC. 5. That whenever the Secretary of Agriculture shall find it necessary, in order to carry out the provisions of this act, he may license the manufacture, storage, or distribution of foods, food materials, feeds, and fuels, and, after having publicly announced such necessity, no person shall, after a date fixed in such announcement, engage in or carry on any business specified in such announcement of manufacture, storage, or distribution of such articles, or any of them, unless he shall secure and hold a license issued by the Secretary of Agriculture. For the purposes of this section the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to prescribe such reasonable regulations governing the conduct of the business of licensees as he may find to be necessary. Such regulations may include requirements for systems and auditing of accounts to be kept by licensees, submission of reports by licensees, and the entry and inspection by the Secretary of Agriculture, or his duly authorized agents, of the places of business of licensees. Any person who, without a license issued by the Secretary of Agriculture, shall engage in or carry on any business for which a license is required under this section, or willfully violates any provision of this section or any regulation of the Secretary of Agriculture under this section, or willfully fails or refuses to comply with any order of the Secretary of Agriculture under this section, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 and by imprisonment not exceeding one year.

SEC. 6. That it is hereby made unlawful for any person to commit or permit preventable waste or deterioration of any necessaries, to hoard, or to hold, or enter into any contract or agreement for any necessaries in excess of any amount reasonably needed to supply his individual or business requirements for a reasonable time; to monopolize or attempt to monopolize, either locally or generally, any such necessaries; to engage in any discriminatory and unfair or any deceptive practice or device in handling or dealing in or with such necessaries; to enter into any contract, arrangement, or conspiracy to restrict the supply or, except as permitted by law, for preventing gluts and for effecting equitable apportionment of perishable products among markets, to restrict distribution, or to enhance the prices of any such necessaries; to exact excessive prices for any such necessaries; or to aid or abet the doing of any act made unlawful by this section: Provided, That this section shall not apply or extend to any accumulating or withholding by any farmer, gardener, or other person, of the products of any farm, garden, or other land cultivated by him.

SEC. 7. That no person shall conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries, or to restrain or injure trade or commerce in relation to any necessaries, or to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries, or to enhance the price thereof, or to prevent or lessen competition in the production, manufacture, purchase, barter, sale, transportation, insurance, or supply of any necessaries.

SEC. 8. That any person who violates any of the provisions of this act, except as otherwise provided, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not exceeding five years, or both.

SEC. 9. That words used in this act shall be construed to import the plural or the singular, as the case demands. The word "person," wherever used in this act, shall include individuals, partnerships, associations, and corporations. When construing and enforcing the provisions of this act, the act, omission, or failure of any official, agent, or other person acting for or employed by any partnership, association, or corporation within the scope of his employment or office shall, in every case, also be deemed the act, omission, or failure of such partnership, association, or corporation as well as that of the person.

SEC. 10. That the sum of $1,500,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, available immediately and until expended, for the carrying out of the purposes of this act, including the payment of such rent, the expense of such printing and publications, and the employment of such agencies in the Department of Agriculture, such persons, and such means, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary.

SEC. 11. That this act shall cease to be in effect when the national emergency resulting from the existing state of war shall have passed, the date of which shall be determined and proclaimed by the President; but such date shall not be later than one year after the termination, as ascertained by the President, of the present war between the United States and Germany.

AMENDMENTS TO PENDING BILL.

Mr. GORE submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 291) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

BUREAU OF MANUFACTURE.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 60), which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures:

Whereas the further development of manufacturing processes is one of the most important and powerful means of increasing the Nation's efficiency, wealth, and prosperity; and

Whereas departments of the Government are now devoted to agriculture, commerce, and labor, but so far no department has been established for manufacture, the other fundamental source of national progress; and

Whereas there is a wide field for the making of useful articles by hand and without machinery, a field which should have especial study; and

Whereas the distribution of knowledge among the people as to the practicability of conducting manufacturing processes, both with and without machinery, on the cooperative plan and otherwise, will open up new channels of popular occupation and achievement; and

Whereas the adaptation of modern machinery to small factories in rural districts, villages, small towns, and in the home itself will open up an avenue of economic independence of incomparable value to the people; and

Whereas the farm is of itself a factory, and its higher profits and possibilities will be unrealized until its processes are carried to the finished state within its own limits or as near thereto as practicable; and

Whereas one of the principal needs of the United States is the conversion of its raw materials into finished products within its own boundaries, it being a source of national shame that we ship such enormous quantities of our basic raw materials abroad to be made by foreign countries into finished products and resold by them to us and others at a great profit; and

Whereas the conversion of raw material into finished products should be effected as near the place of production as may be consistent with access to markets for finished products: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures is hereby authorized and directed to investigate the practicability of establishing a bureau of manufacture at the seat of government for the purpose of studying manufacture in all its forms and diffusing information relating thereto among the people of the United States.

The said committee is hereby authorized and directed to report to Congress the result of its investigation during the second session of the present Congress; and if the committee finds such a bureau desirable, to submit a plan and bill to Congress therefor.

GARDEN CITY MOVEMENT.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 61), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Whereas the garden city and garden suburb movement in Europe has made wonderful progress during the first eight years of its existence; and

Whereas the object of this movement is to secure permanent and comfortable homes for the people, on terms within the reach of the average income, and to combine the advantages of town and country in the same community; and

Whereas this movement is contributing materially to the health, comfort, and prosperity of the people who have experienced its benefits; and

Whereas the movement, in the estimation of many, points the way to the long-sought goal of a contented, home-owning population; and

Whereas a beginning along this line is claimed to have been made in the United States; and

Whereas thousands of American citizens have petitioned Members of Congress for an investigation of the movement both in Europe and the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be authorized and requested to hear and consider such testimony as may be produced before said committee in Washington regarding this movement both in Europe, in the United States, and elsewhere, and to report its findings to the Senate.

EMPLOYMENT OF ADDITIONAL CLERK.

Mr. POMERENE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 62), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ an additional clerk at the rate of $100 per month, for a period lasting from May 16, 1917, until the end of the present session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, to be paid out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate.

IMPROVEMENT OF TENNESSEE RIVER.

Mr. UNDERWOOD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 63), which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed 350 additional copies of House Document No. 1262, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, entitled "Tennessee River between Browns Island and Florence, Ala.," for the use of the Senate document room.

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, House bill 291.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 291) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have a bill here somewhat similar to the joint resolution which the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] had considered, except that it relates to homesteads. It gives service in the Army as an equivalent to residence on homesteads. I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered. I do not think there will be any objection to it whatever.

Mr. OVERMAN. If there is, I shall object to its consideration.

Mr. SHAFROTH. All right. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 33 on the calendar, Senate bill 1811——

Mr. OVERMAN. The bill is on the calendar, and I must object to its consideration. We can not take up bills from the calendar now.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There are very few bills on the calendar.

Mr. OVERMAN. I can not consent to take up calendar bills. If I would agree to do that, some one else would make a similar request. The joint resolution which the Senator from Montana had passed was reported to-day from the Committee on Mines and Mining, and I object to calling up a bill from the calendar.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, we have been considering for several days the so-called espionage bill. Yesterday I made a statement that I would submit to the Senate what purports to be a true copy of resolutions adopted by the recent Socialist convention at St. Louis and some letters and newspaper clippings explaining the meaning of the resolutions. I am not addressing myself to any provision of the bill in particular but to the scope and purpose of it generally, and I also arise for the purpose of discussing the necessity of taking measures calculated to protect ourselves from disloyal and treasonable utterances and publications and disloyal actions and agencies and combinations and organizations.

It has been said here that these are extraordinary measures. They are extraordinary measures, and I would not support them as peace measures, but we are now in extraordinary times. This is an extraordinary period, and some American citizens, or some of those claiming to be American citizens, are taking an extraordinary position at this time, and it would seem that some extraordinary remedies are necessary if we want to maintain the integrity and the safety of this Nation.

Some time ago there was a Socialist convention held in St. Louis, and certain resolutions were adopted. I am going to ask that a copy of the resolutions be printed in the RECORD. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to read the resolutions, but I am going to read parts of them and point out parts of them which are calculated to stir up and incite active resistance to the war measures which this country is about to undertake and which it deems necessary for its safety.

The resolutions recite, first, in a general way that the Socialist Party "reaffirms allegiance to the principle of internationalism and working class solidarity the world over, and proclaims its unalterable opposition to the war just declared by the Government of the United States."

Then the resolutions go on to state that this war was caused, as other wars were caused, by the commercial and financial rivalry and intrigues of the capitalistic interests. They state that these wars breed a sinister spirit of passion, unreason, race hatred, and false patriotism. The resolutions then state that the Socialist Party of the United States is unalterably opposed to a system of exploitation and class rule, which is upheld and strengthened by military power. After going along in that strain for some time, and stating sentiments that I hope very few Americans will subscribe to, they finally say this:

We brand the declaration of war by our Government as a crime against the people of the United States and against the nations of the world.

In all modern history there has been no war more unjustifiable than the war in which we are about to engage.

No greater dishonor has ever been forced upon a people than that which the capitalist class is forcing upon this Nation against its will.

In harmony with these principles the Socialist Party emphatically rejects the proposal that in time of war the workers should suspend their struggle for better conditions. On the contrary, the acute situation created by war calls for an even more vigorous prosecution of the class struggle, and we recommend to the workers and pledge ourselves to the following course of action:

1. Continuous, active and public opposition to the war, through demonstrations, mass petitions, and all other means within our power.

2. Unyielding opposition to all proposed legislation for military or industrial conscription. Should such conscription be forced upon the people, we pledge ourselves to continuous efforts for the repeal of such laws and to the support of all mass movements in opposition to conscription.

I want to call the attention of the Senate particularly to those words—"mass movements." The resolutions continue:

3. Vigorous resistance to all reactionary measures, such as censorship of press and mail, restriction of the right of free speech, assemblage, and organization, or compulsory arbitration, and limitation of the right to strike.

4. Consistent propaganda against military training and militaristic training in the public schools.

5. Extension of the campaign of education among the workers to organize them into strong, class-conscious, and closely unified political and industrial organizations, to enable them by concerted and harmonious mass action to shorten this war and to establish lasting peace.

6. Widespread educational propaganda to enlighten the masses as to the true relation between capitalism and war, and to rouse and organize them for action, not only against present war evils, but for the prevention of future wars and for the destruction of the causes of war.

7. To protect the masses of the American people from the pressing danger of starvation which the war in Europe has brought upon them, and which the entry of the United States has already accentuated, we demand—

(a) The restriction of food exports so long as the present shortage continues, the fixing of maximum prices, and whatever measures may be necessary to prevent the food speculators from holding back the supplies now in their hands.

(b) The socialization of the great industries concerned with the production, transportation, storage, and marketing of food and other necessaries of life.

(c) The socialization of all agricultural land which is now held out of use for monopolistic or speculative profit.

These measures are presented as means of protecting the workers against the evil results of the present war. The danger of recurrence of war will exist as long as the capitalist system of industry remains in existence. The end of war will come with the establishment of socialized industry and industrial democracy the world over. The Socialist Party calls upon all the workers to join it in its struggle to reach this goal, and thus bring into the world a new society in which peace, fraternity, and human brotherhood will be the dominant ideals.

Here are the recommendations made in the majority resolutions, which were approved by the St. Louis convention:

1. We recommend that the convention instruct our elected Representatives in Congress, in the State legislatures, and in local bodies, to vote against all proposed appropriations or loans for military, naval, and other war purposes.

2. We recommend that this convention instruct the national executive committee to extend and improve the propaganda among women, because they as housewives and mothers are now particularly ready to accept our message.

3. We recommend that the convention instruct the national executive committee to initiate an organized movement of Socialists, organized workers, and other anti-war forces for concerted action along the lines of our program.

These resolutions were signed by Kate Richards O'Hare (chairman), Victor L. Berger, Job Harriman, Morris Hillquit, Dan Hogan, Frank Midney, Patrick Quinlan, C. F. Ruthenberg, Maynard Shipley, George Spiess, jr., and Algernon Lee (secretary).

I will here insert the resolutions in full.

COMPLETE TEXT OF RESOLUTIONS ON WAR AND MILITARISM ADOPTED BY SOCIALIST CONVENTION AT ST. LOUIS.

[NOTE.—This is an exact copy of the resolution reported by the majority of the committee to the St. Louis Emergency Convention of the Socialist Party. It was adopted substantially as it is given, with minor changes, which do not affect the meaning or intent.]

RESOLUTIONS ON WAR AND MILITARISM.

1. The Socialist Party of the United States in the present grave crisis solemnly reaffirms its allegiance to the principle of internationalism and working-class solidarity the world over and proclaims its unalterable opposition to the war just declared by the Government of the United States.

Modern wars as a rule have been caused by the commercial and financial rivalry and intrigues of the capitalist interests in the different countries. Whether they have been frankly waged as wars of aggression or have been hypocritically represented as wars of "defense," they have always been made by the classes and fought by the masses. War brings wealth and power to the ruling classes and suffering, death, and demoralization to the workers.

They breed a sinister spirit of passion, unreason, race hatred, and false patriotism. They obscure the struggles of the workers for life, liberty, and social justice. They tend to sever the vital bonds of solidarity between them and their brothers in other countries, to destroy their organizations, and to curtail their civil and political rights and liberties.

2. The Socialist Party of the United States is unalterably opposed to the system of exploitation and class rule which is upheld and strengthened by military power and sham national patriotism. We, therefore, call upon the workers of all countries to refuse to support their governments in their wars. The wars of the contending national groups of capitalists are not the concern of the workers. The only struggle which would justify the workers in taking up arms is the great struggle of the working class of the world to free itself from economic exploitation and political oppression. As against the false doctrine of national patriotism we uphold the ideal of international working-class solidarity. In support of capitalism we will not willingly give a single life or a single dollar; in support of the struggle of the workers for freedom we pledge our all.

3. The mad orgy of death and destruction which is now convulsing unfortunate Europe was caused by the conflict of capitalist interests in the European countries.

In each of these countries the workers were oppressed and exploited. They produced enormous wealth, but the bulk of it was withheld from them by the owners of the industries. The workers were thus deprived of the means to repurchase the wealth which they themselves had created.

The capitalist class of each country was forced to look for foreign markets to dispose of the accumulated "surplus" wealth. The huge profits made by the capitalists could no longer be profitably reinvested in their own countries; hence they were driven to look for foreign fields of investment. The geographical boundaries of each modern capitalist country thus became too narrow for the industrial and commercial operations of its capitalist class.

The efforts of the capitalists of all leading nations was therefore centered upon the domination of the world markets. Imperialism became the dominant note in the politics of Europe. The acquisition of colonial possessions and the extension of the spheres of commercial and political influence became the object of diplomatic intrigues and the cause of constant clashes between nations.

The acute competition between the capitalist powers of the earth, their jealousies and distrusts of one another, and the fear of the rising power of the working class forced each of them to arm to the teeth. This led to the mad rivalry of armament, which, years before the outbreak of the present war, had turned the leading countries of Europe into armed camps with standing armies of many millions, drilled and equipped for war in times of "peace."

Capitalism, imperialism, and militarism had thus laid the foundation of an inevitable general conflict in Europe. The ghastly war in Europe was not caused by an accidental event, nor by the policy or institutions of any single nation. It was the logical outcome of the competitive capitalist system.

The 6,000,000 men of all countries and races who have been ruthlessly slain in the first 30 months of the war, the millions of others who have been crippled and maimed, the vast treasures of wealth that have been destroyed, the untold misery and sufferings of Europe, have not been sacrifices exacted in a struggle for principles or ideals, but wanton offerings upon the altar of private profit.

The forces of capitalism which have led to the war in Europe are even more hideously transparent in the war recently provoked by the ruling class of this country.

When Belgium was invaded, the Government enjoined upon the people of this country the duty of remaining neutral, thus clearly demonstrating that the "dictates of humanity," and the fate of small nations and of democratic institutions were matters that did not concern it. But when our enormous war traffic was seriously threatened, our Government calls upon us to rally to the "defense of democracy and civilization."

Our entrance into the European war was instigated by the predatory capitalists in the United States who boast of the enormous profit of $7,000,000,000 from the manufacture and sale of munitions and war supplies and from the exportation of American foodstuffs and other necessaries. They are also deeply interested in the continuance of war and the success of the allied arms through their huge loans to the Governments of the allied powers and through their commercial ties. It is the same interests which strive for imperialistic domination of the Western Hemisphere.

The war of the United States against Germany can not be justified even on the plea that it is a war in defense of American rights or American "honor." Ruthless as the unrestricted submarine war policy of the German Government was and is, it is not an invasion of the rights of American people as such, but only an interference with the opportunity of certain groups of American capitalists to coin cold profits out of the blood and sufferings of our fellow men in the warring countries of Europe.

It is not a war against the militarist régime of the central powers. Militarism can never be abolished by militarism.

It is not a war to advance the cause of democracy in Europe. Democracy can never be imposed upon any country by a foreign power by force of arms.

It is cant and hypocrisy to say that the war is not directed against the German people but against the Imperial Government of Germany. If we send an armed force to the battle fields of Europe, its cannon will mow down the masses of the German people and not the Imperial German Government.

Our entrance into the European conflict at this time will serve only to multiply the horrors of the war, to increase the toll of death and destruction, and to prolong the fiendish slaughter. It will bring death, suffering, and destitution to the people of the United States, and particularly to the working class. It will give the powers of reaction in this country the pretext for an attempt to throttle our rights and to crush our democratic institutions, and to fasten upon this country a permanent militarism.

The working class of the United States has no quarrel with the working class of Germany or of any other country. The people of the United States have no quarrel with the people of Germany or of any other country. The American people did not and do not want this war. They have not been consulted about the war and have had no part in declaring war. They have been plunged into this war by the trickery and treachery of the ruling class of the country through its representatives in the national administration and National Congress, its demagogic agitators, its subsidized press, and other servile instruments of public expression.

We brand the declaration of war by our Government as a crime against the people of the United States and against the nations of the world.

In all modern history there has been no war more unjustifiable than the war in which we are about to engage.

No greater dishonor has ever been forced upon a people than that which the capitalist class is forcing upon this Nation against its will.

In harmony with these principles, the Socialist Party emphatically rejects the proposal that in time of war the workers should suspend their struggle for better conditions. On the contrary, the acute situation created by war calls for an even more vigorous prosecution of the class struggle, and we recommend to the workers and pledge ourselves to the following course of action:

1. Continuous, active, and public opposition to the war, through demonstrations, mass petitions, and all other means within our power.

2. Unyielding opposition to all proposed legislation for military or industrial conscription. Should such conscription be forced upon the people, we pledge ourselves to continuous efforts for the repeal of such laws and to the support of all mass movements in opposition to conscription.

3. Vigorous resistance to all reactionary measures, such as censorship of press and mail, restriction of the right of free speech, assemblage, and organization, or compulsory arbitration and limitation of the right to strike.

4. Consistent propaganda against military training and militaristic training in the public schools.

5. Extenson of the campaign of education among the workers to organize them into strong, class conscious, and closely unified political and industrial organizations, to enable them by concerted and harmonious mass action to shorten this war and to establish lasting peace.

6. Widespread educational propaganda to enlighten the masses as to the true relation between capitalism and war, and to arouse and organize them for action not only against present war evils but for the prevention of future wars and for the destruction of the causes of war.

7. To protect the masses of the American people from the pressing danger of starvation which the war in Europe has brought upon them and which the entry of the United States has already accentuated, we demand—

(a) The restriction of food exports so long as the present shortage continues, the fixing of maximum prices, and whatever measures may be necessary to prevent the food speculators from holding back the supplies now in their hands.

(b) The socialization of the great industries concerned with the production, transportation, storage, and marketing of food and other necessaries of life.

(c) The socialization of all agricultural land which is now held out of use for monopolistic or speculative profit.

These measures are presented as means of protecting the workers against the evil results of the present war. The danger of recurrence of war will exist as long as the capitalist system of industry remains in existence. The end of war will come with the establishment of socialized industry and industrial democracy the world over. The Socialist Party calls upon all the workers to join it in its struggle to reach this goal, and thus bring into the world a new society in which peace, fraternity, and human brotherhood will be the dominant ideals.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

1. We recommend that the convention instruct our elected Representatives in Congress, in the State legislatures, and in local bodies to vote against all proposed appropriations or loans for military, naval, and other war purposes.

2. We recommend that this convention instruct the national executive committee to extend and improve the propaganda among women, because they as housewives and mothers are now particularly ready to accept our message.

3. We recommend that the convention instruct the national executive committee to initiate an organized movement of socialists, organized workers, and other antiwar forces for concerted action along the lines of our program.

Kate Richards O'Hare (chairman), Victor L. Berger, Job Harriman, Morris Hillquit, Dan Hogan, Frank Midney, Patrick Quinlan, C. F. Ruthenberg, Maynard Shipley, George Spiess, jr., Algernon Lee (secretary).

There was a minority report submitted at that time by those loyal members of the convention who believed in supporting the United States in this war, who are opposed to lending aid and comfort to the German autocracy and to help fasten that autocracy upon the world. And right here let me pause and say that I hope and trust that this minority of patriotic Socialists who fought the resolution represent the great mass of Socialists of America. Let us hope and trust that the Socialists of America in the referendum now pending will not adopt the recommendations of the majority and thus go on record against law and order and in favor of forcible resistance thereto, which of course would constitute treason and insurrection.

The men, among others, who opposed this majority resolution were Winfield R. Gaylord and A. M. Simons, both of Milwaukee, Wis. I have a letter from Mr. Gaylord, which I wish to read.

I desire to say, Mr. President, that Mr. Winfield R. Gaylord was a member of the State Senate of Wisconsin while I had the honor of being a member of that body. I know him well. I do not think there is a more active Socialist in the United States than he is. I do not think there is a more thoroughgoing believer in socialism than he. He is a man of standing in Milwaukee; he ran on the Socialist ticket during the last campaign for Congress and came within 400 or 500 votes of being elected in Milwaukee. He is a loyal American citizen. I want to read a letter which I received from Mr. Gaylord dated April 17, 1917. I shall only read parts of it, but I shall ask to have the entire letter printed further on in my remarks:

APRIL 17, 1917.

Hon. PAUL HUSTING,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In the midst of this general hurly-burly of the war situation, there has been thrust upon me another and more immediate perplexity growing out of the situation resulting from the action of the Socialist convention at St. Louis.

The inclosed copies of documents will help you to understand the gist of the opposing positions as expressed at the convention. The clipping from the Milwaukee Journal will give you some insight into my attitude on the general questions involved.

I want to say here that I am indebted to Mr. Gaylord for a copy of the resolutions adopted at St. Louis, for the correctness of which he vouches. I cite him as my authority, as a member of that convention, for the authenticity and correctness of the resolutions. Mr. Gaylord says:

But there is another issue coming to the fore, and on this I feel that I must act, for the saving of the lives of some of my well-meaning but short-sighted comrades with whom I do not agree.

It is a significant fact that up to date the majority resolution, adopted by the convention on the subject of war and militarism, has not been printed in its complete form, nor in any form which includes the statements as to "mass" action, in the Milwaukee Leader.

In other words, the leading Socialist organ of the Northwest did not up to that time print this part of the resolution which pertains to mass action.

Nevertheless, from statements which I overheard Victor L. Berger and Emil Seidel make on the train returning from St. Louis I know that they expect that there will be "resistance" by the "fanatics" along the lines indicated.

Let me call the attention of the Senate to these statements of Mr. Victor L. Berger, the editor and, I think, the proprietor of the Milwaukee Daily Leader. He was a Member of Congress a few years ago. Emil Seidel was for several years mayor of Milwaukee. He has been the Socialist candidate for United States Senator in Wisconsin. I merely say this so that the Senate may know that these are no irresponsible members of the Socialist Party who are making these statements. Mr. Gaylord quotes them as saying that on the train returning from St. Louis they expected that there will be "resistance" by the "fanatics" along the lines indicated. He says further:

Most significant just now is the fact that this irregularly called convention, having only 185 delegates out of a possible 300, by a majority vote ordered printed for distribution generally the majority resolution before it is acted upon by the referendum of the party.

When they desire to take party action on any matter the Socialists hold a referendum. No one, however representative he may be, no convention, however representative it may be, can commit that party to this propaganda until a referendum first is had by the members of the Socialist Party, and then, and not until then, when the proposed action is approved at the referendum does it become the action of the Socialist Party. But here it seems that they proposed to distribute these seditious and inflammatory resolutions broadcast at once among the people before they were acted upon by the party. Mr. Gaylord goes on to say:

The only purpose of this must be to secure "action" against the Government in some "mass" form to embarrass the administration in its prosecution of the measures necessary for carrying on the war.

It is not my desire to prevent the majority resolution being put to the test of the referendum. That should be done. I am frank to say that if it is adopted I shall have to leave the party organization that can put forth such a statement.

It is not my belief that this will be adopted if it is fairly put before the party membership and the issue is made clear.

But meanwhile much harm may have been done by the stirring up of ignorant prejudices among the syndicalist element on the one hand and the racial pro-German and pro-Austrian elements on the other hand by the circulation of this leaflet. In my opinion it will certainly lead to exactly what is spoken of in the text, namely, "mass action."

Now, this is significant. Mr. Gaylord says:

This phrase is well known among the syndicalist and anarchist element in this and every other country to mean "extra political," i. e., action by force through the gathering of large crowds.

There should be no need of abridging the customary liberties of free speech, free assemblage, and freedom of the press. But this thing is tricky, unauthorized by any proper organization, furtive in its handling—as in the failure to print it here—and is calculated to play directly into the hands of the enemies of our Government.

* * * * * * *

Victor L. Berger did not take the floor in the convention in support of this measure. Nor did any other open advocate of nationalism, but Morris Hilquitt, and he reported for the committee. But they voted with the syndicalist element solidly.

By the close of the convention there were 60 delegates who had so far recovered from their hysteria that they signed the petition for the submission of the alternative declaration to the referendum along with the other. There were only five who stood for an opposite position on the first test vote.

I shall print here this letter from Mr. Gaylord which I have been quoting from:

MILWAUKEE, WIS., April 17, 1917.

The Hon. PAUL O. HUSTING,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In the midst of this general hurly-burly of the war situation there has been thrust upon me another and more immediate perplexity, growing out of the situation resulting from the action of the Socialist convention at St. Louis.

But this thing is tricky, unauthorized by any proper organization, furtive in its handling—as in the failure to print it here—and is calculated to play directly into the hands of the enemies of our Government.

What should be accomplished, in the interests of fairness and for the protection of the public peace, is the withholding from circulation generally, for any purposes other than the referendum of the party members, of this majority-resolution document.

* * * * * * *

There is no need of estranging the great mass of socialists and those who sympathize with them by any drastic action. There is occasion for the discreet use of authority for the prevention of general circulation of this pernicious propaganda.

Victor L. Berger did not take the floor in the convention in support of this measure. Nor did any other open advocate of nationalism but Morris Hilquitt, and he reported for the committee. But they voted with the syndicalist element solidly.

By the close of the convention there were 60 delegates who had so far recovered from their hysteria that they signed the petition for the submission of the alternative declaration to the referendum along with the other. There were only five who stood for an opposite position on the first test vote.

* * * What I am concerned about is the fact that the distribution of this document prior to its submission to the party referendum will not only commit the socialist movement to a doctrine which it has nowhere adopted, but will probably lead fanatical and uninformed members and sympathizers to undertake the thing that is called for in the program, and so lead to bloodshed. As usual, those who will suffer most will not be those whose brains planned the thing.

Some of our socialist attorneys have considered the possibility of a restraining order along these lines. That would be expensive and take time to get the movement for it organized. We have started some correspondence about that, but meanwhile the orders are probably going to the printer.

Yours, very sincerely,

W. R. GAYLORD.

I have read this and agree with it, and join in the hope that some action may be taken to prevent violence.

A. M. SIMONS.

That is all that is pertinent to this particular matter. I have another letter from Mr. Gaylord, under date of April 28, in which he says:

I can not express the regret and sense of humiliation which comes over me as I see the position taken by these men—whether they are conscious of its meaning or not. That 15 of the best years of my life should have gone into an organization which now is used to strengthen the hands of an autocracy that represents—even more than China does to-day—the reactionary powers of the earth is something bitter.

I have some clippings here from the Milwaukee Journal containing interviews by Mr. W. R. Gaylord along the same line and by Mr. A. M. Simons. Mr. Simons, the writer of several of these articles, is known internationally as a social-democratic editor and lecturer. I may say that Mr. Simons was one of the organizers of the Socialist Party in Milwaukee. He was editor of the Workers' Call—now Chicago Socialist—from 1899 to 1900, of the International Socialist Review from 1900 to 1906, and of the Coming Nation from 1910 to 1913. He is the author of several volumes, and is a frequent contributor to the New Republic and other magazines. He also was sent as a delegate from the United States to the Socialist International Conventions at Copenhagen and Stuttgart. So he also is not only a Socialist of standing, but a man of standing, and an author of repute and ability. He describes in these articles how the Socialists of America are attempting to play Berlin's game, meaning Germany's game. It seems that at a meeting held in Stuttgart in 1907 the question of militarism arose and there the German Socialists were called upon to vote down the militarism of Germany. Mr. Simons points out that this resolution defining the Socialist attitude in that respect failed of passage because of the opposition of the German Socialists, and that the Socialists refused to go on record against militarism in Germany, and that in that stand the American pro-German Socialists were the ones who stood by the Germans in refusing to vote down militarism. I call your attention to Mr. Simons's interview in the Milwaukee Journal of April 29, 1917. He points out how at St. Louis, when it applied to this country, when the question of militarism and defense of this country came up, they took the very opposite position and again voted with Germany and against militarism here, showing that as to Germany, with the German Socialists, they stood by what the German Government wanted, while at St. Louis they again stood for what appeared to be what the German Government wants. In other words, our pro-German Socialists in America went on record for German militarism at the Stuttgart convention, thus helping German autocracy, and at the St. Louis convention voted to help German autocracy again by reversing themselves and voting against preparedness here even when we are at war with Germany. I ask to have the articles by Mr. Simons and Mr. Gaylord printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From Milwaukee Journal, Tuesday Apr. 17, 1917.]

RADICALS JOIN PRO-GERMANS—PLATFORM ACTION OF SOCIALISTS—OLD PRINCIPLES DISCARDED FOR "MASS ACTION."

[A. M. Simons, the writer of this article, is known internationally as a Social-Democratic editor and lecturer. He was editor of the Workers' Call (now Chicago Socialist) from 1899 to 1900, of the International Socialist Review from 1900 to 1906, and of the Coming Nation from 1910 to 1913. He is the author of several volumes and is a frequent contributor to the New Republic and other magazines.]

[Written for the Journal.]

There is a dangerous and dishonest phase of the resolutions adopted by the special Socialist convention at St. Louis that has escaped public notice. It is not simply that this resolution indorses a narrow jingoistic nationalism stamped with the Prussian double eagles. That indorsement was secured only by an alliance between the friends of German militarism and the semianarchistic elements in the Socialist Party. That alliance consummated as despicable a piece of treachery as was ever perpetrated.

FAVOR ANARCHISTIC TERM.

The so-called "impossibility," "syndicalist," or extra-political faction has hitherto been most bitterly fought by the nationalistic Germans. This extreme faction was in a minority at St. Louis, as it has been in all other Socialist conventions. There are certain phrases that this faction had always sought to have incorporated in socialist declarations. These called for "mass movements" and "mass action." These phrases are a part of the anarchistic literature of the world. They are always understood to mean extra-political activity, such as riots, general strikes, great processions, and violent revolt. They never appeared in any socialist document in this country until they were placed in the resolution upon war at the St. Louis convention.

They were placed in that resolution by pro-German nationalists, hitherto their most virulent opponents, as a means of gaining the support of the extremists. This extreme faction understood that these phrases pledged the party to the use of violent measures against the war and the means of carrying it on. The adherents of this faction are sincere, devoted fanatics. Many of them would willingly sacrifice liberty or even life in defense of their principles. Hitherto they have accepted the decision of the Socialist majority against such methods. They left the St. Louis convention believing their opponents to have been converted and that violent resistance to war had been indorsed and would be waged by all. This would be bad enough if true.

NATIONALISTS NOT CONVERTED.

But the Prussian nationalists were not converted to anarchy. They are only willing to sacrifice these poor devils to help Prussianism. These politicians will lead no antienlistment riots. They will organize no prohibited processions to protest war and meet machine guns. They will give out interviews from their offices regretting such violence.

These German jingoes wrote these resolutions. They know better than any others the traditional meaning and implication of such phrases. They placed them where they are to lure fanactics to death in the interest of German imperialism.

This charge is fully justified by the fact that these same men fought most bitterly in international congresses to prevent the adoption of similar phrases when their adoption might have blocked the road of this same German imperialism. They were serving the same masters in Stuttgart, Copenhagen, and St. Louis.

I would be a traitor to America, to democracy, to socialism, and to humanity if I left unexposed this murderous treason to all these things on the part of men whose only excuse must be their mad devotion to German autocracy.

A. M. SIMONS.

[The committee's report included the following declaration: "Extension of the campaign of education among the workers to organize them into strong, class-conscious, and closely unified political and industrial organizations, to enable them by concerted and harmonious mass action to shorten this war and to establish lasting peace." Another revolutionary passage adopted by the convention is as follows:

"Unyielding opposition to all proposed legislation for military or industrial conscription. Should such conscription be forced upon the people, we pledge ourselves to continuous efforts for the repeal of such laws and to the support of all mass movements in opposition to conscription."]

"DECEIVE PARTY"—CHARGE THAT IS MADE AGAINST SOCIALISTS.

From the latest issue of the American Socialist, the official organ of the Socialist Party, and from a recent copy of the Milwaukee Leader, it is evident that the pro-German nationalists who obtained the adoption by the Socialists at the St. Louis convention of resolutions treasonable alike to the Nation and the cause of socialism, "are trying to deceive the rank and file of the Socialists as to the purport of those resolutions," says A. M. Simons, Milwaukee. "One official form of the resolutions was published in the American Socialist in the week following the convention. A few days later the Leader published another edition, edited for Milwaukee consumption. The current issue of the American Socialist contains still another version, with the most treasonable words omitted.

"Meanwhile the semianarchistic syndicalists and sincere pacifists, who were caught with the bait of the violent phrases in the copy as first prepared by Morris Hilquit and Victor Berger, are circulating the original resolution in the belief that they are being supported by those who led in its adoption by the convention. But the pro-Kaiser nationalists have now prepared an alibi if their impossibilist dupes should 'start something.'

"Consequently the entire membership of the Socialist Party in Milwaukee is being deceived concerning the action really taken at St. Louis.

"The following, under the head, 'Run out of town,' is from the American Socialist of April 28:

"'A. E. Welch writes from Waco, Tex.: "I was mobbed last night and egged by the home guards, escorted to the train, and virtually run out of town. My assailants numbered between 30 and 40. I had distributed leaflets against war issued by the national office."'

"This is apparently what happens to those who do not have the revised edition or do not 'distribute' from office chairs."

WHAT HAPPENED IN ST. LOUIS—SOCIALIST COMMENTS ON BERGER DEFENSE—SEES A NEW WORLD REPUBLIC RISING.

[By Mr. W. R. Gaylord.]

Now that after three weeks of silence on the subject Victor L. Berger has seen fit in an editorial in the Milwaukee Leader to recognize the fact that something happened at St. Louis and has been happening since which calls for some defense on his part, it is proper for me to answer his references to these matters at least so far as they concern my part in them.

Mr. Berger accuses me of several things, such as "changing front on the war question," a "turnabout" for which he says he can see no reason; that I have not gone to the county central committee with my grievances; that I have gone to the capitalist press; and then intimates that this is paralleled only by the work of the "agents provocateur" in the Russian revolutionist circles.

NO SECRETS OF ORIGIN.

As to the last, there are no secrets about my origin, my coming into the Socialist Party, my activities and my attitude in the party and its work, and in this later development. Mr. Berger will do well to withdraw any such charge. It savors of an attitude of mind not at all agreeable to American conditions, and does not fit my case, whatever may be said of others whom I know.

I was frankly opposed to war on general principles—to all war—until recently. In this I was in agreement with Mr. Berger during the time he was circulating Mr. Bryan's peace program. For a while I thought myself a pacifist; but I found that to be an "impossibilist" attitude, however ideally correct, and I am constructive in the bent of my mind.

Then several things happened. First, the announcement of the savage ruthlessness of the German U-boat campaign. That presented to my mind the possible results for civilization if some nation should happen to have the qualities required to carry out such a program successfully, and I saw that our Nation would inevitably be dragged into the world mêlée.

Then came the Russian revolution, the unseating of the Czar, and the lining up of the newest republic with that of France and with the practical democracy of England against a union of autocracies.

NO LONGER NEUTRAL.

Then war was declared by the United States, and it became impossible as a practical proposition to maintain a neutral attitude.

Within a week thereafter the Socialist convention at St. Louis met to consider questions relative to war and militarism. At that convention this declaration of war was branded as the "greatest dishonor ever forced upon any nation"; the Socialist Party was lined up against any kind of even "alleged defensive" wars; and then the party was pledged to "mass action" against the Government in matters relating to the war, and the national executive committee was instructed to "initiate concerted action with all antiwar forces" to carry out this program.

And—war had already been declared!

In that convention I saw those whom Mr. Berger called "fanatics" following their pacifist doctrines to the logical limit. I heard the syndicalist group denouncing all government and declaring that they had no choice between Kaiser and President. And this was not so unexpected. But when Morris Hillquitt and Victor L. Berger, tacitly renouncing their nationalist positions, joined hands with those other elements, gave up their constructive policies of many years, let the "fanatics" take the lead, and helped to bulldoze the convention into doing things which it could not be gotten ever to do again, I at least did not lose my sense of the meaning of English words. I warned members of the convention. I made such a fight as I was able to make.

NO CHANCE FOR REFERENDUM.

I secured the drafting of an alternative declaration and the signing of it by enough delegates to entitle it to be submitted to the party referendum.

Mr. Berger did not approach me on the subject during the convention, nor afterwards. He did not invite me to state my position in the Milwaukee Leader then or afterwards. I had been informed by one in authority to make the statement, before the convention, that there would be no use of my giving any statement to the Leader, as "it would not be printed."

Mr. Berger did express in my hearing his anticipation that the "fanatics would resist" when it came to carrying out the program of the convention. This decided any doubts I had as to my duty to the members of the Socialist Party, and especially those in Wisconsin and vicinity.

The St. Louis convention was not intended by those who called it to be the rehearsal of a comic opera. It was evidently intended that the outcome of it should be "concerted action with other antiwar forces" along the lines of "mass action," and it was expected, at least by Victor L. Berger, that "the fanatics would resist."

WHAT WAS DREAMED OF?

We have had reports of what happened in Brazil. And we have reason to believe that something similar was at least dreamed of here. What part the Socialist Party was expected to play, if any, why the St. Louis convention was called as it was, what the program of "concerted action" may have been, how far and where and when the "fanatics would resist"—well, perhaps these are among the things which Mr. Berger says are not secret. In which case he ought to be perfectly willing—much more willing than he has thus far shown himself—to discuss them frankly.

My purpose in going to the "capitalist press" was to sound a warning to all my comrades who could be reached that they were endangering themselves for a purpose which I believed to be foreign to the Socialist movement. This could not have been accomplished by taking up the matter in the county central committee, where Mr. Berger and his paper would simply cry me down.

If the Socialist Party fulfills a need in the political life of this country, it will live.

If the present organization and policy of that party does not meet the conditions of political life in this country, it will fade away.

No mere act of one man, not even of Victor L. Berger, can determine the history of the Socialist Party. But if the Socialist Party shall show that it is not only un-American but anti-American, its present organization will pass into the condition known as that of innocuous desuetude, and some other movement will interpret the truths of socialism for American political life.

NEW INTERNATIONAL BODY.

Meanwhile, I see rising among the democratic nations, amid the whirlwind and crash of war, the framework of an international body of finance, industry, and commerce, which may furnish the absolutely necessary soil for the growth of the long-dreamed-of, much-desired republic of the world. When, even for the purposes of war, the nations of the earth are forced to lay aside the old method of industry and trade for profit, and to save the very heart's blood of civilization must build a foundation of social production and distribution to fit the uses of mankind, I know that I am in the presence of something like that which Huxley described when he saw under the microscope the line forming in the protoplasm which indicated the evolution of the spinal column of the vertebrate.

It seems quite true that Mr. Berger and many others—why are so many of them of German blood?—see no significance in all these things. They can not even see the difference between a kaiserdom and a republic. Well, I see a difference, and seeing, would deem myself criminal indeed, with a treason to those forbears who helped to make this land in all its wars, to those of my tribe who are to follow me, and to the principles of socialism, if I should permit my mind and hand to be neutral in the presence of such a combat.

SOCIALISTS PLAY BERLIN'S GAME—TAKE PACIFIST STAND IN AMERICA—REFUSED TO DO SAME AT MEETING IN GERMANY.

[By A. M. Simons.]

[A. M. Simons, the writer of this article, is known internationally as a Social-Democratic editor and lecturer. He was editor of the Workers' Call (now Chicago Socialist) from 1899 to 1900, of the International Socialist Review from 1900 to 1906, and of the Coming Nation from 1910 to 1913. He is the author of several volumes, and is a frequent contributor to the New Republic and other magazines.]

There is a story of the last two international Socialist congresses often whispered between Socialists, but hitherto unpublished. The capture of the recent special Socialist convention at St. Louis by pro-German nationalists now not only adds a final and convincing chapter to that story, but makes its publication in this country imperatively necessary.

This story may be hotly denied by pro-German Socialists here. But every delegate to Stuttgart or Copenhagen in 1907 and 1910 knows it to be true.

The great issue of the Stuttgart congress was militarism. Leading the antimilitarist forces was the brilliant, erratic Herve, whose single aim was to secure a resolution pledging the Socialists of the world to a general strike in case of war. Against him was pitted the entire German-Austrian bloc, led by August Bebel and supported by pro-German delegates from the United States.

For nearly a week the struggle went on in committee. Then suddenly the word was passed about that a compromise had been reached and a resolution adopted by unanimous vote.

THE GERMAN PROMISE.

That unanimity rested upon the pledge of honor by the German Social Democracy that if a formal resolution was not adopted they would lead in any general strike or other concerted move against war.

Because that pledge was made directly to me by prominent representatives of the German Social Democracy my experience is important.

The Socialists of other countries had been assured that the Imperial German Government had guaranteed freedom of discussion to the gathering. If any such assurance had been given, it was most outrageously violated when Harry Quelch, an English delegate, was given 24 hours to pass the frontiers because he had reflected upon the Hague Peace Congress, which included some of the Kaiser's personal friends.

On the evening of the day following his speech I was with Quelch when a secret-service man handed him the formal order of expulsion. With the remark that the document would make an interesting souvenir, he passed on into a room where an entertainment for the delegates was in progress.

THREATENED WITH POLICE.

I sat down beside Ledebour and Paul Singer, both members of the Reichstag and asked what would be done about the Quelch incident. Singer vehemently vetoed any protest, lest the police dissolve the congress.

Surprised at such supineness, I raised the question of the militarism responsible for it and the resolution then before the congress. Very loudly and emphatically Singer declared that the adoption of a resolution indorsing the general strike or other violent action against war would outlaw the great German Social Democracy. I then asked how, if such a position were maintained, there could ever be any international action against war.

Singer's voice sank, he gave a furtive glance around such as I had learned introduced any radical statement in a public place in Germany, and said slowly and impressively: "The German Social Democracy will never be found lacking in international solidarity. It never has been. We will act without resolutions."

LEDEBOUR REPEATS PLEDGE.

Recognizing the tremendous significance of this statement, I turned to Ledebour for confirmation. Singer had spoken in German. Ledebour changed to English and said: "I can pledge you that we will not be found lacking. We were not lacking when help was needed for the general strikes in Belgium and Denmark. We will not need a resolution to bind us."

Of course, after nearly 10 years I can not swear to exact words. But they made a deep impression at the time. I have repeated them many times. I know that the above is as nearly verbatim as it is possible to recall a spoken conversation without notes. Singer has since died. Ledebour has fought the war up to the present moment and has done his best to keep his pledge.

But the complete confirmation came next morning. I found that many similar statements had been made to other delegates by Germans, and that the entire congress was preparing to act upon the strength of those statements.

"EVERY STEP POSSIBLE."

If further confirmation is needed, it exists in indisputable form in the resolution adopted and in the speeches made at the time. The resolution calls upon the working class "to take every step possible to avoid the occurrence of war." Every delegate understood this to include the general strike and revolt, and that this phrase was used to record the pledge of the German Social Democrats without using the exact words that would doom the politicians.

Complete proof is found in the stenographic report of the final speeches on its adoption. The resolution was reported by Vandervelde, who moved the cloture. Herve demanded the floor. The Germans feared to have him speak, because they knew he would so word his knowledge of methods to avoid German police censorship, insisted upon having his instructions that debate must be confined to the question of putting the cloture, translated into French. Herve laughingly informed Singer in German that he, Herve, understood German. "No," insisted Singer, "these instructions must be translated."

HERVE FOR GENERAL STRIKE.

This was done. Herve then, in spite of continuous "calls to order," succeeded in saying that he had obtained everything he wished, that he would return to Paris perfectly satisfied, and, finally, that he "would vote for the resolution with both hands in the air," which he did. Herve came to the congress to secure just one thing—the adoption of a resolution pledging the Socialists of the various nations to revolt or general strike in case of war. He returned thinking he had succeeded.

No sooner had the war broken out and the German Socialists failed to keep their pledge than their American defenders seized upon the omission of the words "general strike" in the resolution to deny that Social Democrats of Germany were pledged to any violent opposition to war. Some who so wrote knew these facts. Others perhaps wrote in ignorance.

By 1910 and the Copenhagen congress the feeling that it was dangerous to trust to an indefinite pledge had grown. Kier Hardie then joined with Edourd Vaillant, of France, to make the pledge formal. Again the German politicians pleaded that such action would outlaw them. But Ledebour, with some other German Socialists, had already begun to suspect these politicians of double dealing and supported the Hardie-Vaillant resolution. But the political machine of Germany, assisted, as at Stuttgart, by their German allies in the American delegation, was able to secure a reference to a committee to report at the next congress. On the date set for that congress German Socialists in arms were in Belgium by virtue of the votes of other German Socialists in the Reichstag.

I do not raise the question of the efficacy or desirability of the general strike and domestic revolt against war. I only call attention at this time to the fact that the very pro-German delegates from the United States who opposed such methods at Stuttgart and Copenhagen indorsed them at St. Louis to be used against the Government of the United States. German imperialism desired the defeat of such a resolution at the international congresses German imperialism desired its adoption by the Socialist Party of the United States.

Mr. HUSTING. I desire also to refer to a letter written by Mr. Gaylord to Mr. Adolph Germer, who is secretary of the Socialist national executive committee, in which he again protests against the action taken by the Socialists at St. Louis. That letter is dated April 26. He calls their attention to the fact that this is a treasonable resolution. By the way, I am reliably informed that when this resolution came up before the editorial staff of the Milwaukee Leader, every editorial writer on that staff, with the exception of Mr. Victor L. Berger himself, said that the paper had no business to publish resolutions of that kind; that they were treasonable in character; but, notwithstanding that, Mr. Berger published them. I am informed the gentlemen who are now fighting Mr. Berger and his crowd in the Socialist Party make no bones about charging Mr. Berger with pro-Germanism to the extent that he goes back on the tenets of his party and the very teachings of socialism in this country in order to uphold the German Government.

I also have here the reply of Mr. Germer to Mr. Gaylord, which I ask to have placed in the RECORD with Mr. Gaylord's letter, in order to make the record complete.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The letters referred to are as follows:

GAYLORD'S LETTER TO GERMER.

APRIL 26, 1917.

Mr. ADOLPH GERMER,
Secretary, and the National Executive Committee,
Socialist Party, Chicago, Ill.

COMRADE GERMER: You will please take notice, and convey the same to the members of the national executive committee—

That I protest against the sending out of the resolution containing the declaration on war for general distribution in advance of the referendum as—

(a) Contrary to good faith with the party membership and the public;

(b) The spread of treasonable matter in the name of socialism;

(c) Making the party organization the tool of a foreign enemy government now at war with this country.

I also protest against the sending out of the same resolution in any altered form as being treachery to the innocent but fanatical comrades who are blindly following the lead of the convention action.

Your attention is again called to the fact that the convention was not called in accordance with the provisions of the party constitution; that it was not attended by a representative set of delegates, there being only 185 out of a possible 300.

Your attention is also called to the fact that while this treasonable matter is proposed to be sent out in the name of a political party organized for political action in the United States, a controlling percentage of the actual dues-paying party membership has come to be composed of persons who are not citizens of the United States, together with many others who have taken part actively in a propaganda carried on for the benefit and to the advantage of the feudal government of a nation with which this Nation is now at war.

I hereby serve notice upon you and the members of the national executive committee that the action proposed in the circulation of the resolution on war, either in the original or in an amended form, will place all socialists who are citizens of the United States in danger of intolerable hardship and risk, not to be justified under existing conditions by any proper demand which could be made upon them as socialists, subjects them to irreparable injury, and causes irreparable damage to the name and cause of the American socialist movement by linking them forever with a cause which has become a hissing and a byword in all democratic nations of the earth, namely, the cause of the autocrats of the central European Empires—Prussian, Austrian, Bulgar, and Turk.

I further demand that you, as the executives of the Socialist Party, in all your actions relating to these matters, obey the laws of the Socialist Party, the laws of the land, and the dictates of good faith with the vast army of those in this and other lands who have espoused the cause of socialism.

In view of the instructions of the St. Louis convention, that "the national executive committee initiate an organized movement * * * of antiwar * * * forces"; and in view of the further fact that the antiwar forces in this country include the syndicatlists, the anarchists, the German-American Alliance, and the secret service of the Imperial German Empire, I demand that the party executives of the Socialist Party shall forthwith declare what "antiwar forces" they have been cooperating with, or propose to cooperate with; this to the end that those members of the Socialist Party who refuse to be implicated in treason may have opportunity to repudiate any actions or alliances entered into without their consent and without their purpose or intent.

That organized action against constituted governments may be justified by conditions existing within the scope of such governments, is demonstrated by the history of this Republic; but that such organized action against this Government should inure to the benefit of the decadent aristocracies of a type of civilization holding over from the Middle Ages, is intolerable to a socialist who is American born.

As a delegate to the St. Louis convention, I further call your attention to the fact that in the issue of the American Socialist, under date of April 28, 1917, there is printed what purports to be a copy of the program contained in the resolution on war, above referred to, in which the paragraph No. 2 is printed in a form different in content and meaning from the same paragraph as contained in the official copy printed in a previous issue of the same publication.

And I demand that if this modification in the form and content of this paragraph has been made because of any warning given to your office directly or indirectly, and to protect the party executives, that the same warning be given out to the membership and sympathizers of the party at large for their protection also.

It can not be emphasized too strongly that any word of explanation or justification which the party executives may have to offer will be gladly received and will be given full consideration; and especially that, in view of the great number of persons concerned and the peculiar and weighty personal considerations involved for thousands of these persons, such explanations and statements of justification should be given at the earliest possible moment.

Yours, very truly,

WINFIELD R. GAYLORD.

GERMER'S REPLY TO GAYLORD.

CHICAGO, ILL., April 27, 1917.

WINFIELD R. GAYLORD,
Milwaukee, Wis.

MY DEAR GAYLORD: Your favor of the 26th instant has just been received, and I note with interest what you say. As per your request, I am to-day sending a copy of your letter to every member of the national executive committee.

It is perhaps my misfortune not to have been born in the United States, or perhaps yours to have been born here. That, however, should have little or no bearing on considering a fact.

Let me call your attention to the fact that it was agreed at the convention (Goebel speaking for your side), and no one objecting to it, that we should immediately proceed to distribute the resolution on militarism and war. It was understood that if the minority report is finally adopted by referendum that it would be the official declaration of the party. Perhaps you were not in the hall when this understanding was arrived at, but I am quite sure the record will show it.

You call it treasonable matter. Treasonable to whom? Surely it can not be treasonable to the people of America to keep them from being shot by others with whom they have no difference. No matter where one is born, he ought to be able not to assume an irrational view on this subject. If the Socialists of every nation would take the same view that you do, there would be no rumbling in the respective governments. The ruling class would have the full support of the Socialists.

You further say that we are making the party organization the tool of a foreign enemy government now at war with this country. Let me ask you, my dear Gaylord, Do you take the position of Stephen Decatur "My country, may it ever be right; but right or wrong, my country"? Of course, if that is your position, then your protest is not in harmony with the international Socialist movement.

You speak of the autocratic government of Germany, Austria, Bulgaria, and Turkey. How about the autocratic government of Serbia, Roumania, Italy, Japan, and Belgium, and until very recently the despotism of Russia? Do you know of any degree of democracy existing in any of these countries? Do you know of the ruling class of these countries fighting for democracy and civilization? Why single out a few of the autocratic countries who happen to be allied on one side of this war? Besides, as one living in America, my greatest concern is to establish a degree of democracy and liberty in the United States instead of meddling and taking sides in the European war. I can see no difference between the autocracy of Germany and the other empires and kingdoms. I hate them all, and I hope that the people of the respective countries, before the war is over or after the war, will manifest good sense and be courageous enough to connect over all the crowns in Europe.

You speak further of the propaganda we are carrying on to the advantage of a feudal government of a nation with which this Nation is now at war. Isn't it a fact that so long as we are furnishing guns and ammunitions and foodstuffs to the allies, that we are not only actively engaged in a propaganda to the advantage of those feudal governments, but are an active part of the war? I hate the words "kaiser" and "sultan," but I also hate the word "king," and I further hate to be engaged in a propaganda that will actively strengthen one side or the other. After all, as our antiwar proclamation well says, we are not conducting a war against the "Kaiser," but we will shoot the German people who are now struggling within their own country to establish a degree of democracy.

One more point, and I am going to leave you. You call our attention to the fact that there were only 185 delegates out of a possible 300 present. I must remind you that a national referendum was pending when the convention was called, providing for a convention to be called in September to be attended by 200 delegates instead of 300 as per the constitution. The emergency convention was called on the same basis as the referendum provided for the September convention. If you say that it was not a representative convention, then you must confess that you were not a representative delegate. Surely you wouldn't claim that you and a few who shared your views were the only representative delegates and the others were not.

Let us forget for a while that we were born in America or Germany or England or elsewhere, and let us remember that we now live in this country, and let us try to solve the problems of the workers here at home. By doing so we might succeed in keeping this country out of international entanglements, even though it might interfere with the profits of Wall Street.

As stated in the outset, I am submitting your letter to the executive committee.

With all good wishes, I remain, as ever, fraternally, yours,

ADOLPH GERMER,
Executive Secretary.

Mr. HUSTING. This morning I received a letter from the postmaster at Delavan, Wis., Mr. C. M. Tallman, which is as follows:

DELAVAN, WIS., May 9, 1917.

Hon. PAUL O. HUSTING,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I am inclosing herewith for your perusal a letter of warning recently sent out by the Sherman Detective Agency, of Chicago, to its clients, to which is attached a duplicate copy of the Internationalist, an ultraradical Socialist organ, the object of which seems to be to discourage patriotism in the form of enlistments and to resist and refuse such compulsory military service as is prescribed by the new conscription act.

You will note the pledge at the bottom of the sheet, and also the fact that at the recent convention of the party held in St. Louis that the article in their constitution relating to the nonindorsement of sabotage, violence, etc., was repealed.

The letter and paper inclosed was handed me by Mr. J. J. Phoenix, president of the Bradley Knitting Co., of this city, and it is the opinion of many in this community, including myself, that the espionage bill should at least be broad enough to prohibit the circulation of such plainly disloyal stuff.

There are now approximately 60 young men of Delavan who have recently enlisted in the National or State service and others are coming right along, we also have over 600 gardens now planted within the city limits, and vacant lots are very scarce.

With very kind personal regards, I am,

Very truly, yours,

C. M. TALLMAN.

I ask to have printed the letter of the Sherman Detective Agency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, that will be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CHICAGO OFFICE, April 31, 1917.

TREASURER BRADLEY KNITTING CO.,
Delavan, Wis.

DEAR SIR: We are inclosing a duplicate copy of the Internationalist, headed as being published by the Socialist Propaganda League of America.

This copy is an exact reproduction with the exception of red being used in place of black where we desire to emphasize certain paragraphs.

Article 2, section 6, in the last paragraph, which is mentioned as being repealed, originally related, we are informed, to the nonindorsement of sabotage, violence, etc.

This material is sent to inform you of the necessity for watchfulness.

Very truly, yours,

SHERMAN DETECTIVE AGENCY,
JOHN F. SHERMAN,
General Manager.

Mr. HUSTING. I also ask to have this copy of the Workers of the World Internationalist of April 7, 1917, published at Boston, Mass., put in the RECORD.

I am going to take the time to read just a few extracts from this. I want to say that these parts that are colored in red ink here were not so colored in the original weekly; but that this is an exact copy is vouched for by the Sherman Detective Agency. These are resolutions of the Socialist Propaganda League, assembled in conference at Boston, Mass., April 1, 1917, and referred to the Socialist Party convention at St. Louis, April 7, 1917.

This is what they say:

Resolved, That the S. P. withdraws its general support from the A. F. of L., which can not be recognized any longer as the representative of organized labor on the economic field.

I just want to point out there that they recommend breaking away from the American Federation of Labor.

Now, here comes the significant part of the resolution:

Resolved, That the Socialist Party pledges itself to support every action on the economic field against capital in such a way as to further the interests of the working class as a whole by advocating industrial organization instead of craft unionism, encouraging every tendency toward organized mass action and mass democracy on the economic field, so expressed and practiced by the Industrial Workers of the World; be it further

Resolved, That the Socialist Party will participate in every class fight which is fought in the interest of the working class against capital and the State, each Socialist to be pledged to participate in the economic actions and to advocate in his organization the principles of general democratic mass action.

Here, again:

Resolved, The Socialist Party will support and organize mass demonstrations and political strikes and will instruct its delegates to support such mass actions and to act as spokesmen in the representative bodies to voice the demands of the working class and to fight for freedom of speech, action, and organization as fundamental for every form of political mass action toward the overthrow of capitalism and the building up of a socialist commonwealth.

There are a good many just as significant as these, but I just want to read the colored portions now:

The Socialist movement is not neutral in a war nor does it simply adopt passive measures of protest; it fights the war continually, relentlessly, and by all the means of action in its power.

In other words, they want to be understood as saying that they are not neutral in this country; that they are going to fight against this war in this country by all means of action in their power. They do not say "by all proper means" or "all lawful means," but they say by "all the means of action in their power."

Now, here, again:

We call upon the working class, organized and unorganized, to institute strikes against the mobilization of industry and military forces under the guise of which the ruling class deprives the people of its civil and industrial rights, and we pledge ourselves to encourage and support these strikes and develop them into a general revolutionary movement against war and capitalism.

Mr. REED. Who says that?

Mr. HUSTING. That is published in The Internationalist, No. 11, volume 1, Boston, Mass., April 7, 1917.

Mr. REED. But who publishes it?

Mr. HUSTING. It is signed by Charles W. Fitzgerald, conference chairman; Samson Frieman, conference secretary; and Alfred S. Edwards, secretary of the Socialist Propaganda League of America.

Mr. REED. What is that?

Mr. HUSTING. I do not know. I am telling you that this comes through the mails. It purports to be a periodical. It is published by the Socialist Propaganda League of America.

Mr. OVERMAN. Do I understand the Senator to say that that circulates in the mail?

Mr. HUSTING. That circulates in the mail; yes.

Mr. REED. The Senator is not advised who constitutes the league?

Mr. HUSTING. Why, I suppose this is one of these conferences that we have so many of through the country. We had an embargo conference that flooded us here with telegrams, and we have leagues of various kinds, some of whom it is known have been furnished with German money.

Mr. REED. And we also have a league to promote the draft.

Mr. HUSTING. The difference between one and the other, as I understand it, is that the league to promote the draft is doing something to sustain the action of Congress, to aid and not to restrict the enforcement of its laws and its policies.

Mr. REED. One of them is not nonpatriotic, although it may be mistaken, while the other is clearly of a seditious character. I am only asking the Senator in order to try to get the source of it. I think the Senator is doing good work in advising us of this.

Mr. HUSTING. I do not know whether the Senator was here or not, but I stated some time ago what I was reading from. If these excerpts that I have been reading appear to be so commonplace that they can be put on a plane with a great many others, then I will say that the same rule ought to be adopted with the others. I do not care whether anybody is in favor of draft or against draft as an academic proposition, but I do say that I am against any paper going through the mails or being circulated or any body of men getting together and conspiring together to put before the people resolutions and statements that incite rebellion, that urge and recommend war against the authorized authorities of the United States and especially so while we are at war with a foreign nation. I do not care whether it comes from the Socialist Party or whoever else it comes from.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. HUSTING. I want to say that this is only in line with the resolutions adopted by the Socialist convention at St. Louis. They advocate mass action, mass resistance to the draft.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HUSTING. I do.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator probably in some way misapprehended what I said. Surely, the Senator knows that I do not think any such movement as he is now discussing is tolerable. I think the Senator is doing good work in calling our attention to this matter. The whole purport of my question was this: I desired to know, if possible, the source of this circular. I was anxious to know whether it came from a large body or a small body of men, whether it was the effusion of a few cranks or a few scoundrels, or whether it came from a considerable body of people who might be numerous enough to become dangerous.

Mr. HUSTING. I will state that here at the head of the paper there is given a description of this organization, and it will appear in the RECORD, so that it will speak for itself. My purpose in referring to these things on the floor of the Senate is to show that there are influences at work, financed sometimes as this may be, I do not know through whom, through which the German Government has an opportunity to work its baneful influence among the American people. It is, as I understand it and look at it, purely the continuance of a propaganda that has been going on here ever since the war began. We have record of many propagandas; we do not know whence they come, who pays for them, or anything about them; and yet we know that the mails have been flooded with this kind of stuff, and if the Senator has received what I have received he knows that he has received thousands of circulars having for their ultimate object and their design the undermining of the institutions of this country, the setting of one man against another and one race against another; and I say its ultimate design is to destroy this country.

I want to repeat here and now that I do not like to have our own instruments used for the purpose of destroying ourselves or our country. I do not want to feel that we are the unconscious instruments of carrying and aiding a propaganda that is directed against us by our enemies, and it ought to be stopped. I do not feel as though alleged constitutional rights ought to be invoked to protect the propaganda of a country that is aiming to destroy us, and that is the reason why I am bringing this matter again to the attention of the Senate.

Now, here they say:

We declare that we shall carry on this propaganda and action, even should the Government declare it illegal.

If not legally, then illegally!

Here is another paragraph:

Resolved, That article 2, section 6, be withdrawn from the party constitution.

That is the article prohibiting sabotage and these other things I have read.

Now, here comes the pledge:

I, the undersigned, solemnly protesting against the working class and the country of my birth (or adoption) being caught in the steel trap of militarism, will refuse to render any kind of military service when informed that 10,000 male citizens of the United States (or those who have declared their intention to become citizens) of an age between 18 and 45 have signed this pledge.

Name ———.
Address ———.

And so forth.

Now, I said that that was sent through the mails. The detective agency, I find when I come to look at the letter, does not say that it went through the mails. I assume that it did, however, and I have no doubt that it is being sent through the mails.

Here is a blank pledge held out to its readers whereby they undertake to resist the call of the country when conscripted, upon the condition that 10,000 male citizens of military age join with them in the pledge. Why wait until 10,000 associates or fellow conspirators join them if not because of a purpose to join with this 10,000 in an insurrection when the word is passed that 10,000 of military age are ready? Can anything be clearer than this is, inviting rebellion and an attempt to mobilize discordant elements to make war on their own country and to aid our enemy Germany?

[From the Internationalist, weekly of the Left-Wing Socialists, Boston, Mass., Apr. 7, 1917.]

RESOLUTIONS REFERRED TO THE PARTY CONVENTION—THE SOCIALIST PROPAGANDA LEAGUE SENDS GREETINGS TO COMRADES AT ST. LOUIS, WITH RESOLUTIONS COVERING ALL ESSENTIAL POINTS OF THE "MANIFESTO" FOR ACTION.

It was a working body of delegates from branches of the Socialist Propaganda League that assembled in Boston last Sunday, April 1, in response to call for a special conference to consider matters of extraordinary importance in their bearing upon the emergency convention of the Socialist Party to open at St. Louis to-day, April 7. The action of the conference was practically unanimous on all issues discussed and passed upon, and if the printing in this issue of the paper of the definite policies of the league, which must be placed in the hands of convention delegates at St. Louis, excludes a full report of the conference, the members throughout the country may look for it next week.

The series of resolutions appended express the deliberate convictions of the conference. Under instruction from the body they are referred to our comrades of the Socialist Party convention as the embodiment of views held by thousands of earnest men and women in this country, whose sole desire is that the banner of international revolutionary socialism may be upheld at St. Louis.

Attest:

CHAS. W. FITZGERALD,
Conference Chairman.
ALFRED S. EDWARDS,
Secretary Socialist Propaganda League of America.
SAMSON FRIEMAN,
Conference Secretary.

RESOLUTION ON INDUSTRIAL ACTION.

Whereas the American Federation of Labor by advocating a harmony of interest between capital and labor does not represent the interests of the working class as a whole;

Whereas the American Federation of Labor by its criminal neglect to organize and to support the action among unskilled labor is largely responsible for the ruthless suppression of labor conflicts and murder of the workers by the capitalists;

Whereas the convention of presidents and officials of the unions constituting the American Federation of Labor has pledged support to the exploiters and committed itself to war, with Samuel Gompers participating in the National Counsel of Defense: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Socialist Party withdraws its general support from the American Federation of Labor, which can not be recognized any longer as the representative of organized labor on the economic field: Be it further

Resolved, That the Socialist Party pledges itself to support every action on the economic field against capital, in such a way as to further the interests of the working class as a whole, by advocating industrial organization instead of craft unionism, encouraging every tendency toward organized mass action and mass democracy on the economic field, as expressed and practiced by the Industrial Workers of the World: Be it further

Resolved, That the Socialist Party will participate in every class fight, which is fought in the interest of the working class against capital and the State. Each socialist to be pledged to participate in the economic actions and to advocate in his organization the principles of general democratic mass action.

RESOLUTION ON POLITICAL ACTION.

Whereas political action constitutes the general class action of the workers; and

Whereas political power can only be based on class power of the working masses: Therefore be it

Resolved, The Socialist Party will support and organize mass demonstrations and political strikes and will instruct its delegates to support such mass actions and to act as spokesmen in the representative bodies to voice the demands of the working class, and to fight for freedom of speech, action, and organization, as fundamental for every form of political mass action toward the overthrow of capitalism and the building up of a socialist commonwealth.

RESOLUTION ON PARLIAMENTARY ACTION.

Whereas the present stage of imperialism shows that capitalist parties develop more and more into one reactionary mass and lean to centralization of political power into the hands of executive and judicial bodies under the control of financial and monopolistic capital and abandoning the rights and prerogatives of bourgeois parliaments: Therefore, all the hopes of socialists for the legal conquest of political power through parliamentary action vanishing, be it

Resolved, That our parliamentary campaigns shall be conducted on strictly Socialist lines, without compromise with bourgeois parties or issues, for education and propaganda toward mass action, illustrating our principles and tactics on every-day facts and issues; and be it further

Resolved, That elected Representatives shall use their office for criticism and propaganda and the support of mass action, regarding themselves as spokesmen of the working class under control of the Socialist Party and bound to resign rather than to act or support action detrimental to the interests of the working class.

RESOLUTION ON MILITARISM AND WAR.

The Socialist movement is not neutral in a war, nor does it simply adopt passive measures of protest; it fights the war continually, relentlessly, and by all the means of action in its power.

Realizing that there is a division in the international movement on the problem of action against war; realizing, moreover, that this problem is crucial in the reconstruction of socialism, the Socialist Party declares against participation in a war waged under any and all conditions of imperialistic capitalism, including wars of national defense and democracy, so called.

The Socialist Party can not compromise its unrelenting opposition to war; it seeks to use every opportunity that may arise to transform a war into the social revolution to the proletariat.

In conformity with and applying these general principles, the Socialist Party of America lays down the following program of action during the war:

(1) Representatives of the Socialist Party in the various governing bodies shall refuse to vote for war credits or any other measures of war. Action shall immediately be taken to expel party members violating this decision.

(2) We pledge ourselves and our organization to resist all efforts at recruiting by means of meetings, an aggressive educational propaganda, mass demonstrations, and by any other means in accord with revolutionary Socialist principles and tactics.

(3) We call upon the working class, organized and unorganized, to institute strikes against the mobilization of industry and military forces under the guise of which the ruling class deprives the people of its civil and industrial rights, and we pledge ourselves to encourage and support these strikes and develop them into a general revolutionary movement against war and capitalism.

(4) In the event of conscription being forced upon the people of this country by the ruling class we shall initiate a movement for the refusal of military service; moreover, we shall support by all means mass movements of the people organized to resist and refuse compulsory military service.

(5) Aside from these special measures against the war, we declare that we shall not allow the class struggle to relax; moreover, we affirm that the general revolutionary class shall proceed with new vigor and increased intensity during the period of war along the lines of general mass action of the working class.

6. The Socialist Party of America, in short, declares war upon the war and the measures adopted by the Government for purposes of war. No "civil peace!" No truce with the ruling class! War does not change the issue, but emphasizes it: War against capitalism. On with the class struggle!

7. We declare that we shall carry on this propaganda and action even should the Government declare it illegal—if not legally, then illegally!

RESOLUTION ON INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATION.

Whereas the second international has failed and is broken down when mostly needed; and

Whereas the period of internationalism and world wars makes it imperative to have a strong and effective international organization of the Workers of the World to resist the capitalist aggressions and capitalist wars: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Socialist Party of America will participate only in a new third international of parties and socialists, who denounce a true or Burgfrieden during a war of whatever nature, and who are willing to propagate and participate in mass action as a means to resist militarism and war, including so-called defensive wars of capitalist States and to build up an organized democratic mass power to overthrow the capitalist State.

RESOLUTION ON ARTICLE 2, SECTION 6, OF THE PARTY CONSTITUTION.

Whereas article 2, section 6, of the present constitution is contrary to the very principles of revolutionary socialism, and constitutes a danger to the Socialist Party, especially under the development of capitalism in the period of imperialism, in which organized mass action is the most effective weapon against the solid autocratic power of financial and monopolistic interests, organized in the modern capitalist State; and

Whereas organized mass action against the reactionary forces of modern imperialism, using illegal and brutal means of violence and murder in the class struggle, can not always be carried on without the use of force by the working class: Therefore be it

Resolved, That article 2, section 6, be withdrawn from the party constitution.

THE PLEDGE.

I, the undersigned, solemnly protesting against the working class and the country of my birth (or adoption) being caught in the steel trap of militarism, will refuse to render any kind of military service when informed that 10,000 male citizens of the United States (or those who have declared their intention to become citizens), of an age between 18 and 45, have signed this pledge.

Now, Mr. President, I have brought the Socialist resolutions, adopted at St. Louis, to the attention of the Senate. I have pointed out here that by a majority vote they were ordered printed for distribution generally, and before they were acted upon by a referendum; so it is plain that to-day the mails of the United States are being used for the purpose of furthering propaganda that has for its object and purpose forcible resistance to the authorized officers of the United States. If they are drafted, they say in as plain English as English can be that they are going to resist, and that now a referendum is being carried on through the mails to bring that about.

I do not cite these things because of any particular provision in this espionage bill, although it may pertain particularly or more directly to the question of nonmailable matter; but this whole bill, and bills of this character such as we are now considering, are not aimed at legitimate newspaper business. They are not aimed at legitimate correspondence or legitimate business. They are being directed against an influence which ought to be routed out, which ought to be stopped in this country. Ever since this war began we have suffered great harm at the hands of agents and instruments of a country with which we are now at war, namely, Germany. This harm has been done to us by many ways and means. It has been done through newspapers, speeches, letters, circulars, pamphlets, and we have aided and abetted these agencies, hostile to us and inimical to the welfare of the country, through our mails; in other words, Germany has turned our own mail service into an instrument for her benefit, to our own undoing. What I am saying here to-day is more about the object and purpose of this bill than the particular provisions of the bill. This bill is not aimed at any forces that are legitimate and loyal, but only against forces and influences that are disloyal, treasonable, and illegitimate. If the interpretation which some of the Senators put upon certain chapters of this bill is correct, I would vote against these sections myself, but the trouble is that their construction, in my judgment, is entirely erroneous and unjustified. The trouble has been in the discussion of this bill and other bills calculated to give power to the President to wage this war successfully against Germany, and which were calculated to strengthen him in his negotiations with this same country that Members of Congress, certain newspapers, and certain people have always imputed to our Government the most sinister motives and purposes.

Senators here in discussing this bill are constantly talking about the danger of our constitutional rights being invaded instead of presupposing that the President is as anxious to uphold the Constitution as Senators are. Not only that, but in the discussion of these bills where it is perfectly plain that no unconstitutional power is delegated to the President, Senators trouble themselves to discover opportunities afforded where the President might act unconstitutionally. It ought to be a sufficient answer that the bill delegates no unconstitutional powers, but if that is not enough, let me add that President Wilson has never yet exercised his functions unconstitutionally and, in my judgment, never will. Every President has the opportunity, if he is so minded, to disregard the Constitution, but Senators should remember that President Wilson has never been so minded, and I want to say that there is no Senator in this Chamber who is more careful to keep within his constitutional powers and prerogatives than the President himself whom they profess to fear so much.

Now, in dealing with the matter of carrying seditious and treasonable matters, is not it unthinkable, in a time of war, that we should permit a foreign government to use an agency of the United States, namely, the United States mails, to wage war upon ourselves here through her own organizations, sympathizers, and publicity facilities? Is not it absurd, to say the least, that we should be tying ourselves up in such a manner as not only to hinder us, but actually to facilitate the carrying out of the foreign enemy's own cunning and dangerous designs and purposes?

It seems to me that in attempting to protect what we conceive to be the constitutional rights of the people, Senators, gratuitously and without warrant and justification, are taking it for granted that every instrument put into the hands of the President is going to be used for sinister purposes. On the embargo here we have been told by the opponents of the bill that if this power were given to the President he would violate treaties. One Senator even said that he might lead us to the commission of the same acts that were committed by Germany. Referring to all these things and all these arguments that have been brought up, I say that in these extraordinary times, to accomplish these extraordinary purposes that we have in mind, in order to get our hands and our feet free to fight an enemy that scruples and hesitates at nothing to gain its ends, it is necessary temporarily to put into the hands of the Commander in Chief of the Army all the powers necessary to bring this war to a successful conclusion.

When we declared war, and thereby put the Army and the Navy and all the resources of the country at the disposal of the President, we gave or impliedly promised him all the powers we possessed to carry it on successfully. We ought not declare war in one breath, and then in the next breath say that we are not going to give the President power to wage war. Do we want to declare war and then lie down supinely and let our enemy overcome us without resistance? Shall we deliberately put ourselves, and our very liberties, in jeopardy, and then refuse to defend them or permit a defense of them? We do not want to tie the President down, we do not want to hamstring him, we do not want to sit here in the Senate every time some measure which is necessary to our defense comes up and then debate whether or not we are going to let him do it. We have got to have some faith in the President of the United States. We have got to rely on the patriotic judgment and ability of our Commander in Chief.

It is said here that we are trying to muzzle the press and that a constitutional right is invaded. Mr. President, when we passed the conscription bill, by which we conscript a man, conscript the happiness of his family, conscript his earning capacity, conscript his life, I want to know if we can go any further than that in taking away constitutional liberties and rights, if it is a taking of constitutional liberty and rights. But it is not. It is a thing that is necessary for every country to exact from its citizens when it gets into war; but it seems to me that it does not lie in the mouth of those who only in a small measure are restrained of what they conceive to be their full constitutional rights in time of peace to complain and to fight and to obstruct on every hand every movement calculated to strengthen the arms of the President—yes; calculated to strengthen our own arms and our own might. I want to say right here that neither the administration nor any Senator supporting this bill, and certainly not myself, want to muzzle the press or want to hinder and obstruct the fullest intelligence, discussion, and comment in times of war consistent with our public safety. If there is anything in this bill that encroaches on this, I do not know where it is; in fact, one proviso expressly negatives it. What I favor and what the administration favors and the primary and sole object of the bill, as I understand it, is to tear out and uproot this disloyal propaganda that has been going on throughout the country for the purpose of protecting ourselves against sinister influences initiated from without but manifested from within. In short, the object to be attained is to prevent disloyal and illegitimate publicity calculated to give aid, comfort, and information to the enemy, and is not aimed at publication or publicity whatsoever which has for its purpose the welfare of the country. What the President wants by these sort of bills is to be able to deal with disloyalty and sedition and not to hinder or obstruct legitimate publicity.

For instance, take the power to be given the President in regard to the embargo. When that was up for discussion in this bill Senators immediately jumped to the unjustified conclusion that the President if given this power would use it in violation of the Constitution and our solemn treaties. If I thought that the President of the United States was going to violate any solemn treaty or to break our word with any country, I would not have voted for the embargo no matter how much we may need it. One of the Senators said here upon the floor that "perhaps, in time of necessity, he might be obliged to vote for the sinking of boats by submarines without warning." Let me at least put myself on record in that regard. May the hands of any officer of the United States be palsied before he will ever sign his name to the infamous order directing the discharge of a torpedo at a boat loaded with helpless men, women, and children without warning and without observing the rules of international law, and may no man who ever has the honor to belong to the American Navy put the foul blot upon his country which now brands Germany as an outlaw nation. May I never live to see the day when our glorious Navy will make war on men, women, and children, and in sinking a Lusitania sink itself to the infamous level of the German Navy. We can afford to lose, if must be. But we can not afford to be unjust; we can not afford to break our word; we can not afford to lose our honor; we can not afford to lose the trust and confidence in which the nations of the world hold us. We can not afford to do the things that our enemy has done, to do that which we have denounced and condemned over and over again on the floor of the Senate and elsewhere. I would not vote to do that; but I am voting for this embargo, and I am voting for these other powers that are put in the hands of the President of the United States, because I know they will not be abused, because I know he will not do those things, because I know also that he would do nothing not lawful under this bill. I know that he will use the powers conferred herein in accord with the rights of neutrals; yes, I will go further and say with rights of our enemies, and that they will be used only to do what we manifestly have a right to do and no more.

I do not believe that there is any treaty written of the kind which says we must feed our enemies, or which provides either in letter or spirit that we must aid and abet our enemies in their efforts to destroy us or which prohibits the use and shipment of our own resources for our own defense, and I want to take particular issue with the charge of the Senator from Michigan when he said that we were doing or attempting to do the things which Germany had done, and against which we have complained, for which we went to war with her. I do not think that we have ever complained because Germany had used her own resources for her own armies and naval forces. We complained because Germany refused to let us, a neutral Nation, sell and deliver our foodstuffs to another neutral country. An embargo under this bill does not contemplate for a moment that we are to interfere with neutral trade from one neutral country to another or to sink and destroy boats and kill noncombatants, men, women, and children, because of our attempt to stop one neutral country from trading with another, but this is what Germany did and against which we complained. She told us "If you take a boat across this dead line from one neutral port to another neutral port I shall sink your boats, take your lives and your property." We propose to do nothing of the kind. Here it is only a question of what we shall do with our own foodstuffs and resources and supplies. We simply say that we will do with our foodstuffs, with our own supplies, and with our own resources that which is necessary for our defense.

And there is no other excuse or justification necessary in the levying of an embargo upon our own foodstuffs than to say that in waging this war and since we have entered into the war our first duty to ourselves is to arm and feed and supply our Army and our Navy and the armies and navies cooperating with us and whose aid and assistance is necessary for our defense. There is no duty incumbent upon us to supply any other country when we are at war, under treaty or any other obligation, which is paramount to that.

This does not violate any rule of international law; this can violate no treaty. There is no power in this bill which Mr. Woodrow Wilson, the President of the United States, will or can properly use in the way that Germany has used her powers, which we have condemned. There is nothing in Woodrow Wilson's make-up that warrants or justifies anyone in believing he will use these powers in a way which no one better or more vigorously than he has condemned beyond measure.

Is it not strange, Mr. President, that whenever measures of this kind come up to be discussed we impute to our own Government the most sinister motives; that we fear every power we may momentarily, because of extraordinary circumstances, relinquish or delegate to one of our branches of our Government is going to be used by a scoundrel, by a man bereft of every human attribute—that these powers will be used as a tyrant would use them? What country has ever acted more upon the square than this Government has in war or in peace? We would have to go back on every tradition and every paragraph of American history to take for granted that our Government or any men who represent our Government are going to use their powers contrary to the rules of civilized nations and of civilized warfare. I for one refuse to believe it, and I propose to proceed upon the theory in this war that a President such as we have will not violate the traditions of his country or violate its laws or its Constitution and will do nothing to bring dishonor to his Nation or to his own name.

We know, however, on the other side, that every instrument than can be used or seized upon by our enemies is being used ruthlessly and without regard to the rules of civilized nations or civilized warfare. There is no law for Germany but Germany's necessity; and she is the sole judge of her own necessity. So Germany's necessity is not only Germany's law, but she would make it the law of the whole world.

I say that we have entered into this war to challenge her right to impose her necessities upon the world, and we should strengthen our Government so that our Government may fight this war to a successful conclusion, and thus make good our challenge and vindicate the right of democracies to live. I say there is nothing in our history, there is nothing in the history of the President or of any man of influence at the head of our Government that warrants any Senator in believing that a President of the United States will misuse his powers contrary to the rules of law or justice and right.

So, it seems to me, Mr. President, we should not be spending days and weeks here in debate while our boats are going down, while every newspaper brings us news of some more men, women, and children who are being murdered in cold blood upon the high seas. We should make haste, in the face of a world's famine, when we know that Germany is sinking cargoes to the bottom of the sea; when she is not only inflicting damages upon her enemies, not only sinking our ships, not only destroying millions of dollars' worth of property, but she is doing worse than that—she is committing a crime against the world by destroying foodstuffs and the ships wherewith to supply the world. She has set out and boasts that she is doing what she set out to do, to starve the world into submission. For every ship that goes down puts beyond reach of the hungry people of the world the food to feed the world. And when she sinks millions upon millions of bushels of wheat and other foods, she diminishes the world's supply, and thereby not only aggravates the drive upon but shoots the prices skyward upon the remaining and fast-vanishing supplies that must feed the whole world, if the world is to be fed. In other words, for every boatload of food that is sent down to feed the fishes, a blow is struck at the table of the world as well as at her enemies.

Yet while she is doing these things, while she is trying not only to starve her enemies but to starve the whole world, we sit here and argue for hours and hours about the construction of this phrase or that instead of going direct to the purpose sought and imperatively needed; that is, giving the authority, the obvious necessary power, to the President, so that he may do that which we declare he shall do and which he must do under his constitutional oath of office.

I say it seems to me that we should close this thing up in a hurry. There is no danger of this reacting on ourselves after this war. It is only going to be for the period of the war. I would not stand for these bills for a second after the war is over. I would be glad to have a paragraph put in every bill that as soon as the war shall cease these laws shall become inoperative. I do not want any authority to be delegated to take away our constitutional rights, but I want the authority to be given the President so that he shall have the legal right and power to do what is necessary to be done to properly defend ourselves. I want it done, because if this Government is put out of business you can toss the Constitution in the stove if you want and burn it up, because there will not be any constitutional rights left to anyone of us if the autocracy of Germany prevails in the world. Do you not think we would better in times like these even circumscribe our rights just a little bit in order that we may save them all? Is it not better to fight and fight to win than to refuse to deny and restrict ourselves a little in this crisis, and thus in trying to save alleged rights lose these and all the rest?

Mr. President, I wanted to say these things, because I have felt keenly that we are losing time, that we are wasting our time on nonessentials when we ought to be getting ready for war. We ought to be mobilizing the resources of this country instead of talking. We ought to be saving this country instead of saving something that some Senators fear may possibly be used as long as the war lasts to the detriment of the American people.

It seems to me that all the provisions of the pending bill within reasonable safeguards ought to be enacted as speedily as possible, and we ought to enact all the other necessary bills as speedily as possible, and give the President of the United States at least the confidence that we must extend to any commander upon the battle field. We ought to give the authority which I think has been given to any President of the United States in any war we ever fought. As far as I know, they received every power they asked in so far as was necessary to carry out the war in which the country was engaged.

I say now as to the President of the United States, whose entire record as President and as a man does not warrant a misgiving or a belief that he will usurp any power or use any authority contrary to the laws of society and good order and morality and decency, the presumption ought to be when he asks for it that he is asking for it for the good of the Government, not for himself, but for the good of the whole world, including the good of the United States. Instead of the constant presumption that he is asking these things as a favor for himself, as a desire to gather more power to himself, is it not a fair presumption that he is doing it out of some love for the country?

What Senator in this body, what citizen of the United States, can justly profess a greater love for his country than the President of the United States? His intellect is not challenged; his record is not challenged. He has been right in all the steps he has taken. But we have heard these same things before. Every step that he has sought to take in the interest of the safety of his country has been obstructed. He has been halted. He has been obstructed, and so far he has never been defeated, and even those who have opposed him on other occasions would not have it any differently now. The presumption and his record are in his favor, and when he comes here I think we ought at least presume that he ought to have it, instead of presuming all the time that when he is asking for it he ought not to have it.

I am voting for these bills, some of them that I think are drastic, because unity in this country is essential for the safety of the country and for the perpetuation of its institutions. It is necessary for us to pull together. It is necessary to have teamwork, and we can not have teamwork and we can not put power in the hands of the President unless Congress primarily and the people also primarily stand back of him in all that is necessary to carry the war to a successful issue.

I trust and I pray that the President may be given these powers, and with the thought that even if some Senators think the proposed legislation goes too far they may be sure that the President will not go too far in using it, even if he has the authority, which I contend he has not under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of California obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	Martin	Smith, Mich.
Bankhead	Hardwick	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Beckham	Husting	New	Smoot
Borah	James	Newlands	Sterling
Brady	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Stone
Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Sutherland
Broussard	Jones, Wash.	Page	Thomas
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Poindexter	Thompson
Culberson	Kendrick	Pomerene	Townsend
Cummins	Kenyon	Ransdell	Trammell
Curtis	King	Reed	Underwood
Fernald	Kirby	Robinson	Vardaman
Fletcher	Knox	Shafroth	Walsh
France	Lodge	Sheppard	Watson
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Shields	Wolcott
Gallinger	McKellar	Smith, Ga.
Hale	McLean	Smith, Md.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was requested to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] is unavoidably absent, presiding over a hearing before the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. LANE] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and other Members of the Senate are in attendance upon the Finance Committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Finance Committee is in session conducting hearings upon the revenue bill. I bring the fact to the attention of the Senate that the Senator from North Carolina and most of the members of the committee are present at the hearings.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the members of the Committee on Finance be excused from attendance upon the Senate during this day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. There is a request that the members of the Committee on Finance be excused from further attendance on the session of the Senate to-day. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the committee is excused.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, some 10 days ago I gave notice while the Senate bill was pending that I would move to strike out the parenthetical c clause that has been termed here the censorship provision of the bill. I wish for a very brief time to demonstrate, if I can, that the mischief we seek to remedy here both by various amendments and by the motion can only be reached finally by eliminating the particular features of the bill relating to censorship.

In speaking now upon this subject very briefly. I want to make plain at the outset that I do not speak for the metropolitan press at all, and I am not concerned at all with the attitude of the newspapers of the country. They are sufficiently powerful, sufficiently rich, sufficiently influential to care for their own interests; and, no matter what laws we may pass, they doubtless, with their power and their riches and their influence, will go forward as they see fit and doubtless be true to their traditions.

It is for the man who reads and who is entitled to read the truth; it is for the man and the woman who see their boy conscripted and taken from their arms to do a man's war work; it is for the boys who constitute the Nation's Army and are entitled to the fostering care of that Nation; it is for the humble man with his sacred American right to express himself as he sees fit—it is for all of these and for the right of free speech for and on behalf of all these that I plead with you to-day.

I want to make plain at the outset of what little I say that I am talking to you of the right of free speech in this Nation, the right that is mine and the right that belongs to every man and to every woman to express, within the limitations of the Constitution and answerable for the wrong that they may do, the opinions that are theirs and to communicate those opinions unto their neighbors.

In this day the preservation of free speech and the preservation of a free press are of more than ordinary importance. Of transcendent importance is it whenever there is a time of stress, whenever there is excitement, whenever there are enthusiasms in which we lose our judgment, that we should protect these fundamentals of democracy. To-day not only is that stress present in this land, but there is another reason that has been voiced upon this floor again and again in the last two weeks that makes it more important now than ever to preserve the right of free speech and the right of a free press—more important than at any other time in the history of our Nation. I have heard distinguished and revered Senators upon this floor within the past two weeks deplore—deplore in terms that went to my very heart—the abdication of the functions of the popular branch of the government of this land. I have heard them not alone up this side but upon the other side of the Chamber, continuously in the debates that have transpired in the last few weeks, say—and say with a feeling and a pathos that could not be denied—that that which formerly was the popular branch of the government of our land has abdicated much of its functions and to-day passes only the policies and registers only the will of the Chief Executive. I do not question either the wisdom or the unwisdom of this; I seek not the causes of it, nor do I criticize at all that that may be the attitude; but it is a fact, a fact which has been admitted upon this floor again and again in the past few weeks, that this branch—the legislative branch of the United States Government—has forgotten much of its initiative and has abdicated much and many of its functions. If this be so, how much more tenderly and how much more preciously should we guard the right of our people to free speech and the right of our press, within legal and legitimate limits, to publish what may be read by the people of this land?

So at the outset the premise that I make to you is the premise of the Senators here in debate, extending over some weeks, that we have forgotten, in a degree at least, the obligation that might have been ours in the past; and so it is more essential now than at any other time for the preservation of the rights and liberties of our people that we guard the fundamentals upon which our Government rests.

I have listened, as well, during these debates to the very eloquent and distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], to the eloquent Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] this morning, and to many others solemnly conjuring us that in the passage of laws of this sort we should stand by the President. I will not yield even to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina in my desire, in a time of war like this, to stand by the President. I have vied with him—this side of the Chamber, indeed, has vied with the other side of the Chamber—in passing every law that the national administration has asked of the Congress of the United States, all animated by a common purpose and the same patriotic design of accomplishing just one thing—the country's welfare and the successful prosecution of the war.

We followed our President in his desire for a declaration of war; we followed him when he asked for the appropriation of $7,000,000,000, and we appropriated it with fewer restrictions than a municipality or a county or a State would appropriate any portion of its revenues; we followed him when he asked of us that, for the first time in the history of the Anglo-Saxon race, we conscript at the beginning of the war; that we take our youth by conscription to fight that war. I will follow him, and I have no doubt the other Members on this side of the Chamber will follow him, in the future in conscripting not only the blood of the Nation but its resources and its wealth; but I insist that we should not follow anybody into autocracy. We should not, no matter whence comes the request—and none of the sort that I indicate is here from the President in this bill, as I will demonstrate to you—we should follow none in the destruction of the very fundamentals of democracy, the very pillars upon which this Government of ours rests. I insist that in acting in relation to this bill as I do and proposing to eliminate subdivision (c) in relation to the censorship problem, I act in accord with the written declaration of the President of the United States, and that under his written declaration, if you desire to follow the President with the enthusiasm and the equanimity and the cheerfulness and the zeal and the assiduity and the pertinacity with which we have followed him in the last few weeks, it is impossible for you to do otherwise than to strike out this particular section and this particular obnoxious clause.

But before coming to that matter, let me suggest to you that it is no answer to the objections that we make to censorship and the censorship clause, to say that the President himself will make the particular regulations and rules. Already there is a consorship existing in this Nation; already every means of communication between our land and lands outside have been taken charge of by the United States Government; already everything has been done beyond the mere passage of a law of this sort which will attain the desired result. In what has been done, we may learn the mode of what may be done under the particular provisions of this specific bill. Senators are aware, I take it—and therefore very hastily I run over it—that Secretaries Lansing, Baker, and Daniels on the 14th day of April last requested the President to appoint a committee on public information. Their communication was:

Premature or ill-advised announcements of policies, plans, and specific activities, whether innocent or otherwise, would constitute a source of danger * * *.

It is our opinion that the two functions—censorship and publicity—can be joined in honesty and with profit, and we recommend the creation of a committee on public information. The chairman should be a civilian * * *. Other members should be the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy, or an officer or officers detailed to the work by them.

We believe you have the undoubted authority to create this committee on public information without waiting further legislation, and, because of the importance of the task and its pressing necessity, we trust that you will see fit to do so.

The committee, upon appointment, can proceed to the framing of regulations and the creation of machinery that will safeguard all information of value to an enemy, and at the same time open every department of Government to the inspection of the people as far as possible.

The President thereupon made an Executive order, in the following course:

I hereby create a committee on public information, to be composed of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and a civilian who shall be charged with the executive direction of the committee.

As civilian chairman of the committee, I appoint Mr. George Creel.

The Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy are authorized each to detail an officer or officers to the work of the committee.

It is perfectly obvious—and that is contemplated by the very proclamation—that it is the subordinates of Government who will devise the censorship rules; that it is the subordinates of Government, however good they may be—and I criticize none of them—who will prescribe the requisite regulations; it will be the subordinates of Government, I know not how high or low, who will say whether I shall write or I shall speak my sentiments or whether a newspaper shall write or publish its views. Not alone have we this demonstration by the particular censorship which is now in operation, but on May 1, you will recall, that there was a proclamation by the President in these words:

PROCLAMATION OF THE PRESIDENT.

Whereas the existence of a state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government makes it essential to the public safety that no communication of a character which would aid the enemy or its allies shall be had.

Therefore by virtue of the power vested in me under the Constitution and by joint resolution passed by Congress April 6, 1917, declaring the existence of a state of war, it is ordered that all companies, or other persons, owning controling, or operating telegraph or telephone lines or submarine cables are hereby prohibited from transmitting messages to points without the United States and from delivering messages received from such points except those permitted under rules and regulations to be established by the Secretary of War for telegraph and telephone lines and by the Secretary of the Navy for submarine cables.

To these departments, respectively, is delegated the duty of preparing and enforcing rules and regulations under this order to accomplish the purpose mentioned. This order shall take effect from date.

According to the news dispatches of that day, May 1, to one single individual and to those who were employed by him was left the sole duty of deciding whether a dispatch should be sent or whether or not there should be any communication made through the particular agencies described in this order.

You will observe that, of necessity, because of his onerous duties and the multifarious burdens that are his, the President must leave to subordinate officials of the Government the preparation of rules and regulations and the enforcement of the rules and regulations relating to particular censorship matters.

There is no necessity to-day for such a law as you ask us to enact. Three thousand miles are we from the seat of actual conflict. There is no battle that rages on our borders. There are no boundaries within the confines of our country which must be protected, as they had to be protected during the particular period of the Civil War. To-day we are far removed overseas from this conflict. If it be needed in the future to sacrifice democracy for the safety of the Nation, we will all go as far as we ought to go; but at this particular time legitimate argument can not be advanced why, with the war in its present state, at the very commencement of the conflict, we must enact the most drastic censorship law that any nation on the face of the earth has.

I quote, not only with approval but with profound respect, the views of the President of the United States on this particular question. I read to you the letter written by him to Mr. Arthur Brisbane, the well-known journalist, because in these views thus expressed I insist to the Senate of the United States that I but follow the President when I urge that we eliminate subdivision (c) of the particular clause relating to censorship. The President's letter to Mr. Brisbane is as follows:

MY DEAR MR. BRISBANE: I sincerely appreciate the frankness of your interesting letter of April 20 with reference to the so-called espionage bill now awaiting action by Congress.

I approve of this legislation, but I need not assure you and those interested in it that whatever action the Congress may decide upon, so far as I am personally concerned, I shall not expect or permit any part of this law to apply to me or any of my official acts or in any way to be used as a shield against criticism.

What process of ratiocination, what peculiar kind of reasoning is it by which you would apply this law to the captain, the major, and the general and not apply it to the Commander in Chief? When the Commander in Chief says to us, to our Nation, and to all, that he would not permit this law to be applied to him under any circumstances, he writes the death knell of the law, and he writes as well that it ought not to be passed by the Congress of the United States. When he says to us, as here he says, "I shall not expect or permit any part of this law to apply to me," he abrogates the law before it is passed so far as the Chief Executive of the Nation is concerned; but you who favor this law would say to us, "If there is a commander incompetent or worse in charge of a part of the armies of this Nation, if he shall lead into death and slaughter the boys that we take from our homes, if he shall permit pestilence to decimate their ranks, if he shall be guilty of every offense and every crime that a general can be guilty of, this law shall apply to the general, and my lips and yours are closed against comment or criticism, but it shall not apply and will not apply to the Commander in Chief of that general."

It was generous, it was unselfish, it was patriotic for the President to write as he did. I can not commend too highly the position that he takes; and I am glad that it is a position that enables me to do, in connection with this bill, what I have done in connection with every other bill which has been presented by the administration in this Congress—to follow the President and to do as he desires, because it is obvious to me that, if he does not desire this law to be applicable to him and that he will abrogate its provisions so far as he is concerned, he would not have us make it applicable to a poor or a lame or a halt subaltern or subordinate, and then protect that particular subordinate where he himself would not ask protection.

The President proceeds in his letter to Mr. Brisbane:

I can imagine no greater disservice to the country than to establish—a system of censorship that would deny to the people of a free republic like our own their indisputable right to criticize their own public officials.

What?—

I ask the Senators upon the other side who have spoken so feelingly and eloquently of following the President, who follows the President in this particular crisis and in connection with this particular bill? They who would muzzle the press and gag our people or we who insist that there shall be no censorship provision, who insist in the very language, indeed, of our honored and exalted and respected Chief Magistrate, that there shall not be established "a system of censorship that would deny to the people of a free republic like our own their indisputable right to criticize their own public officials"?

The letter proceeds then—and I will read it all, that you may have it before you, if you desire:

While exercising the great powers of the office I hold I would regret in a crisis like the one through which we are now passing to lose the benefit of patriotic and intelligent criticism.

And, oh, is not that all that is pleaded for here—patriotic and intelligent criticism that may enable our people to know exactly what is transpiring and to know whether that for which they are giving all that they hold dear and all that they have shall be carried forward in the fashion that they desire and in the fashion that it ought to be carried forward?

The letter concludes:

In these trying times one can feel certain only of his motives, which he must strive to purge of selfishness of every kind, and wait with patience for the judgment of a calmer day to vindicate the wisdom of the course he has tried conscientiously to follow.

Thanking you for having written to me,

Cordially and sincerely, yours, WOODROW WILSON.

I insist to our friends upon the other side, I insist to all, that there is the best argument that has been made against the espionage bill since its presentation to the Congress of the United States; and upon that argument we who do not believe in the sort of thing that would be fastened upon democracy to-day by this law might well rest our case and leave with you the determination. But beyond that, in a nation like ours, you can not have and preserve liberty and freedom with undefined and indefinable crimes. You can not make the right of the moment the offense of the next. You can not by legislation say that the virtue of to-day shall be the crime of to-morrow; and when you leave to the uncertain determination of any man overnight the power to write a new criminal code, when you give to any individual the power by rules and by regulations to define penal offenses as he may see fit to define them, then you do the very thing that we inveigh against. You make this hour's virtue the next hour's crime. In a republic—in a nation such as ours—that ought never to be done. It ought never to be done, I will say, even as an extreme measure; but assuredly it ought not to be done when the necessity does not exist and when here at our very elbow the necessity can not be seen.

I read not very long ago a declaration made by the War Department, and it is so naïve, so refreshingly frank, and furnishes so distinctly and clearly one of the reasons for this law that I read to you a particular portion of it. I read a paragraph from the pamphlet issued by the Army War College entitled "The Proper Relationship Between the Army and the Press in War," and this is it:

By criticism of the conduct of campaigns, the action of certain officers and the exploiting of others, the people will be led to lose their confidence in the Army, with the result that the moral support of the people is lost; they cry for and obtain new generals and new plans of campaign, not based on expert knowledge and thought, with a consequent lengthening of the war or even defeat.

How refreshing in a land of the free! Why, the logical conclusion is that the only thing to do in time of war is to permit no criticism or comment at all. The only rational reason that can be advanced for a paragraph such as that is that criticism and comment in war are so harmful that the strong arm of the law at all costs should prohibit them.

See where this leads us, please. If you should run a newspaper and during war you publish of Gen. Bloss—we will take that as a fictitious name by way of illustration—that Gen. Bloss is a most astonishing strategist, that he unites in himself not alone Alexander and Hannibal and Cæsar but also all of the soldierly and masterly qualities of Napoleon, you may publish that in columns, you may publish it wide to the world, and with equanimity and ready acquiescence and indeed with the utmost pleasure these gentlemen will see that publication. But if you say that Gen. Bloss, in leading his army along the Potomac, had so little sense that he led it into a morass and half of his men were drowned; if you say he is inefficient and incompetent or that he went into action drunk, and thus sacrificed the lives of your fellow citizens, then you are guilty of a crime and you will be put into prison for it, and this without regard to the truth.

Now, let us assume that Gen. Bloss is inefficient and is incompetent. Let us assume that he is not fit to lead any number of men. Let us assume that he leads his men to their slaughter, and you see these 21-year-old boys that are taken from their homes paying the penalty of his inefficiency and his incompetency. We assume these to be the facts; and if you say that the general, in leading his men, did it in masterful fashion and with an efficiency that has never before been witnessed upon the field of battle, that he went forth to the conflict and he fought the good fight, and that he did all that could have been done by any strategist in any age of the world, then a ticket of merit is yours for what you say of the general. But if you say to the heartbroken man and woman back home from whom you have taken their one boy, if you say to those whom you love in your particular territory, if you say—as it is the American right to say—to your fellow citizens and to mine, "This man is inefficient and incompetent, and led his boys to slaughter," to jail you go, and a censorship closes your mouth, gags you, and muzzles your newspaper.

Why, it puts a premium upon the false publication; it makes a crime of the truth; and this is exactly what I insist is the very purpose of this law. The very purpose of it is to render impossible legitimate criticism, by word of mouth or otherwise, of those who may lead during this war, and lead in incompetency and in inefficiency.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does not the Senator think the proviso will cover that case? I will read it:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Why, of course it does not, sir. I answer the Senator in rather dogmatic fashion, and he will pardon me for the emphasis of my response. Of course, it does not cover what is designed by this law. Would you have me think, sir, that you have written one provision and then nullified it by the next? Would you have us believe that you have prevented criticism and comment in the first 16 lines of an act, and then, in the last 4, you have permitted criticism and comment? And the very language itself, if you construe it as it ought to be construed, is language, I am certain, that does not for one instant reach the remedy that we ask, and does not for one instant repair the injury or undo the mischief of this particular enactment. Behind a law such as this will be buttressed inefficiency and incompetency.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I do.

Mr. LODGE. The power of regulation is left in the hands presumably of the censors appointed by the President. Now, the President has told all the world that he does not wish himself to avoid criticism, and I have not any question that he means every word of it; but who constitutes that board? The Senator has stated it. There are three Cabinet officers upon it.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. And their subordinates are of necessity selected for the task.

Mr. LODGE. How much criticism affecting any one of those departments, no matter how just, would ever get by that board?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The constitution of the particular censorship board is "another story," as Mr. Kipling would say, and some time perhaps I may have the opportunity to express a view concerning at least one of the component parts of that particular board.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator will permit me—I have been very much interested in what he has said—I want to call his attention to the fact that if this bill should pass, it would be a violation of law for the newspapers of the country or any newspaper to print the crop reports of the country, which is intimately related to our military efficiency and the national defense; and the most illuminating speech made by the distinguished Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] yesterday, if carried in the public press, showing our utter lack of appropriate food supply, would come within the prohibitions of this law, because it would give comfort and encouragement to the enemies of our country, while at the same time the publication of such information might be vital to the people of our country.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I have purposely refrained, Mr. President, from a discussion of the legal aspects of this law; I mean by that, concerning its constitutionality. I take it that where there are so many constitutional lawyers as there are in this assemblage, it would ill become me to express any view concerning the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of this particular enactment; and I take it, too, that with so many distinguished lawyers, the view of any one will hardly be controlling with very many others. So I leave the question of constitutionality with those distinguished attorneys, learned in the law, who have presented it. I am speaking of fundamental principle of this Nation. I am talking of a policy, whether it be a policy of war or of peace. I am speaking of that which those of us who fought in the past, and fought against odds, have understood—those who have had the iron enter their soul in years and years of struggle, who know what power is that is held over a community or a State. I am speaking with a knowledge of that which I know, in protesting here against this inroad upon democracy and this excursion into autocracy. I am speaking here of policy concerning this law, rather than constitutionality; and I may stand, I repeat, upon the utterances of the President of the United States.

Buttressed by this law, the public officials of this land will be greater than the people, their creator. Buttressed by this law, inefficiency and incompetency may stalk unquestioned and undenied. Buttressed by this law, even dishonestly may skulk in the secrecy that it imposes. All these are fatal objections.

But there is another objection that is greater still, and that appeals to me with a force that would not permit me to remain silent during this debate. We have talked of democracy here since the 2d day of April. We have looked across the water at Russia, just emerging from centuries of oppression and centuries of despotism. We have seen Russia enter upon her new career, come at last into the light, and, entering upon her new career, we have seen this Russia tear from her Czar and her rulers the very insignia that we take up to-day and would put upon our people. We say to the world, we who lead in democracy, in this struggle for democracy we have just entered, "Democracy can not be trusted; when democracy enters a world war and a world crisis you must throttle democracy." That is the answer that we send across the seas to benighted Russia, looking here to us, looking to this beacon light that has been so eloquently described upon this floor.

Ah, yes! This Nation is the beacon light for the democracies of the world. It is the beacon on the summit of the mountain to which the eyes of all mankind may turn. It is the light of admonition to the rulers of men. It is the light of salvation to all the oppressed. Would you here take this beacon that is ours, and of which we boast, and would you dim or quench it when democracy, by war and crisis, comes to the test?

It is for the historic past, it is for the present that is ours and is glorious, it is for the fruition of the hopes that were the hopes of the fathers, and it is for that of which we boast as our inspiration and our aspiration that those of us who oppose this law ask you to eliminate from it the clauses that make the attack—insidious it may be, but the attack—from which, for generations, it will be difficult to recover, upon the very fundamentals of democracy.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to read the provision of the bill which is the subject of our immediate consideration:

Whoever, in time of war, in violation of reasonable regulations to be prescribed by the President, which he is hereby authorized to make and promulgate, shall publish any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken for or connected with, or intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or any other information relating to the public defense calculated to be useful to the enemy, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or by both such fine and imprisonment: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same.

I read this because I desire to have this exact provision appear as a part of my remarks. This provision concerns newspapers and other publications, such as magazines and the like.

I send now to the desk a collection of the letters and addresses of Thomas Jefferson and ask the Secretary to read the article headed "On the conduct of a newspaper," which is a letter of Thomas Jefferson to John Norvell.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

ON THE CONDUCT OF A NEWSPAPER.

WASHINGTON, June 11, 1807.

TO JOHN NORVELL:

To your request of my opinion of the manner in which a newspaper should be conducted so as to be most useful, I should answer, "By restraining it to true facts and sound principles only." Yet I fear such a paper would find few subscribers. It is a melancholy truth that a suppression of the press could not more completely deprive the Nation of its benefits than is done by its abandoned prostitution to falsehood. Nothing can now be believed which is seen in a newspaper. Truth itself becomes suspicious by being put into that polluted vehicle. The real extent of this state of misinformation is known only to those who are in situations to confront facts within their knowledge with the lies of the day. I really look with commiseration over the great body of my fellow citizens who, reading newspapers, live and die in the belief that they have known something of what has been passing in the world in their time; whereas the accounts they have read in newspapers are just as true a history of any other period of the world as of the present, except that the real names of the day are affixed to their fables. General facts may indeed be collected from them, such as that Europe is now at war, that Bonaparte has been a successful warrior, that he has subjected a great portion of Europe to his will, etc., but no details can be relied on. I will add that the man who never looks into a newspaper is better informed than he who reads them, inasmuch as he who knows nothing is nearer to truth than he whose mind is filled with falsehood and errors. He who reads nothing will still learn the great facts, and the details are all false.

Perhaps an editor might begin a reformation in some such way as this: Divide his paper into four chapters, heading the first, Truths; second, Probabilities; third, Possibilities; fourth, Lies. The first chapter would be very short, as it would contain little more than authentic papers and information from such sources as the editor would be willing to risk his own reputation for their truth. The second would contain what, from a mature consideration of all circumstances, his judgment should conclude to be probably true. This, however, should rather contain too little than too much. The third and fourth should be professedly for those readers who would rather have lies for their money than the blank paper they would occupy.

Such an editor, too, would have to set his face against the demoralizing practice of feeding the public mind habitually on slander and the depravity of taste which this nauseous aliment induces. Defamation is becoming a necessary of life; insomuch that a dish of tea in the morning or evening can not be digested without this stimulant. Even those who do not believe these abominations still read them with complaisance to their auditors, and instead of the abhorrence and indignation which should fill a virtuous mind betray a secret pleasure in the possibility that some may believe them, though they do not themselves. It seems to escape them that it is not he who prints but he who pays for printing a slander who is its real author. (Letters and Addresses of Thomas Jefferson, pp. 175 et seq.)

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am a great believer in Thomas Jefferson. He is the father of the Democratic Party. He has always ranked as the greatest of American Democrats and as one of the wisest and most philosophical advocates of popular government of all the world and of all history. I have always believed and still believe that estimate of him to be true. With great attention, pleasure, and especially with great advantage, I have read Jefferson's life and sayings. There are few things done or said by him in his public life I do not agree to. I have such a high respect for his opinion on all subjects that I am loath to disagree with anything he has said. But as to this letter to John Norvell I am disposed to think that Jefferson's indictment or criticism was somewhat too broad and general. I have no doubt that in his day and time there were, as in this day and time there are, editors and managers of newspapers and other publications whose thought, expressions, and general conduct and policy were on a plane so much above the general level of publishers as justly to exempt them from this criticism and indictment of one of the wisest, most just, and discriminating men who ever lived.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to me for a few moments on a matter which I consider to be urgent and important?

Mr. STONE. The Senator breaks in on me at a very inopportune time.

Mr. MARTIN. I thought the Senator would yield, but I withdraw the request.

Mr. STONE. The Senator's business can certainly wait a few minutes.

Mr. MARTIN. It can wait. I shall certainly not ask the Senator to yield.

Mr. STONE. But in the main I believe Jefferson was right in what he said about publishers of his day, and in that general sense and within the limitations and exceptions I have indicated, I believe his indictment would just as well apply to this day as to his own. However, I apprehend that Jefferson was so exasperated by things said about him and about the public men of that period and about the Government of that time with which he was connected that he may have spoken with some degree of well-justified resentment and even passion.

ABUSE OF WASHINGTON.

As an example of what was done by publishers at that time in this behalf, and as explaining Jefferson's attitude, let me lay before you a brief and imperfect résumé of the attacks made through these sources even upon George Washington, in whose Cabinet Thomas Jefferson served. Now I am going to quote from history as it is written in books which are everywhere regarded as authentic and reliable.

While Genet, of France—called Citizen Genet, as was the custom at the time of the French Revolution—was in the United States as a representative of the then so-called French Government, his activities and general conduct made him obnoxious to the Government at Washington. It is recorded that on one occasion Genet made some complaint to the Secretary of State in a manner most offensive—in a manner well described by the historian as being "in the language of a Jacobin orator." While Genet was waiting for a reply to his insolent communication, a public dinner was given him at Philadelphia by his American sympathizers. This demonstration was in substance an open revolt under foreign influence against President George Washington and his administration. Previous to that there had been angry demonstrations at Philadelphia and at other cities against the President. Bands of men had paraded the streets, damned Washington, and threatened to make the Government declare war on England in the interest of France. History records that at one time 10,000 men gathered in meetings and paraded the streets of Philadelphia, where the Government was then located, threatening to drag the President from the Executive residence, and to do other violent things. Adams, in alarm, had muskets carried into his house by a back way to defend it. At one of these anti-Washington feasts, given in honor of Genet, many toasts were proposed and numerous songs were sung. The last stanza of one of these songs I shall quote, and when that stanza was sung the historian recounts that "the whole company, with one accord, joined hands around the red cap"—which had been set on the table—"and shouted the last stanza till the ceiling rang." I quote as follows:

Rejoice, ye patriot sons,
With festive mirth and glee;
Let all join hands around
The cap of liberty,
And in full chorus join the song,
May France ne'er want a Washington.

All these proceedings were duly recorded under appropriate headlines in the press of that day, with varying editorial comments. The press practices of that day were very similar to those of the present.

Among the most influential editors of that day and time were Philip Freneau and Benjamin Franklin Bache, the latter being a grandson of the Benjamin Franklin who is deservedly commemorated as one of our great men. Their papers were very bitter against Washington. Among other things they said of him was that "He was fast debauching the country. He was seeking a crown. He was passing himself off as an honest man," and so forth. Now, the President was vilified in a poem written by Genet, and now attacked with varying vilifications in prose. McMaster, the historian, says that for a while Washington met this abuse with cold disdain. Driven at last, as he was more than once, into exasperation, he wrote to Henry Lee that—

The publications in Freneau's and Bache's papers are outrages on common decency, but I have a consolation within that no earthly effort can deprive me of, and that is that neither ambition nor interested motives have influenced my conduct. The arrows of malevolence, therefore, however barbed and well pointed, never can reach the most vulnerable part of me, though, while I am up as a mark, they will be continually aimed.

One of Washington's outbursts of resentment against the cruel attacks made upon him took place at a Cabinet meeting, and has been described by Thomas Jefferson. At this meeting Mr. Knox spoke of the libels on the President.

In a moment—

It is recorded—

the face of Washington put on an expression which it was seldom given his friends to see. He got into one of those passions when he can not command himself, ran on much on the personal abuse which had been bestowed on him, and defied any man on earth to produce one single act of his since he had been in the Government which had not been done on the purest motives. (McMaster, vol. 2, p. 111.)

On what was declared to be the authority of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, Washington was charged in terms as being a thief. I am almost ashamed to repeat this. This charge was based on a statement given out that Washington had fraudulently overdrawn and misused his official allowances. He was also charged with being a murderer. I am almost ashamed to repeat this. The proof of this charge was based on letters said to have been written by Washington and captured by certain British forces from his body servant. These alleged letters were proven to be forgeries, but Washington himself was so sensitive on the subject that he left a solemn statement among his papers to the effect that every one of the letters published was an absolute forgery.

These opposition newspapers, in exploiting the false charge that Washington had misused the public moneys to his personal advantage, sent broadcast such statements as that I now quote:

How can the people—

They said—

feel respect for the rulers who trample on the laws and Constitution of the land? What will posterity say of the man who has done this thing? Will it not be said that the mask of political hypocrisy has been worn by Cæsar, by Cromwell, and by Washington alike?

These things were going out in the newspapers of that day.

Let me quote something more that went abroad through the immaculate columns of the press. I quote this:

With the Constitution in one hand and the Word of God in the other, George Washington swore to defend a system of republican government that abhors the insidious machinery of royal imposture. Has he done so? What have been the fruits of this solemn oath? The seclusion of a monk and the supercilious distance of a tyrant. Old habits on a sudden have been thrown away. Time was when he, more than any other, indulged the manly walk and rode the generous steed. Now, to behold him on horseback or afoot is the subject of remark. The concealing carriage, drawn by supernumerary horses, expresses the will of the President and defines the loyal duty of the people. He receives visits; he returns none. Are these republican virtues? Do they command our esteem?—

And so forth.

That is enough. All this kind of stuff was intended to belittle Washington and lower the public esteem for him, and thus minimize, if not destroy, his influence with the people.

In this connection I quote from another historian, as follows:

The enemies of the administration perceived that the attempt to execute their plans would be vain unless they could first weaken Washington's influence by diminishing his popularity. The task was hard and repelling; and it may reasonably be presumed that a supposed political necessity, rather than cordial good will, led them to engage in so ungrateful a work. It was pursued with a perseverance, and sometimes with an acrimony, for which the best of causes could hardly afford an apology. (Life of Washington by Sparks, pp. 449–450.)

Sparks further says in this connection—that even the motives and character of Washington did not escape a full measure of the abuse which was poured out upon all who approved the acts of the administration. Regardless of truth and decorum, his detractors assailed him with a license and malignity which showed an utter despair of accomplishing their ends by honest means.

That sort of thing, as I have said, is familiar to the people of this day and generation. It is the old assassin's idea of getting rid of one who can not be used and who stands in the way by killing him or destroying him.

Mr. President, these attacks on Washington grew in violence and virulence up to the very end of his public life and even afterwards. Washington's Farewell Address was issued shortly before he left office and surrendered the Presidency to John Adams, who succeeded him. But this great parting message of Washington to the American people, which is now reverently read at public gatherings on Washington's Birthday, was assailed through the press with a malignancy which now excites both universal amazement and execration.

A historian summarizes the published attacks made on Washington at that time in this language:

Had it [the Farewell Address] been a second proclamation of neutrality or an open declaration of war against the French, it could not have provoked more angry or ill-timed replies. His character, said one—

Now, listen to this—"his character," Washington's character—

having been founded on false appearances, can only be respectable while it is not known. His temper is arbitrary. His disposition is avaricious. He has a great passion for being seen. Without any skill as a soldier, he has crept into fame by the places he has held and by the success of the cause he espoused. Nor will the schemes of finance he has favored add much to his renown. If it be a merit to have laid a tax that raised an insurrection, then he shares it with the British ministers who provoked the Revolutionary War. If it be a merit to have burdened the many to enrich the few, then he shares it with that infatuated monarch who brought about the present state of France. If it be a merit to have bound the American aristocracy to its Government by a large and everlasting debt, then he shares it with that British monarch who drove the Stuarts from their throne. History will yet tear the page devoted to his praise. It was France and his country that, in defiance of England, gave him fame, and it is France and his country that will, in defiance of England, take that fame away. Once his conduct had been guided by candor. Of late he had sadly departed from that wise course. He had refused to the representatives of the people the papers they had a right to see. From that moment the brightness of his countenance faded. The glory that once shone around him dissolved in mist. The enemies of liberty and his country claimed him as their own and the name of Washington sank from the high level of Solon and Lycurgus to the mean rank of a Dutch stadtholder or the insignificance of a Venetian doge. Posterity would look in vain for any marks of wisdom in his administration. They would, instead, behold a funding system, the worst of all diseases that ever inflict a state. They would see an excise arming freemen against their fellow men, and they would say the great champion of American liberty retained the barbarous usages of the feudal system by keeping men in livery, and 20 years after the founding of the Republic still owned 500 slaves.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, from whom was the Senator from Missouri quoting?

Mr. STONE. I am quoting from MacMaster's History of the United States.

It was this sort of evil, widespread and general, which I think may have possibly excited the passion of the great Jefferson to such an extent as to somewhat blur his usually extraordinarily clear and discriminating judgment. He was human, as we are. I indulge the apprehension that possibly he spoke with passion.

Mr. President, the evil of this sort of thing has increased rather than diminished in the long stretch of years between the days when Washington and Jefferson served the country and the days in which we live and serve. The only difference between that time and this is that the evil is more aggravated now than then.

FREEDOM OF SPEECH AND PRESS.

The Constitution guarantees freedom of speech and freedom of the press. That is one of the most important provisions of that great charter upon which is founded the integrity of our institutions and the liberties of our people. No man more than I is more ardently in favor of maintaining that provision in the Constitution; and I say this with full knowledge that this boon of freedom—freedom of the press—has been perverted into a license for doing evil. It is fair to assume that the men who threw this protection over and around the freedom of the press did not do so with the idea that newspapers and magazines would become the avenues of mendacity and libel against public officials or the Government of the country, but that they would deal with public men, public measures, and the Government with a patriotic regard for decency and right conduct.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. STONE. I would rather not yield for my time is running short.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri declines to yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I simply desire to say that at that very time when they were guaranteeing freedom of speech and of the press, they were receiving the most abuse, according to the Senator's citations.

Mr. STONE. The things that I have read happened after the Constitution was adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Were not the very men who made the Constitution complaining?

Mr. STONE. Some of them, but they abused George Washington; and this was after the Constitution had been adopted and Washington had been elected President.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There was no censorship at that time.

Mr. STONE. No. But I do not wish to be led off into that. We know that now, as in former days, both men and the Government are assailed and charges made against them calculated and intended, often without reason, to impair the usefulness of the public official and to weaken the public confidence in the integrity of the Government. Men are maligned and the Government is maligned on allegations without foundation in fact, and thus public opinion is poisoned and misled. This sort of thing is done deliberately. It may be later shown that the charges made are false and unfounded, but it is the rarest thing that any newspaper or magazine will retract, much less apologize. Deliberately the malignant poison of defamation is spread, and the authors of it are content to leave it there, and content to leave the victims to devise their own means of counteracting the evil effects. Nevertheless, I would have it understood that I would not change the Constitution in this respect. I recognize the great evil against which Thomas Jefferson and George Washington leveled their indictments, but I think it would be better that we should endure the ills we have than fly to those we know not of. It would be an exceedingly dangerous thing, as I see it, except in extraordinary circumstances, such as face us to-day, to restrain freedom of speech or freedom of the press.

However, we may reach a point in times of national peril when, for the protection of the public interests and to safeguard the national welfare, some restraint must be imposed upon what ordinarily we hold to be the freedom of speech and the freedom of the press. We have reached that point now. There is no more reason for saying that a restriction should be placed on the freedom of speech than on the freedom of the press. In fact, an unrestrained press in a time like this might well be regarded as more dangerous than unrestricted freedom of speech. We are at war with some of the most stupendous and puissant powers of the world. When, in the opinion of the Government, it would be unwise, hurtful, perhaps dangerous, to have the secret plans of the Government published to the world it should not be permitted. Recently I have read in the newspapers elaborate accounts of two things that it seemed to me, if true, the height of unwisdom to make public in the midst of war. One of these things is to the effect that it is the intention of this Government and the Government of Great Britain to cover the North Sea with submerged floating mines, in order to prevent German submarines from coming out into the open Atlantic; and the other is a statement to the effect that scientists employed by the Government had invented some machine or devised some method for successfully combating the submarine. I do not know whether these statements are true; but if true, they should not have been published to the world. The publication could do no good to this country or its allies, but it would put our enemy on guard. It would not only put our enemy on guard, but it would spur him to use all his power to find out the plans of this Government and better enable him to watch their development. These publications of themselves are sufficient to indicate the necessity of conferring upon the Government in the circumstances of this time the power to exercise some control over publications in newspapers and magazines with respect to matters of vital concern in the conduct of the war.

Mr. President, holding to this view I shall vote to retain the particular provision now in question as a very essential part of the bill we are considering. I believe this provision as reported from the committee should be enacted into law.

STAND BY THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. President, only a word more. CHAMP CLARK is reported to have said the other day that as the newspapers appear to have adopted "Stand by the President" as their pet particular slogan, he wondered why they did not themselves stand by the slogan. But, Mr. President, that question of the Speaker is answered by the trite old saying that it makes a difference whose ox is gored. Human nature is much the same all over the world and among all classes of people. Men are generally amused when they hear a squeal emitted from a man whose toes have been stepped upon, but it is a very different thing for one to feel the pressure of a heavy foot upon his own corns. Because this bill would subject publishers to the same general rules which they insist the public safety requires should be applied to all others, the publishers cry out in protest. They regard themselves as a favored class who should be exempt from the restrictions upon liberty imposed on all other people. They regard themselves as sacred white oxen, who should be permitted to roam at pleasure horning fences, trampling flowers, feeding in forbidden fields, and chewing their sacred cud around the very springs of life without fear of molestation. They alone are to be immune from all hampering restraint and from the burdens of war. Can it be possible that publishers claim the right, or that we would grant it if claimed, that they might print what a citizen could not speak?

Mr. President, newspapers and magazines represented the most powerful influence which operated to involve the United States in this European war. In a large sense—a very large sense—this is a war provoked and brought on, so far as the United States is concerned, by the newspapers. Now they not only object to any restraint upon their liberty of action enjoyed in normal times, but we are having protests against the features of the revenue bill which lays additional burdens of taxation on publishers. We now have before Congress a new war-tax measure intended to provide approximately $2,000,000,000 of additional revenue necessary to the prosecution of our part in the war. Practically every interest seeks a hearing before the Finance Committee, of which I have the honor to be a member, to protest in some form against the tax provided for with respect to that particular interest, and among these protestants are the publishers. I know full well that this revenue bill hits the publishers pretty hard, but it hits everybody else pretty hard. This is the old story of each class looking sharply after its own particular interests; it is mere expression of the old desire to have the tax burdens shifted onto other shoulders than one's own; but we had a right to expect that our great patriotic editors, who have done more perhaps, as I have said, than anybody else to persuade the country into war, would have been the last to complain against sharing to the fullest limit the burdens of the war which the President and the Congress felt it would be just to lay upon them in the distribution of various ills that a nation must bear while passing through the storm peril of war. Again, I call the attention of the publishers to their slogan, so often heralded through the land, "Stand by the President." Both this espionage bill and the revenue bill referred to are distinctively administrative measures. The passage of each of them is urged by the President. Do not forget that the rules for the government of the press espionage are to be prescribed by the President. My friend the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] said—I made a note of his comment, and will see if I can decipher it—that the subordinates of the President will prepare the censorship rules.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Subalterns.

Mr. STONE. Subalterns or subordinates would prepare the rules for the President, as if that made any difference. I say it makes no difference, for the reason that the President must sign and promulgate the rules, and it must be assumed that he will know what he is signing and promulgating. Is not that a fair inference? In the end, at least, whatever may be done, it will be the President's act; and I assume that whatever he does will be done intelligently.

The Senator from California also says that the President approves this legislation we are considering, including the very section I have read to the Senate. The President approves it, the Senator says—indorses it and asks the Senate to pass it. But then the distinguished Senator proceeded to read from a letter of the President to Mr. Brisbane and declared that that letter was the most forceful argument that had ever been made against the censorship. In other words, it is alleged that in the same letter the President strongly indorsed this very legislation and yet at the same time made the strongest argument ever made against it. I can not accept this view of the distinguished Senator.

Ah, gentlemen of the press, why do you not set your countrymen an inspiring example? May not even I assume to plead with you to do that great thing by yourselves standing up for the President, standing up in manly support of the slogan promulgated by you to your countrymen—"Stand by the President."

AMENDMENT OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN. As preliminary to a motion which I will submit, I send to the desk a letter written by the governor of the Federal Reserve Board——

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is not the pending question before the Senate the espionage bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair understands that it is.

Mr. MARTIN. Then, I ask the acting chairman of the committee in charge of that bill to yield to me merely to enter a motion, which I do not think will take many minutes of time. It is a matter of urgent importance, and I simply desire to enter the motion because the time in which the motion may be made will expire shortly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina can not do that except by unanimous consent. I shall object, and, besides. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that the matter the Senator from Virginia has in mind can not be disposed of without considerable debate.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator chooses to object, I can not help it.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I shall make a motion, but as preliminary to the motion I will read the letter.

Mr. HARDWICK. I rise to a question of order, namely, that the espionage bill being the pending proposition before the Senate, no motion relating to another matter is now in order.

Mr. MARTIN. I have the floor.

Mr. HARDWICK. I know that; but I am raising a question of order.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not think the Senator can take me off of the floor by such a point of order as he is making.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am making a point of order against the Senator's motion.

Mr. MARTIN. I have not yet made any motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will reserve the consideration of the point of order until the Senator from Virginia states the motion.

Mr. MARTIN. I will read a letter that was addressed by the governor of the Federal Reserve Board to the Hon. CARTER GLASS, of the House of Representatives, and handed to me a few moments ago by Mr. GLASS. It reads as follows:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Washington, May 10, 1917.

Hon. CARTER GLASS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GLASS: Since you were in my office this afternoon, Mr. Delano tells me that he just had a talk over the telephone with Gov. Strong, of the Federal reserve bank of New York, who calls attention to the possibility, if not strong probability, of the Government having to pay bankers a million dollars exchange charges in connection with subscriptions to the liberty loan, assuming that the Hardwick amendment, which the House has instructed its conferees to agree to, becomes a law.

This estimate is based upon the assumption that one-half of the total issue of bonds will be placed outside of New York. Subscribers are permitted to make payment by their checks upon local banks properly certified, and under authority given by Congress many of these banks would undoubtedly avail themselves of the opportunity to charge one-tenth of 1 per cent. Should this exchange charge apply to one-half of the subscriptions, the expense to the Government would be $1,000,000.

I would suggest therefore that you call the attention of Senator OWEN to this and suggest that he ask the Senate to reconsider the Hardwick amendment with a view of changing it so as to prevent it from applying to transactions connected with Government bonds. This, I think would give you the opportunity that you desire to handle the matter in conference.

Very truly, yours, W. P. G. HARDING,
Governor.

Mr. President, that letter has brought to the attention of the Senate a condition which seems to be entitled to serious consideration; and, in view of it, I move that the vote whereby the Senate passed House bill 3673 be reconsidered; and, in connection with that motion, I move that the House be requested to return House bill No. 3673 to the Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia enter that motion?

Mr. MARTIN. I do enter that motion, and I call attention to the fact that the last motion under the rules is required to be voted on first, voted on immediately, and without debate.

Mr. HARDWICK. I raise the point of order against the motion, first, that the motion is not in order, because the Senate has now before it, and has not displaced, another matter. The Senate can not act indiscriminately and at random, jumping about from one matter to another; it must get rid of the matter pending before it takes up something else. If the Senator wants the parliamentary authority, he will find it in the Manual.

I want to say, first, however, because the Senator from Virginia has discussed the merits of this matter and there will be no earthly objection in conference to putting in a provision—and the action of the House has authorized it—that this collection charge shall not apply to the loans of the Government. The House conferees intend—in fact, the conferees of both bodies, I think, intend—to attend to that matter, and nobody need be swept off his feet by the statement that any bank in this country wants to charge, or would be permitted to charge, any exchange in connection with any of these Government loans.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. REED. I think the Senator rose to make a point of order——

Mr. HARDWICK. But the Senator from Virginia argued the merits of the matter.

Mr. REED. Against a motion, and now he proceeds very clearly——

Mr. HARDWICK. I have the floor; the latitude of debate here is considerable, and it is a pretty stiff proposition for Senators on one side of this matter——

Mr. REED. I rise——

Mr. HARDWICK. I decline to yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. I do not ask the Senator to yield. I raise the point of order——

Mr. HARDWICK. I have the floor.

Mr. REED. I raise the point of order that the Senator is out of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. I submit that I am not.

Mr. REED. Very well. I make the point of order that the Senator is out of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, Mr. President, on that point I desire to be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say that the present occupant of the chair has only been in the chair for a moment, and is not able to decide the point of order now raised by the Senator from Missouri, but will have to leave it to the Senate whether the point of order can be made at this time. The present occupant of the chair has not heard what the Senator from Georgia said.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am perfectly willing to have the question submitted to the Senate. If a statement on one side of the merits of this question can be made, and then, when a statement is sought to be made on the other side, opportunity is denied, I want to see it done in the Senate, by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. REED. Nobody has asked to do that.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is exactly what the Senator from Missouri has done.

Mr. REED. It is not what the Senator from Missouri has been trying to do.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the effect of the Senator's action, then.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri sat in his seat and heard the Senator from Virginia base his motion on the proposition that certain things will be done with reference to Government loans, and then when I raise a point of order against the Senator's motion and undertake merely to reply to the statement by the Senator from Virginia the Senator from Missouri thinks that is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri insist on his point of order?

Mr. REED. I undoubtedly insist on the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will have to submit the point of order made by the Senator from Missouri to the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before it is submitted I desire to read from subdivision 2 of Rule XIII:

When a bill, resolution, report, amendment, order, or message, upon which a vote has been taken, shall have gone out of the possession of the Senate and been communicated to the House of Representatives, the motion to reconsider shall be accompanied by a motion to request the House to return the same; which last motion shall be acted upon immediately, and without debate, and if determined in the negative shall be a final disposition of the motion to reconsider.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, that is the motion that I made and which is submitted to the Senate, and on which I ask immediate action in accordance with that rule.

Mr. HARDWICK. The point of order made by the Senator from Missouri, I suppose, need not be passed on, unless the Senator from Missouri wants a vote on it. If so, I am willing to have it. The point of order I am making is this, that the Senate has before it as its unfinished business the pending espionage bill, and that as long as that bill is before it the motion of the Senator from Virginia is not in order.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Georgia also that the Senate has the bill before it under a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly.

Mr. THOMAS. Under which no other business can be transacted.

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly. Now, I insist that under the condition of the Senate's business, that motion is not now in order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the unanimous-consent agreement we are proceeding under? I should like to have it stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is endeavoring to ascertain just exactly what the agreement provides.

Mr. REED. I observe that it is on the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the unanimous-consent agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that after the adoption of this order speeches upon H. R. 291 during the present calendar day, and the calendar day of Friday, May 11, shall be limited to one hour each on the bill, the substitute, or amendments thereto, and no Senator shall speak more than once on the bill, or the substitute, or any amendments thereto.

It is further agreed that after the calendar day of Friday, May 11, unless the bill is otherwise disposed of, no Senator shall speak more than once, or more than 10 minutes upon the bill, the substitute, or any amendments thereto.

Mr. REED. Now, I inquire whether there is anything in that which prohibits the laying aside of that bill by the taking up of other business?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest that the unanimous-consent agreement does not bind the Senate to proceed to the consideration of this measure to its determination, to the exclusion of other business; and that, notwithstanding the unanimous-consent order, it is within the power of the Senate, upon a motion to proceed to the consideration of other business, to displace, temporarily or otherwise, the pending bill.

The unanimous-consent agreement, I repeat, does not bind the Senate to dispose of the espionage bill, the matter now under consideration, or to take a final vote upon it at any given time; and therefore it does not preclude the consideration of other business.

Mr. HARDWICK and Mr. THOMAS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will ask Senators to indulge the Chair until he can read carefully the unanimous-consent agreement. [A pause.] The Chair is able, he thinks, to answer the parliamentary inquiry of the Senator from Missouri, as he understands it, in regard to the unanimous-consent agreement. We will dispose of one thing at a time. The Chair sees no reason why it is not within the power of the Senate to displace the present bill at any time under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. HARDWICK. Before the Chair makes that as a ruling will the Chair hear a short argument against it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be very glad to do so.

Mr. HARDWICK. There is a very strong reason in fairness and in morals against it, because we agreed that the discussion should end at a certain time, and at that time debate should be forever foreclosed on this great measure. If we entered into this sort of an agreement, that the Senate was to debate this bill until Friday at 11 o'clock, and then proceed to vote, would it be good faith by a majority vote to lay aside the pending bill and cut off the opportunity for debate? That would violate the spirit, if not the letter, of the unanimous-consent agreement. Would it be right, if we agreed to debate this bill until a certain time, to lay it aside and take up the time of the Senate, as this proposition will, with other matters, instead of giving to the consideration of the espionage bill and to the debate on it the time that we all agreed should be given to it?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an inquiry?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senate should find that it was necessary to lay aside the bill and proceed with something else, why would it not be right to do so, the Senate not having bound itself to keep the espionage bill before it?

Mr. HARDWICK. Simply because an agreement as to debate was obtained on that basis, with that understanding.

Mr. ROBINSON. But, if the Senator will pardon me, that is the point I am making. The agreement does not preclude the Senate, if it desires to do so, from suspending debate and proceeding to the consideration of other matters.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator is right——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators must address the Chair.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, of course, I yielded to the Senator from Arkansas.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; the Chair was not calling especial attention to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. Just let me answer this question first. The Senator is absolutely wrong. If that is the fair view of it, and the Senate can lay it aside for 1 hour, it can lay it aside for 10 hours, and take up as many matters as other Senators think are important; and what, then, becomes of the spirit of your agreement that we will have until a certain time to debate this bill?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, does the Senator yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. I point out to the Senator again that the unanimous-consent agreement entered into does not fix any specific time for debate on this bill. It merely provides a very reasonable limitation on debate, that no Senator shall speak longer than an hour. That is practically the only effect of the agreement.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, that is arguing in a circle. This agreement says that we shall debate this bill until a certain time Saturday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; if the Senator will permit the Chair——

Mr. HARDWICK. I should like the Chair to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say that there is no time fixed when the debate on this bill shall conclude. There is only a limitation on the time allowed each Senator in debate, and a special provision is made in case the debate shall go on after to-day, in this wise——

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, let us see what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (reading)—

It is further agreed that after the calendar day of Friday, May 11, unless the bill is otherwise disposed of, no Senator shall speak more than once, or more than 10 minutes, upon the bill, the substitute, or any amendments thereto.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. There is no time fixed to vote at all.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia has the floor.

Mr. HARDWICK. The substantial rights of debate will be different after Friday, May 11, under this agreement. In other words, "it is further agreed that after the calendar day of Friday, May 11, unless the bill is otherwise disposed of, no Senator shall speak more than once, or more than 10 minutes, upon the bill, the substitute, or any amendments thereto." Now, I say that if the letter of this agreement sustains any such contention as Senators are making, certainly its spirit does not. We did not intend to lay aside this matter to inject another matter into it that may be the subject of sharp controversy. We did not intend to do anything but to devote this time—and that was the condition on which this consent was given—to the consideration of this measure; and after to-day Senators are sharply limited in their right to debate. Now, when they all agree to be so sharply limited in their rights after to-day, I submit to the Senate, is this good faith?

Mr. THOMAS and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must inquire, in justice to the Chair and to the Senate, just precisely what were the terms of the point of order made by the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HARDWICK. The point of order made by the Senator from Georgia was——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; the Senator from Missouri made the point of order. The Chair is inquiring now in order to get in touch with the exact parliamentary situation, in view of the fact, as Senators know, that the present occupant of the chair has been in the chair for only a short time.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think it is not necessary for me to insist upon my point of order. I was objecting to the Senator from Georgia discussing the merits of a matter, and the Senator from Georgia has desisted in discussing it, and I do not care to insist on the point of order further.

Mr. HARDWICK. "The Senator from Georgia" has stated as much as he wanted to about that, because it was absolutely necessary to state it in reply to a statement made by the Senator from Virginia; but we have passed away from that.

I simply wanted to say that one thing in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Virginia and to the letter that was read. Now, the point of order pending is that there is one matter already before the Senate, namely, the espionage bill, under a unanimous-consent agreement, and that the motion of the Senator from Virginia is not now in order.

Mr. THOMAS, Mr. REED, and Mr. SWANSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado has addressed the Chair many times. He will be recognized first.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall detain the Senate only a moment. If the construction which the Senator from Arkansas suggests should be given to this unanimous-consent agreement should prevail, it will destroy the spirit and the effect of the agreement. I should not have consented to it under any circumstances if I had supposed that it would permit the interjection of other business to the exclusion of the consideration of this business before the time arrived when speeches were limited to 5 minutes or to 10 minutes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. One moment, Mr. President. If it be true that under this agreement the Senate is at liberty to take up the measure suggested in the motion made by the Senator from Virginia, then it is equally true that when that has been disposed of, if it does not occupy the rest of the day—as it probably will—some other business may be interjected, and the right of Members of the Senate to speak for an hour at a time upon the espionage bill will be utterly destroyed through a construction that certainly does violate, as the Senator from Georgia says, the spirit of this agreement, and which precludes any further extended debate upon it, however anxious Senators may be to occupy the time.

Mr. HARDWICK and Mr. OVERMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield first to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. I just want to get this in, if the Senator will pardon me. I also have other objections and make other points of order to the motion of the Senator from Virginia. I make the point that there is nothing before the Senate, no bill or papers, to which the motion of the Senator from Virginia can apply. If the Senator will pardon me, I want to say this so that the Chair will not rule on the question without understanding that there are some other things—will the Senator yield further?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I yield, provided I do not lose the floor.

Mr. HARDWICK. There are some other things involved in it besides the point of order about the consideration of the espionage bill. The Senate amended a certain bill from the House in certain particulars, and asked for a conference with the House. The House granted the conference, retaining the papers, which are now in the possession of the House conferees. They are in the possession of neither House of Congress. They are in the possession of the conferees—that is to say, the conferees of the House of Representatives, as agents of that body, and as members of a body representing both Houses. Now, I submit also that any motion respecting a bill that is not before the Senate in any form, that is not even before the House of Representatives, is not now in order; and I submit that the only way in which the Senate can again act on this bill is when the Senate conferees, the agents of the Senate, report to this body, and in that way bring up to the Senate again the entire question connected with this bill, or possibly by concurrent resolution to which the House agrees.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I now yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say that we are now acting upon a bill which, by the order of the Senate, is the unfinished business.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Now, can the unfinished business be laid aside except by unanimous consent? I consented, but the Senator from Georgia objected. The question, then, is, It having been made the unfinished business, and a unanimous-consent agreement having been made in regard to it, can the unfinished business be laid aside except by unanimous consent? It has invariably been held by the Senate and by the Presiding Officer that it can not be laid aside. It can be laid aside by a motion agreed to by the Senate, but not unless some other bill is taken up in its place.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I realize the great importance of the motion made by the Senator from Virginia. I think we ought to proceed with it as soon as it is possible. I do not want to be understood as objecting, except upon the sole ground that the spirit of this unanimous-consent agreement is not only violated but destroyed if we are going to set it aside for the consideration of other business prior to the time when debate not to exceed one hour by each Senator can be made, and of course that time would expire with the present calendar day.

I hope therefore that, independently of the question whether the unanimous-consent agreement does or does not permit the taking up of other business, it will not be done so long as any Senator wants to address the Senate upon the merits of the pending measure.

Mr. REED and Mr. SWANSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this is not an ordinary unanimous-consent agreement which we have here. It is not an agreement to vote at any time. It is not an agreement to close debate at any time. If Senators will glance at this unanimous-consent agreement, they will see that all that is agreed to in the world is that after to-day they shall not be permitted to talk more than one hour each.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I simply wanted to ask, for my own information and that of one or two colleagues about me, whether or not the Chair has actually submitted the point of order to the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; the Chair has had a parliamentary inquiry addressed to him, which he endeavored to answer, and which he was hearing Senators discuss; but the Chair is entirely willing and ready to decide the question, with due courtesy.

Mr. REED. I shall be very brief.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not want to interfere with the Senator at all.

Mr. REED. I simply want Senators to read this unanimous-consent agreement. We do not agree to vote at any time. We simply agree that after the 11th day of this month, which has now arrived, Senators shall be limited to one hour each in speaking on this bill. Now, the bill is the unfinished business merely because a Senator rose in his place and moved to proceed to the consideration of H. R. 291. That bill can be immediately displaced by a motion to take up any other matter.

If we were proceeding under a unanimous-consent agreement which provided that a bill should be held before the Senate and considered and that a vote should be taken at a certain time, that would be quite a different question; but under a unanimous-consent agreement which provides that a bill shall be voted upon at a given hour of a given day it has been the custom continually in this body to take up any other matter and consider any other matter, at the will of the Senate, unless the unanimous-consent agreement contains the words "shall remain the business of the Senate."

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I do, for a question; yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. When the Senator realizes that after the calendar day of to-day has expired, the rights of Senators have all been materially abridged by this unanimous-consent order, and that they will be different from what they are under the general rules of the Senate, and different from what they would have been but for this unanimous-consent agreement, does he think it is fair, on this last day, to inject in here another matter that will take a great deal of the time that is left?

Mr. REED. The hour rule is already on the Senators, is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is entirely ready to rule on these various matters.

Mr. REED. I ask, Is not the hour rule already on the Senators, and has it not been since yesterday?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understands.

Mr. REED. Yes. Then what limitation is put upon a Senator, except that he does not get to speak at a particular time?

Mr. HARDWICK. Here is the limitation:

> It is further agreed that after the calendar day of Friday, May 11, unless the bill is otherwise disposed of, no Senator shall speak more than once, or more than 10 minutes.

So it seems that there is another very sharp restriction after the day is over.

Mr. REED. Yes; after to-day.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I should like to make a suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SWANSON. Just a minute. As I understand, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] has submitted a motion to the Senate. Now, that is a privileged motion. It must be made within two days. The rule specifically states that it is privileged.

Now, if it is privileged, then the question comes up whether you shall consider it now or consider it later; but as I understand the rule, it has been so decided in the precedents that within that two days, as a privileged matter, a motion to reconsider is in order. Now, that motion having been made and accepted and received——

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SWANSON. I will.

Mr. HARDWICK. Can that motion be made by a Senator who is on the side that lost?

Mr. SWANSON. The rule says that it must be made by a Senator who voted on the prevailing side.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from Virginia, I think, voted against this proposition.

Mr. MARTIN. There was no record vote on it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. The point of order is that the point of order raised is not debatable, and that the Chair ought to rule on it and have it disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order made by the Senator from North Dakota. The motion under consideration is not debatable. The condition of matters, so far as the Chair is called upon to decide, is this——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, just one word. I assume that that refers simply to recalling the bill from the House?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does.

Mr. GALLINGER. The motion to reconsider, of course, is debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was the intention of the Chair so to rule.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am perfectly willing for the Chair to rule on the proposition as to whether or not this is in order under the unanimous-consent agreement. I do not want to discuss that any further, but I have some observations that I want to submit and some arguments that I want to make to the Senate itself on the proposition as to whether the motion can be made at all, in the existing parliamentary status.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I shall object to anybody arguing unless I am given the same privilege. I do not intend to be excluded from the privilege of making an argument if others are allowed to do so.

Mr. MARTIN. All this debate is out of order, and I ask the Chair to enforce the rule, and rule on this point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is necessary to enforce the rule, although the Chair has been endeavoring to show every courtesy to Senators.

A parliamentary inquiry was made as to whether, under the unanimous-consent agreement, such a motion could be considered. The Chair rules that it is not contrary to the unanimous-consent agreement that such a motion should be considered. That is an answer to the parliamentary inquiry.

In regard to the point of order made against the motion of the Senator from Virginia by the Senator from Georgia, the Chair——

Mr. HARDWICK. That is debatable, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order, and the Chair desires to state this: The Chair deems it to be the duty of the Chair to see that the business of the Senate progresses, and it is the chief duty of the Chair to see that the business of the Senate is not unnecessarily delayed. The Chair, as the Members of the Senate understand, has no pride of opinion, and would be glad to submit to any appeal from the decision of the Chair at any time.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, on the point of order that this motion is in order under the parliamentary status, I am going to appeal from the ruling of the Chair; and on that appeal I am entitled to be heard, and want to be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not think the Senator from Georgia is entitled to be heard on the question when the main motion is to ask for the return of a bill, which is not debatable.

Mr. MARTIN. The rule says that distinctly.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Chair cite me to the authority for that? I did not catch the citation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the rule of the Senate is clear that a motion to request the return of a bill, such as that made by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], is not debatable, and that debate can not be raised on that motion by any side issue or appeal or point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Chair did not let me argue that at all. I do not think the Chair even understands the point I have made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks he does.

Mr. MARTIN. It is not debatable.

Mr. HARDWICK. Possibly I am in error. Pardon me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. However that may be, in the interest of the dispatch of business the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HARDWICK. And from that ruling "the Senator from Georgia" appeals.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the question before the Senate is——

Mr. HARDWICK. On that question, Mr. President, I demand the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? On that the Senator from Georgia requests the yeas and nays. Is there a second? Evidently a sufficient number have seconded the call for the yeas and nays. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. SAULSBURY's name was called). I decline to vote on this matter.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I wish to inquire whether the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not voted.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have a general pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], with whom I am paired, is not present. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. GERRY. I should like to ask if the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not voted.

Mr. GERRY. I am paired with the Senator and will withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (after having voted in the affirmative). I forgot to announce my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and its transfer to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES]. I will let my vote stand.

Mr. GERRY. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—30.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate decides that the decision of the Chair does not stand. The point of order made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is sustained by the Senate, that the motion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] is out of order.

Mr. REED. Was the point of order that the motion itself was out of order and could not be made or was it that it could not be considered. Because if the Senate has decided that a motion to recall a bill from the House of Representatives can not even be filed and made of record, then the Senate has absolutely put it out of its own power to ever preserve any right with reference to a bill that has once left it, if we happen to be proceeding under a unanimous-consent agreement. If that is laid down as a rule in the Senate, there will be no more unanimous-consent agreements, because we can not afford to tie our hands in that way. If the ruling is merely to the extent that a motion can be filed and not now considered, of course a different proposition is presented.

I know there is a good deal of feeling about this particular bill. This particular bill may be very dear to the hearts of some of our Senators; but it ought not to be dear enough to the heart of anybody so that he wants to establish a rule here that will prohibit the Senate from taking proper action to recall bills which may have passed temporarily from the hands of the Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. REED. I am through.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I just want to suggest my own judgment is that had the Senate voted otherwise it would have violated the spirit of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. REED. Do you object to the motion being filed?

Mr. HARDWICK. I object to its being filed, because I contend that it is out of order now, and will be whenever made, unless the present parliamentary status changes and until it does change.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas will state his point of order.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to make the point of order that the question raised by the Senator from Georgia was that the point of order on the motion to recall the bill is debatable.

Mr. HARDWICK. No.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas is mistaken. The point of order was that the motion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] was not in order.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Chair ruled that the point of order was not debatable inasmuch as the motion itself was not debatable, and we voted on an appeal from that ruling. I ask that the reporter's notes be read.

Mr. HARDWICK. On the contrary, I made the point of order that the motion of the Senator from Virginia was not in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire. I yield the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have taken very little part in the discussion of the rules of late, but I do not like to see them violated ruthlessly. This bill is before a conference committee. A simple resolution of the Senate can not recall the bill. It will require a concurrent resolution to get it out of the hands of the conference committee. So the motion would be futile if it should be carried.

I wish further to suggest, with all deference to my good friend the Senator from Virginia, whom I rarely ever feel like antagonizing, that he voted in the negative on this question, and he has not any right to move a reconsideration. Even if his motion was made in good faith, a point of order against it would lie, because the rule specifically says that a motion to reconsider can only be made by a Senator voting in the majority.

Mr. MARTIN. If the Senator knows that I voted that way, he knows more than I do. I voted on the amendment, but on the passage of the bill there was no roll call, and my impression is that I did not vote at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understood that the Senator wanted to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted.

Mr. MARTIN. I have made no such motion. I have moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr, GALLINGER. I did not understand the Senator, then; so I withdraw the suggestion I made. There was no record as to the vote on the passage of the bill, but I distinctly understood the Senator to refer, and the letter he read had reference to, the amendment made on motion of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. MARTIN. That was the ultimate object in view, but my motion was to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and I am sure I did not vote at all on that question.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply rest my suggestion on the fact that the bill is in the hands of the committee of conference and can not be recalled by a simple resolution of the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN. If the Senate will excuse me, after a little consideration on his part he will hardly entertain that view. The committee is but the hand of the House, and the House controls the bill that is in the hands of the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. It does not control the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN. When the Senate makes a communication to the House the House will control their conferees; and surely when the bill is in the hands of the conference Congress in both branches can control the conferees.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am more interested in the question whether we are establishing a bad precedent now than I am in the main question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Missouri will pardon the Chair for a moment, the Chair wishes to inquire whether the Chair, under the instruction of the Senate, shall keep the list of Senators and the time consumed on this matter, because the Chair is very desirous that the Senate shall have its own view with regard to the unanimous-consent agreement and with regard to the construction of the rule, but does not think it is fair without notice to do that.

Mr. BORAH. We are undoubtedly proceeding under the unanimous-consent agreement whatever we may discuss, and the Chair ought to keep the time of Senators on this matter.

Mr. REED. I propose to count the remarks the Senator just made as a speech, cutting him out of any further right to speak.

Mr. BORAH. That is perfectly safe, for I have already spoken.

Mr. REED. I ought to have known the Senator had thought of that.

I do not care anything about the question just raised, as far as I am concerned. The rule of the Senate provides that—

> When a bill, resolution, report, amendment, order, or message, upon which a vote has been taken, shall have gone out of the possession of the Senate and been communicated to the House of Representatives, the motion to reconsider shall be accompanied by a motion to request the House to return the same, which last motion shall be acted upon immediately, and without debate, and if determined in the negative shall be a final disposition of the motion to reconsider.

Mr. President, this bill was passed and did go to the House of Representatives, and a motion to reconsider must be filed within two days.

I only want to state this case and then I am through with it. The motion now was made or attempted to be made to recall the bill. That motion is a privileged motion. If the rule is established that a unanimous consent having been given to debate a bill under certain rules and limitations, which is the unanimous consent we are proceeding under, no motion of any kind can be even filed with the Senate, no privileged motion can be filed with the Senate, then every time we enter into a unanimous-consent agreement we cut off the right of the Senate to recall any bill that has passed from its possession. We cut off the right to move to reconsider any bill, however important, or whatever the emergency may be. I understand the Senate has absolutely voted here to overrule a ruling of the Chair that the right to recall a bill may be preserved, and the right to make a motion to reconsider may be preserved. Both of those rights have been cut off by the ruling of the Senate, and hereafter we are to understand, if this precedent is to be allowed to remain, that whenever we enter into a unanimous consent either to vote upon a bill at a given time or to debate a bill in a certain way we have destroyed the right of the Senate to even have a motion entered to reconsider any matter that has once passed the Senate.

Now, that is not good parliamentary law, in my judgment. It is fraught with a great deal of evil for us in the future. It illustrates the evil that has been growing here in the Senate of voting upon points of order not with reference to the merits of the point of order, but with reference to the desire of the Senator as applied to the particular subject matter the point of order happens to relate to at that time. I think if the Senate proceeds much longer in that way we might as well wipe out our rules altogether, because if a rule is to give way every time the desire of a Senator finds itself interfered with by the rule, if we are to vote not upon a correct construction of the rule but upon our judgment with reference to some subject matter that the point of order may relate to, we wipe out our rules and we have nothing left. It is really a pity that we are doing this. The Senate boasts that it is the greatest deliberative body on earth, and yet if any man will take the trouble to compare the rulings of the Senate upon points of order for the past year I think he will be astonished at the number of times the Senate has reversed itself.

Mr. BORAH. May I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I voted to sustain the point of order with the understanding that I was voting to sustain the unanimous-consent agreement. I want to call the Senator's attention to a statement which was made by the Senator who has charge of the bill at the time when we were discussing the unanimous-consent agreement:

> Mr. OVERMAN. I will say to the Senator that I will keep this bill before the Senate.
> Mr. CUMMINS. For both discussion and action?
> Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.
> Mr. CUMMINS. I have faith enough in the Senator from North Carolina to accept his statement.

I do not see how we can displace this unanimous-consent agreement with that understanding before us.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator go to the extent of saying that even if that had been written in the unanimous-consent agreement a motion can not be filed?

Mr. BORAH. No; I am not discussing that. That is not what I voted on.

Mr. REED. That is the point I am discussing, that a motion can be filed, so that when the unanimous-consent debate is over a motion having been filed within time provided by the rule of the Senate it can be taken up for consideration.

Mr. BORAH. I did not understand that I was voting against filing it. I understood that I was voting against considering it, and I understand that that is what the Senate understood it was doing.

Mr. REED. I suggest now that that matter might be raised by the Senator from Virginia simply asking the privilege of filing the motion. If the Senator who desires to make a motion to reconsider will ask the privilege of filing that motion, then the Senate can rule on that question merely.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think there is any objection to lodging a motion to reconsider; that is a privileged motion; but you can not proceed to its consideration except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SWANSON. It has been decided repeatedly that a motion to reconsider is a privileged motion. It was decided as early as February 3, 1850, that a motion to reconsider may be entered as a privileged motion, like a motion to adjourn, recess, or anything else, but its consideration must be determined by a vote of the Senate. Now, it seems to me it is clear——

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me say if I may——

Mr. SWANSON. Wait until I get through.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator from Virginia will yield now, we can agree on it, allowing the motion to be entered.

Mr. SWANSON. First, the Senator from Virginia entered his motion, and the Senator from Georgia made a point of order against its being filed. The second step would be to move to proceed to its consideration.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think we can agree on it now.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think we can get unanimous consent to have the motion entered. The motion is not in order, but I am willing to have it filed so that the parliamentary question involved can be settled hereafter.

Mr. MARTIN. Let my motion to reconsider be entered. Let it be accompanied by a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed. I accompanied it by such a motion, and the Senator from Georgia made a point of order that it was not in order at all.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am willing that the motion shall be made, with the understanding that it is not to be disposed of.

Mr. OVERMAN. All right.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the matter before the Senate at present?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter before the Senate is the unfinished business.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. SWANSON. I will speak to that.

Mr. President, there is no doubt that a motion to reconsider is privileged; that is conceded. The rule requires a motion to return the papers. It says that the latter motion, which is the motion to return the papers, shall be voted on immediately.

It seems to me it is clear that a motion to reconsider, which is privileged, can be entered. The question of consideration would not come up, because the rule provides that the latter motion, which is for a return of the papers to accompany a motion to reconsider, shall be voted on immediately. There is no doubt that a motion to reconsider is a privileged motion. If the contention made by the Senator from Georgia is right, you can not move to reconsider; you can not do anything except debate the bill under the unanimous consent until it is disposed of. A motion to reconsider is privileged like the others named and can be filed, but the question of consideration could be raised against it except when accompanied with a motion for a return of the papers; and the rule says the latter motion shall be voted on immediately.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I am going to make a brief statement about this matter and then I am not going to say any more about it for the present. I want the Senate to understand exactly the situation and I will give my opinion about some of these things.

The Senate voted for an amendment relating to the exchange on bank checks. I believe that the gentlemen who thought they would be conferees believed it would be lost in conference, but instead of that happening our friends in the House of Representatives took it up and agreed on that one proposition to instruct the House conferees. They decided upon this by a vote. The Senator in charge of the bill let it go to the House of Representatives with my amendment. Now the gentlemen who are making this move are trying their best to get the Senate to strike out the provision. That is the bottom of all this business. That is what it means.

I do not think you can do it in that way. They did not make the motion to reconsider the bill when it was before the Senate. I do not see how that they can make any motion relating to the bill when the Senate has not control of the bill. The bill was in the custody of the other House until they agreed to send it to the conference the Senate had requested. By agreement between the two Houses the bill is now in the custody of the conferees representing both Houses. I think the Senator from New Hampshire is correct in that it will take a concurrent resolution of the two Houses to get the bill out of the position it is in.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand that the House agreed to the conference and carried the papers into conference.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is true, but——

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will let me finish my question, the conferees of the House are the agents of the House. The House can discharge them and can compel them to bring the papers back and do what they please with their own servants. If this resolution should go over there, and the House desires, they can tell their conferees to bring the papers back to the House, and the House can send them back to the Senate.

Mr. HARDWICK. I understand all that, if that is all the Senator wants to say.

I think I will finish making my statement. I do not believe the Senate will agree to this proceeding. We can not afford to act hastily about this matter. We knew what we were doing when we passed the amendment. Nothing has happened to change my views about it. The House instructed its conferees to agree to this amendment The trouble is there is an amendment substantially agreed to by both Houses, and the gentlemen who are conferees do not want it, and they are trying to get rid of it; hence all this row.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from Georgia may be correct, but by appealing to the House he would deprive a Senator of the right to move a reconsideration and have the bill considered again.

Mr. HARDWICK. You did not move for reconsideration, because you thought you would lose it in conference. I know that is true.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator from Virginia has moved a reconsideration, and yet by reason of the point of order which the Senator has made it can not be considered within the two days that are given by the rule. Are you going to abolish that rule? The Senator says undoubtedly it shall be submitted.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me ask the Senator a question. Can we reconsider a bill that is not before the Senate?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; you can. I will read the rule.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, you must move to get it from the possession of those who have custody of it. If the House of Representatives has custody of it, you might get it from them, if they will agree to it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Here is the rule, Rule XIII:

1. When a question has been decided by the Senate, any Senator voting with the prevailing side may, on the same day or on either of the next two days of actual session thereafter, move a reconsideration; and if the Senate shall refuse to reconsider, or upon reconsideration shall affirm its first decision, no further motion to reconsider shall be in order unless by unanimous consent. Every motion to reconsider shall be decided by a majority vote, and may be laid on the table without affecting the question in reference to which the same is made, which shall be a final disposition of the motion.

Second paragraph:

2. When a bill, resolution, report, amendment, order, or message, upon which a vote has been taken, shall have gone out of the possession of the Senate and been communicated to the House of Representatives—

It does not say whether it has been acted upon by the House conferees or even by the House itself if it shall have been sent to the House of Representatives—

the motion to reconsider shall be accompanied by a motion to request the House to return the same; which last motion shall be acted upon immediately and without debate, and if determined in the negative shall be a final disposition of the motion to reconsider.

If the vote had been taken by the Senate on the question as to whether or not this paper should be returned or the bill should be returned and it was voted down, of course that would be a final disposition of it; but the Senator's point of order was made; upon the ruling of the Chair the point of order was not well taken; and then an appeal from the decision of the Chair was taken and the vote of the Senate sustained the appeal. It seems to me if we are going to obey the rules of the Senate, this being a privileged motion, we are entitled to vote upon the question as to whether the papers shall be returned to the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I will be very brief. I simply want to express this opinion: The point made by the Senator from Colorado, in my opinion, is not well taken, for this reason: The Senator thinks the House of Representatives can control its own conferees on the conference committee. It can not do so. The bill is in conference. If the bill was in the House of Representatives what the Senator says might be true. The bill is in the conference committee, which is the creation of both the Senate and the House together. If the Senate passes a concurrent resolution and the House concurs in it, that, of course, would take the bill out of conference, but nothing less than a concurrent resolution of both branches or the action of the conference committee itself in voluntarily reporting it could get the bill back to the Senate.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let me ask the Senator a question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Just wait a moment. The House can not pass a resolution instructing the House conferees to grab the bill and take it away from the conference committee, ignoring the Senate conferees, and send it back to the Senate; and the Senate can not pass a resolution instructing its conferees to grab the bill away from the House conferees and report it to the Senate. The only way the bill can get out is by the conference committee reporting it or else the adoption of a concurrent resolution of both Houses instructing them to bring it out.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator from Connecticut permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will.

Mr. SWANSON. It has been decided repeatedly that the conferees hold the original papers simply for consideration; the papers can not be passed to the conferees. The conferees are the mere agents of the House.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will yield to the Senator from Virginia for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. SWANSON. I am asking the Senator his view of the matter. The conferees have not the original papers; they belong to the House which had the original papers last in their possession.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Oh, no.

Mr. SWANSON. The papers can not be passed to the conferees.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator asks me that question, I will say that I think his position is entirely wrong about the matter. The question of who has possession of the papers for the purpose of making a conference report and to which House they shall first go is not under discussion here at all. That is not the question about which we are talking.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from Connecticut makes a mistake. It has been decided repeatedly——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not yield to the Senator for the purpose of laying down the law. If he wants to ask a question, I will yield.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator may understand the law better than I understand it, but it has been decided repeatedly that the conferees are the agents of the respective Houses by whom they are appointed. If they come in with the original papers, they may be compelled to carry them back to the House which is entitled to them.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator has merely stated over again what he said before, to which I disagree. I do not care, however, to reply to that. That is all I have to say, Mr. President.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the defect in the argument of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], in my judgment, is that he does not observe the language of the rule. The rule reads:

When a bill, resolution, report, amendment, order, or message upon which a vote has been taken shall have gone out of the possession of the Senate and been communicated to the House of Representatives—

There is no limitation as to how far the House shall have gone in the matter. There is no statement here that if it is referred to a conference committee that that is the end of it. There is no limitation of that kind, but the rule continues:

the motion to reconsider shall be accompanied by a motion to request the House to return the same.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, we now have the espionage bill before us under a unanimous-consent agreement that a Senator can speak but once, and I make the point of order.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me that the rule is being violated if we do not give consideration to the motion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

PUNISHMENT OF ESPIONAGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 291) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. HARDWICK. Regular order!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not know what the question is.

Mr. OVERMAN. The question is on what is known as the Cummins amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], which is found on page 37.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, before the amendment is voted upon I wish to submit some observations.

Mr. NELSON. I wish the Senator would ask to have the entire paragraph stated before he speaks.

Mr. CUMMINS. I intended to do that, of course, in my speech, which will be very brief. I feel that I ought to say a single word upon this subject before the vote is taken, inasmuch as the present situation is rather a peculiar and extraordinary one.

When this subject was before the Senate a few days ago, while we were considering the Senate bill, I submitted certain observations to the Senate with regard to it, both from the standpoint of its constitutionality and the standpoint of its policy. I then said, and I now repeat, that the subsection was perilously near, if not entirely in, collision with the Constitution, and that I did not believe that the time had come, even though we had the power to do it, that a censorship of the press should be established. I am of the same opinion still.

I would much rather that there should be in this bill no provision with regard to the regulation of the press or of speech; but it will be remembered that during the debate upon the Senate bill the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] offered an amendment proposing to strike out the subsection. Thereupon, upon a vote, the Senate refused to strike it out. I offered at that time an amendment, substantially the one that is now before the Senate as offered by the Senator from Colorado. I offered the amendment because I believed that it mitigated the severity of the proposal as it came from the committee; I offered it because it limited the scope of the Executive power with regard to the publication of information.

The committee proposal not only permitted the Executive to make rules and regulations for the suppression of information regarding the movements of the Army and the Navy and all our military forces, but it authorized the President to make rules and regulations with regard to everything which pertained to or was related to the national defense. I hoped by my amendment to eliminate that broad, vague field that was covered by the phrase "national defense," and to limit the power of the President to matters which concerned the movement, the disposition, and the operation of our military forces. I have not changed in the least degree the views that I expressed upon a former occasion.

I am not satisfied that any legislation is necessary upon the subject, but I earnestly hope, if we are to legislate upon it, if we are to establish rules and regulations which will control the publication of information in this country, that the authority may be restricted to the limits that I have provided in the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Colorado, but which, as he said yesterday, is the amendment which I proposed, and of which I gave notice after the change in the order of procedure was had.

With regard to the matter suggested by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], this amendment does not affect the proviso which came into the bill, as I remember it, upon the suggestion or motion of the Senator from Massachusetts; that is to say, that the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Colorado, and which I earnestly hope will be adopted—because whatever may be the fate of subsection (c), it would seem to me that everyone who has taken a considerate view of the subject must believe that the amendment which bears my name is wiser; that is, if we believe in a narrow limitation of the power of the President—is wiser than the provision as it now is, or as it was reported by the committee.

I referred a moment ago to this proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same.

If the amendment now before the Senate is adopted, this proviso remains in the bill. The amendment does not propose to eliminate it. Referring to the print of the House bill, the amendment begins with the word "and," in line 5, page 37, and ends at the word "imprisonment," in line 18, page 37. Therefore I hope that when we come to vote upon the amendment it will be understood by all Senators that the limited operation of the amendment, if it be adopted, is still qualified or modified by the proviso which I have just read, namely:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same.

Without regard to what may be done finally with the subsection, whether it is entirely eliminated or further modified, it seems to me that those who believe in the freedom of speech and the freedom of the press ought to favor the amendment which has been proposed, because in it the President's authority is limited to military matters and is not extended to every phase of national life which is embraced within the term "public defense" or "national defense."

Mr. WALSH. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Iowa whether it has been agreed that there shall be eliminated the last proviso in the amendment tendered by him, as adopted by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], as follows:

Provided, however, That no such rule or regulation shall apply to the proceedings of the Congress of the United States nor to the debates therein.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know. I do not feel that I have any control over the amendment at all, inasmuch as it has been offered by the Senator from Colorado; but, personally, I care nothing about that proviso. It was inserted originally because in the amendment when first offered there was an explicit provision that nothing should be done that would abridge the freedom of speech or of the press. I do not regard the last proviso as essential to the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I think the proviso ought to come out of the amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator who presented the amendment told me he was going to strike it out.

Mr. WALSH. So that we may have action on it, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the proviso.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). The Senator from Montana moves to amend the amendment by striking out the proviso which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 of the amendment offered by Mr. THOMAS, it is proposed to strike out the last proviso, reading as follows:

Provided, however, That no such rule or regulation shall apply to the proceedings of the Congress of the United States nor to the debate therein.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I need not say that I make this motion, because I can not conceive that any regulation should apply to the proceedings of Congress, and I should not like to have it suggested by the amendment that anyone thought any regulation might so apply.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I have another inquiry to address to the Senator from Iowa. The original draft of this amendment as it was tendered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] read, in line 6 thereof:

The disposition of any of the armed forces of the United States or the plans of naval or military operations—

And so on. As tendered by the Senator from Colorado the words "or the plans of" were stricken out and the word "in" substituted therefor. My information about the matter was that that change was made upon the suggestion of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], who indicated that if that change were made the amendment would meet his approval. Can the Senator from Iowa advise me as to that?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Montana has been misinformed. Before the Senator from Colorado offered the amendment I submitted it to the Senator from California, and he very emphatically and promptly said that the amendment did not meet his approval as compared with the entire elimination of the subsection, but that the amendment would be improved if the words "or the plans of" were stricken out and the word "in" substituted. He did not indicate, however, to me at least, in any way whatever that the amendment would then command his approval.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I simply desire to say that if the amendment were to be adopted without further discussion and without a roll call upon it, I should be quite willing to allow it to stand as it is; but I take it from the very able address of the Senator from California this morning that that will not be done. I accordingly move, Mr. President, to strike out the words in line 6 and to restore the language of the amendment as it was originally proposed by the Senator from Iowa, substituting the words "or the plans of."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana moves an amendment to the amendment tendered by the Senator from Colorado, which the Secretary will state.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the word "in" heretofore inserted in line 6 of the amendment of Mr. THOMAS and to restore the former language of the amendment, the words "or the plans of."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana will not prevail. It is quite true that the words he seeks to reincorporate in the amendment are the words that were originally there, but it is manifest and more apparent to me upon reflection than when I framed the amendment that the word "plans" is too comprehensive. It embraces things not military in their character; and I thought that the objection which the Senator from California made to the word was well founded and that the amendment would cover everything that was intended to be embraced in it if the word "in" should be employed. That is to say, it provides that these rules and regulations may be made:

For the purpose of preventing the disclosure to the public, and thereby to the enemy, of information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, and disposition of any of the armed forces of the United States in naval or military operations.

Now, everything that pertains to "the movement, numbers, description, and disposition of" our armed forces in their military operations or naval operations will come within the purview of the amendment if the word "in" is used rather than the other words.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion there?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Does not the Senator think the language is too broad and might include a lot of extraneous matters unless we follow it up with the words "of campaign," so as to read "the plans of campaign"? Why not put those words in? Certainly we would not want such information to be published. I suggest that the language be amended to read "plans of campaign."

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Minnesota is right in that construction, but the plan of a military campaign is covered, anyhow.

Mr. NELSON. I think not.

Mr. CUMMINS. The words used are "with respect to the movement, numbers, description, and disposition of any of the armed forces of the United States in naval or military operations." Everything that this Army may do, everything that the force may do, wherever they may move, whatever disposition may be ordered all come within the terms of the amendment.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, with all due respect to him, I think he is mistaken. The war board, or the War College, or the naval board may formulate a plan of campaign, providing where troops should be landed on the enemy's shore, what they should do when they got there, and how the operations should be conducted. Those matters are planned in advance; they are formulated and prepared here in the War and the Navy Departments. Why should such plans be published? Why should the newspapers have immunity for publishing information regarding such plans?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not differ from the Senator from Minnesota in that particular instance. I only say that every plan that has to be carried out by some movement or some disposition of the armed forces of the United States is already covered by the use of the word "in."

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me, why not make it clear by using the words "plan of campaign"? Certainly there can be nothing objectionable about that language, unless it is desired that the newspapers shall have an opportunity to publish information concerning the plan of campaign.

Mr. CUMMINS. I repeat, I do not believe that the time has come when any such drastic legislation is necessary. I have already given my reasons for so believing. My only concern now is that if we are to have a statute which limits or restricts the right of free speech and the right of publication, I am very anxious that it shall be confined to matters purely military in character.

I hope the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] will not press his amendment; but if he does, I hope it will not prevail.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him once more?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield the floor.

Mr. NELSON. I simply want to say, without taking undue time of the Senate, that my anxiety in this matter, Mr. President, is to protect our soldiers in the field and our sailors at sea. I think that they are entitled to some consideration as well as the newspapers. I do not want them to be handicapped or ham-strung by reports in the newspapers specifying their movements, where they are going, how numerous they are, how well they are equipped, and all that. I think that would be a great detriment to the service, and the result might be that we would suffer defeat, and in some instances a good many sailors and soldiers might lose their lives. As an old soldier of the Civil War, I can not help saying, Mr. President, that my heart goes out to the soldiers and sailors who are to fight the battles of this gigantic war, and I think they, instead of the newspapers, are entitled to our first consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, important amendments are being acted upon and I think they ought not to be acted on by a handful of Senators. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Members answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	Nelson	Smoot
Bankhead	Gore	New	Sterling
Beckham	Gronna	Norris	Sutherland
Borah	Hale	Overman	Thomas
Brady	Harding	Page	Thompson
Brandegee	Hardwick	Pittman	Townsend
Broussard	Hollis	Poindexter	Trammell
Chamberlain	Husting	Pomerene	Underwood
Colt	Johnson, Cal.	Ransdell	Vardaman
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Reed	Wadsworth
Cummins	Kellogg	Robinson	Walsh
Curtis	Kendrick	Shafroth	Warren
Fall	Kenyon	Sheppard	Watson
Fernald	King	Sherman	Weeks
Fletcher	Kirby	Shields	Wolcott
France	Knox	Smith, Ariz.
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Smith, Ga.
Gallinger	McKellar	Smith, Mich.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Montana proposes to strike out the word "in," which has heretofore been substituted for the words "or the plans of," in line 6 of the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, may we not have the whole amendment reported?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment, together with the proposed amendment to it.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] proposes to strike out, on page 37, line 5, all after the word "years" down to and including the word "imprisonment," in line 18 of page 37, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

In time of war the President is hereby authorized to prescribe and promulgate rules and regulations for the purpose of preventing the disclosure to the public, and thereby to the enemy, of information with respect to the movements, numbers, description, and disposition of any of the armed forces of the United States in naval or military operations, or with respect to any works intended for the fortification or defense of any place; and whoever, in time of war, shall willfully violate any such rule or regulation shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] proposes to strike out the word "in" and to restore the former language of the amendment, so that it would read as follows:

And disposition of any of the armed forces of the United States or the plans of naval or military operations, or with respect to any works intended for the fortification or defense of any place—

And so forth.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, there is a proviso in that paragraph, which I ask may be read.

Mr. THOMAS. The proviso has been eliminated.

Mr. NELSON. No; there is another proviso that follows this in that same paragraph of the bill. I ask to have that read, because that will be a part of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises the Senator from Minnesota that one of the provisos was stricken out upon motion of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the proviso in the bill is not covered by my amendment.

Mr. NELSON. I know, but it is a part of the paragraph. It will be a part of it, and that is why I want it read.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not object to its being read. I simply wanted to correct the misapprehension, if possible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the other proviso.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs upon the amendment of the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. OVERMAN. Now, Mr. President, as to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], I am authorized to accept that amendment so far as I can.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado, which has just been read.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand the amendment of the Senator from Colorado is the amendment which has just been read with the words "or plans" left out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; that is the way the Chair understands it—with the word "in" inserted.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado will state it.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the adoption of this amendment preclude the entertainment of a motion to strike out the entire section? There seems to be a misapprehension upon that subject.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. Is not the rule that we may first perfect the text; that even before a motion to strike out, a motion to perfect the text is in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The statement of the Senator from Georgia accords with the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. THOMAS. It accords with my understanding, too; but I wanted to clear up that matter before a vote was taken.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, may we please have a statement as to what the understanding of the Chair is? We did not hear it here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The understanding of the Chair is that this section, as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Colorado, may be perfected before it is finally acted upon, and a motion to strike it out would then be entertained.

The question recurs upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I move to strike out, beginning with the word "and," in line 5, page 37, down to and including the word "same," in line 23, page 37; or, if the amendment has been substituted by the adoption just now of the matter presented by the Senator from Colorado, to strike out all that shall succeed the word "years," in line 5, page 37, to the conclusion of the particular section.

Mr. HARDWICK. In other words, if the Senator will yield to me, so that I may understand his motion, he moves to strike out subsection (c) as the Senate has now amended it. Is that it?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes, sir; I move to strike out the entire subsection (c).

Mr. HARDWICK. As the Senate has now amended it.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California moves to strike out the entire subsection (c) as amended.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, that signifies, as a matter of course, that there is to be no restriction whatever upon the publication of any matter concerning the naval or military forces, or the disposition or movement of the troops, or works intended for the fortification or defense of any place, or anything else the publication of which is unlawful, unless, as provided in subdivision (b), it is intended that it shall get to the enemy. I do not desire to say anything upon that, but I merely desire to inquire of the Senator from California if he was present in the Chamber last night when I inserted in the RECORD the publication in the New York paper of all about the Navy secret, the spreading of a net across New York Harbor to intercept the entrance of submarines?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. In response to the Senator, I will state that I was present. The purpose is to strike out all of subsection (c); and the bill contains ample powers, ample crimes, and ample penalties to reach any intentional design to do aught that is wrong.

Mr. WALSH. Now I desire to ask the Senator another question.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I interrupt for a minute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I simply desire to interrupt for a moment in order to know how we are proceeding under this unanimous-consent agreement. Do I understand that under this unanimous-consent agreement each Senator is limited to one speech upon the bill, the substitute, or the amendments? I have no desire to stop the Senator from Montana. I hope that it will be ruled that we are entitled to several speeches.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the Chair has not seen the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. WALSH. I will say that my interpretation is that a Senator is entitled to speak on each amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BORAH. An hour?

Mr. WALSH. An hour, while the hour provision lasts.

Mr. OVERMAN. That was my intention; but an occupant of the Chair, I was told, stated that he was going to rule differently.

Mr. BORAH. The reason why I asked the question was because I was notified yesterday that my time had been consumed, and, of course, I thought it was not a fair ruling—that is to say, not a ruling which the agreement justified. At the same time, I thought we ought to know before we proceeded further.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. In drafting the unanimous-consent agreement, it was my intention that we should have an hour on the bill, on the substitute, and on the amendments.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Do I understand the Senator from North Carolina to say that the Chair has made a ruling on the construction of this agreement?

Mr. OVERMAN. Not the Vice President; another occupant of the chair said he thought he would rule so. I told him I did not so intend the agreement when I wrote it, and I did not think it meant that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a moment and then I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. A very peculiar construction, if I may be allowed to use that word, was placed on the unanimous-consent agreement which the Senate entered into in regard to debate on another bill here the other day—the Army bill—under which a Senator was not allowed to speak 15 minutes upon the bill until all the amendments had been disposed of, and the result was that he was not allowed to speak at all. Now it seems, from what the Senator from North Carolina says, that an equally strained and I think unwarranted construction is about to be placed on this unanimous-consent agreement——

Mr. OVERMAN I do not think it will be placed upon it now.

Mr. POINDEXTER (continuing). Utterly in conflict with the plain language of the agreement, which says that speeches "shall be limited to one hour each on the bill, the substitute, or amendments thereto"; and if the construction suggested by the Senator from North Carolina should be adopted the word "each" would be utterly meaningless in the agreement.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senator is right. I told the Chair he was wrong, and that it was not the intention.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I just thought it was wise to take the precaution of calling attention to it, and to say that if it was proposed by some occupant of the chair to place such a construction on it, I want to protest against it and object to it. I do not know that I shall want to speak at all, but I may want to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is ready to rule upon the inquiry. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I understand the matter, no occupant of the chair has publicly announced that he intended so to rule.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. So that this is an academic question that is hardly worth discussing. I will venture the observation that if any occupant of the chair does so rule he will be promptly overruled by the Senate——

Mr. OVERMAN. Why, of course, he will.

Mr. GALLINGER. Because the terms of the agreement are very plain.

Mr. WALSH. Now, Mr. President, I want to propound a further inquiry to the Senator from California. I want to inquire of him whether, in his judgment, the publication of such information as that to which I called the attention of the Senate last night should be prohibited?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That is not the question. The question is one of balancing disadvantages and wrongs. It would be infinitely better that there be such a publication than that the mouths of the citizens of the United States be gagged or the press be muzzled.

Mr. WALSH. I am obliged to assume that the Senator answers "no"; that there are contrary considerations of a public nature of so weighty a character as that we ought not to prohibit the publication of information of this character. Have I interpreted the Senator correctly?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I assume that the Senator has in part. It is exceedingly difficult to hear over here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend for a moment. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The Senator may interpret my conclusion to be this—that there are crimes sufficiently described in this particular bill, there are in it enough provisions, to meet every requirement that is present in this Nation, and that there is no occasion at this particular time to gag either the press or the people of this country.

Mr. WALSH. Of course that is general, and is no answer to my question as to what the view of the Senator is as to whether the publication of information of this character should be prohibited. I take it that his answer is that, in his judgment, it should not be; that the papers should be free to publish information of this character if they see fit to do so.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The distinguished Senator may take it just exactly as he intellectually determines it to be. The answer I have made to him, and the answer is, I repeat, that while there may be things done that ought not to be done, things that we would not justify and would not desire to be done, the harm that is done by an act of this sort infinitely transcends the harm that would be done by the other sort of act.

Mr. WALSH. I so understand the Senator; that is to say, that there are public considerations of so weighty a character that we ought not to attempt to prohibit the publication of matter of this character. That is the question on which the Senate is now called upon to vote.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WALSH. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to ask the Senator in regard to the proviso commencing on line 18, page 37. I want to get his judgment on whether or not that proviso—which I understand remains in the bill as it stands now——

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon me, will he identify the proviso again?

Mr. NORRIS. The proviso commencing on line 18, page 37, which reads as follows:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same.

I wanted to ask the Senator if, in his judgment, that proviso would not permit the very publication that he read yesterday and to which he is calling the attention of the Senator from California?

Mr. WALSH. I should say not.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator referred to the publication with regard to the putting of a net at the mouth of the Harbor of New York. That would be an act of the Government or its officials. Would not that proviso, if it means anything, permit the publication of the fact or of any comment that any newspaper desired to make on it?

Mr. WALSH. I should say not. The paper is not commenting on it at all. It is giving the information. It is telling the facts. It is not commenting on whether that is a wise or an unwise policy to pursue.

Mr. NORRIS. But this proviso says the act shall not limit or restrict "any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. "Or the publication."

Mr. NORRIS. "Or the publication of the same."

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but there is not in this any discussion of or comment upon or criticism of the acts of the administration——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There need not be.

Mr. WALSH. Unless it be that they say they are disclosing one of the great secrets of the Navy. To that extent there is some comment on the fact, but the article is no comment or criticism or discussion. It is a bare statement of facts.

Mr. NORRIS. That is, it is a publication of the facts.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly.

Mr. NORRIS. Is not that permitted by the last clause in this proviso?

Mr. WALSH. Clearly not.

Mr. NORRIS. I refer to the clause which says "or the publication of the same."

Mr. WALSH. Clearly not.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not see how you can give any effect to those words unless they would permit the publication of that fact.

Mr. WALSH. That is perfectly easy.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. You go to the news columns of the paper to get the facts—the information.

Mr. WATSON. That is what I was about to say.

Mr. WALSH. You go to the editorial columns to get the comment and criticism

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; but the publication of the fact that a net had been strung there, it seems to me, would be permitted by the very proviso that the Senator desires to retain in the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I must disagree with the Senator. The language of the proviso is perfectly plain to me.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. WATSON. My understanding of the position taken by the Senator from Montana is that if this publication appears in the news columns it is contrary to the provisions of this proviso, whereas if it appears in the editorial columns, and comment is made on it, it is not contrary to the provisions of the proviso.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator has misunderstood "the Senator from Montana." My statement is that you would go to the news columns to get your information; you would go to the editorial columns to get comment upon that information given in the news columns. Of course, information might be conveyed through the editorial columns as well as through the news columns.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me that the Senator from Montana has overlooked one of the phrases in this proviso when he is of the opinion that the publication to which he refers would not come within the proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same.

Mr. OVERMAN. The publication of what?

Mr. BORAH. I take it to be the acts or policies of the Government.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, by no means; the publication of discussions, comments, or criticisms.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is it.

Mr. BORAH. Then there is very little consolation in the proviso.

Mr. WALSH. However, Mr. President, the Senators who are opposing any regulation of the matter at all certainly ought not to complain that the proviso is too comprehensive.

Mr. BORAH. No; we do not complain that it is too comprehensive. We complain that it is nebulous and insincere and worthless on its face.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the Senator probably could not be reconciled to any provision at all on the subject, and he therefore finds it quite easy to criticize what is provided.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. I wanted to ask this question: The President has already appointed, as I understand, the board of censorship. Is it the understanding of the Senator from Montana that that board of censorship is to pass upon the acts that would fall within the purview of this act which we are now passing or about to pass?

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Montana has no understanding at all upon the matter. The board of censorship to which the Senator has referred is a thing that exists outside of the law so far as it has any existence whatever.

Mr. WATSON. Precisely.

Mr. WALSH. I stated on yesterday and the day before my understanding of the so-called board of censorship. It exists for the purpose of giving to the public information concerning the activities of the Army and Navy and of the State Department to such an extent as those departments feel that the public ought to have that information.

Mr. WATSON. That is quite true.

Mr. WALSH. That is to say, that heretofore the newspaper men have come there, and almost anybody has given them information. Now they have a means through which the information that ought to go out is given out.

Mr. WATSON. What I was seeking to find out was whether or not the enforcement of the provisions of this bill was to be left to that board of censorship as appointed by the President.

Mr. WALSH. Why, Mr. President, there is not anything to enforce here except to make rules and regulations.

Mr. WATSON. Precisely; but are those rules and regulations, and the enforcement of the rules and regulations, to be left to that particular board of censorship?

Mr. WALSH. Why, I do not know upon whom the President will call for advice and counsel in the drafting of these rules and regulations. I have not the slightest doubt in the world that he will call in representatives of the press, who are very honorable men, generally speaking, and that he will get the best ideas he can from them, and that he will then frame those rules and regulations. So far as the enforcement of those rules and regulations is concerned, that will be with the Department of Justice. Anybody who violates those rules and regulations will be subject to prosecution just the same as he is subject to prosecution for the commission of any other crime. That is my understanding about the matter; and the idea of a censorship or a board of censors which is going to blue-pencil editorial or any other comment is a good thing to talk about upon the hustings, but it has not very much relevancy to anything that is before the Senate.

Mr. WATSON. Well——

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator from Indiana will pardon me, since I have referred to the representatives of the press, Mr. President, the purpose of those who are advocating some regulation of this matter is simply to give legal force and sanction to a patriotic agreement that now exists between the great newspapers of this country that they will not print any information that in their judgment is inimical to the best interests of the country in the prosecution of the war. But, Mr. President, any one of those newspapers may at any time violate that agreement, and the remainder of them have no protection whatever. It is for the purpose of giving to every newspaper that desires honestly and conscientiously to live up to that agreement and to help out the Government in the prosecution of this war the assurance that they will not be jeopardized in their interest by some paper that will not so scrupulously adhere to the agreement that is entered into.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senator yields will he permit an inquiry? This extra official board of censors is in existence now, is it not?

Mr. WALSH. I have just been trying to explain to the Senate my idea about it. If you speak of it in that way——

Mr. SHERMAN. There is practically a board of censors now, is there not?

Mr. WALSH. Not in any sense such as has been suggested in debate here, so far as my information about the matter goes. I understand that a board of censors, as it is usually accepted, undertakes to pass in advance upon everything that shall appear in a newspaper, and in the countries of Europe the newspaper publishers are required in times of peace as well as in times of war in some of those countries to submit their columns to the board of censors, which passes upon it in advance. Nothing of that kind is in existence here so far as I know. Nothing of that kind is contemplated by this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me inquire further if George Creel, a former newspaper correspondent, is not now acting practically in that capacity?

Mr. WALSH. I have just told the Senate what I understand to be the capacity in which he is acting, and it is not in that capacity.

Mr. SHERMAN. If it would affect the conversion of Mr. Creel from his muck-raking propensities, I have no doubt it would be a sufficeint reformation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, undoubtedly the country to-day is in an inflamed state of mind. It is natural that it should be so. We have just entered the greatest war the world has known, and the excitement, the patriotic enthusiasm, which is going over the country is to be commended, and yet it should be guarded against.

I thoroughly believe the Congress of the United States owes it to the Nation to sustain the President of the United States in his effort to conduct the war in every respect that it is possible to do so, but I do not believe the time has come when it is necessary for the Congress to betray the fundamental principles of government in order to carry on the war at this time.

This vote seems to turn on the question, by way of illustration, of the stretching of a net in New York Harbor, the criticism of a newspaper that published the fact that a net was stretched across the mouth of that harbor. I think it goes without saying that any commander of a German submarine lying off New York Harbor, whether he was informed or not, would assume that if war had been declared this Government would act as all other Governments would under those circumstances, and that the Government had already stretched a net across the mouth of the greatest harbor in the United States.

But I do not know that this newspaper is to be condemned for the news it prints. I do not hold a commission to defend the newspaper fraternity. I am free to admit that they make mistakes sometimes, and sometimes publish matters that should not be published, especially when they publish the secret proceedings of the United States Senate; but I think we can acquit the New York newspaper of any violation of its duty to the Government in this instance, because I recall very distinctly, as I am a member of the committee, that about a month ago, before this publication appeared—I think it was before the publication appeared in the New York paper—officers of the Government appeared before the subcommittee of the General Appropriation Committee on the sundry civil appropriation bill, and asked for an appropriation to buy the quarantine station at New York, stating as one of their reasons why this quarantine station should be bought that it was necessary for the Government to stretch a net across the mouth of New York Harbor; that one end of it would be at the quarantine station, and they wanted to control that end of the net. That was stated in an open hearing before the Committee on Appropriations by Government officials; it was made public, and I take it for granted that under those circumstances the Government itself did not regard that statement of fact as a dangerous one to be made by a newspaper or anyone else, as the first statement came from the Government itself. That is true in reference to a great many other statements that are made.

If we were across the English Channel from the German line, I would vote for very much greater restrictions along the line proposed in this bill than I am willing to vote for when 3,000 miles of sea separate us from the enemy's country, when we know with absolute positiveness that no troops can leave the Continent of Europe that belong to the enemy, that no ship can sail the seas of the enemy except a submarine, for which there is no place to land in our harbors; when we know that the Government of the United States and the British Government combined control every cable and every wireless apparatus on this continent, and that no matter what is published in the newspapers of America to-day it can not get out of this country except by some spy returning on a ship, and it would take days for it to travel, unless it is allowed to go through the cables and the wireless-telegraph machines that are absolutely controlled by the United States Government.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama if he was in the Chamber a couple of days ago when the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], upon what seemed to be quite reliable information, made the statement that there are 16 wireless stations in the adjacent Republic of Mexico and that communication is constant between that country and Germany?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We control the border. There is no immediate communication that can go to Mexico.

Mr. WALSH. Let me inquire of the Senator whether American papers do not cross the line as a matter of course?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They do, of course; but spies cross the line, as far as that is concerned. We have no doubt, we know that the Government of France and the Government of England have spies in Germany to-day, and I think in all human probability, although I do not know the fact, the Government of the United States has spies in Germany. Is it to be presumed for one minute that the German Government has not spies in the United States? These spies are not men who throw bombs and make a noise or publish their information in the papers. They are men who accumulate their information, hold it within themselves, and take an opportunity, the best opportunity that affords itself to them, to carry it to their home government.

Whether a matter of this kind, the stretching of the net or the movement of a regiment of troops was in a newspaper or outside of a newspaper, if it was a matter of moment, I have no doubt that a German spy in this country would know it, and if it were possible communicate it to his Government, and the question of its publication in a newspaper would not be of any moment one way or the other. If I believed it was of moment and it was necessary to gag the newspapers of the United States in order to successfully carry on this war, without hesitation I would vote for the gag.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. Suppose the great commercial vessels sailing from the ports of the United States were to have the dates of their departure published in the newspapers, and then the news is sent by the papers down into Mexico, and Mexico delivers it to Germany, does the Senator think it would be right to have that information in the possession of Germany, to know that the ships sailed on certain dates so that the submarines would know when they were to arrive? Does the Senator think that would be proper?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly not. But what are you effecting by this legislation? If the only means of a German spy or anybody else to secure this information that was needed was through the columns of the American press, I would say the Senator was right.

Mr. OVERMAN. A lady said to me the other day a pretty wise thing. She was talking to me about German spies being here. She said they would need but one German spy. I asked why. She said, "Because he could get all the knowledge he wants from the newspapers by reading them."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That may be true or it may not.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not say it is true, but I say spies do not get all the information. The newspapers are constantly publishing the dates of sailing of vessels. The Senator knows that when we tried to keep the date of the sailing of the St. Louis a secret it was published to the world.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We were not at war then, and I have a higher opinion of the character and the patriotism of the men who are in the newspaper profession of this country to-day, and their love of their country, than my colleague from North Carolina seems to have.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator can not put me in that position, for he knows as well as I know that there are many patriotic high-toned honorable men in the newspaper business. But there are some who are not patriotic and who would sell out.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But they do not control the columns of the papers.

Mr. OVERMAN. All sorts of papers are published in this country. The Senator knows as well as I know that there are many papers that ought not even to be allowed to go through the mails. There are many irresponsible newspaper correspondents in this country, and the Senator can not put me in the position of charging that the newspaper men of this country are dishonorable; they are as honorable as any other class of our citizens.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sure I did not attempt to put the Senator in that position.

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not put myself in that position.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator can interpret his own position; I certainly can not.

But the position I am taking is that this legislation is unnecessary, that information of any moment is going to be obtained anyhow, and if it can be gotten out it is going to be carried, and if it is not of moment, then it is immaterial whether it is sent out or not. I say, if we were within a few miles where there was easy communication of the enemy's border I might be willing to vote for as drastic legislation as is contained in this bill, but knowing that we control the cables and the wireless lines and that communication going to Germany can not precede the sailing of our ships by any means, I am not willing at this time to take a position that appears to me to be drastic, so far as the fundamental principles of the Government are concerned.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator from Alabama permit me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There have been a number of references to the article which was quoted by the Senator from Montana. I have read the article several times. I do not believe it would have been possible for that information to have come from other than official sources. If it came from official sources and was printed in the paper, it must have been intended to be printed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask the Senator not to interrupt my argument for that statement, because if the Senator desires to know where it came from I have already made the statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama declines to be interrupted.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was published by the Government. It was given to the Committee on Appropriations in a hearing a month ago.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understood the Senator, of course.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Therefore certainly it could not have been regarded as a matter of moment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Evidently it was an official statement. It was not anything that could have been observed from the shore. It dealt with the intricacies of that harbor and it must have been official.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was in a statement made by officers of the Government before the Appropriations Committee. So there really could have been nothing in the instance. But the position I take with reference to this matter is that I may vote for the bill if it is properly amended. If it is not properly amended, I intend when the final vote comes to vote against the entire bill; but I hope that it may be modified so that I may have an opportunity to vote for some of the features of the bill that I believe should be put on the statute book. However, I am not willing, so far as I am concerned, to violate what I consider to be fundamental rights of the American people to obtain as an incident thereto some legislation which may be necessary.

We should sustain the hands of the President of the United States in every way that is required in conducting this war abroad. Give him men and give him money, but it should be conducted for the American people. If the American people were not in favor of war, then we as their Representatives made a mistake in voting for it. I believe the verdict of Congress was sustained by the American people, but I also believe if the day should come when the American people desire to know the facts and on those facts have the Congress of the United States declare peace, no censor gag of the American press should keep the people of this country from having a clear understanding as to the conditions here and abroad.

This paragraph has been greatly modified. It has been very much improved since it was reported to the Senate, but the paragraph as it stood in the bill reflected the sentiment of the proponents of the bill. When this paragraph is modified it will go to conference in a modified way and be subject to the action of that conference. I feel that this matter is of too much importance, too vital to the great interests of the American people, freedom of thought, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, to allow this item to go to conference at all.

In my judgment there is no necessity whatever for the enactment of this law to-day, and if it is not necessary, if existing conditions do not require its enactment into law to-day, then it should be stricken out of the bill; and if conditions arise in the future which require legislation of this kind, when the time comes there will be ample opportunity for Congress to act.

We are giving more and more power to the administration in every bill that comes before this Congress. Where those powers are needed I am willing to give them; but there are only two checks on those powers. One is to write in the bills themselves that when a treaty of peace is signed these laws shall be wiped off the statute books. The other is, so far as it is possible to do so, to give the American people a full and free opportunity to know exactly what their Government is doing.

I may be answered by saying that the paragraph as amended does not cut off that right. In many respects it does not; it is very much limited from its original conception; but yet, as it goes to conference, it carries an unnecessary power.

It has been stated here that the press of this country has entered into an agreement with the administration that they will not violate any war secrets which the administration deems it necessary to keep secret. I believe that the press can be trusted to live up to that agreement; they can be trusted to live up to that high standard of patriotism that is expected of every loyal citizen of the United States. The time may come in this Republic before this war is over when it may be necessary that the limelight of publicity shall throw the real facts before the Nation in order that proper public sentiment may be formed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, what is there in this bill that would hinder the press doing that? Even when originally reported, it referred only to military and naval operations, aircraft operations, and fortifications.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, the Senator himself referred a moment ago, as a part of his argument, to the necessity of our concealing the fact of the movements of merchant ships.

Mr. OVERMAN. That was as to the movements of war vessels.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is not the movement of war vessels.

Mr. OVERMAN. I merely gave that as an example; but the Senator reiterates that it is proposed to prevent all criticism, when, as a matter of fact, in this proviso it is expressly stated that one can indulge in as much criticism as he pleases about anything.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; you can criticize, but not publish; and how far does your criticism go when you can not publish it?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Alabama will not construe the language in that way when he carefully reads it. It reads:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict, nor shall any regulation herein provided for limit or restrict, any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same.

Of what? Of comment or discussion or criticism.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly you can publish the criticism all you want to, but you are to gag the facts.

Mr. OVERMAN. Facts about what? Let us see what the facts are about.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator might want to suppress facts——

Mr. OVERMAN. What facts? Facts as to the Army and Navy and fortifications? That is all it comprises, and the Senator is traveling far afield when he talks about after the war, and when peace comes, and criticism about that. What has that got to do with the provisions of this bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am glad that the Senator recognizes that there is some force in my argument. I wish he would recognize my reasoning to the full extent of voting with me. I was a Member of the other branch of Congress during a time of war. There was no such gag on the press proposed at that time; and I remember a great scandal arose in the country because rotten beef was sold to the soldiers.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I ask the Senator would this bill prevent the publication of information regarding such a condition as that?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know how far this bill would go.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, this provision was submitted by the press. They saw the point.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, what does this provision have reference to when it says "operations of the Army"?

Mr. OVERMAN. The press can criticize the Government and its policies and conditions as much as they please. They themselves submitted this provision. Now, the Senator talks about "gag." Did he not vote for this very bill when it was pending here and passed in the last Congress on a yea-and-nay vote?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No.

Mr. OVERMAN. We did not hear the Senator's voice then.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not recall having voted for it. I do not think I did.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator did not vote against it, and did not say anything against it. Something has come over the minds of some Senators since they voted for that bill, which was more drastic than the bill pending here now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I may not have been in the Senate when the bill was passed.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will say to the Senator that twice a yea-and-nay vote has been taken in the Senate on this very clause, only in a more drastic form than it is now, and there was no voice lifted against it. When the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] stood here and fought it for weeks and weeks, we did not hear the voice of the Senator then. When we had it up subsequently, we did not hear the voice of the Senator, but here lately something has come over the spirit of his dreams.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I will say to the Senator that I do not think anything has come over the spirit of my dreams. I probably sat in my seat and voted, or probably the bill went through when I was absent from the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will yield to the Senator in a moment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me a moment before he goes further with his argument?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not long ago a contract for the furnishing of shoes to the French Army was let in the United States. There was a defect in the footgear furnished, and the French Government canceled the contract; but the publicity that was given by the press of the United States led directly to the improvement of the character of merchandise of that kind delivered on all future contracts and had a very beneficial effect.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois is correct. Under this bill information in reference to contracts that are made for Army and Navy supplies might be gagged by the censor, and yet it might be greatly to the public interest that the newspapers of the country should give full publicity to the contracts that were being made in order to protect the Government itself against injury and possible destruction. Now, this bill provides—

And (c) whoever, in time of war, in violation of reasonable regulations to be prescribed by the President, which he is hereby authorized to make and promulgate, shall publish any information with respect to the movement, numbers, description, condition, or disposition of any of the armed forces, ships, aircraft, or war materials of the United States, or with respect to the plans or conduct of any naval or military operations, or with respect to any works or measures undertaken—

Undoubtedly under this bill, as it originally stood, a newspaper which published any items in regard to the movement of troops or the condition of the troops might be severely punished. There might be an epidemic in camp of some kind, the doctors might not be giving the necessary attention, and yet the people of the country might be deprived of that information, and possibly the Congress of the country might be deprived of it. But the position that I take is not one of captious criticism. I care not for the mere words of the statute. I say that a law to suppress the press and free speech at this time is unnecessary.

Mr. OVERMAN. If the Senator will yield to me, I wish to say that I thought I was right in my statement as to the Senator's former position. I have sent for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I find that the Senator voted for this bill. His name is recorded in the affirmative.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I have obtained information in reference to the bill since the Senator spoke to me. I understand the bill was driven through in the closing hours of the last Congress.

Mr. OVERMAN. No, Mr. President; the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then when was it passed?

Mr. OVERMAN. It was here for some time. It seems to me that we spent about three weeks on the bill then.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I am sorry that the eloquence of my distinguished friend from North Carolina was not so penetrating as to reach the impediments in my brain. I was not aware of his arguments on the subject.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was wondering why the Senator should change his view.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that I have many a time made a mistake. I have sometimes in the rush of business voted without an opportunity for full consideration of the purport of a bill; but certainly, if I voted for this bill under the circumstances that the Senator relates, I made a mistake, and I am glad of the opportunity to correct that mistake, now that I have full information on the subject.

Mr. OVERMAN. Great men change their minds sometimes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; and small ones do, too; and that is our class.

Mr. President, I am not going to delay the Senate in further discussion of this particular question. When I rose I did not intend to extend my remarks to the extent that I have. I merely desired to give the reasons why I intended to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from California, and, further, to say that I think in matters of this kind we should act slowly, deliberately, and with careful, matured judgment before we commit ourselves to drastic and unnecessary legislation which sometimes others may attempt to drive us to by reason of the stress of circumstances that rest upon the country.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I do not intend to speak at any length. I rise more particularly to call attention to a clipping I have here in my hand. It seems to me that the opposition to subdivision (c) is of a kind that out-Herods Herod, judged from the statements in the clipping to which I call attention. This is taken from a German newspaper. I received it in the mail this morning, and am not quite certain from what paper it is taken, but I think from the Staats-Zeitung, because a part of the last word of the name of that journal appears on the opposite side of the statement from which I read. The statement is entitled:

Free speech—Petition to Congress—Opposing the espionage bill.

It was evidently sent to me by German-American friends in South Dakota and is signed by three of them residing in one of the most populous counties in the State, settled almost wholly by citizens of German birth. I call attention to this first statement in the petition:

To the Congress of the United States:

Your petitioners earnestly and respectfully ask the Congress not to pass any censorship act that shall extend beyond military and naval news of value to the enemy.

And we are not proposing, Mr. President, to pass any censorship act that extends beyond that. The right of full criticism of the policies of the Government, of the acts of the Government, or of the representatives of the Government is reserved in subdivision (c) itself.

I call attention now to the very last paragraph in this petition, as follows:

Concealment of military plans and operations during their execution is always necessary, but concealment of the result of those operations, of failures or reverses or past mistakes, or of incompetence or dishonesty is inexcusable in a republic, where the people govern, and must know the truth in order to govern wisely and well.

There is in this bill no prohibition on criticism, or censure, or even ridicule of any of the acts or operations or polices of the Government, or any of its representatives.

Mr. President, while I have the floor I desire to read an extract or two from the Outlook of day before yesterday, the 9th of May. I do not think there is in the United States a stronger champion of free institutions, the free press among them, than that great periodical. I shall not attempt to read the whole of the article, but it is under the heading, "War and a free press." It says among other things:

The liberty of the press in a free country differs in no essential respect from other forms of liberty. Democracy assumes the truth of an aphorism attributed to Augustine, "Please to do right, and then do as you please." It assumes that most men please to do right, and it generally leaves them free to do as they please. But the country may define what is right and may punish the individual or prevent him from doing what is wrong. He has liberty to use his hands as he pleases, but if he uses his fist to knock his neighbor down the law punishes him. He has liberty to use his tongue as he pleases, but if he uses his tongue to slander his neighbor the law punishes him. Liberty and anarchy are not synonyms. The country retains the right to define the limits within which the individual may do as he pleases.

Further, and a little more to the point:

If a newspaper libels the President, the editor should be liable to punishment. An American citizen does not lose his rights to the protection accorded to other American citizens because the Nation has made him its President.

If a newspaper incites a mob to violence, or if in time of war—

Note this—

it publishes statements the obvious effect and probable purpose of which are to give aid and comfort to the enemy, its editor should be liable to punishment. There is no sacredness in type which makes immune from punishment the men who use it for a criminal purpose.

Preventive law is legitimate in time of war as in time of peace. Whatever information is given by the newspapers to the country is also given to the enemies of the country. The great majority of newspapers will voluntarily refrain from such publication. But one newspaper which does not refrain may inflict on the country irreparable injury. The country has a right to protect itself against this peril by prohibiting the publication of any information which will do injury to the country or give aid and comfort to its enemies.

And that, Mr. President, is all that this bill proposes to do. It invites, we might say, criticism; and the President of the United States has, in the letter read this morning by the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], generously invited criticism of any executive act of his. Whether the subordinates of the President, the Secretary of State, or the Secretary of War or of the Navy, or any censorship board invite criticism or not, they are, nevertheless, subject to criticism under the terms of this bill.

Continuing the reading:

And it may take such measures as it deems wise for giving to the press and to the public the information which is consistent with the public interests, and may prohibit the publication of information which it regards as perilous to the Nation. Such prohibition is only the application to the newspapers in time of war of a principle long since recognized and acted upon in time of peace.

* * * * * * *

It will sometimes be difficult to draw the line between legitimate and illegitimate criticism. But honestly patriotic editors will rarely find it difficult to draw that line for themselves, and others must be content, as their fellow citizens are content, to leave the line between the lawful and unlawful in doubtful cases to be defined for them by the courts.

The concluding paragraph:

Congress ought to protect the right of the administration to prevent the publication of news which it deems injurious to the public interest, and it ought to protect the right of the public through the press to criticize freely the public acts and public policies of the administration.

And that, Mr. President, from the Outlook, is in line with the petition itself put out for signing by one of the greatest German newspapers in the United States, the Staats-Zeitung. So from these two quite opposite sources you have the recognition of the right of Congress to pass a censorship act that shall extend to military and naval operations, and prevent the disclosure of information that will interfere with or impede in any way those operations, or furnish information that will be useful to the enemy.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I think I have heard it stated on the floor of the Senate in argument against this bill that the exposure of what some people regard as the failure of the Dardanelles expedition would not have been possible under such a law as this, and that the great campaign which Lord Northcliffe made in Great Britain for the overthrow of the ministry that at that time had control of the conduct of the war could not have been carried on, resulting in the improvement of conditions and the elevation of Lloyd-George to the premiership.

I have here an article written by Lord Northcliffe; and surely he ought to know the interest of newspapers in such a matter as this. I understand that he is probably the largest newspaper proprietor in Great Britain, and he always has been, of course, the champion of the liberty of the press, and zealous in defense of all of the privileges which are essential to the successful conduct of newspapers. Now, he says in this article over his own signature—I am quoting now—

> That strict naval and military censorship is essential is obvious to any person who has ever been in a submarine or on a battleship or close to the firing line; but censorship is a dangerous weapon when it is used to conceal scandals of supply or of military direction.

That is his view in regard to it. Now, I fail to see how it would be possible for any board of censors, under the authority which is given by this act, to exclude from publication in newspapers or circulation through the mails the exposure of inefficiency in the Government or of the failure of campaigns or of scandals in regard to Army or naval supplies. No information in regard to those things which have already taken place can be of any aid or benefit to the enemy. They may be of tremendous benefit to the country in remedying those conditions and in preventing a repetition of those failures. There is not a word or a syllable in this bill that could by any proper construction be used to prohibit the exposure to the country of all of those matters, and the framers of the bill have taken the precaution to go to the extent of putting in an express proviso in order to save those things.

I only want to say a word, as this may be the only opportunity before voting upon this matter, in view of the public interest in it and the extent of the discussion which has taken place in regard to it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I have become somewhat interested in the proviso, and for information I should like to get the Senator's idea as to the kind of publication or publicity or discussion to which the proviso applies. Is the proviso confined entirely to editorial comment or comment of individuals on facts, if they be facts, relating to the movements of the Army, or any order made by any of its officials?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; not in my judgment. I do not think it could be seriously contended by anybody that the distinction between an editorial and a news article was the proper basis of distinction between what is authorized and what is not authorized.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, to make a concrete case of it——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will yield again if the Senator will just let me finish this part of my answer.

Mr. NORRIS. All right.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would say, if I were called on to advise what this permitted and what it did not permit, that this proviso permitted the publication of everything in regard to military or political affairs that was not expressly prohibited in the preceding part of the paragraph. Now, it may be said in regard to such a construction that it would be the case, anyhow, and of course it would be; so I presume that the proviso is put in out of extra precaution as a definition, and to make it clear to everyone who reads the bill that it was not intended to prohibit matters of that kind, and that the language of the section is not intended to go any further than the words necessarily imply.

Mr. NORRIS. Would it not follow, then, if the Senator's construction is right, that the proviso, as a matter of fact, is useless?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not think it is useless. I think it is very well to make the declaration. I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I can see how it might be advisable to put in an explanatory clause, as I judge the Senator considers this proviso——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think very largely so.

Mr. NORRIS. But if we were going to be real technical it would not be necessary, and the effect of the law would be just the same if the proviso were left out.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The effect of it, in my judgment, would be the same, because in the absence of any other limitation on the press they would have a right to publish anything except that which is prohibited.

Mr. NORRIS. All the claim that is made, then, by those who are making it, that the proviso is a relief and gives substantial rights, is, in the judgment of the Senator, unfounded?

Mr. POINDEXTER. If they mean by that that it limits the prohibited matters in the preceding part of the article, I think it is unfounded. I do not think it qualifies, or is intended to qualify, what precedes it. It tends to define, however, the preceding words.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand the construction put upon it by those who are advocating the bill—and I am not criticizing that construction, for the purpose of the question; I am assuming it to be correct—it applies only to discussion, comment, or criticism, and the publication of such discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts of the Government or its representatives, and has no application to the publication of an item of news.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not construe it in that way at all. I think there are many items of news that could be published so long as they do not come within the express terms of this section which precedes the proviso.

Mr. NORRIS. So long as they are not prohibited by the preceding language?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes. My understanding of the purpose and reason of putting in that proviso is that there was a tendency to misconstrue that language. It is somewhat in the nature of a congressional construction of the statute.

Mr. NORRIS. The preceding language gives the President the authority to make certain regulations, and prohibits the publication of news in regard to the movements of troops and the actions of the Army or of the Navy. Now, if the proviso only permits comments on such movements, and the preceding language prohibits the publication of the fact of there being such movements or actions, then would it ever be possible to publish, under the proviso, any comment, editorial or otherwise, if as a matter of fact the preceding language prohibited the publication of the news on which it was based?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The preceding language does not prohibit the publication of the news upon which it is based unless it is news as to the movements of troops.

Mr. NORRIS. I am referring to something that is prohibited.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The number, description, or disposition, and, of course, as to those matters the publication is prohibited.

To say that because we are a free people and have in our Constitution a guaranty of the liberty of the press we must have going along with our headquarters newspaper reporters, news gatherers, who, under this constitutional guaranty claim the constitutional right to spread that information abroad to the world, is to say that democracy is inefficient and incapable of preserving itself, because that would be the inevitable result. If we do not, by some such law as this, provide the machinery by which the spreading of that information may be prohibited, what is the alternative going to be? The alternative would be an effort on the part of those who were directing the military affairs of the Government to exclude newspaper men from participation in all information in regard to the conduct of the Government which might even indirectly bear upon military movements. The alternative would be that newspapers would be deprived of information which otherwise, under reasonable censorship, they would have and might use, to the improvement of the service, without any objection.

It seems to me that to say that there can be no reasonable censorship, in the name of freedom of discussion and the exposure of inefficiency and of scandals and of scandalous conditions, is to defeat the very purpose of the argument. It would be utterly futile and impossible to undertake to conduct a war unless there is some means somewhere vested in the Government which is carrying it on of imposing secrecy in regard to those things which are of vital importance to the success of a military movement, and if this secrecy can not be preserved by a reasonable censorship self-preservation will require that all war information be withheld.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] said a moment ago that there was no occasion to invoke this censorship at this time. Well, why not at this time? He seems to admit that at some time in the conduct of the war these principles which I have just undertaken to express would be applicable, and that a censorship ought to be imposed. I judge from the statement of the Senator from Alabama that he is of the opinion that this is not the time to begin to carry on the war. Well, how long is the Senator from Alabama going to wait before we begin to carry it on?

I hear a good deal of criticism here and there, in Congress and out of Congress, because we have waited as long as we have since we have declared war against Germany. There are a great many policies that have been undertaken by the Government which no steps have been taken to carry out, and yet the Senator from Alabama seems to be of the opinion that there is no hurry at all about it, and that next month or six months from now or in perhaps a year we should begin to do these things, and then we could adopt a censorship. He also says there is no occasion for a censorship, because there is not any danger of German troops coming to the shores of the United States. Now, that is not the only thing in the nature of a military movement the publication of which it might be advisable to prevent. My opinion about this war is that, as is very often the case, the best defensive is an offensive. At any rate that might possibly be determined upon, and it would be desirable to prevent the publication of news not of German troops landing in America but of American troops landing in Europe, or news of an expedition to that effect. I only mention that by way of illustration.

He seemed to regard with some horror that it was proposed to limit the publication of news of the sailing of merchant ships. In other words, he advocates that in the face of a submarine war which has developed into the central feature of this struggle, which has for its purpose the destruction of every merchant ship which sails to Europe from our ports, newspapers should be allowed to publish the date of their sailing, the route which they take, and the date on which they are to arrive in Europe, and thereby furnish a ready-made program and detail of the places and the times when the submarines could find their prey.

But it is said that if the newspapers do not publish it, spies will furnish the information. According to that argument there would never be occasion to have censorship anywhere, because there are always spies in war maintained by all countries.

So it seems to me that it amounts to saying that all the censorships that have ever been imposed and that which the Senator from Alabama himself suggests might well be imposed when we get ready to begin to make war, would be wholly unnecessary, because there will be spies then, probably more of them than there are now, who could furnish this information.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, as the Senator referred to me——

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just a moment, to complete the sentence and conclude the point which I was making. If we by the refusal to pass this act tacitly give legislative consent to the publication by industrious news gatherers of vitally military and naval secrets, you constitute every enterprising reporter of a newspaper, to all intent and purposes, a spy for the enemy, and you could relieve them of the expense of maintaining a spy system of their own.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will yield, surely he would be correct if his supposition was correct, but it is not. The only military information of any great value which can be given out at the great distance we are away from the enemy's country is the movement of ships, and a dozen men in a dozen ports, if they are able to establish communication with the German Government, can give this information, whether it is published in the newspapers or not. I stated in my argument, if the Senator heard it, that if it was necessary to protect military secrets I would go as far as any man in protecting those military secrets; but what military secrets we will have on the battle fields of France will not be affected by this legislation. The question of our raising a great army and building a great navy and making great preparations for war I do not think is a military secret that we want to conceal. I think it would be advisable for the German Government to know it and to know the effect of it; and I wish that the German people realized fully that this country is going to use every exertion within its power to bring the war to a successful conclusion.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Alabama seems to overlook the Navy entirely, the movements of which it is most desirable to conceal.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should think so. It seems to be generally regarded so even by the newspapers of the country.

It has been stated here time and time again that the newspapers have voluntarily refrained from publishing these military and naval matters. If the newspapers have voluntarily refrained from publishing them, undoubtedly it is not a matter which is very damaging to the newspapers, at least it is not damaging to such an extent that they do not put their patriotism above the mere matter of news advantage. And, furthermore, the fact that they have voluntarily refrained from publishing these facts is an indication that, in the judgment of the newspaper managers of the country, it is advantageous to the conduct of the war not to publish it. If they believed that it would do no harm to our naval and military movements they would say so and insist upon that view, but the judgment of the newspapers themselves contradicts the argument of the Senator from Alabama that the publication of information as to the movements of our Navy and our Army is of no detriment to the military success of the war.

Now, I wish to add one word more, and that is this: A good deal has been said about the invasion of the principles of free government and the fundamental principles of liberty—I think that was the phrase which was used in the debate this afternoon—because it is proposed to provide here some governmental machinery for the purpose of excluding vital military secrets from publication. That argument seems to be based upon the assumption that newspapers must be allowed under the principle of the liberty of the press to publish anything that they choose to publish, whether it is detrimental to the vital interests of the country or not. That is what that argument amounts to. But that is not what freedom of the press means. That is not what the Constitution of the United States provides, as is shown by the constant practice of the Government in a great many other respects.

I in times past as an officer of the law have assisted in suppressing certain publications. They did not have liberty of the press. I undertook to stop their publication, and I did stop their publication, because they were obscene and indecent publications, and the law of the State prohibited publications of that kind. It was not in violation of the Constitution of the United States to suppress them. No more is it a violation of the Constitution of the United States to suppress a publication which may be a veiled friend of the enemies of this country, publishing facts to be used by the enemy, using the force of their reporters and news gatherers to get news and publish it in a form in which it can be disseminated for the purpose of injuring the United States and helping its enemies.

Mr. President, we have given the Postmaster General power to exclude publications from the mails if they are fraudulent. That is not a violation of the Constitution of the United States. We passed here not very long ago a law which infringed not upon the liberty of the press but protected the country against the license of the press. There is liberty and there is an abuse of liberty. It is not very long since the Senate voted to censor the newspapers. I think the Senator from Alabama did object to it, but there was no objection on the part of many of those who are now objecting to this censorship to the provision when we proposed that any newspaper carrying liquor advertisements should not be allowed to circulate in the post office. That was a limitation upon what some people call the liberty of the press, but in effect it was but a restraint of the abuse of the liberty, of license that is not liberty.

I want before sitting down just to add this word upon that subject. In my opinion, whether consciously or unconsciously, the worst enemy of liberty and of the freedom of the press is he who advocates unrestricted and unrestrained license, even though it should go to the extent of treason against the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I discussed this bill in the beginning of the debate, and I am not going to enter again upon a discussion of those features of the matter which I then covered. I have this to say, however, that when the debate opened there seemed to be much doubt as to whether we really were undertaking to lay the basis for a true censorship of the press. It seemed to be conceded at that time that there was no authority under the Constitution to establish a law upon which censorship could rest and that this bill was not undertaking to do anything of that kind; that it was simply defining certain crimes and not undertaking in any sense to control the press prior to the publication.

It is conceded now, however, both in the public discussions and here upon the floor of the Senate, conceded by the President in his letter to Mr. Brisbane, and conceded upon all hands that this law is to serve as the basis upon which to erect a censorship, and I presume we should proceed from this time on upon that theory, because it is no longer a controverted proposition in this debate.

As to our power under the Constitution to do that, I discussed it before, and I am not, as I said, going to discuss it again; but the issue is now made clear that we are going against the express terms of the Constitution that Congress shall pass no law abridging the freedom of the press in undertaking to establish a censorship, which has always been held from time immemorial and by our own Supreme Court to be an invasion of that provision of the Constitution. There is not a single decision to be cited anywhere but holds that any law which undertakes to control the publication previous to its publication is in violation of that provision of the Constitution, and that is precisely what we are proceeding to do by this proposed law. We are boldly, brazenly, indifferently disregarding a plain, vital provision of our fundamental law and a provision in which the people are deeply interested.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] has just referred to the fact that we authorized the Postmaster General to exclude certain material from the mails for the reason that it was obscene, and so forth. But the Supreme Court held in that particular case in construing that law that if Congress should proceed so far that the circulation could not take place outside of the mails it would be a limitation upon the freedom of the press; that while you could exclude it from the mails, because that was a Government agency and it was only a partial control of it, you could not proceed to the point where you would prevent distribution entirely.

However, I am not going to discuss that. I want to come to the policy of this matter. Once before in the history of the Government we undertook to establish something in the nature of an abridgment of speech and of the press. It was a complete and ignominious failure. It did not serve the objects and purposes of those who fathered it. It accomplished nothing in the way of that which they desired to accomplish. That was in 1798. Then during the Civil War we undertook again, in an indirect way, to establish a censorship by suppressing certain publications and to prevent the distribution of certain printed material coming supposedly, and in fact at that time conceded to be, from those who were in sympathy with the southern side of the contention. That was an ignominious failure, conceded to be such. It served no purpose whatever and accomplished no good whatever. The historians writing upon the subject and some of the men who enforced it, even, before they died conceded and acknowledged that their attempt to suppress these publications served no benefit and in no way aided the Government in its work.

Mr. STERLING. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, sir.

Mr. STERLING. Is the Senator able to state to what the censorship extended during 1798 or the Civil War? To what matter did it extend? Did it extend to the publication of matters of fact or did it go beyond that and extend to criticism and comment upon the action of the Government?

Mr. BORAH. In 1798, as the Senator knows without my taking time to repeat it, it was incorporated in what was known as the sedition law. It did not go nearly so far as this act goes, because it only condemned that which was false and malicious and in criticism of public officers, and so forth.

Mr. STERLING. The sedition law expressly prohibited the criticism of acts of government. That law was not aimed at the publication of facts concerning the movement of troops or the disposition of the armed forces of the United States. It was a sedition law and prevented criticism of the Government. It was aimed at that.

Mr. BORAH. I was speaking of that which they desired to accomplish. That which they desired to bring about by reason of the enactment of that law they never did accomplish, even along the line in which they were attempting to accomplish it; that it did not have the effect which they supposed it would have; and no law which has ever been passed in this country attempting to interfere with the freedom of the press or free speech has ever been successful along the line which those who established it supposed would be successful.

Let me call your attention to a later period. When the war came in Europe they established a censorship—an almost universal censorship in England—for the purpose of protecting and concealing the movements of their troops and the action of the Government with reference to military affairs. They have had it there ever since. I challenge any Senator upon this floor to find a single expression from any disinterested party in commendation of that censorship or of the advantage which it has been to the Government. It is almost universally condemned as a failure; and not only that, but as concealing facts and preventing the public from getting hold of facts which it was essential for the public to have.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Why do the Government of Great Britain and the Government of France continue censorship if it is such a failure? They have been at war now for nearly three years; they have had the benefit of all its experience, and they are perfectly free to abandon it at any time they see fit; yet they continue it.

Mr. BORAH. They do not abandon it for the same reason that those who are so anxious to have it here are urging it. It is a protection in certain quarters. It is a certain shield or cover for mistakes for a time at least.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho allow me at this point to tender him a suggestion in response to the inquiry of the eminent Senator from Washington?

Mr. BORAH. I will very gladly yield.

Mr. LEWIS. The censor laws of England were modified four times. Finally they were altogether abandoned and a single phraseology left in of preventing the circulation or the expression of any news or information without the consent of a department, and then they put in whatever department had to be consulted.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I will say to the able Senator from Washington that, as it now stands, the regulation governing publication permits the publisher of the paper to make publication upon obtaining the consent of the particular department having the subject matter in charge. The law to which the eminent Senator refers has practically been repealed by the new form of regulation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It has been repealed and a far more drastic one substituted in its place evidently. The distinguished Senator from Illinois, whose reputation as a brilliant lawyer I knew when he resided in the State which I in part represent, can see, from the reading of the paragraph which he has just read, that it is an absolute unconditional authority to censor newspapers, regardless of whether or not what they publish is of benefit to the enemy or is a disclosure of vital military secrets, as our bill is limited. As the Senator has just read it, it authorizes the department of the Government——

Mr. BORAH. I do not want to yield for a discussion.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will merely add this: It authorizes the department of the Government to whom it applies to prevent the publication of any news or information.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senator for yielding. I only wanted to call attention to the fact that there is now prevailing in England something which they adopted a very short time ago, vesting in the different department heads the power to regulate the subject.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have gathered during the last month or so a great many comments upon the censorship in Europe. I have not time, and I do not propose to take the time of the Senate now, to read them, but I do want to call attention to a statement by Mr. Bullard, who is an author of note and distinction, and who is now, as I understand, in the employ of the Government. He has spent the last two years in Europe observing conditions and studying the situation. He has written a book, in which he has given his views upon some of these matters. He is a very earnest advocate of this war and a very pronounced sympathizer with the administration. I take it that he has not written in mere prejudice to this bill or to the general principles upon which it is founded. He says:

> Doubtless the devil could contrive some worse impediment to the mobilization of public opinion than a censorship of the press, but I doubt if he ever did. The blunders of the French and British censors have been so stupid that it is hard to escape the conviction that the idea itself is inherently stupid.

There is the fundamental principle upon which we base this idea of censorship; that the censors will be clothed with immaculate knowledge; that they will never make any mistakes; that they will only conceal that which should be concealed, and will always permit that to be published which should be published. Take an illustration. Suppose we should have a censorship and a censorship board, of whom would it likely be composed? It would be composed undoubtedly of those whose acts ought to be criticized, if any criticism is due; and is there any human being who would not feel that it was unfair and unjust and of benefit to the enemy or seditious to criticize the heads of the departments in their efforts to carry on the war? They would naturally believe that a criticism of their department and of the manner of carrying on the war would be of benefit to the opposing forces.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. Mr. Bullard continues:

> Free discussion is the lifeblood of democracy. Stop one and you stop the other. The people of France and Britain wanted a more efficient war than they were getting, but the censors forbade criticism. If British newspaper men had not at last dared to risk imprisonment their army would still be short of shells. The censorship in Russia made it impossible to drive traitors out of office except by bloodshed.

Now, I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to follow the Senator from Idaho. This bill reposes in the President—and we will assume that he is going to constitute a board—the power, and the power only, to make rules and regulations concerning what shall be published.

Mr. BORAH. The violation of which shall constitute a crime.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly; to be prosecuted by the Department of Justice.

Mr. BORAH. A man will not know for the coming morning what the law is, even if he knew what it was the day before.

Mr. WALSH. That is what I want to ascertain from the Senator. After these rules and regulations have been promulgated, what else is there to be done?

Mr. BORAH. The "else" is that another set may come next morning.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, well, there are the rules and regulations just the same.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; they are rules and regulations; but no newspaper man, no private individual, and no one else can know what they will be 24 hours after the promulgation is made.

Mr. WALSH. That is what the Senator is afraid of?

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no; that is not all. I am afraid of the whole unconstitutional, un-American, unwise, and unnecessary scheme. It is fundamentally and essentially wrong, and, being wrong in principle, no one can foresee all the evils to flow from it.

Mr. SHIELDS. Let me suggest to the Senator from Idaho that, under these rules and regulations, anyone who desires to publish a matter may be required by those rules and regulations to first present it to some officer and get his permission to publish it.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly. Every newspaper in the land would have to trek its way to the heads of the departments or to the head of one department before it could publish at all. That would likely be the best regulation; that is, that they should not publish anything concerning the wide range of subjects until after they had consulted a certain individual. I presume that would be the first regulation which would be made.

Mr. WALSH. Certainly; the wide range of subjects expressed in the bill and nothing else, because the regulations must be confined to those particular things.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I can take this bill and, with far less ingenuity than the Senator from Montana has in drawing such things, draw a set of regulations which will stop all publication concerning the vital questions in which the people of the United States will be interested in this war. When you take the entire subject matter covered by the bill and then base upon that the regulations, they might be so drawn as to control absolutely the publication in this country of any information upon the most vital questions with which the people would be concerned in this war.

Mr. Bullard continues:

> Military "experts" do not like civilian criticism. Generals are not used to reasoning with their subordinates, they do not argue about their orders, and so they do not like to explain to the Nation. They bitterly resent criticism. But it does them good. They need not only our criticism but our help. Our General Staff is asking for authority to install an exceedingly drastic censorship. But even if they forget it, let us at least keep this lesson of the European war in mind: In France and Britain the censorship system devised by the military authorities did not work. Nominally intended to keep information from the enemy, they succeeded mainly in keeping news from the people at home. They proved themselves most efficacious in sheltering dishonest army furnishers and in hiding from the public the ineptitude of some in high command.
> If the British military censor had had his way, the failure of the ordnance officers to reorganize the munition industry would not have been discovered in time.
>
> At best the censorship in its effect at home is purely negative—an effort to keep dangerous and misleading ideas from the public. But even those who are strongest in their advocacy of protecting the sheep from pernicious or seditious ideas admit to-day that the censor has had only negative—and meager—success. Bolder spirits have trusted democratic common sense even in the heat of war, and have tried the positive method of combating dangerous movements of opinion by publicity, by constantly giving the man in the street something wholesome to think about.
> While there are still old fogies in uniform who cling to "the-public-be-damned" theory and would rather lose a battle than accept help from a mere civilian, a type of officer who is being produced by this war, educated not in a school of theory but on the field, realizes that victory nowadays depends not only on armies but on civilians as well.

Nothing, Mr. President, could be truer than that in this Government of ours. You must carry along with you in this war from day to day, from month to month, and, if it continues, from year to year, public opinion. You must take the people into your confidence; and you must secure, if possible, their confidence in return. I do not believe that there is any possible way to do it other than to permit the free interchange of opinion upon all questions that concern the interests of the people and of the Government.

I admit that there may be a publication such as that to which the Senator from Montana has called attention, which ought not to be made, but I think, as the Senator from California has said, that is a weighing of benefits and disadvantages; that, while the enactment of such a law as is proposed might result in the preventing of the publication of that particular article or some article like it, yet, on the other hand, we must take into consideration that there are items of information which will be suppressed which the people ought to know and which they will be concerned to know, and which they must know if they are going to support the Government in this war.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator think that the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado, which I believe has been accepted and adopted, would operate to prevent the free interchange of opinion?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I must say that, with all due respect to those who drew that amendment, I have not found any two Senators who agree upon what it means. That does not militate against the capacity of the Senator who drew it; but it simply shows that it is not within the ingenuity of the human mind to formulate a rule of censorship which is workable. Now, to my mind no one can tell precisely what would come under this bill; but, taking into consideration the fact that it is to be construed by the heads of bureaus, I am very much of the opinion that, if this bill passes, the Senator from New York will agree with me in a year from now that we might just as well have passed the bill as it was originally written, for the power which is not given by the bill they will have reached out and taken possession of by construction.

However, I want to say to the Senator further than that, that this proposition is fundamental with me. I am opposed to any form of censorship. I think the evils which flow from publication are infinitely less than the evils which flow from a censorship. Besides, we have no constitutional right to establish a censorship.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is the Senator's conviction; and I do not intend for a moment to question the sincerity of his conviction; but does the Senator believe that it would be to the advantage of the people of the United States if the newspapers, or if one newspaper, announced that on yesterday a brigade of American troops left the port of Baltimore bound for France?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think if that factor stood alone, and you would ask me whether or not if I knew those troops were going to leave, I would publish the information, I would say no; but if you intermingle that with all the other conditions and circumstances which relate to the carrying on of the war and the necessity of information going to the people which they would not get, I should say it was infinitely more important that they should have the information which they would not get than that this particular information should not be published.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My reading of the language of this amendment convinces me that it would apply to information of that character—the movement and disposition of troops and military plans of campaign.

Mr. BORAH. "Disposition of troops," Mr. President, covers almost every conceivable thing which could relate to troops in war. What does "the disposition of troops" mean?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Where they are placed.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely; where they are placed; in other words, whether they have in a sense been used properly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No.

Mr. BORAH. That is what the Senator thinks; and if the Senator from New York were writing the regulations, that is perhaps what he would say; but when you include the disposition of troops, the movement of troops, the condition of troops, and so forth, you have all that relates to troops.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. REED. I should like to make this suggestion: Suppose that a general had lost a battle, and he had lost it by reason of having placed his troops in the wrong position, and it was forbidden to say anything about the disposition of troops, how could a speaker or a writer tell how the general lost the battle without telling how he had placed his troops, and if the writer told how he had placed his troops why might he not come within the inhibitions of this bill?

Mr. BORAH. I presume that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] would write an editorial in the nature of a criticism, without giving any facts particularly about it.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, the remark made by the Senator from Idaho is wholly unwarranted. If he will permit me, I will venture a word in answer to the suggestion made by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. BORAH. I did not mean any disrespect to the Senator; but the Senator, as I understood him, thought when he was discussing the bill that he could do that thing.

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will permit me, the publication referred to by the Senator from Missouri would be after the fact. It could not be calculated to benefit the enemy particularly, and there would be no objection under this bill to any criticism of that kind.

Mr. BORAH. That is a most strained construction.

Mr. STERLING. I do not think it is.

Mr. BORAH. If the publication were designed to expose the incompetency of the general or the incompetency of those who had in charge the situation, does the Senator from South Dakota think for a moment that they would not construe it as coming under this clause?

Mr. STERLING. Indeed they could not under the language of this bill or under any fair construction that would be put upon it by any lawyer.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, that is the Senator's judgment of it. I think, however, he will find when the bill goes into effect that he will be mistaken. I read one more paragraph from Mr. Bullard:

> Public opinion can not be sane and wholesome without freedom to discuss and argue, to criticize and oppose. The creation of a censorship over political debate, in speech or printed word, is like putting a "nigger on the safety valve." It means a vast and appalling ultimate risk for a small immediate gain. The appearance of unanimity which the Czar won by imprisoning the opposition, the semblance of content which is gained by silencing discontent, the order which comes from tyranny, is fraudulent, unstable, and dangerous. It is utterly undemocratic. And if this is not to be a democratic war in the widest and noblest sense it is not worth waging.

As I said a moment ago, there are other comments upon the censorship in the European countries, which I have, and which I may ask to insert in the RECORD. I call attention to them only briefly, however, to show that such a system does not work; it does not effectuate results; it is not satisfactory; and the only way in which the press have served the cause in England has been by breaking over or by refusing to abide by the regulations established under the censorship. Those who have found conditions they thought ought to be criticized have, regardless of censorship and regardless of the law, gone forward and performed their duty to the Government and the country.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator think that the author of the book from which he has just quoted has had better opportunities for observation or any more reason for giving attention to the matter than Lord Northcliffe, who publishes a number of papers, and who has been vigorous in his attacks on the administration?

Mr. BORAH. Precisely; and Lord Northcliffe simply ignored the regulations of the censorship when he performed that service.

Mr. POINDEXTER. And yet Lord Northcliffe says:

> That strict naval and military censorship is essential is obvious to any person who has ever been in a submarine or on a battleship or close to the firing line.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator read what follows?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Certainly:

> But censorship is a dangerous weapon when it is used to conceal scandals of supply or of military direction.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think everyone will agree to that; at least I do.

Mr. BORAH. But you are establishing here a power which I maintain could be used for that very purpose; and that, of course, is the evil and that is the danger of censorship.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, does the Senator know whether or not Lord Northcliffe was prosecuted under the censorship law?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know whether he was prosecuted or not; but I know that when he began his work of exposing the situation in the army of England he was understood to be acting in violation of the censorship, and that his own papers carried the fact that it was in violation of the censorship, and that he was taking his chances of being imprisoned for performing his duty to his country.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, that was a much wider and more drastic censorship than this provision carries, was it not? In other words, if I may put the question in another way, in the judgment of the Senator from Idaho, would the action of Lord Northcliffe have been in violation of this act?

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt that it would—not a particle of doubt.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think not.

Mr. BORAH. Well, of course, there is the difficulty of the situation. You have here terms which men may sincerely and conscientiously construe either narrowly or broadly. But when you take into consideration the exposé which Lord Northcliffe made of the ineptitude of the men in charge of the army, and the ineptitude of those who had to do with the military situation, I can not see why he would not come clearly within the provisions of this act, as it would be construed by those who would draw these regulations.

Now, Mr. President, I have detained the Senate too long.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I think I agree with the Senator from Idaho that if it became a question between no restriction at all and too much restriction I would prefer no restriction; but I have in mind now a publication which is owned one half by a man living in Germany and who is himself a German subject; the other half of the paper—that is, the stock in the publication—is owned, as I understand, in this country. The paper is edited by an unnaturalized German, and at times he has been positively villainous in his criticism of all things American. Now, does not the Senator think that some one ought to be clothed with some power to make rules and regulations with respect to such a publication as that, rather than to leave that publication without any restriction whatsoever when it comes to printing matter with respect to the movements of our troops and other similar matters?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator puts a concrete proposition.

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, as I said a moment ago, if that particular matter were standing alone, and in no wise associated with what I conceive to be the general evil of censorship of the press, I would likely agree with the Senator, waiving for the present the legal questions; but let me say to the Senator that one of the wise things that the President has said, among many other wise things, was that when you were dealing with a fool or a demagogue, or a man with a dangerous idea, the best thing to do was to rent him a hall and let him expose his ideas; that the people would take care of him.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I agree entirely with the Senator and with the President on that specific matter, but when it comes to the dangers to which we may be subjected by having a publication of the type that I have mentioned disclosing our preparation, disclosing the location of our naval forces and of our military forces, it does seem to me that we ought to place some restriction upon that publication, rather than to subject our boys in the Navy or in the Army to improper disclosures.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I went back here, as a matter of enlightenment, and as a guide somewhat for the present situation, and reread some of the editorials and some of the publications which were published from 1861 to 1864 in the North, some of which journals are yet great journals in this country. I will venture to say that the Senators will not produce anything during this war so bitter, so denunciatory, so utterly unguarded in truth and in fact, as were those denunciations of Lincoln and his Cabinet and those who had in charge the Civil War.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment.

Mr. POMERENE. I beg pardon.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, they expended their force without effect. It accomplished nothing; but when Mr. Lincoln, through the ill advice of Gen. Burnside and what I conceive to be the bad advice of Secretary Stanton, undertook to suppress some of those publications opposition spread like wildfire over the country, and came very near defeating Mr. Lincoln for reelection.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not want to protect the President or any other officer of the Government from criticism, whether it be fair or unfair.

Mr. BORAH. I was not making the reference particularly with regard to the President. I simply meant to say that these journals were publishing everything which was calculated to discourage the people at home from sustaining the war; and while centering their fire, of course, upon the President, calling him an insensate fool and a clown and a disgrace to the White House, and all such things as that, so long, as the present President says, as they had a hall and could speak freely and unrestrainedly it seemed to have but little effect; but the moment it was undertaken to restrain them and to destroy a fundamenal principle it had the very opposite effect.

Mr. POMERENE. As a general proposition, I agree with the Senator from Idaho; but if it comes to the movement of our troops across the Atlantic in transports, I insist that there shall be no publication and there ought to be no publication as to the movements of those transports. I agree with the Senator exactly that most of the great publications of this country would respect the movements of those transports; but there are a few of them, of the type of the paper that I have in mind now, which if they could sink some of those transports to the bottom of the deep would not hesitate to do it.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, I will venture to say that as agile and as successful and as expert as the gentlemen are who represent the newspapers here in this city, they would have the news 48 hours after those across the sea who are more interested in having those ships sunk. A Senator near me says he does not understand what I mean. What I mean is that this news is in the possession of the enemy before it is in the possession of the people of the United States, through newspapers, nine times out of ten. The publication in these newspapers comes long after the information has passed into the hands of private individuals, and it will be in the possession of those who are more interested in it, likely, long before it is published.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from Idaho, then, if I understand him correctly in assuming that he means that the newspaper men ought to get diligently to work now to find out all they can for the information of the public about the military secrets, because they will be known to the spies of the enemy anyhow?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have not nearly as much appreciation for the Senator's sarcasm as I have for his legal knowledge. The Senator from Idaho has made no such suggestion. He has intimated nothing of the kind.

Mr. WALSH. Let me inquire, then, if the Senator believes that it would be to the best interest of the public that they should not be published?

Mr. BORAH. That the facts should not be published?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; the facts that these diligent and enterprising young gentlemen can easily accumulate.

Mr. BORAH. If they can easily accumulate the facts from the officers who have possession of the facts, I take it that they will be published, and should be published. These facts with reference to the movements of troops, and so forth, are in the hands of officers in the first instance, and must come from them.

Mr. WALSH. That is what I say. If the spies can get them as well as the newspaper men, then they might just as well be published.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly, so far as concerns the protection to which the Senator from Ohio had reference; that is true. So far as protecting ships is concerned, they had just as well be published. But, Mr. President, that is aside from the question, because the newspapers have been, I think, exceedingly careful about these publications. I have not heard any complaint about the newspapers thus far; and I have thought that before any censorship bill was passed here, we might well wait, as a matter of policy, until there is some manifestation upon the part of the newspapers of a disposition to publish these facts.

The Senator from Montana read this morning an article as it if had been purloined or secretly gotten hold of and published in a newspaper, and as if that was a great revelation. It was a known fact by the time the newspapers published it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I called attention to the fact that the newspaper boasted that it was then disclosing a great secret of the Navy Department.

Mr. BORAH. Oh, Mr. President, that is a statement often made by newspapers—that they are revealing some fact for the first time. That is natural; but the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has disclosed the fact that it was a matter of common knowledge, in the possession of many people, long before it was published in that newspaper. But we should not change the principles upon which free government rests, defy the Constitution, and do injury to a whole people because of an ill-advised publication by one or a few newspapers. What I object to in this bill can not be remedied by amendments. There is a principle here which is wrong and I do not try to compromise with fundamental principles.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, before the colloquy is ended, may I be permitted to invite the attention of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to a feature of this matter, and ask him at this time, in connection with what the Senator from Idaho has said, for some information? It was this—and this interests me much:

The paragraph under discussion prevents the publication of information that would acquaint the enemy with the movement of the troops. Now, let us assume that the troops have moved from America and are in Europe. The American papers are forbidden to publish anything concerning their movement. It is assumed that such information would work to the advantage of the enemy. But, being in Europe, the information of all of that movement is communicated to the enemy, which is the neighbor to the field where our troops are. Thus, the enemy obtains all this information, if there be any information obtained, from its own representatives there in Europe; yet here in America we are forbidden to publish the matter, notwithstanding the fact that the enemy could have all the information without regard to whether it is published in any wise whatever in an American paper.

Now, I ask the Senator from Montana, whom I treat as the counsel of the committee—and I do so upon the theory that the committee has very excellent counsel—whether the able Senator from Montana assumes that that provision would punish an American paper for publishing information after the troops landed in Europe and were there?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am glad to respond to the Senator from Illinois. I had intended to propose an amendment to the pending bill as follows, that the disclosure should not be made prior to the publication, communication, or disclosure of the facts by the Government directly, or by its authority; but I am perfectly satisfied that that is implied in the act as it stands, and moreover I can not conceive that the regulations would forbid anything of the kind. That is to say, the regulations will undoubtedly provide that after the information is given to the public by the Government, it will be subject to publication as a matter of course.

Mr. LEWIS. But the able Senator would concede that the present language would comprehend just such a situation, and punish an American paper that would publish the movements of troops even after they were in Europe, unless something is done to avoid that offense?

Mr. WALSH. I do not think the amendment necessary at all, but I would be quite willing that it should be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. LEWIS. I think it would aid the matter very much.

I thank the Senator for allowing me to obtain this information.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I want to remind the Senate that under the unanimous-consent agreement speeches after to-day will be limited to 10 minutes. They are limited now to 1 hour. If any Senator desires to speak as much as an hour at this time, I will hold the Senate in session; but if not, I will ask for a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow. I ask the Senators if anyone desires to make as long a speech as that? [A pause.] I do not want to take any advantage of any Senator. Under the agreement Senators can not speak more than 10 minutes on any amendment or the substitute or the bill after to-day.

RECESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina moves that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, May 12, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 11, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, infinite and eternal Spirit, Father of all souls, for the moral order established in the earth which Thou didst write in the hearts of men before the Laws of Sinai were written on the tables of stone. Help us, we pray Thee, to establish our laws in accordance with that order and to conform our lives to them; that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in our hearts and all hearts, to the glory and honor of Thy Holy Name, Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we are going to have a very important matter come up, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that no quorum is present, and evidently there is not.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to, and the Doorkeeper was ordered to close the doors and the Sergeant at Arms to notify absentees.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Anthony	Fitzgerald	London	Scott, Iowa
Blackmon	Flynn	McAndrews	Scott, Pa.
Borland	Francis	McFadden	Scully
Bowers	Gandy	Maher	Sells
Browne	Godwin, N. C.	Martin, Ill.	Shackleford
Capstick	Graham, Pa.	Meeker	Shouse
Carew	Griffin	Miller, Minn.	Siegel
Carter, Mass.	Hamill	Moore, Pa.	Small
Church	Harrison, Miss.	Morin	Smith, Idaho
Clark, Fla.	Harrison, Va.	Nelson	Smith, T. F.
Coady	Haskell	Nichols, Mich.	Stevenson
Currie, Mich.	Hawley	Nolan	Sullivan
Dale, N. Y.	Hayden	Oliver, N. Y.	Tague
Davis	Hayes	Olney	Talbott
Dewalt	Huddleston	O'Shaunessy	Taylor, Colo.
Dooling	Hulbert	Porter	Tilson
Drukker	Hull, Tenn.	Pou	Venable
Dupré	Kearns	Pratt	Voigt

Eagle	Kreider	Riordan	Winslow
Estopinal	Lee, Ga.	Rodenberg
Fairchild, G. W.	Linthicum	Rowland
Farr	Littlepage	Saunders, Va.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 342 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a suggested basis for a just war-tax levy by the Kentucky Manufacturers and Shippers' Association, which, I think, contains some very good ideas.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2106. An act to authorize the county of Cass, in the State of Indiana, to construct a bridge across the Wabash River east of the city of Logansport, at a point known as Cedar or Rock Island, in said Wabash River.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1007) authorizing the city of Bemidji, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near that place.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 13. An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes.

TEMPORARY INCREASE OF THE MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I submit a conference report on the temporary increase of the Military Establishment, to be printed under the rule.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman from Alabama when he intends to call up the conference report for action?

Mr. DENT. It is my intention to call it up to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. MANN. When does the gentleman expect to have the House meet?

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 10.30 a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 10.30 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TEMPORARY INCREASE OF MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. MANN. I understand from the gentleman from Alabama that the conference report will come up the first thing in the morning.

Mr. DENT. Yes; immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of papers on the Speaker's table.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the conference report.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that two hours' general debate be had on the conference report, one half to be controlled by myself and the other half by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that general debate on the conference report shall be limited to two hours, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from California. Is there objection?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how is it proposed to divide the time?

The SPEAKER. One half to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama and the other half by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from California agree as to what shall be done with the conference report.

Mr. KAHN. I will say, Mr. Speaker, that so far as the time which I shall have is concerned, I shall be pleased to give it to those who are opposed to the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARDNER. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask first if this is a proper time to reserve points of order.

The SPEAKER. Points of order have been reserved by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. GARDNER. The gentleman's request is for one or two hours on a side?

Mr. DENT. Two hours altogether.

Mr. GARDNER. I think it ought to be longer than that. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. GARDNER. Well, everybody knows what the fight is going to be to-morrow, and to shut off the Roosevelt proposition to one hour on a side seems to me unwise.

Mr. BRITTEN. Everybody knows all about it.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Massachusetts any suggestion to make to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. GARDNER. Certainly. I suggest that we should have two hours on a side.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I shall not agree to that. The whole conference on this bill has been held up for nearly two weeks looking to a solution of this problem, and it is time now for action and not for talk.

Mr. LANGLEY. But the House has not had a chance to be heard upon it.

Mr. GARDNER. This has been held up for nearly three years, so far as that goes.

Mr. LANGLEY. The Members of the House have not had a chance to be heard upon that proposition at all. The committee has taken up all of the time.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, inasmuch as the committee of conference has taken two weeks to agree upon the matter, it seems to me that the whole House should be entitled to a little more than an hour on a side in which to discuss it. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], he is mistaken. The conferees have been in conference these two weeks on three different bills—the regular annual Army appropriation bill, the Military Academy bill, and this new bill—and we have spent only from Saturday until Thursday on this new bill. I think two hours' debate is plenty.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

THE REVENUE BILL.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4280, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, this matter now under consideration is one of great importance. As the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] yesterday well said, there has never been a bill presented to any legislative body in the world raising through direct taxation upon the people a sum of money equal to that provided for in this bill. Therefore, to the people of the United States this is a matter of great importance.

First, let me say that the Committee on Ways and Means in considering this matter and selecting the items upon which they thought a tax could be placed did so absolutely free from politics. There was no partisan feeling brought into the consideration of this matter by members of that committee, every man realizing that he had a duty to perform, and he endeavored to perform that duty as a public-spirited American citizen, free from partisanship. [Applause.]

At the threshold of the Civil War, in 1861, our Treasury was depleted and the people of the country were much divided upon the great question that then confronted them. At that time, as at this time, it was the banks of the country that came to the relief of the Nation, and if I am correctly informed it was the National City Bank of New York that first subscribed to a Government loan for the people of the North in the Civil War.

Mr. MANN. The National Bank of Commerce.

Mr. MASON. The National Bank of the Republic.

Mr. FORDNEY. Perhaps my information is not correct; but, at least, that was one of the first to subscribe. The banks of the country came to the relief of the administration to the extent that the Government's credit was restored and they made it possible for the Government to engage in one of the greatest civil wars the world had ever known. There were then, in round numbers, in the United States some 31,000,000 people, two-thirds of whom resided north of Mason and Dixon's Line, or about 21,000,000 people from which to draw money and men to successfully carry on that war on the part of the North. The entire cost to those 21,000,000 people for the total expense of the Civil War was $6,190,000,000, not including money contributed by the various States o the Union. At this session of Congress we are appropriating from direct taxation upon the people and from the proceeds of the sale of bonds more money than the entire Civil War cost the people of the North. It has been my opinion, and is now, that we are making a mistake in imposing upon the people at this time such a large portion of the expense of this war. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there? I have a question or two that I would like to ask that might be appropriate at this time.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. I have been giving some little consideration to this question, and what I have to say, I think, will be apropos. I want to ask the gentleman from Michigan if the Ways and Means Committee held any public hearings in connection with this bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. The Ways and Means Committee heard a few gentlemen who came in at the request of some Senator or Member of the House.

Mr. MADDEN. But there were no public hearings?

Mr. FORDNEY. We gave no public hearings.

Mr. MADDEN. Was any Government official before the Committee on Ways and Means stating the use to which the money proposed to be raised in this bill is to be put?

Mr. FORDNEY. The Secretary of the Treasury consulted some members. I believe he did not come before the full committee and express himself, but he certainly did express himself. I know that he sent for me, and I went to his office, and he explained at some length the necessity for this money.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Was not the Secretary of the Treasury before the entire committee when it first met, as to the consideration of this policy of how much money we should raise?

Mr. MADDEN. But that is not what I am asking. I want to know what the Secretary said in regard to the use to which the money is to be put.

Mr. FORDNEY. Only in a general way has the committee had any information as to just where this money is to go.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the gentleman's judgment as to the use to which this money is to be put?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, my good friend, I can not tell you just where that money ought to go; but if we are to put 2,000,000 men in the field, and spend a billion dollars in the construction of ships to carry men and provisions and supplies abroad, and to spend a billion dollars in strengthening our Navy, God only knows how much money is going to be required to conduct the war.

Mr. MADDEN. I know; but that is not the question here.

Mr. FORDNEY. What question does the gentleman want to ask? Does he want me to detail the amount of money that is going to be used by the Army and the Navy for the next 12 months? If he does, I can not give him the information.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the judgment of the committee as to the use to which this money is to be put?

Mr. FORDNEY. I believe the judgment of the committee is based on the information given to it by the administration—that this money will be needed.

Mr. MADDEN. That is all?

Mr. FORDNEY. That is about all.

Mr. MADDEN. Is it supposed that it will be necessary to use any of this money to defray the civil expenses of the Government during the present or the next fiscal year?

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentleman will be patient, I will try to give that.

Mr. MADDEN. I would just like to ask these questions here, because——

Mr. FORDNEY. I can not answer all these questions at once, and I ask the gentleman to be courteous enough to let me get these questions one at a time.

Mr. MADDEN. I think I can show the gentleman and other gentlemen——

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, I know the gentleman from Illinois can throw light upon the mind of the gentleman from Michigan, but just wait until we reach that ray of sunshine.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the gentleman proceed without interruption for an hour and then answer such questions as may be asked him, if he so desires. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. I am rather inclined to think members of the Committee on Ways and Means ought to be glad to furnish information to the House and the country as to what this money is to be used for.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me say to my beloved friend I will be glad to give to him or any other man any information in my possession, if in my power to do so.

Mr. MADDEN. I did not think the gentleman showed any inclination to give information.

Mr. FORDNEY. I trust the gentleman does not think I wished to be discourteous——

Mr. MADDEN. I did not think the gentleman intended to be discourteous, but the information I was seeking was information that ought to be in the possession of every Member of the House, and before I get through asking the gentleman questions I intend to show that there is a billion two hundred millions levied by this bill that is not needed for the ordinary expenses of the Government or the conduct or maintenance of the Army or Navy. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield time to the gentleman from Illinois, and would be very glad indeed to have him show that to the House, if I am unable to do so in my humble and feeble way.

Mr. Chairman, I started to say we needed a very large sum of money to carry on this great war. I am afraid we have taken on a much greater undertaking than any man realizes. It is a matter of great seriousness. I say we should raise a larger proportion of the money needed by a bond issue. [Applause.] It is not reasonable that we should pay so heavily in human blood and money at this time in order that something may be done that is going to bring great benefits to the people of this country for all time to come. In the Civil War that was not requested. We yet are paying some of the Civil War debt. These bonds we are about to dispose of are going to be issued for a length of time from 30 to 40 years. We have, in round numbers, in this country at the present time 100,000,000 people. The population of this country will double in the next 25 years. Before any of these bonds, that are now being issued for a period of not less than 30 years, will mature we will have from two hundred to two hundred and fifty million people to pay them.

If we fight the battles of this Nation in this great world's war and pay a reasonable share of the expenses, in my opinion that is all we should be asked to do at this time. [Applause.] My friends, the entire Civil War, I say, cost this Nation $6,190,000,000, and during the session of Congress last winter and this extra session of Congress, including the loan of $3,000,000,000 to the allies, which we must pay whether they, the allies, pay or not, we have authorized and are taxing the people twelve and a half billion dollars. Let me describe that to you. Under existing law it is estimated that the taxes that will be collected by the Government this fiscal year are $1,570,000,000. While this bill proposes to raise $1,800,000,000, I will show you that the estimates are entirely too low, and if this bill is put into law as it is now prepared it will yield more than $2,000,000,000. Therefore by direct taxes this coming year we will raise more than three and a half billion dollars. Including the Panama Canal bonds, $240,000,000, and other bonds authorized by Congress at its last session, Congress authorized $790,000,000 of bonds to be sold. A few days ago we passed a bond issue here carrying $7,063,000,000, three billions of which is to be loaned to the allies. We are now appropriating by direct taxes $2,000,000,000 more. Put these sums together and you have $12,400,000,000, a sum beyond all comprehension, gentlemen. At a dollar a minute working night and day, Sundays and week days, it would require 2,000 years to create a fund of $1,000,000,000. Just $1,000,000,000. Multiply that by 12 and see the enormous sum of money we are calling upon the people of this country to pay now. If we need it, good and well; I am ready to pay my share so far as my income will permit me to pay it, as is every other public-spirited citizen. The most amusing thing in this whole situation in the preparation of this bill is that I have not received a single communication in person, by wire or by mail, from anybody who is satisfied with the way he is going to be taxed by this bill. [Laughter.] They want it put on some other man or levied in some other way. I assure you, gentlemen, that to put a tax of $2,000,000,000 upon the people in addition to the taxes now imposed by law is no easy task. In my opinion there are some injustices in this bill, and if I am permitted to have the time and can call to memory as I go along the things which I would like to discuss I will point them out to you. But as a whole I do not know where we could go to get that amount of money without levying the tax as provided in this bill. I have in mind one means of raising revenue which I am opposed to, but which would yield an enormous sum of money and would not be a very great burden upon the people. The intention of the members of the committee, who are conscientious men, is to place the taxes where they will be the least burden upon the masses of the people. We have put a stamp tax upon some articles—mortgage notes, bonds, and such like—which were in the law which was repealed a year ago, but we have left off the stamp tax from bank checks.

We have placed in this law a tax upon promissory notes, 2 cents per hundred or fractional part thereof, or 20 cents per thousand. If we were to place a tax of that kind upon bank checks—which I do not recommend—it would yield this Government from $500,000,000 to $900,000,000 at 2 cents per hundred or fractional part thereof, or 20 cents per thousand. Such a tax would not burden anybody, but it would cause more complaint than any other form of taxation.

My Democratic friends, let me say to you that I never thought it laid in your ingenious minds to search with a fine-tooth comb and find so many ways to raise revenue as you have devised. You have outwitted any Republican I ever heard of in that respect. [Applause.] But, as an old story goes, no man on the committee was satisfied with everything that went into this bill. I know I am not satisfied. But the answer to the whole thing is that we must have the money. And it is like the old story that I have told you many times of the boy that was digging potatoes. A man came along and said, "My son, what are you getting for doing this?" He replied, "I get nothing for doing it, but I will get hell if I do not do it." [Laughter.] And so it is, my friends, that I am going to enter my objection to the items in this bill of which I disapprove, but I am going to vote for the bill when the vote comes.

Now, in reference to the income tax. I want to tell you what the committee intended doing, and call your attention to the amount of tax imposed upon each and every person with a given income under existing law and the amount that will be imposed under this law and the total of the two; also the percentage of incomes that will pay taxes. I give you here the tax upon a single person. A married person pays $20 less on all these sums, because the exemption for a single person is $1,000, on which no tax is to be paid, and on a married person the exemption is $2,000. Therefore a single person is taxed at $20 on $1,000 of his $2,000 income, and then the two begin to travel along together. Under existing law, take any given sum called for and I will show the amount of taxes that would be paid. For instance, take a Congressman's salary of $7,500.

Mr. SWITZER. I would like to know whether or not the exemption carried in this bill changes the exemption of the existing law?

Mr. FORDNEY. It in no way changes the old law in any respect whatever. This law is in addition to the old law. A man whose income is $7,500 under the old law would pay $90 of tax—2 per cent on $4,500, there being an exemption of $3,000 under the old law. He will pay under this law an additional $155, or a total of $245, or 3.26 per cent of his income.

Now, let us go to a higher sum. I have it worked out here in many items. Suppose a person's income is $20,000. He would pay under the old law $340. Under this law he would pay an additional $880, or a total of $1,220, or 6.10 per cent of his income.

The following table shows: (a) The tax imposed on various incomes under existing law; (b) the additional tax on various incomes to be added under the operation of the proposed new rates; (c) the aggregate tax; (d) the per cent of total tax to the various incomes:

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask the gentleman a question while he is discussing the income tax?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. AUSTIN. What exemptions are there under this bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. One thousand dollars for a single person and $2,000 for a married person.

Mr. AUSTIN. What public officials are exempted from the operation of this bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. All those that are exempt under the old law—State, municipal, or county officials, and certain Federal officers.

Mr. AUSTIN. What certain Federal officers are exempt?

Mr. FORDNEY. I can not name all of them, but I believe the members of the Supreme Court and many others, and the President of the United States.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the gentleman will permit, I think he is in error. It is exactly the same, because we do specifically state local officials who were exempted under the old law.

Mr. FORDNEY. That was stricken out of the bill because it was held to be wholly unconstitutional, as has been shown by the Supreme Court decisions.

Mr. AUSTIN. Unconstitutional for a member of the Supreme Court to pay an income tax?

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, I am not a lawyer, but that is existing law, and we did not change that law for fear we might put some unconstitutional provision into this law.

Mr. AUSTIN. How much does the President pay under this bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. He does not pay anything. He is taxed like everybody else, except on the salary for the term for which he is elected. There is a provision of the Constitution which says that the Congress of the United States has no right to change the salary of the President for the term for which he has been elected, and it was supposed that a tax upon his salary would be a violation of this provision of the Constitution, and therefore we let it alone.

Mr. AUSTIN. How about Members of Congress?

Mr. FORDNEY. A Member of Congress comes in for every devilish thing on earth.

Mr. AUSTIN. Why should an exception and a distinction be made in the President's case? I understood the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] yesterday in a question I propounded to him to state that the President was not exempt from the provisions of this bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. He is not exempt except for whatever his salary may be for the term for which he is elected. He pays on all other income. His exemption is on the salary for the term beginning the 4th of March this year.

Mr. STERLING. He will pay on his salary under the old law?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. Let me go along further. Let us take an income of $100,000. I will hurry along, because to detail all these various amounts will take too much time. If a man's income was $100,000, he paid $3,940 under the old law. Under this law he will be taxed $10,280, or a total under both laws of $14,220, or 14.22 per cent of his income.

The tax increases until we get to $500,000. Under the old law a man having such an income pays a tax of $42,940. Under this bill he will pay an addition of $122,280, or a total of $165,220, or 33.04 per cent of his income. When you get to an income of $500,000, those supertaxes stop, do not go any further; but as the greater incomes are paying additionally the higher rates of supertax the percentage of income taxes increases until it reaches nearly 50 per cent, because under the old law the supertax is 13 per cent, and a normal tax of 2 per cent, or a total of 15 per cent.

Under this law there is an additional 2 per cent normal tax and 33 per cent supertax, making a total of 35 per cent under this law, and 15 under the other, which is a maximum of 50 per cent, so that, no matter what a man's income may be, the combined tax will never reach 50 per cent of his income because of the lower rate and because of the fact that the combined maximum rate is 50 per cent, computed on the excess income above $500,000.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. In a minute—going to a million dollars, if a man's income is a million dollars—and last year let me say that 120 men in the United States paid a tax on an income above $1,000,000—if a man's income is $1,000,000, he paid under the old law $102,920. Under this newly proposed law he will pay in addition $297,280, or a total tax of $400,220, or 40.2 per cent of his total income. When it reaches a million and a half dollars his tax is 42.66 per cent; when it reaches $3,000,000 it is 46.14 per cent.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. First let me say I know of a man, a resident of the State from which I have the honor to come, whose income is more than $30,000,000, as published in the annual report of the company of which he is president; and an income of $30,000,000 will pay in round numbers $15,000,000 under this law, or one-half of the income. Now I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. POWERS. I wanted to ask the gentleman about the President's salary and the salaries of Members of Congress. I understand the gentleman has stated that the President's salary was exempted from the operation of this income tax because to tax it would be regarded as changing or reducing his salary, which you have no right to do during his term. Is that correct?

Mr. FORDNEY. That is the argument as to why he is not taxed.

Mr. POWERS. If the President's salary can not be legally taxed, certainly the same reasoning would apply to a Member's salary.

Mr. FORDNEY. The Constitution has no such provision in regard to a Congressman, but it has in reference to the President.

Mr. LANGLEY. Did the retroactive provision apply to the President's salary prior to the beginning of the present term?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I think not.

Mr. LANGLEY. Well, I guess that is right, in view of the fact that "he kept us out of war."

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Different Members get up and address questions to the gentleman speaking without getting permission from him.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will be glad to answer all questions asked, because I am here to give, if possible, information to the Members of the House.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman has stated that upon an income of $1,000,000 50 per cent is taken for taxes, or about 42 per cent.

Mr. FORDNEY. In round numbers.

Mr. DOWELL. What would it be on an income of $100,000?

Mr. FORDNEY. I gave that, but I will give it to you again.

Mr. DOWELL. I mean what per cent of the income?

Mr. FORDNEY. On $100,000, $14,220, or 14.22 per cent of the income.

Mr. DOWELL. Now, the question that I was getting at was this: That the 50 per cent did not occur until the income became a million dollars.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; half a million dollars. When the income has reached one-half million dollars, that sum has reached the maximum amount of both normal and super tax under both laws. But as the income increases above $500,000 all those increased incomes pay the higher rate, as you will see, and consequently brings up the general average of income tax based on the total income. But the tax will never reach 50 per cent, because of the lower rate, and because of the fact that 50 per cent is the maximum under both laws.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. A great many Members would like to hear the gentleman from Michigan conclude his remarks without interruption.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan has control of his own time. If he does not desire to be interrupted, the Chair will endeavor to protect him.

Mr. FORDNEY. I feel it my duty to answer questions as we go along, because a man may have something come into his mind while I am discussing a point that he would forget before I could conclude my remarks. I would like to be interrupted as little as possible, but I will aim to answer every question that is presented.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BLAND. Since the gentleman was interrupted at this time, I would like to ask a question.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BLAND. Is the gentleman familiar with the provisions of the bill with reference to where the money goes that you raise by the law—particularly the money that is taken in by the increase of postage?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will state to the gentleman this: The gentleman from Indiana called my attention to that matter yesterday. As fourth-class postmasters are permitted to retain all their cancellations up to a certain amount of the receipts of their offices, the fourth-class postmasters would get all of the cancellations up to a certain amount; and as the postmasters in first, second, and third class offices are paid a salary based upon the receipts of the office, a very large portion of these increased receipts would go to the postmasters of the country. The gentleman has well suggested, as he did yesterday or the day before, that some provision of law be placed in this bill to provide that none of this increased revenue from postal receipts shall go to either until this war is over. [Applause.] That is justifiable and should go into the law, and I believe the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], is willing to have such a provision written into the law, and I am in favor of it.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will in a minute.

Mr. BLAND. I would like to state to the gentlemen of the committee that prior to the report of the committee I waited on two or three members of the committee with this suggestion, thinking probably that it would go into the bill, but as soon as it came out and did not contain that provision I immediately sought out members of the committee and talked with them about the advisability of it. They suggested that I go to the Post Office Department and get the Post Office Department to assist in drafting an amendment, which I did, and I have here a copy of the amendment that I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks would meet the requirements.

I will say in advance that, the Post Office Department and myself having worked out this amendment, I find that the chairman of the committee [Mr. KITCHIN] has an exact copy of the amendment, which he proposes to offer as a committee amendment.

Mr. FORDNEY. I believe I have a copy of it. I will ask the gentleman to read it, because mine is a dim print.

Mr. BLAND. It reads:

And provided further, That the salaries of all postmasters in offices of the first, second, and third classes shall not be increased after July 1, 1917, during the existence of the present war: And provided further, That the compensation of postmasters in offices of the fourth class shall continue to be computed on the basis of the present rate of postage.

I will ask the gentleman from Michigan if he thinks that to add that at the end of the last section on the subject of postal rates would cure the difficulty?

Mr. FORDNEY. I rather think it would. If I understood the chairman of the committee [Mr. KITCHIN] yesterday, I think he and other members of the committee propose an amendment of that kind to the bill.

Mr. CRISP. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CRISP. I want to call my colleague's attention to the fact that it was the intention of the committee, several days ago, and the committee then agreed, that they would put into the bill a provision that all this increase should go to war expenses and not to the postmasters; and further, I wish specifically to call attention to the fact that the chairman of our committee [Mr. KITCHIN], in his speech yesterday, expressly and explicitly stated to the House that he would offer an amendment to carry that into effect.

Mr. FORDNEY. He did. I had forgotten, however, that it was discussed in the committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. That was decided on several days ago.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. I merely want to call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAND] to the fact that the committee had already decided to do that, and the only reason why it has not been put into the bill is that we were waiting for the Post Office Department to prepare the amendment that the gentleman just called attention to.

Mr. BLAND. The Post Office Department did not have this under consideration until I took it up with them, but the committee had had it under consideration, and when I took it up with the Post Office Department they were very glad to prepare the amendment.

Mr. GARNER. Undoubtedly the gentleman from Indiana killed the bear. There is not any doubt about that.

Mr. FORDNEY. At all events I want that provision to go into the law, and I believe the members of the Ways and Means Committee are agreed upon it.

Mr. GARLAND. I will suggest to members that this is not the time to discuss amendments. There will be plenty of opportunity to do that afterwards. I think we want to hear the gentleman from Michigan, and his time is being consumed by these questions about amendments. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Thank you, sir. Now, gentlemen, in reference to the income tax. I believe we will raise more money than it is estimated will be raised, and I will tell you why. It is estimated by the Treasury Department that under existing law the corporation income tax and individual income tax will yield $330,000,000 on last year's incomes, to be paid before June 30. To satisfy the members of the committee that we were going to raise enough money for the purposes of the administration, after much hesitation and argument, and much dissatisfaction among members of the committee, we decided to tax last year's incomes an additional 33⅓ per cent of the amount those incomes will pay in June. Some have already paid. One-third of $330,000,000 will amount to $110,000,000. I see by the report that it is estimated that the amount will be $108,000,000. Now, the Treasury Department advised me that the reports on incomes this year show an increased collection over incomes last year of 20 per cent; therefore basing it not upon theory or upon an estimate, but upon actual returns already made, we will raise more money this year. So it seems to me that we will raise not only one-third more than the full amount raised last year, but 20 per cent more than the amount raised last year based on the old rate, and an additional one-third more based on the increased rate.

I have figured up here the amount that we will raise on incomes. I have taken the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue as to the number of people who pay taxes upon a given income, and then have figured out the amount that each one would pay, and have multiplied it by the number of people who paid an income tax last year. Based upon those figures, which are absolutely correct, I find we will raise this year $1,030,000,000 from incomes, not including the excess profits tax, which is $226,000,000. By doubling the excess profits tax, as we have in this bill, making it 16 per cent on excess profits as against 8 per cent under existing law, we will get $452,000,000 this year not including any increase in the amount of excess profits. That is a very large sum of money. In my judgment this bill is going to raise more than $2,000,000,000, and I believe I can justify such a statement. For instance, last year this Government collected $153,000,000 on distilled spirits. The year before there was collected from that source $133,800,000, showing an increase of more than $12,000,000 last year over the previous year. The tax on alcohol in the existing law is $1.10 a gallon. We have added $1.10 more, or just doubled it up. If the same quantity of spirits is withdrawn from bond this coming year that was withdrawn last year, we will raise an additional $153,000,000. But it is reasonable to suppose that because of prohibition laws there will be a reduction in the consumption of liquor this year as against last year. But in the estimates here you will notice the receipts from the tax on distilled spirits are estimated at $83,000,000 and not $153,000,000. Conceding that the figures of the Treasury Department are correct in the falling off of consumption to 120,000,000 gallons as against 138,000,000 or 140,000,000 gallons last year, then $1.10 on 120,000,000 gallons is a sum far in excess of the estimates given in this report, viz, $83,000,000.

Now, let me go further. Rectified spirits is alcohol mixed with some adulterated, chiefly water, oil to put a bead on it, and a flavoring extract; that is all. By drinking rectified spirits you get less alcohol in your stomach than you would to drink the pure alcohol. We will raise a certain sum of money from this source, say from $8,000,000 to $10,000,000.

But let us go to brewed liquors. Last year there was collected by the Government on beer in round figures $88,000,000, at $1.50 per barrel. Figure that out, and you will find that the consumption last year was 60,160,000 barrels of beer. I did not drink my share of that beer. [Laughter.] I never drank a glass of beer in my life, and never expect to. I do not know that I am any better off for that. I may have other bad habits to make up for that, but that question is not in this argument. The estimated amount to be collected on beer under this bill is only $37,500,000. We add $1.25 war tax on 59,000,000 barrels of beer, and figure that we will only receive an income of $37,500,000 in addition to last year's receipts.

Do you believe that the falling off in the consumption of beer this next year will bring the receipts down to thirty-seven and one-half million dollars? Not at all. If the consumption of beer this year is equal to last year, which was 10.6 per cent above the year before, the amount of the tax collected under this bill will be $74,000,000 and not thirty-seven and one-half million dollars as here estimated. I mention these things because as I go along I want to point out to you that, in my candid judgment, we are going to raise more than $2,000,000,000 under this bill, which, I think, is a mistake, although I will vote for it when it comes to a vote.

We have doubled up the tax on all wines except dry wines, and so on. Now, when we get to cigars and cigarettes, it is shown here that we will collect this year $25,000,000 on cigarettes in addition to the amount collected last year. We collected last year in round numbers $35,000,000, with a greater consumption of cigarettes last year over the previous year's consumption. With the population of the country increasing I am sorry to say that the consumption of cigarettes and tobacco increases. I have not used my share. I never smoked a cigar or a cigarette in my life. I never voted the prohibition ticket in my life but once, and that was last fall, when the constitutional amendment was submitted in Michigan.

On manufactured tobacco we collected more last year than the estimate will show here, and we double that tax.

Now, on telegrams and telephone messages, where the message was more than 15 cents, under the old law we collected two and one-half million dollars at 1 cent per message. In this bill the amount is fixed at 5 cents, or twelve and a half million dollars. I notice that the estimate in this bill is $7,000,000. I know of no good reason why that estimate should not be twelve and a half million dollars. I know of no man that will decline to send a telegram because there is a tax of 5 cents instead of 1 cent on that message, and I believe the full amount of $12,500,000 will be collected.

Now, we come to express companies. The committee looked around to raise money where it would not injure some particular industry or the great mass of the people. We placed a 10 per cent tax on all passenger tickets—Pullman car tickets, chair car tickets, and all other kinds. When you go to the ticket office, if this bill becomes a law as now written, you will pay in addition to the regular railroad fare 10 per cent. From Washington to my home a ticket costs $17, so that I will be required to pay in addition $1.70 into the Treasury of the United States to carry on this war. It is not going to hurt me. I would not walk that distance for $1.70; neither would you. This tax does not include railroad fares below 25 cents, for we did not want to burden the man that lives out of town and goes back and forth to his work on the cars. We placed a 10 per cent tax on all express charges, and as express charges are larger than freight charges the committee thought it wise to put a larger tax on express charges than on freight bills. So we put 10 per cent on express charges. We have placed 3 per cent on all freight charges.

Let me show you what that will raise. Last year there was collected in passenger fares for railroad and steamboat lines, in round numbers, $800,000,000. Ten per cent on that sum is $80,000,000. There was collected last year in freight charges by the railroads of the country $2,444,000,000, and, in round numbers, $200,000,000 by water freight. These collections last year were $400,000,000 by the railroads in excess of freight collected the year before. Therefore it is reasonable to suppose that the freight paid this coming year will be in excess of the freight paid last year, which was $2,444,000,000.

I have taken two and a half billion dollars for easy figuring. Three per cent on two and a half billion dollars is $75,000,000.

Therefore the freight collected on that basis would be $75,000,000, and $80,000,000 on passenger fares.

Now, that is a tax that will not burden anybody. It was suggested by some members of the committee that we should make the railroads of the country pay a tax on the proceeds of the sale of both passengers and freight. If the House will bear with me a minute I will tell you why I opposed a tax of that kind. The railroads of the country to-day are unable to supply themselves with the necessary rolling stock and equipment to handle the business of the country, and every manufacturing institution in this country is suffering at this time for the want of more cars. Prices are high on every article produced in the country. For instance, I am engaged in the manufacture of lumber. I mention that, because I am familiar with the particulars. Every lumber yard in this country is overstocked, and prices have not been so high in four or five years as they are to-day. But freight can not be moved because of a lack of cars. A lumber yard in which I am interested to-day has nearly 13,000,000 feet of lumber piled up, when our normal stock is only 5,000,000 feet. Higher prices are prevailing, as I have said, than at any time within the past five years. Of course we would move that lumber quickly and get the high prices if the railroad companies could handle the product, but they can not. Drastic railroad legislation by Congress and the various legislative bodies in the various States of this country has gone to the extreme, and there never was a time in the history of this country when as many railroads were in the hands of receivers as within the last year. I received a few days ago information concerning the value and number of miles of railroad which are in the hands of receivers, and to my surprise found that 14.9 per cent of all the railroad mileage of the United States is this minute in the hands of receivers.

Let me say the power to fix the maximum rates for railroads to charge rests in the Interstate Commerce Commission, and beyond rates they fix the railroads can not go. That fixes their income. Recently the Congress of the United States fixed by law the minimum wage scale that the railroads shall pay. Consequently the railroads of this country are between those two great powers—a political body on the one side, the Congress of the United States, and the Interstate Commerce Commission on the other. The power to fix the minimum wage scale and the maximum income for the railroads ought to be placed in one body, the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Let me show you what our railroads are doing as compared with foreign railroads. I am making this argument because I have been informed that an amendment will be offered to this bill before it passes to put a tax upon the freight rates of the railroads of the country, and I want to give you at this opportune time the information. I have taken the last yearly statistics of the railroads of the principal countries of the world that were available and have compared them with ours, and here is what I find. Nineteen hundred and thirteen is the last year for which I am able to get reliable statistics as to the railroads in Europe. The pay to all railway employees in France was $5 per week and the freight charge was 1.30 cents per ton per mile. The wages paid in England were $7 per week and the freight charge 2.23 cents per ton per mile. In Austria the wage is $6.35 per week and the freight rates 1.34 cents per ton per mile. It is exactly the same in Hungary, except that the wages there are $5.77 per week. In Russia the wages are $4.06 per week and the freight rates 1.94 cents per ton per mile. In Japan the wages are $2.17 per week and the freight rates 0.87 cent per ton per mile. The Government of Japan owns nearly all of the railroads in that country.

Now let us take Germany, where 95 per cent of all of the railroads are owned by the Government. The wages there are $7 per week and the freight rates 1.37 cents per ton per mile. In the United States the wages are $16.52 per week and the freight rates 0.71 cents per ton per mile. Our railroad wages are more than double those of any other country in the world and the freight charges one-half those of any other country in the world, except Japan, where the wage scale is but 31 cents per day. Is there anything in that argument that would influence you to have the Government of the United States own and operate our railroads? Our wage scale is double that of Germany and our freight rates one-half. In Germany the Government owns the railroads and in the United States the individuals do. Go to Government-owned railroads and you will have the greatest political machine ever created in this country, and you will pay double the freight rates that you pay to-day.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Does not the gentleman think that in order to be fair he ought to state the fact that the mileage, the average distance haul of tonnage, in Germany is a very great deal shorter than it is in this country?

Mr. FORDNEY. I believe that is true, but that does not cut any very great figure.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman understands that if you take a ton of freight and haul it a hundred miles you can do it for a great deal less per ton per mile than you can if you haul it only 10 miles?

Mr. FORDNEY. But, my friend, Russia has 6,000 miles of railroad across Siberia and her rate is 1.94 cents per ton per mile. She hauls freight a great distance. That does make some difference, but it does not make up the great difference that I have demonstrated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, should not the further fact be considered that in Germany there is a density of traffic which is greater than here, and freight rates should be less accordingly, whereas they are greater than in this country? The suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] does not hold, because in compactly settled countries the freight rate naturally comes down per ton per mile.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; that is right. The greater the volume of business done by the railroad the greater the profit and the less the rate which can be profitably charged by the railroads. In Germany the Government-owned railroads, with labor costs less than half our own, cost $113,000 a mile to construct and equip, and their equipment is not as good as ours. Our roads have cost $76,000 per mile with labor double what it is in Germany or in any other country in the world. The cheapest constructed railroads in the world per mile are the railroads of the United States, and the best equipped roads in the world are in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand that the Government of the United States owns the Panama Railroad. Can the gentleman tell us what it costs the Government per ton per mile to operate that railroad—to draw freight over it?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I can not tell you that, but I can give you an illustration of what the Government does. For the district that I have the honor to represent, in the State of Michigan, I received an appropriation at the courtesy of this House amounting to $70,000 with which to build a post office. Ten thousand dollars of that money was expended in a site, and it cost $50,500 to put up the building. Eight thousand nine hundred dollars went to the superintendent and for drawing the plans. Great God! In their extravagance they just managed to keep out of State prison, and that is all—robbed the Government. That is the percentage of cost that it costs the Government of the United States to do anything in proportion to that of an individual. The Government of the United States, with the red tape and the loose management that must come from politicians, can not do anything; can not carry on any great enterprise as cheaply as it can be carried on by private individuals or well-conducted corporations.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will just make a guess that it costs the Government 2½ cents a mile to draw a ton of freight on the Panama Railroad.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. DECKER. Is the gentleman familiar with the railroad owned by the city of Cincinnati, and can he give us any information as to the equipment and success of that enterprise? I am asking for information.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I can not; but let me ask the gentleman is that a belt line?

Mr. DECKER. No; that is a long railroad. I forget just where it runs.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, any person having an acquaintance with that line knows that it runs from Cincinnati to Chattanooga, and it is operated by a private corporation—leased by the city of Cincinnati for a number of years.

Mr. AUSTIN. It is the Queen & Crescent Line, that runs from Cincinnati to Chattanooga. It is not owned by the city of Cincinnati.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. As I recall, reverting back to the Panama Canal Railroad, when I was down there the Government charged 5 cents a mile for passenger transportation.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman from Ohio says the Panama Canal Railroad charges 5 cents a mile.

Mr. FESS. That is my remembrance.

Mr. FORDNEY. If they do that, they charge for freight in proportion. Let me go back a minute.

I had not concluded in reference to the income tax. There is a limit to where we can go in taxing incomes in this country, and especially corporations. It was suggested by some members of the committee we ought to put a higher rate than 16 per cent on excess-profits tax. Others wanted a higher rate on normal taxes. One per cent on normal taxes will amount to more money than 4 per cent on excess-profits taxes, because you begin at the very base of a man's income there in normal taxes. There is a limit to which you can go and take from a man his income until he begins to evade the law. If you make him mad, he is going to get the best of you if he can. Let me tell you how he can do it. There is no law in this country or any other that compels a corporation to pay dividends.

I know of a corporation in a city in Michigan where the stockholders are quarreling among themselves trying to make the president of that company pay a dividend, and he will not do it, although their profits are very great. So the very minute you have taxed the corporation to the point where the stockholders see you are about to confiscate their property, they will pass to surplus their earnings instead of paying it in dividends, and the next year get the benefit of the deduction of 5 per cent on capital and surplus used, or 8 per cent on capital and surplus. So in making up these rates the committee was mindful of these possibilities. Another thing—it was stated that we ought to tax some men of this country whose incomes are very great not from industrial institutions but from inheritance. There are men in the city of New York who have inherited from their forefathers great and valuable property. Suppose a case, I am only supposing a case, but it seems to be reasonable, that a man owned the Waldorf-Astoria in New York and had it leased to a corporation. He knows their note is good, and instead of collecting his earnings this year he will say, "I have no use for the money; could you use it at 3 per cent? If so, give me your note for four or five years at 3 per cent." That is not income until the note is paid, and you can not make them pay it, at least I do not know of any way you can. So, you see, he will begin to dodge the very minute you begin to put a burden upon him that is an excessive burden. Some gentlemen came to individual members of the committee, to the chairman and myself and some other members, and advocated the taking of 98 per cent of all the incomes above $50,000 or $100,000 or various amounts. Simmered down, I will bet a dollar to a doughnut their income was below the amount they proposed to exempt. They were after the other fellow. I never knew a man in my life who wanted free trade on his own product. He wanted free trade on something he wanted to buy. He wanted protection for himself. I never knew a man, although one did come before the committee and said, "My father's income is very great, and he sends me here to tell you that you ought to take all income above $100,000." You put that into the law, and I will bet you 10 to 1 he would divide up his stock with his children and make his income below the amount suggested. [Laughter.] I never saw a man do anything of that kind, although it has been suggested. Now, my friends——

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to divert the continuity of the gentleman's thoughts——

Mr. FORDNEY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. There is a clause here giving a definition of capital invested. I want to inquire of the gentleman, Is it the intention of the committee in defining the capital invested to give credit to those persons or corporations that have invested their money or earnings in timber lands or mining properties where they have increased in value as a credit on their income?

Mr. FORDNEY. My friend, I did not intend to say anything about that matter, but as the gentleman has opened up the question I feel at liberty to discuss it.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I was anxious to know what the intention of the committee was under that definition. It is found on page 7—bottom of the page.

Mr. FORDNEY. My good friend, we had considerable discussion over that very point in the committee. I took one position and my friend Mr. KITCHIN another. The only reason in my opinion he won out was that they needed the money, not because of the justice of the argument on his side. Let me tell you what that is. That paragraph says:

SEC. 202. That for the purpose of this title actual capital invested means (1) actual cash paid in, (2) the actual cash value of property paid in otner than cash for stock or shares in such corporation or partnership at the time of such payment.

Now, this bill permits a bank to use its capital, its surplus, and its undivided profits as capital used, and on that the corporation can deduct $5,000 and 8 per cent in paying excess profits taxes. I used this argument and I want to use it now, but I vote for the bill with all the inequalities in it because I am a Roman and I stand by the majority. Let me call your attention to this fact: Suppose a case—and I know of an instance of a man in California who, in January, 1887, 30 years ago last January, purchased a piece of property for a fraction less than $20,000. That property to-day is worth from $250,000 to $300,000 because of the enhanced value in the 30 years, being a timber property. Suppose that man builds a sawmill to-day that costs him $100,000, or built it last year, before this bill becomes a law. What is his capital? Is it $100,000 he put into the mill and $20,000 invested in the property 30 years ago, making $120,000 in all, or is it the capital put in the mill and the actual market value of that timber to-day? I say it is the actual value as of to-day.

If his property is worth $250,000 and he puts $100,000 in the mill, his capital is $350,000, on which he should be entitled to deduct 8 per cent before he pays an excess profits tax, and not $120,000.

Suppose that 20 years ago some gentlemen joined with me and we purchased a lumbering institution in the South, or anywhere, for which we paid $200,000. We have taken our profits each year, took a living out of it, nothing more, put back into the business money with which to purchase timber time and again, until to-day our property is worth $1,000,000, although we only put in originally $200,000. What is our capital? Is it $200,000 or is it $1,000,000?

Let me go a little further. Suppose a gentleman here and I own that property jointly. Some man comes along and says to me, "I will give you half a million dollars for your interest,

Mr. FORDNEY," and I take it. He wants to buy the other man's interest, but he will not sell, because he thinks it is worth more money. There are two men now who are partners, one old one and one new one; one put in originally $100,000 and the other has put in $500,000. What is the capital on which they can deduct 8 per cent? Ought they not both to be treated alike? Certainly they had. The other man could have sold his for half a million. It is the market value to-day. That is the gauge that ought to be used as to capital. That is the market value to-day.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. I wish to explain that further, but I will yield.

Mr. FESS. I wanted to ask just here, what is capital in the illustration you have used in the bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. The capital originally invested, not the value of to-day.

Mr. FESS. Not the market value?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; for the reason, as the gentleman from North Carolina argues, it would be impossible to take physical value to-day. A man's assets are his capital. You make a statement every year, or every practical man does, and he shows his assets and liabilities. He must do that. Every merchant takes an inventory of the goods on the shelves once a year, and shows what his assets are and what his liabilities are, and the difference is his property over and above his debts. Everybody makes that statement. Everybody makes a sworn statement now to the Government in paying their income tax and their corporation tax, and there can be heavy penalties placed in the law for a violation of an oath in that report, and they are placed there; and other countries have that provision of law.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Suppose a person paid $200,000 for his property when he purchased it and to-day it was worth $100,000?

Mr. FORDNEY. I was just going to refer to that. I know of an instance in the State of Louisiana where a firm has been in operation for 20 years. In March I visited that concern. They have only about four years more cut of timber when they will be out of business. There is no more timber to buy in that vicinity. Their capital was $1,500,000 when they started in. The value of the standing timber to-day is but a quarter of a million dollars. Are you going to let that firm deduct 8 per cent on its original capital, $1,500,000, when its assets are to-day a quarter of a million? That would not be right. Uncle Sam would be robbed in that case.

In our stamp tax upon stocks the law that we passed at the last session of Congress, that 50 cents per thousand stock tax, is to be based upon actual value of that stock, not the par value, because we know there are many stock companies in this country to-day whose property is worth but 25 cents on the par value of their stock. And we know there are many corporations in the country whose real property value is five to ten times the par value of their stock when that company was first organized. The provision of law, in my opinion, my good friend, is not right and ought to be written differently.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Is the difference upon the part of the members of the Ways and Means Committee one merely of the construction of language?

Mr. FORDNEY. No.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Or do you differ as to the objects?

Mr. FORDNEY. We differ as to the objects, because it is claimed that if you permit corporations to-day to deduct 8 per cent on the real value of the property this excess profits tax will very materially dwindle and you will not get nearly so much money. And we need the money.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I thought I understood the chairman of the committee yesterday to contend the same thing that the gentleman is contending for, but that it was merely a difference as to the construction of the language—as to the definition of the capital invested.

Mr. FORDNEY. I have here the language that I offered.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. I would like to ask the gentleman what he would think of this language as definition of capital invested, namely—

That for the purpose of this title actual capital invested shall be taken to be the fair market price or value of all assets, real, personal, or mixed, owned and used in connection with the business at the beginning of each accounting period for which the tax is to be computed.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is the language I offered as an amendment to the bill, and the committee voted it down because we need the money, not because it was not just.

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BATHRICK. Let me ask the opinion as to the effect of this law in this illustration: Suppose a corporation buys a piece of land for $10,000 and erects a building on it—although the value of the building is not necessary to my illustration—and after a term of years the land itself increased in value so it is worth $100,000 more, would this bill as it stands require his exemption to rest upon the $10,000 and not consider the $100,000 at all?

Mr. FORDNEY. Absolutely. The original capital invested, not its value to-day or during the taxable year.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do.

Mr. STAFFORD. I desire to ascertain the gentleman's construction of this section as to what is capital, on this state of facts: Suppose a corporation invests some of its surplus in buildings and purchase of equipment, would that be considered capital on which they would be entitled to deduct the 8 per cent exemption?

Mr. FORDNEY. My friend, if you put in your undivided profits and put that addition into the business it is considered capital. For instance, we will say a bank organizes with a capital of $100,000. It runs along until it has a surplus of $100,000 and undivided profits of $100,000. The capital of that bank is $300,000, and on that 8 per cent can be deducted before excess profits begin. But it is only in the case of a bank and not with an industrial institution.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, the gentleman from North Carolina—and I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina—when I put that concrete case to him yesterday he stated it would be considered as capital and would be considered as the basis for the 8 per cent deduction.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; only in the case of a bank.

Mr. STAFFORD. My instance yesterday was in the case of an industrial corporation that uses some of its profits in the purchase of equipment, of machinery, or buildings, and the like, which is really capital, and I asked the gentleman from North Carolina the question whether that would be the basis of the 8 per cent deduction, and he said under his construction it would be.

Mr. KITCHIN. In the case the gentleman put yesterday and to-day it would be considered capital and would have the deduction. It distinguishes the part of profit from wear and tear or depreciation.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not talking about the question of depreciation. I am talking about the diversion of part of its capital in the purchase of equipment, of machinery, of stock, or of buildings, and whether under the new phraseology that would be the basis of the 8 per cent deduction?

Mr. FORDNEY. As I understand the gentleman's question, if the surplus is put into the buildings it is capital, but increased values are not capital under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Take the case of a corporation that was originally capitalized at $50,000, and where at several periods since that time, out of the surplus earnings, additional capital has been created. Now, of course, that, under this law, stands as capital as well as surplus and undivided profits on which the 8 per cent can be deducted. Is that right?

Mr. FORDNEY. Any money paid in as capital or any money put aside as surplus account and used as capital is considered capital under the terms of this bill.

Mr. SNYDER. Whether earned or paid in?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; not whether earned. You have got to put it to surplus.

Mr. SNYDER. And then be declared into capital stock?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and put into actual use.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Under a condition of that kind, where the surplus is created and put into capital stock and distributed, the tax is levied upon that distribution, the same as any other dividend, is it not?

Mr. FORDNEY. Whenever a profit is about to be distributed in dividends, if it is distributed as a stock dividend, it does not come in as capital.

Mr. BRITTEN. But it is taxed?

Mr. FORDNEY. Of course it is taxed.

Mr. GRAY of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GRAY of New Jersey. Would it not be rather difficult to administer a law that would reckon increased values? Would it not be almost impracticable?

Mr. FORDNEY. If you are a business man and engaged in manufacturing, you know that every year, at the end of the year, you make a statement showing your assets and your liabilities. You know you make a report to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and you certify to the correctness of that report, that the value of your property is so much.

If you make a false statement, you commit perjury; and under the provisions of the law you can be punished for making a false statement. Every man makes a statement now who pays an income tax or a corporation tax, and he certifies to the correctness of the statement. Every corporation must show its assets and its liabilities and show what the income is, and must pay the tax; so that there is no effort required at all on the part of the Government to revalue property. Everybody values their own property and has to certify to its correctness.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman will remember that this same argument that has just been mentioned was to some extent used in the committee, that it would be entirely impracticable for the Secretary of the Treasury to appraise and value all the property of these various corporations and partnerships. But it seems to me that there might be a provision that would do away with a great deal of that and perhaps avoid this entire objection, though I agree with the gentleman from Michigan as to his construction of the provision as it now stands. If the provision is left as it is now, but with a provision that in case the owner of the property claimed that the amount actually invested was larger than the amount originally paid in, he could have the privilege of showing that to the Secretary of the Treasury; and on the other hand, in the case which the gentleman from Michigan mentioned a short time ago, when the assets had greatly depreciated below the amount originally invested, the Treasury might have an opportunity of showing that, if they saw fit, and taking its valuation. It seems to me there would not be one case in a thousand when there would be a revaluation, but that a correct balance would be struck.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; because when you make your statement the Government either accepts it or rejects it and sees whether you make your statement correctly. The Government has the right to prove whether you make your statement correctly; if you value your property too high, they will make you come down to what it ought to be; and if you make it less than it should be, they will make you raise it up.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The work would be upon the party concerned?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and not upon the Government.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. A few minutes ago the gentleman used an illustration, the leasing of the Waldorf Hotel, as an example, by which the owner might escape the income tax.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. As I understood the statement, the owner might lease the property and then, instead of actually receiving the rent, leave it for a period of years to the lessees and thus escape the tax. That does not seem a fair proposition or a correct interpretation of the word income. It seems to me the question hinges on the meaning of the word income, whether it is money actually received or money earned. Let me read Webster's definition of income. It is, among other things, "that gain which proceeds from labor, business, property, or capital." Would it not be income gained from property, but not received in actual cash?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; for instance——

Mr. HICKS. That man might have a gain, but did not receive any actual income?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; for instance, suppose you take my note for four years——

Mr. HICKS. I would be glad to take it.

Mr. FORDNEY. I question whether you would get your pay unless I put up collateral——

Mr. HICKS. I would be glad to take my chances on that.

Mr. FORDNEY. Because there is some doubt whether a four-year note will be paid, no matter who gives it, because God only knows what is going to happen to values in this country, or men's ability to pay, in the next four years.

Mr. HICKS. If the property earns an income, can it not be considered income whether the owner of the property actually receives it or whether he loans it? If the rent is loaned, then in reality the owner of the property has received it; otherwise he could not loan it, and it is income subject to the tax.

Mr. FORDNEY. He has not received it. It may be splitting hairs; but, as I said, to start with, the minute you begin to punish a fellow, he will begin to try to evade the law, and he will beat you if he can. I only gave that as one illustration of a possible way for a man to evade paying his taxes. I do not believe that would happen.

Mr. SNYDER. Using the same illustration, supposing the man who leased the Waldorf-Astoria was unable to pay for two years. Then there would not be any income received.

Mr. FORDNEY. No.

Mr. SNYDER. And it could not be considered that there was any income.

Mr. FORDNEY. No.

Mr. SNYDER. And the case is exactly the same, whether he was able to pay or whether he was not, so long as he did not pay.

Mr. FORDNEY. It would be exactly the same whether he was able to pay or unable, so long as you took his note for it.

Mr. HUSTED. What would be the situation of a corporation which purchased a tract of land, say, 50 years ago, and on that tract of land from time to time erected buildings and improvements as the necessities of its business demanded, but never kept any accurate track on its books of the actual cost of those buildings and improvements, but carried them at the appraised valuation. How would the surplus of such a corporation be determined for the purposes of taxation under this act?

Mr. FORDNEY. I can only give you my opinion. I should say, if the man was a practical business man he would enter on his books the amount of money invested in the plant from time to time and his books would show how much money he had actually put in in addition to the original value of the property, what buildings had been placed on it, and the capital invested in those buildings, and he would be permitted to deduct that amount; but if his father gave him the property originally and he paid nothing for it, that is not capital, and under the provisions of this bill he could not deduct anything for that as capital.

Mr. PLATT. Is there not danger of getting the income-tax rates so high as to kill reinvestments and stop the prosperity of the country?

Mr. FORDNEY. There is such danger, but I do not believe the rates in this bill will do that. Take, for instance, a man whose income is a million dollars and above that, you are going to take practically half his income. Well, if he is economical he can live on half a million dollars a year, and it is only the very large incomes that are very heavily taxed.

Mr. PLATT. Suppose he had an income of $2,000,000 and spent $1,000,000 and reinvested the other. If the Government takes the other million he will not have it to reinvest.

Mr. FORDNEY. He will have to cut down his expenses and live on a little less than a million dollars, that is all. I would try it mighty hard if my income was equal to that sum.

Mr. REED. How far back is your tax on corporation incomes retroactive?

Mr. FORDNEY. One year only; for the calendar year 1916.

Mr. REED. Let us presume that a corporation has made a little money, and on the 1st of April distributed it, and then sold out to somebody else. Who is penalized in the payment of this retroactive tax?

Mr. FORDNEY. With the ability of the Democratic Party to find revenue here, I leave it to them to find that money. I believe they will get it. Before I came into the room this morning a gentleman asked me a question about the tax upon insurance policies. I was in error. I had in mind then that the stamp tax upon these policies would be placed upon the policy at the home office; but instead of that, as I have once before informed him, that provision was not changed in this bill, and they will not be required to put on the stamps, but they will pay proportionately a lump sum of money, based on the value of the stamp. That is to avoid placing the stamp there. That is so also in the case of soft drinks. The tax is there placed upon the liquid gas and upon the sirups used, and so on.

Mr. REED. In the case I mentioned the corporation continuing in business would have to pay the tax, would they not?

Mr. FORDNEY. They would be called on to pay it, and they would have to take it out of the business, or out of the profits next coming due, I presume.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield on that?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. That retroactive provision is simply adding one-third to the tax of this year.

Mr. FORDNEY. One-third of the tax on last year's income under the old law, and that is the end of that tax—33⅓ per cent of the money that will be collected on last year's incomes. That will yield $110,000,000 revenue.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I want to ask my friend about a corporation engaged in the manufacture of pianos or musical instruments. They pay an excess profits tax, and then I understand they pay 5 per cent on their sales.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; on all musical instruments valued above $10.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. A delegation called on me this morning; I suppose they called on other Members; and they said that a good deal of their business of manufacturing and selling pianos involved sales on time, and they said if they had to pay that 5 per cent on sales it would amount to more than the whole of the first installment, and the burden of carrying that 5 per cent would very greatly injure their business and perhaps destroy it. What does the gentleman say about that?

Mr. FORDNEY. I think it is a wrong principle of taxation to tax the gross proceeds of sales.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is it not a little unfair to single out certain industries and tax them 5 per cent in that way?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; but the whole business is unfair, on musical instruments and automobiles especially. I think we are burdening them. I think we will put several institutions out of business, which will work to the benefit of some other institutions that are engaged in making automobiles. For instance, a 5 per cent tax upon the gross sales of the product of any factory is usually equivalent to 50 or 75 per cent of the net profits of that concern, and sometimes more than 100 per cent of the net profits, because there are many institutions in the country that do not make 5 per cent profit on the capital invested. Therefore that is a wrong principle. We are going at the thing wrong, and the only excuse for it is that we need the money.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. We could afford to be fair.

Mr. FORDNEY. I would like to be fair with everybody. Let me tell you something. I quarreled and fought and sometimes came near using profanity. I took my hat and left the room three times, but never went farther than the screen and then came back. [Laughter.] I am black and blue from my head to my heels by the punishment the committee has inflicted upon me. I am discussing the things now. I do not believe they are right, but they are here in the bill, and I do not know how we are going to get them out. Some of us tried to get them out in committee and could not do it. What the House will do I do not know, what the Senate will do I do not know, but to put a tax on gross sales of a private business, or any institution in this country, is the wrong way to collect a tax.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Is there any danger that we will defeat the very purpose we are trying to reach if we put the tax to a certain point that will be prohibitive so that we will fail to get the revenue, and destroy business?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; that is the danger.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. BRITTEN. The retroactive feature in the bill applies to the income tax for the period of 1916. It places an additional tax on the income of last year and that is payable in June of this year.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. In many instances the tax has already been paid, and in some cases large amounts. What becomes of those particular cases; are they reassessed, or is the additional amount prescribed, provided in this bill, called in?

Mr. FORDNEY. There is no language in the bill upon that point; it simply taxes incomes of last year; and I notice here an estimate of $108,000,000 instead of $110,000,000, which would be one-third of that already assessed, and which we know will be collected. I think the framers of the language of the bill figured on the loss of a little money, because they have dropped off $2,000,000 in the estimated receipts. I do not know how they are going to catch it where a corporation has distributed its profits last year and discontinues business and is gone. That money is lost. How they will get it from corporations and institutions in existence unless they go back and say you have to pay it, I do not know. If it is to pay no dividends hereafter, it comes out of the value of the stock, and I presume the Government can collect it.

Mr. BRITTEN. The case I had in mind is where a Chicago concern paid several hundred thousand dollars taxes in advance of the period prescribed. Will the Government go after that particular concern for the increase?

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman can rest assured that the Government will go after every nickel that it can collect, because they need the money.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Either the gentleman from Michigan or myself misunderstood one of the questions asked by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN]. He asked if the so-called retroactive tax would not be paid in June. It is not payable until September.

Mr. FORDNEY. No. I misunderstood the gentleman. The provision in the bill is that the one-third of the income tax imposed by this bill is not payable until the 15th of September.

Mr. BRITTEN. So that he may pay it in two installments, one in June and one in September.

Mr. FORDNEY. Under the old law one in June, and he pays the other in September.

Mr. MASON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MASON. I agree with the gentleman that the tax on gross incomes may work a great hardship. I want to ask if the gentleman's attention was called to the fact that when you tax the gross income, for instance, of a billposter, or advertiser outside of a newspaper there are difficulties. The billposter may contract for a display for $100, and it may cost him $98 to get that $100. I can understand how you can take it out of street car space, because they rent out the space, and I can see how that would not work a great hardship, because the space is there. But to take a man who is to fill the space with his labor or the labor of the artist whom he hires to paint the advertisement—that plan of taxation is in violation of every good principle. You put a tax on every cent he takes in, whether he makes any profit or not.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will tell you. We tax the man who advertises on what it costs him to get it, whether it is a billboard advertiser or whatever it may be. Somebody has got to pay the tax, and it falls on the man that pays for the advertising. At one time it was thought wise to tax advertisers in the newspapers, but we get the newspapers the other way, by putting additional postage on them, and you thus catch the fellow in postage. But those who advertise on the billboards we put a tax of 5 per cent on its cost, because you can not catch them by putting on additional postage. Such advertising does not go through the mail.

Mr. MASON. In that way you make no discrimination as to the question of cost. A man may receive $1,000 for rent of space in front of his lot for advertising purposes, and he pays 5 per cent; the other man may get a contract for $1,000 and spend $999 for the painting and labor.

Mr. FORDNEY. It is a tax on the gross proceeds of the business, and it is just as equitable as the automobile tax or the taxing of musical instruments; none of them are equitable taxes. They are out of joint.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. I think the gentleman has anticipated, perhaps, my question. If you tax the sales of automobiles, musical instruments, pianos, and so forth, it is all covered by the same principle as taxing the advertiser because the advertising by billboard is only one means of making the sale. It is the same principle that covers both.

Mr. FORDNEY. Exactly the same principle. It is taxing the gross proceeds of your sales, and I say that is not a correct principle of taxation, but it is in this bill, and I have got to swallow it, because I can not get it out.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Certainly.

Mr. REAVIS. You get at the party that advertises on the billboard, and you increase the postage on the newspapers, but how can you reach the man that advertises exclusively in the newspaper?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; except to get him through increased cost of advertising. Yesterday the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANDLER] presented a copy of the Outlook here to my good friend from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. I received one of those same circulars through the mail this morning, and I read it, and it is to this effect: The Outlook is sending this little slip around to everyone, whether he be a patron of the Outlook or not, showing the subscriber how much this increase in postage is going to cost him for his subscription. The Outlook does not propose to pay it—not on your life! They are just notifying you that if you live so far away from where the Outlook is published it is going to cost you 54 cents or a dollar or $2.70 for this increased postage, or some other sum. No, no; not the Outlook.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. But just let me conclude with this: That notice is going out to everyone to induce him to appeal to his Congressman to strike out this extra postage on second-class mail matter that the consumer has to pay.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. They can pass it along to the consumer, and they are showing that they are going to do it. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I would ask if there would not be a falling off of the subscription list on account of the increase?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not think so; but let me tell you why. The Outlook and the Saturday Evening Post, as I understand it, are getting as high as $6,500 a page for advertising matter, and they are going to charge a little more for advertising. They have to pay 1 cent a pound now for sending magazines through the mails from one point to another all over this land—1 cent for sending the paper to Alexandria, and 1 cent for sending it to San Francisco. The zone system is now proposed in this bill, and the committee has thought it wise to double up the tax and make it 2 cents a pound in the first and second zones, which covers a distance of 150 miles, 3 cents for the third and fourth zones, and then 1 cent for each zone until it reaches the eighth zone, 7 cents, and for all distances beyond the eighth zone, which is 1,800 miles, 7 cents a pound. What the periodical publisher will undoubtedly do is just exactly what Sears, Roebuck & Co. and Marshall-Field & Co. and many other great mail-order houses do. They will send by freight, as they did to my home city last spring. Sears, Roebuck & Co. sent one carload of their catalogues by rail and distributed them through the local post office.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. But there is a difference between a catalogue and a publication which is distributed and sent out once a week, or once a day for that matter.

Mr. BRITTEN. Not so far as the advertising is concerned.

Mr. FORDNEY. The great metropolitan newspapers and the magazines are the ones that are going to pay this large increased postage. The average country newspaper in a town of 50,000 or 75,000 people sends a very small percentage of its papers a distance further than 150 miles away from the point of publication. It is the large metropolitan papers, as the Postmaster General in his report shows, that travel a distance on an average of 300 miles from the point of publication, and the magazines go from 1,000 to 1,150 miles away, and undoubtedly they will send those out by freight and distribute them through the local post offices where they are delivered to their patrons.

Mr. PLATT. But there is a proviso to prevent that, for the bill provides that second-class mail matter mailed to subscribers from an office other than that of publication shall pay the same rate as if mailed from the office at the place of publication.

Mr. FORDNEY. Suppose there is. What is there in the law to prevent the Saturday Evening Post being published so far as its California list is concerned in San Francisco instead of in Philadelphia? They can send manuscripts out there and have it put through the press out there and delivered from there at the lower rate.

Mr. PLATT. I think that is just what will happen. Now, in the case of the Outlook they state that it will cost them $1.25 additional.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, no; they do not.

Mr. PLATT. To deliever in the West.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; they do not. They tell you that it will cost you that—not them.

Mr. PLATT. That is the extra postage upon it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes; but they say that it is going to cost you that and not them.

Mr. PLATT. If it is going to cost me that I will stop it, and that is what everyone else will do.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, bless your soul, no. You will want to find out about what the Outlook has to say about some automobile manufactured somewhere.

Mr. PLATT. You still have left a provision in the bill that nothing shall affect the existing law as to the free circulation and rates on second-class mail matter within the county of publication.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. And people will get their information more from their home papers instead of from the metropolitan papers?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and they are struggling along now between life and death.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to get the viewpoint of the committee in placing a ban upon publishing houses from utilizing other facilities than the mail in connection with the distribution of mailable matter. It has been the practice for years to permit these publishing houses to utilize other agencies in their distribution, such as express companies or the railroads, through freight. They have then used the mail at the immediate point of distribution.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the theory of the committee in absolutely forbidding these large publishing houses the freedom of business in the means of distributing their publications by the cheapest possible way as under existing law?

Mr. FORDNEY. Because Uncle Sam needs the money, and you are going to tax them to the fullest extent and get that money. There is no other excuse for it that I know of.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is placing a penalty upon the dissemination of information.

Mr. FORDNEY. Wait a minute, my friend.

Mr. STAFFORD. You are, certainly, if you keep in the bill this provision which says they must pay the higher rate——

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me answer the gentleman. It has been shown by every Postmaster General since I have been a Member of this House—18 years—that it costs this Government 9¼ cents a pound to handle the magazines of this country and the Government is getting 1 cent a pound for doing the delivering. Therefore, the Government is losing 8¼ cents a pound for every pound of magazines handled by mail in this country. Now, this is an opportune time for the periodicals of this country—which I said the other day have done as much as any other institution in this country to bring on this war—to come forward now and pay a fair share to maintain the war. [Applause.] My son has already enlisted—I hope God will bring him back safely uninjured—and to send my son to the front with an empty gun and an empty knapsack, without anything to eat and without ammunition, is to send him to the slaughter, and I am ready to pay, and every public-spirited man in this country ought to be ready to pay, his fair share of taxes to support my son at the front fighting his country's foes. [Applause.] The magazines of this country have been getting a subsidy out of this Government and they ought to come up without complaint now like brave, public-spirited men and pay a fair share of the maintenance of this war to supply your boy and my boy and other boys out in the trenches fighting the enemy under the Stars and Stripes. They will do it. They are kicking now; they will complain severely now; but, as the good chairman of the committee said yesterday, the only reason why this tax has not been imposed heretofore is because it was lack of nerve of men in this House to do it. Now, we think it is a just and equitable time to place this tax with less complaint than at any other time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to say, if the gentleman will permit me, that during 18 years of service on the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads I always advocated an increase of the postage rate on second-class mail matter, but I never advocated any increase of postage rates on second-class mail matter that would result in the curtailment of publications. Now, you are placing here a ban of rates that will be absolutely confiscatory upon publishing houses. We send these magazines and publications by freight now under the new car-space plan. The freight rate in carload lots on this class of merchandise from New York City to Salt Lake City is $2.38 a hundred pounds, and $3.39 when shipped in less quantities, and yet you are proposing to charge these publishing houses that send their publications bagged up and carried in many instances without expense to the Postal Service to the terminal stations $6 a hundred pounds, and yet you will not permit them to utilize the freight service and then the Postal Service for local delivery, but say, you must send by mail entirely if you want to have the mail facilities at all.

Mr. FORDNEY. Wait a minute; the gentleman has made a speech and an effective one, too, but let me tell you something the gentleman has not brought into his argument. The Postmaster General advises the committee that it costs Uncle Sam 4½ cents overhead charges in handling this mail, to say nothing about transportation. Does the gentleman want the magazines to send their stuff through the mail at 1 cent postage and this Government lose 3½ cents handling it?

Mr. STAFFORD. The Postmaster General can not show that it costs 4½ cents a pound or anything approaching that amount for overhead charges for the carriage of bag-magazine mail. They are usually carried in bag lots.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman knows what the man said to the fellow in jail, "They can not put you in jail." "Why, my good friend, they can, because I am in jail." [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Nevertheless there are no figures by the Postmaster General to show that it costs 4½ cents overhead charges for the carriage of magazines of the country carried in bag lots.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. The Postmaster General shows exactly that, I tell you. Whether it is right or wrong I do not know, because I have not gone through the Government's books to find out. I yield now to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman has just stated, as I understand, that the average cost to the Government for transportation of second-class mail matter is about 9 cents a pound—the transportation for long distances would be about 9 cents, but assuming it is 9 cents to carry it, say, to San Francisco. Under this bill is provided a charge of 6 cents and then, for fear that the company will not ship at the rate of 6 cents for that which the Government must pay 9 cents, you have a proviso that will prevent their using freight for carrying that until it comes to the local office.

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, a great many gentlemen have advised me, Members on this side of the House, that it would be a wise provision to put in the law for the increase of postage on second-class mail matter that this stuff can not be sent any other way than through the mails. Now, there is a very large sentiment here in favor of that sort of thing.

Mr. CRAMTON. If my colleague will yield——

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am not arguing against the increase in rates. I think there should be some increase, but I do not believe the figures are correct that the department has so industriously peddled, that the cost is 15 cents, or it costs the Government 15 cents, or that the average is 9 cents. And the committee shows that they do not believe it costs the Government 9 cents by providing language requiring these companies to ship at 6 cents, thereby causing the Government to lose the 3 cents.

Mr. FORDNEY. You are wrong about that.

Mr. CRAMTON. And cause the Government a loss of 3 cents.

Mr. FORDNEY. It has been a long time, I will say, since we have had a Republican Postmaster General—the time is too long to suit me altogether—but Mr. Hitchcock's last report when Postmaster General gave the figures that I have given you, and the present Postmaster General verifies them by making practically the same statement. And I have never seen any report by any Postmaster General that varied much from Mr. Hitchcock's report. I do not know whether that is right or not. I do not carry the mail. I do not run the Post Office Department. I never was Postmaster General, but I am going to take it for granted that the man making those reports knows something of what he is talking about, and I must be guided somewhat by his judgment.

Mr. CRAMTON. Then, accepting the cost as 9 cents a pound, you provide that the Saturday Evening Post, for instance, instead of sending a publication at their own expense by freight, must send it at a cost of 6 cents a pound to them and cause the Government a loss of 3 cents? I think the committee is inconsistent.

Mr. FORDNEY. We are not asking the newspapers to pay all the cost. We are like the Irishman that said in regard to his dog: He cut his ears off a little bit at a time because it would not hurt so much.

Mr. CRAMTON. And at the same time others are taking off a few chunks, as, for example, the print-paper people.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, print paper! The chairman yesterday spoke of Mr. CANNON's loyalty and good judgment in that matter. There came before the Ways and Means Committee when the Payne tariff law was being framed a man whose name was Ridder—I believe he is dead—and a man by the name of John Norris, who, I understand, also is dead, and they claimed they were paying then $32 or $38 or $40 a ton for print paper, and if we would remove the duty then upon print paper it would be very much cheaper from Canada and elsewhere. All right. The House passed a bill based upon the report made by the committee, of which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was chairman. After thorough investigation that committee, as I now remember, recommended a duty of $2.50 a ton on print paper. The bill went through the House with that rate in it, just as recommended by the committee. It went to the Senate, and the Senate increased the rate to $4.50 a ton. When the bill went to conference the rate was reduced by the conferees to $3.75 per ton, and every newspaper publisher was mad because print paper did not go on the free list and flayed every man who voted for that duty and put some of my best friends out of Congress.

I received a letter a short time afterwards from a gentleman at Niagara Falls who purchased pulp in Canada and imported it to this country and made print paper from it, and he begged my pardon for coming before the committee and making any such fool statement as he had, namely, that if the duty on pulp were removed he could get his raw material cheaper, while, as a matter of fact, the price had gone up. And he said,

> I am purchasing my print paper to-day from the same firm at Quebec, Canada, that I purchased it from before you reduced the duty, and I am paying $10 per ton more now than I did before Congress reduced the duty and wish to acknowledge I made a fool of myself.

Where is the price of print paper to-day? It is $80 to $100 per ton. Congress has done everything in its power the newspapers of this country have asked in reference to the duty on print paper, and there is no way that I know of to please the newspapers and magazines in this country except to give them free transportation through the mails and free print paper. I expect to be flayed by the newspapers and magazines for my position on this matter, but I will vote now for what I think is right and do what I think is my duty now, and then stay at home if necessary.

Mr. FOCHT. Just to get that question of the tariff on paper right, let me ask the gentleman a question. In section 2 of the reciprocity treaty which was passed by this Congress and sent to Canada, where it was turned down on a popular vote, was it not, after all, the trick of that whole proposition to get through the repeal of the tariff on print paper, costing less than 4 cents a pound, and after we were all through with it, it was repudiated by Canada, and the only thing that was left standing on that bill was the repeal of the tariff under 4 cents?

Mr. FORDNEY. In reply to the gentleman I will say that I saw a letter purporting to come from the Secretary of State at that time, addressed to this man, John Norris, whose name I have mentioned, before the reciprocity message was presented to Congress and before it was presented to the public, notifying Mr. Norris that every provision he wanted in that reciprocity treaty was already in.

Mr. FOCHT. You will permit me to state, gentlemen, to get the right understanding, that we had a big excitement here and all over the country by the newspapers and newspaper publishers that we wanted this reciprocity, and that the then Republican President of the United States came to Congress and in coalition with the Democrats passed the bill with over 200 Republicans against it.

Do you not understand that was the farce and joke and trick of the whole thing, that this same reciprocity was to cover this farce of repealing the tariff on paper; and now the result is just as the gentleman says, that the paper companies are going out of business in this country, and they are all up in Canada, and the United States Government has to come to the rescue of the newspapers; and those of us who publish newspapers in the country have got to get cheap paper or go out of business. We have had to appeal to the Government for help. We would have had to pay 6½ cents a pound for print paper but for the intervention of the Government in our behalf, and that brought it down to 4½ cents a pound. I want to get that straightened out and emphasize the fact that all things are not as they appear to be. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; yet you can not believe all you hear, and only about half what you see, these days. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I want to inquire if it was the intention of the committee to raise the rate that an individual pays when he mails a newspaper? Was it the intention of the committee to raise the rate that you and I pay when we mail a single-wrapped newspaper?

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, it is pretty hard to answer that question and give you the real definition to it. But it was the intention of the committee to get more money, because we needed it. Now, if you pass it along to the consumer, good and well. That is what I think the printer will do.

I received a letter day before yesterday from a constituent of mine, appealing to me to have the postage on first-class mail matter reduced to 1 cent. I replied to him that I was then engaged with other members of the Ways and Means Committee in trying to readjust the postal rates of this country, and that it was the effort of the Democrats to put the rate up to 4 cents, while I was doing everything in my power to keep it down to 3 cents, and I hoped to succeed. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. This committee is a great committee, and it ought to know when it raises a rate what it is doing. Yesterday I asked the chairman of the committee a question; and he replied, I think, by asking me three questions; but when he got through he yielded the floor to another gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Tell me what you want.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. You answered my question by asking another question, which had no relation to the question that I asked of you.

Mr. FORDNEY. You want to know, do you, whether or not we intended you or somebody else should pay the bill when we increased the postage on second-class matter?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No. When I pay the rate of 1 cent for every 4 ounces, I want to know if that rate is to be raised to the individual as well as to the publisher.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; when we put the postage at 3 cents instead of 2.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It is subject to the zone rate?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, I am talking about first-class mail matter.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, no; we are talking about second-class mail matter.

Mr. FORDNEY. You evidently are talking about one thing and I another. You mean you are talking about sending a newspaper under 2-cent postage? are you?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I am talking about sending it at 1-cent postage, 1 cent for every 4 ounces.

Mr. FORDNEY. If this bill becomes a law you will have to pay 2 cents, because we need the money.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, no.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; you will. Maybe I am wrong, but maybe not. Whatever is the rate we have put in this bill will have to be paid if the same is enacted into law.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Wait a moment.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, no; I will not wait a moment. Whatever rate is put in this bill for first or second class mail matter is adding to the existing law, my friend, as we thought, in the most equitable manner to get the money that the increased rate will raise. As the Government must raise more money, we thought this increase in postage would place upon the people a burden in the least vexatious manner. To require everybody who sends a newspaper or a letter through the mails to pay the increased rate and give the Government an increased amount therefor is an equitable distribution of the tax.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Then the committee understood they were raising the individual mailing rate?

Mr. FORDNEY. You can call it the individual or the association or whatever else you desire. But we decided to double it up.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. You have not raised the third-class rate.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; we did not touch that class of mail.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Supposing a newspaper publishing house is sending out a newspaper that does not weigh over 2 ounces, and it desires to mail it out as a circular. Have you provided anything in there to prevent that?

Mr. FORDNEY. If it is not in this bill, you evidently can not find it. [Laughter.] But I have explained to you, my friend, that we propose to double up the rate on second-class mail matter and add 50 per cent on the rate on first-class matter. Now, I decline to yield further. The gentleman does not listen to me when I reply to his questions.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman stated that the purpose is to get all the money possible——

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and in the least burdensome manner.

Mr. LANGLEY. I have had a number of complaints from dealers in soft drinks. [Laughter.] They contend that the increase in the cost of the various ingredients used, as a result of this bill, will make it impossible for a great many of them to continue in the business. Now that the country is going "dry" so rapidly, the soft-drink industry is becoming relatively more important. What does the gentleman say about that?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will tell you what they will do. They will do just what the man does who sells beer. He will give less in the glass. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANGLEY. They certainly could increase the price above the universal rate now prevailing.

Mr. BRITTEN. They increase the bubbles. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Is Coca-Cola a soft drink?

Mr. FORDNEY. It is considered a soft drink.

Mr. LANGLEY. If it is not "spiked," I guess it is.

Mr. CANNON. I have seen it mentioned in medical journals and many others, and I have never heard it disputed, that the contents, the factors that make the Coca-Cola, beget the drug habit. Now, does the gentleman know whether that is true or not?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I do not. I can not say to the gentleman whether it begets the drug habit or not; but let me say this: The law provides that all these drinks that contain less than one-half of 1 per cent alcohol shall go into one class and those containing more alcohol go into another class.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose this is something akin to opium.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know as to that, but Coca-Cola was considered as one of the soft drinks. Let me say to the men who put up those soft drinks, Coca-Cola and pop and seltzer waters and drinks of that kind, that a manufacturer of such goods, a Member of the House, came before the committee with samples. The committee had an expert, Mr. McCoy, a chemist in the employ of the Treasury Department, with them, and there was a difference of opinion as to how much liquid gas is used in the charging of a gallon of water for soft drinks. It was claimed by one man that there could be only charged 4 gallons of water with a pound of liquid carbonic gas. Another man claimed that from 20 to 30 gallons could be charged with a pound of that liquid gas. But here is what happened when we got the two men together: One man had a bottle of seltzer water and a bottle of ginger ale and a bottle of vichy water, or something of that kind, and presented a letter he had received from an expert over in New York, whose name, I believe, was Smith, who said that 1 pound of liquid gas would thoroughly charge 4 gallons of water. Before the expert in the Treasury Department came in I asked the gentleman, "What is the difference between a gallon of thoroughly charged water and a gallon of charged water?" He did not know just what the difference is; but when the expert came in he showed that Excelsior water is charged at a pressure of 180 pounds, and an ordinary glass bottle would not stand that pressure, but would burst; but the glass of the bottles in which Excelsior water is contained is a quarter of an inch thick and will stand that pressure, and many of the soft drinks are charged at 20, 30, 40, 50, and 60 pounds pressure instead of 180 pounds pressure, as in the case of Excelsior water. Do not drink too much of that Excelsior water, gentlemen, or you will blow up. It seems to me that some Members in this House are pretty thoroughly charged. [Laughter.] That was what made the difference. Now, if you thoroughly charge 4 gallons of water, 1 pound of liquid gas will be consumed; but if you charge the water under a pressure of 20 pounds instead of 180 pounds, you can charge from 20 to 30 gallons of water with 1 pound of liquid gas. It just depends upon the pressure, which determines the amount of gas that goes into the water; so that the committee, to tax it as correctly as possible, put a 2-cent tax upon a gallon of soft drinks in order to get the amount of tax wanted from that source without putting a hardship on the manufacturers of the liquid gas.

Mr. LANGLEY. Going back to my original question, then, you do not think this tax that you are proposing will put any soft-drink manufacturers out of business?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, no. There will, in my opinion, be more soft drinks sold next year than ever before.

Mr. LANGLEY. I hope you are correct, but I doubt it.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. How about the manufacturers of liquid gas?

Mr. FORDNEY. The manufacturer of liquid gas pays the tax at the factory, and instead of paying a stamp tax it is proposed to let him pay on the volume of his business, equal to the sum the stamp tax would amount to for the reason that labor is very scarce, and it costs about as much money to put the stamp on the bottle as the stamp itself costs.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. But I am informed that some manufacturers of this liquid gas have contracted a year ahead to deliver their product at 5½ cents a pound, and you are going to tax them 8 cents a pound.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and the Outlook Co. have, and other magazines have, contracted to deliver copies of their publications a year ahead, but they also must pay the increased postal tax. I admit this feature in this bill is a serious matter for some people. Men who make contracts in advance and do not throw safeguards about them are liable to find themselves in a bad fix.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MOON. I want to make a statement of fact or two to the gentleman from Michigan, which he is aware of, but to which I desire to call his attention, and then to ask him a question or two in reference to the postage proposition that he has been discussing. It is known to the House, of course, that we have four classes of postal matter, and that the first class is carried at 32 cents a pound and the second class at 1 cent a pound. Nearly all of our revenue comes out of the first class, the third and fourth class matter taken together being barely self-sustaining, if they are even that. Now it is unquestionably correct that the second class ought to bear a larger proportion of the burden of the Post Office Department than it does. Last year the second-class mail matter amounted to 1,240,000,000 pounds, which this Government carried for 1 cent a pound.

Mr. FORDNEY. Or for $11,000,000.

Mr. MOON. There is a difference between the calculations of the committee and of the department and of the Hughes Commission and other commissions as to the actual cost of transportation, but I take it the most conservative figure would be that we pay about 8¼ cents a pound and get 1 cent, and therefore that we lost $80,000,000 or $90,000,000 on second-class matter last year.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is the estimate.

Mr. MOON. I assume that your committee want to recoup that loss in part, and the Post Office Committee are willing to yield their jurisdiction upon this question to the Ways and Means Committee. Now I make this statement in order to get to the point as to what is the best method of recouping. In considering this question you can not afford to overlook the well-fixed and established policy of this Government in postal affairs for more than a hundred years, that the Government ought to lay the least possible burden upon that class of literature through which knowledge and information are disseminated to the people. It is the weekly papers and the daily papers, and they alone practically which give that knowledge of the affairs of government and of our lives that is essential to the welfare and interest of the country. Therefore the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have been seeking all along to find some method by which we would not violate the well-established principle of the Government in the interest of a free press and of the dissemination of knowledge, and at the same time make that class of matter pay more than it now pays. It once paid 2 cents a pound, and then was reduced to 1 cent. Now the radius of the circulation of a daily newspaper is shown by all the reports to be a little less than 300 miles. But newspapers carry not only information, but they carry an immense amount of advertising. Now that advertising matter is commercial; it does not fall within the purview of the policy of the Government, of maintaining a system by which knowledge of governmental affairs and general information are carried to the people. Can you not arrange some way by which you can let the papers that give information to the public be carried at a low rate, and tax that part of the paper which is purely commercial in its nature?

We have pending here a bill introduced at this session in which it is provided that within a fixed zone of 250 miles the present rate upon papers is maintained, and after you have passed that zone you apply the parcel-post rate to the paper so far as it contains advertising. In other words, the publisher is required to separate the advertising matter from the purely literary matter and weigh the advertising matter and furnish to the Government a statement of the amount, and while he will continue to pay for the literary part the present rate, he will pay a sum equal to the cost of transportation upon the purely commercial part of his paper. That we thought was fair, because that is a purely business proposition. There is no such principle involved as there is in the carrying of literature and information, and the advertisements ought to be carried just like merchandise, and pay as much. I am not making any objection to the position of the committee on this matter, but I want to suggest whether it would not be wise to amend this part of your bill so as to provide for the preservation of that principle that has been maintained so long as to the press, within a limited first zone, and as to all zones make the part that carries advertisements pay the cost of the carriage of the advertisements.

There is a bill pending here that is intended to cover that, proposing an increase, perhaps not so high as it ought to be. I merely make the suggestion to the gentleman without any desire to interfere with the views expressed by the committee or the gentleman's argument. The question of postage is one of many sides and many difficulties, and you can not go at it with one fell stroke and do justice to all that are interested and to the Government, nor can you do justice to yourself without some discrimination along the line that pertains to the whole matter.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. If the gentleman from Michigan will yield, may I ask the gentleman from Tennessee one question. I think that he falls into the same error that I think the committee has, and that is that postage on second-class mail matter is not always paid by the publisher. He said that it was paid at 1 cent a pound. Now, there is a class of second-class mail matter that is mailed by the individual that pays 1 cent for every 4 ounces.

Mr. MOON. That is not what we are talking about.

Mr. HULL OF Iowa. You never intended to raise that rate, did you?

Mr. MOON. I think there ought to be a little raise along that line too.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I am glad to get the information from the gentleman from Tennessee. He is chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and has given the matter much more study than has any member of the Ways and Means Committee, for our committee have never had those questions to deal with. But the Ways and Means Committee have studied it from all angles, and to the best of their judgment the rates recommended in the bill were the best they could figure out. If anybody else can offer an amendment to the bill to make the rates more just and equitable and still get the money, I am ready to accept such an amendment. Bring it along, gentlemen.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Certainly.

Mr. SLOAN. I desire to say that the gentleman from Michigan made an error of statement about the zones. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] has straightened it out. The gentleman from Michigan said inadvertently that the third and fourth zones were to pay a rate of 3 cents. The third zone in this bill, which is 150 to 300 miles, pays a rate of 3 cents; the fourth and fifth zones a 4-cent rate. In that connection I wanted to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that Judge Moon said that the newspaper circulation was carried an average distance of 255 miles. So the average newspaper is carried well within the first, second, and third zones, which is 300 miles, which seems to me pretty nearly the standard for other zones.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman does not mean the average newspaper.

Mr. SLOAN. Yes; the average newspaper.

Mr. FORDNEY. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. SLOAN. I am quoting from the Hughes commission.

Mr. FORDNEY. The metropolitan papers——

Mr. SLOAN. I am talking about the daily newspapers.

Now, the fourth and fifth zones, running from 300 to 1,000 miles, are only raised 1 cent, which shows the injustice to the newspapers as compared with other publications.

Mr. FORDNEY. I believe I have gone over that ground pretty thoroughly as to the newspapers, and I believe I have covered most of the items in this bill except one particular proposition that I want to mention.

I have always been in favor of a protective tariff on imports. I am now. If I were permitted to write a tariff law personally, I would not put some of the rates in the law as high as this bill is going to put them. I will give you an illustration. Under the Dingley tariff law the duty on rough lumber was $2 a thousand feet. In the Payne tariff law that duty was reduced to $1.25 a thousand. The imports of lumber last year averaged about $22.50 per thousand feet. This bill, if put into law, will put a 10 per cent ad valorem duty on all imports, whether dutiable or free. This bill proposes 10 per cent ad valorem on lumber, and at $22.50 per thousand that amounts to $2.25 a thousand. If that lumber is dressed and made into flooring—tongued and grooved, first-class flooring—when imported into this country from Canada it sells for abut $50 per thousand feet. Add the 10 per cent ad valorem duty and you have $5 per thousand feet on that grade of lumber. Shingles imported at $2.50 a thousand will pay 25 cents duty. That is about what the tax was under the Payne tariff law, or, I think, 30 cents a thousand. If this bill goes into effect there will be nothing imported into this country free from any country in the world. It must all pay a duty in addition to the rates fixed in the Underwood tariff law.

There are many articles of raw material that ought to be brought into the country free of duty. I have never been in favor of putting a duty on noncompetitive products, such as tea, coffee, raw rubber, or hemp, for the reason that we do not produce tea and coffee and crude rubber in this country, and yet practically everybody uses these articles. Therefore it is a Republican principle to bring into this country free of duty articles that we must have but do not produce.

But under the provisions of this bill if put into law, coffee now imported at an average value of 9 cents a pound will have to pay nine-tenths of 1 per cent per pound duty. Last year the importations of tea averaged 18 cents a pound, and therefore the duty will be 1.8 cents per pound. That will not hurt anybody. I believe tea and coffee could stand a higher rate of duty; but whether you put the import tax on articles that are not produced in this country, or whether you call it a consumption tax, it is a consumption tax pure and simple, for it is a tax on a noncompetitive article. I am not in favor of that kind of taxes. But neither the Committee on Ways and Means nor anybody else can sit here without extended hearings and fix scientific rates of duty to be added to existing law, or substitute for existing law, and get them anywhere near correct. At the present time it would be a very difficult matter, for the reason that prices are abnormal all over the world, as regards the value of manufactured articles, agricultural products, and labor. I want to assure you gentlemen that, with my long experience on that committee, it is my candid belief that no body of intelligent men, conscientiously working together, can now sit down and put a scientific rate of duty on imports in less than from five to seven months of effort.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. COX. If these rates which the committee has reported be finally written into the law, how much will that amount to in the way of general average on all imports?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad the gentleman has asked that question. Under existing law the imports last year amounted to $2,391,000,000. That was the value of all imports, dutiable and free; of this amount, 30 per cent paid and 70 per cent were on the free list.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Just let me finish this suggestion. On that amount of imports the Government collected import duties to the amount of $210,800,000 in round numbers, or a fraction over 9 per cent ad valorem on the total imports. If these same imports continued for the coming year, and 10 per cent ad valorem were added to all imports, dutiable and free, we would collect an average of 19.1 per cent duty on all imports, and therefore collect in customs dues from imports about $450,000,000 in the next year. But let me say to the gentleman that our imports at the present time are surprisingly great. Undoubtedly gentlemen will be surprised to learn that they are greater now than ever before. For the month of March last our imports were $270,000,000, and taking as an average the first three months, January, February, and March, if the same rate of imports continues during the next nine months, we will import this year $2,845,000,000 worth of goods, and this added import duty of 10 per cent ad valorem will yield in revenue, in addition to the amount to be collected under existing law, $284,000,000. The most surprising thing about those imports is that 27 per cent, or $633,000,000, of the imports of last year came from Europe, and the greater percentage of this came from England, and a little over 10 per cent came from Canada, or a total of $884,000,000 out of an importation of $2,391,000,000 came from Europe (chiefly England) and Canada combined.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. COX. I am asking for information, because the gentleman knows more about this subject than I do or ever expect to. Suppose this rate which the committee has incorporated in the bill finally becomes a law, just as you have prepared it; how would that rate compare with the rate of duty that was put upon goods that came in under the Payne tariff law? In other words, which would be the highest on the sum total of goods imported?

Mr. FORDNEY. This rate will be higher than the Payne tariff law to this extent. During the life of the Payne tariff law the average ad valorem rates upon all imports, dutiable and free, was 18½ per cent. These rates, based upon last year's imports, will amount to, in round numbers, 19½ per cent, and therefore we will collect more duty under this proposition than we collected on the same amount of imports under the Payne law.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Under the title "War tax on manufactures," in that section referring particularly to tennis rackets, golf balls, baseball bats, etc., there is the phrase "balls of all kinds." I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows, which of course he does, that there are many millions of steel balls made in the country that are used for ball bearings. I would like to know if that tax would apply against steel balls used for ball bearings?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; it is intended to be applied to golf balls, and so forth, and steel balls are not used in playing golf. I think steel balls the gentleman refers to would come under manufacturers of steel, and so forth, and would pay a 10 per cent ad valorem tax in addition to whatever the duty is upon such articles under the existing law.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, referring again to the rates on second-class mail matter, as it reads now I take it that the rates of postage on one class of second-class matter will be reduced. For instance, if you take a newspaper and wrap it up and put a 1-cent stamp upon it yourself you can send 4 ounces for 1 cent, which makes 8 ounces for 2 cents. Under this bill, in the first zone you can send 10 ounces for 2 cents.

Mr. FORDNEY. That depends on whether you or the publisher sends it.

Mr. PLATT. Exactly. Did the committee intend to include that? Apparently the bill includes that kind of second-class matter.

Mr. FORDNEY. If there is any language in the law that would permit that to be done, it is an oversight, for the reason that the committee intended to double up those rates and add 50 per cent to all second-class mail matter. That was the real substance of the argument.

Mr. PLATT. This is one of the classes of second-class mail matter, and there ought to be an amendment in the bill to cover that.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentleman will prepare an amendment of that kind and convince my good friend from North Carolina that you are right about it, and he tells me to vote for it, I shall do so; for you see I am absolutely under his control. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I see that the bill provides for an increase in freight, express, pipe-line rates, for a tax upon articles transported thereby. I would like to know whether there is any increased rate for sending mechandise by parcel post?

Mr. FORDNEY. No. The parcel-post rates are not changed at all.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Why is that? That comes in competition with the express companies.

Mr. FORDNEY. It was thought that those rates were nearer equitable than the second-class mail matter, and it is a different class of mail altogether. A great deal of bread and butter and flour are going through the mails by parcel post, and the committee thought it was not wise to change those rates.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. And it is more than paying its way now.

Mr. FORDNEY. It is claimed the parcel post now is not dependent upon the Post Office Department for financial aid, but is paying its own way.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But the express companies pay their way.

Mr. FORDNEY. The express companies are taxed because they must pay the corporation and income taxes. We double up the corporation tax and make it 4 per cent instead of 2 per cent, as under existing law they must pay the excess-profits tax as well, and they have to pay all other taxes that every other corporation in the country has to pay, and we are putting a burden upon the man who sends goods through the express companies just the same as we put a burden upon the man who sends freight by the railroads.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Can the gentleman tell how much merchandise is transported by the parcel post each year?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; that question did not come before our committee; we did not look that matter up.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is not there more than there is by express?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know anything about that; we did not consider that question.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. CRAMTON. Permit me, in connection with what the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] said in regard to this second-class mail matter, to call the gentleman's attention and the attention of his committee to what, I think, perhaps is an oversight entirely—the effect of it upon the newspapers and magazines published upon the border. As the gentleman knows, he and I are very near the Canadian border. The parcel-post law, in dividing the country into zones, has divided the United States and its possessions, and the same mileage does not apply on publications going into Canada. There is a provision that the eighth-zone rate of postage shall apply to such parcel post, and I assume that if this provision as written goes into the law the eighth-zone rate of postage would apply on the shipment of newspapers published, say, in Port Huron or Saginaw or Detroit, going 50 miles into Canada.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, the gentleman ought to know we can not do that. This Government can not fix the rates charged in foreign countries.

Mr. CRAMTON. This fixes the rates that will have to be paid by the publications.

Mr. FORDNEY. But in the United States; not in Mexico, not in Canada, nor any other foreign country; only in the United States.

Mr. CRAMTON. It does fix in the parcel-post law that the eighth zone of postage, no matter what the mileage is, shall apply to all parcel-post matter mailed in the United States for delivery in Canada, and I desire to see if the committee has given that question any consideration.

Mr. FORDNEY. If I get the sense of the gentleman's argument, suppose the newspaper is nearer the border than 50 miles——

Mr. CRAMTON. Say, Port Huron.

Mr. FORDNEY. That this increase of zone rate may be extended to that class of mail matter?

Mr. CRAMTON. My point is a newspaper published at Detroit or Port Huron on the border that shall send into Canada, say, 25 miles, instead of paying the first-zone rate, as we would naturally anticipate they would, would be classified as being in the eighth zone and pay 6 cents a pound instead of 2 cents a pound. I do not believe the committee intended it, but I think that is the situation.

Mr. FORDNEY. If a paper is posted at Port Huron, although on the banks of the St. Clair River, and the boundary line is in the middle of that river, it pays the rate within the first zone and no more? No, we could not change that, even though we might have some zone arrangement with Canada on parcel-post mail matter. We can not change the Canadian rates on any other class of mail matter without some treaty or agreement with Canada, and therefore this committee assumed that the rate in the first zone applied only to whatever portion of the zone is in the United States, and not abroad.

Mr. CRAMTON. But the provisions of the parcel-post act and the regulations place it in the eighth zone, even if they only go 10 miles.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, that applies to the United States, and not in foreign countries. We could not change that question. We have no authority to do that, and that could be done only by some arrangement between the representatives of this Nation and the representatives of a foreign Government.

Mr. CRAMTON. However, I think the gentleman will find samething there that ought to be corrected.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. Like every other Member of the House I have received earnest protests against this bill by automobile dealers, manufacturers, manufacturers of musical instruments, bill-posting companies, and so on, and I have been waiting patiently here to get an answer to the questions and protests that have been put to me. Now, are we to explain that while a great many members of this committee are of the opinion, and have so expressed themselves, that, although it is unjust and unfair, and in many cases it is discriminatory, our only answer would be "that we need the money"?

Mr. FORDNEY. My good friend, I have stated over and over again that I do not believe the proper principle of taxation is upon the gross receipts from sales. It is, however, thought that the automobile business of the country is generally prosperous and has been. It is known that many men engaged in the business have made immense fortunes. Now comes the time when it is necessary for this Government to raise a very large sum of money. I am not in favor of as high a rate of tax as fixed in this bill upon automobiles, because I believe 5 per cent on gross sales is more profit than some automobile concerns are making. If we are going to impose that kind of taxes, I would be in favor of starting at a much lower per cent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I simply want to ask the gentleman this question: Whether it be true or not the rate of 5 per cent on the sales of automobiles is too high or too low, there is not anything in this point that is so continually brought out that it is a discriminating tax.

There are thousands upon thousands of articles produced in this country that will bear precisely this tax, practically everything in the nature of a luxury, and it is absolutely unfounded to say it is discriminating as to automobiles and in favor of other business.

Mr. FORDNEY. What applies to automobiles also applies to other articles of manufacture, where the committee has put a tax upon the manufacturers' products, of course. Let me say that a representative of one concern who came to interview a few members of the committee as best he could when he got a chance—he was not permitted to have a full hearing, because we could not do that—stated it would be alsolute ruin to that concern to put 5 per cent upon the gross sales of their product, although they were paying 25 per cent commission to the agent for selling their machines.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is not the fellow who gets caught now the agent away out in the country where automobiles are not manufactured? An agent has a warehouse full of automobiles and is undertaking to make sales. He has borrowed money from the bank. He may find little sale this year, and next year he will have a dead stock on his hands. That is where the automobile business gets pinched in this bill.

Mr. FORDNEY. Suppose your automobile sells for $4,000?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is too high for my part of the country.

Mr. FORDNEY. No. You pay more than that for many makes of automobiles out there.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, a few.

Mr. FORDNEY. You get out there Packards and Pierce-Arrows and cars of that grade, and they sell from $3,500 to $4,500 each. Take a $2,000 car for instance. The selling agent gets $500 for selling that car if he gets 25 per cent. Five per cent on $2,000 is $100.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Out of which he pays his warehouse charges, his rent, and his advertising, as well as the cost of borrowing money for his season's operations.

Mr. FORDNEY. As I stated to my good friend, I believe that 5 per cent on sales of many manufacturers of automobiles in this country is going to be confiscatory. I do not believe that many of them make 5 per cent on gross sales. Therefore this is going to be a hardship.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Speaking about the profits of the agents who sell the cars, I think my colleague will readily understand that in a very large number of cases they take back old cars as a part of their purchase price, and those old cars have to be disposed of, and in many cases they suffer great loss on them. The agency business is one of the hazardous ends of the business.

Mr. FORDNEY. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. I am probably anticipating what the gentleman will refer to a little bit later; but I was wondering if any provision was going to be made to meet a situation of this kind: For instance, a firm in my district has contracted to buy a large amount of low-grade lumber in Canada. I presume the gentleman would disapprove of that from the start, personally; but that has been done, and contracts have been made to sell that lumber in America. Both ends of the deal are closed now, and yet that concern is now confronted with that extra tax on the lumber. Is there any provision made to take care of anything of that kind where both ends of the transaction are closed?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will say to the gentleman that any firm that has already purchased and imported——

Mr. HICKS. This has not been imported yet.

Mr. FORDNEY. If it has not been imported, the buyer will suffer to the extent of that tax.

Mr. HICKS. But the contract for sale has been made.

Mr. FORDNEY. A man that imports that article must pay it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Why should this exporter in Canada be in better position than many lumber manufacturers in the State of Washington, who are behind delivery on 40,000 cars of lumber for want of cars—the lumber sold f. o. b. St. Paul, and find themselves caught with a 15 per cent increase in freight rates?

Mr. HICKS. I am not interested in the Canadian exporter; I am interested in the American business man and feel he should not be unfairly dealt with.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. He is worse off than the Canadian lumberman.

Mr. HICKS. Of course, I am not a lumber producer.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me say to the gentleman that in our great wisdom here last year, we—Congress, not myself—voted for the Adamson bill, and imposed upon the railroads of this country, as railroad representatives stated before a commission in this city last week, $350,000,000 to $400,000,000, and the 15 per cent additional freight rate the Interstate Commerce Commission now offers to give to the railroads will not yield more than $350,000,000. It will not give the railroads a sufficient sum to meet that additional expense that Congress imposed upon the railroads by passing the Adamson bill. Men forget that we vote here for such matters, and that if their vote goes into effect the people are the ones who must pay the fiddler. Every time you increase the cost of production or the cost of transportation the man that consumes must pay that increased cost. You voted here last fall, as I said, to get votes at the polls, and it got them, but you put a burden upon the consumers of the country. Now, then, we must not complain in giving the railroads an additional 15 per cent in freight rates to meet the very expense that was imposed by the Adamson law.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. On that particular point does the gentleman from Michigan concede that this statement of the railroads that it will cost them $350,000,000 is correct?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have no reason to doubt it, because I have no other information. These experienced railroad men say it is so. Who else can I go to to find out facts in this line? If I want to know anything about making a watch I will go to the man who makes watches, and not to a blacksmith. I will go every time to an experienced railroad man if I want correct information about railroad business, and not to a politician.

Mr. BORLAND. There is no such testimony.

Mr. FORDNEY. There is such statement, I tell you——

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; there have been plenty of statements.

Mr. FORDNEY. Do you know what it is costing them? You are not a railroad man. What do you know about the management of railroads?

Mr. BORLAND. I have been a railroad man——

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, let me tell you——

Mr. BORLAND. And it will cost them less than $100,000,000.

Mr. FORDNEY. Wait a minute. I will not listen to you until I answer your first question. You remind me of a student in college, one who said to a professor: "Professor, I would like to be a manager of a great railroad system. How much of my money and how much of my time will it take to educate me so that I will be competent to manage one of the great railroad systems of this country?" The professor looked into the face of the student and said: "As intelligent as you are, sir, it will take 20 years of your time and $20,000 of your money. But, sir, it will require but three months of your time and about $300 of your money to elect you to Congress, and once there you will feel competent to direct, not the management of one but of all the great railroad systems in the country." That is your case exactly. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORLAND. There are several of us in that position.

Mr. FORDNEY. Your question would lead me to believe that you are that fellow. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORLAND. I am sure that it would take more than $300, I am sorry to say. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know what it cost to send you to Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now concerning another paragraph in this bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I want to ask the gentleman if he can tell us something about section 504, which provides for a limited tax equivalent to 5 per cent, to be paid by any person, and so on, to any other person or corporation, and so on, for advertising and advertising space other than in periodicals and newspapers. Is it designed to catch outdoor advertising solely?

Mr. FORDNEY. It is designed to catch every manner of advertising except that through the periodicals and newspapers. In the case of the periodicals and newspapers, we felt we would catch them hard enough on this additional postage rate. It catches the billboards and the signs in the street cars, and it catches advertising wherever it may be posted, and requires a payment of 5 per cent on the actual cost of advertisement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How will it catch the man who advertises in the moving pictures or the great concern which puts up its own billboards? I venture to say it will catch less than 50 per cent of all the men engaged in the business.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentleman knows any better way than the Democrats are figuring out, for Heaven's sake let him tell it. They beat me in finding methods of taxation. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think it would be better to put a tax of, say, one-half of 1 per cent on all advertisers, or any other small sum.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman is a newspaper man?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Can the gentleman tell us a better way to catch newspapers than by this additional postage rate?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; indeed, I can. I will say to the gentleman that the volume of advertising in the United States is computed to amount to $800,000,000.

Mr. FORDNEY. The estimate I have on the advertising is from $800,000,000 to $1,000,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But the outdoor advertising is only a part of it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; but we can not catch the billboards in the mails. But we do catch the others in the mails. If it is fair to catch one in one way it is fair to catch others in some other way.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This does not catch the other fellow. It catches only the organized branch of outdoor advertising. It lets advertisers in competition with that branch go scot-free.

Mr. FORDNEY. It is intended to catch every branch of advertising except that in the newspapers and magazines. If you can invent some way to catch the other fellows I will vote for it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says this bill catches all forms of advertising either by the percentage or by the increase of postage on periodicals and magazines. Is not the gentleman mistaken about that? Does it catch any advertising in the local papers, or does it catch any advertising in the metropolitan papers?

Mr. FORDNEY. It catches them on their postage.

Mr. MANN. Their postage is only nominal.

Mr. FORDNEY. They complain that it is being doubled.

Mr. MANN. It catches the advertising in magazines that are transferred by mail, but does it in fact catch any advertising to speak of in any of the newspapers of the country?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not understand that it does. It was not intended to, except on the postage.

Mr. MANN. I mean either way. They do not pay any postage. Very little of their issues are sent out by second-class mail.

Mr. FORDNEY. The little country newspaper does not pay.

Mr. MANN. Neither the little newspaper nor the big.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then it does not catch them.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said they were caught one way or the other.

Mr. FORDNEY. It was intended to. I do not see how you can discriminate between the big newspaper and the little paper that is distributed in the county where it is published.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman wants to catch all advertising, would it not be a fairer way to put the tax on all advertising instead of putting an additional postage rate on second-class mail matter so as to catch everybody on equal terms and not discriminate between them?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me tell the gentleman from Illinois the advertising is on the amount of business done, and it would be a tax on the volume of business, like the tax on automobiles, and I think that is an unjust tax, an unscientific tax. But I am firmly of the opinion that the newspapers of the country have not paid their fair share of postage heretofore, and I want them to pay now, and I hope this provision in the bill will never be repealed. I want them to pay in the future a fair share of what it is costing the Government to-day to handle this class of mail.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman says the newspapers, but means principally the magazines.

Mr. MANN. A great majority of the newspapers—I am not speaking of trade journals and magazines—do not send one-tenth of their output through the mails.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes; they claim so.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; they do not claim so.

Mr. FORDNEY. They have made such claims to me. I do not know what they say to you.

Mr. MANN. The county papers do, but the big daily papers do not send their papers through the mail.

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield, and to whom?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield to the gentleman from Michigan first. Then I will yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH].

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I wanted to ask my colleague about the question of the 5 per cent tax.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir. I have talked entirely too long. I will yield.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I would like to know whether, in computing the 4 per cent tax, the normal tax——

Mr. FORDNEY. On corporations?

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes; the 5 per cent gross-sales tax is first deducted from the profits.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; my understanding of the law would be this, and I think I am correct: First, before charging the excess-profits tax all other taxes will be deducted, all other taxes of every kind. Then, whatever the net profit is beyond that, the excess-profits tax must be paid on.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I do not think my colleague quite understands my question.

Mr. FORDNEY. Your normal tax at the present time under the law is 2 per cent.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will my colleague explain to the House just how these taxes will be levied—in what order?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I will try to do that.

Mr. CANNON. Did not the gentleman do that at the beginning of his speech, and will it not be in the RECORD?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not think I brought out that point. I will try to do it now. For instance, suppose if a corporation. It is called upon to pay first under existing law the normal tax of 2 per cent. That is the present law. That is the end of your tax, except the excess-profits tax, which is 8 per cent. After deducting all charges, after deducting from their income all taxes of every description and all charges of every kind, then on what is left they are called upon to pay 8 per cent on their excess-profits tax. Let me give you an illustration. Suppose you had $1,000,000 invested and on that, after paying all manner of taxes of every description, you have made 18½ per cent. or $185,000 on an investment of $1,000,000. Now, before you are called upon to pay your excess-profits tax you are permitted to deduct from that $185,000 an exemption of $5,000. Then you are permitted to deduct 8 per cent on your $1,000,000 capital, or $80,000. The two combined is $85,000. I take that sum because it is easy for me to figure and illustrate to you. You have then left $100,000 net profit after paying all taxes and all expenses. On that $100,000 you are called upon to pay 8 per cent, and under this law an additional 8 per cent, or a total excess-profits tax of $16,000. That leaves you $84,000 of the $100,000, and it leaves also your $5,000 exemption and 8 per cent on your capital, which leaves $169,000 out of the $185,000. Your excess profits tax, then, on your net profit after all other taxes are paid is $16,000. That leaves you 16.9 per cent instead of 18.5 per cent profit on your capital when invested, when based on the 18.5 per cent earnings. That is an illustration of what the excess-profits tax imposes upon a corporation.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Let me put my question just as I had it in mind.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Which is the first tax levied—the 4 per cent?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; the normal tax.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The normal tax. Then what comes next—your exemption?

Mr. FORDNEY. Then comes your exemption.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Then you deduct 8 per cent on your capital invested.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Then you put on the 5 per cent gross-sales tax on that.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; the 5 per cent gross-sales tax would come first of all, or at the beginning.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman's colleague is trying to get him in the position of saying that the automobile companies will pay that tax themselves, instead of passing it on to their customers.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; what the gentleman wants to know is where that 5 per cent gross-sales tax is going to be placed, first or last.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Yes; where is it going to be placed?

Mr. FORDNEY. Right upon your gross sales, first.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Then the normal tax will be computed after that.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and then your excess-profits tax, if you are lucky enough to have any excess profits left.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I would like to ask one more question. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who sits beside me, wants the question asked directly whether the 5 per cent gross-sales tax would be charged up as a part of operating expenses.

Mr. FORDNEY. That applies to your sales.

Mr. MADDEN. In other words, you do not tax the man at all. You simply take it out of him, because you do not allow him to put it into his expenses.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; that is about it; you take his money away from him and then send him to war—busted.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I am not quite clear yet about that 5 per cent gross-sales tax, unless he can deduct it from his net income.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; his income has nothing to do with that 5 per cent gross-sales tax.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Has it got something to do with the 4 per cent tax?

Mr. FORDNEY. Wait a minute. If he produces an automobile that sells wholesale for $1,500, he must pay Uncle Sam 5 per cent on that $1,500, or $75; and if he has anything left after this he pays the balance of his taxes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Does he deduct the 5 per cent before he pays the 4 per cent?

Mr. FORDNEY. He pays that 5 per cent first of all, and then if he has any money left with which to pay taxes, well and good; and if not, then he is busted.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Can he deduct that 5 per cent?

Mr. FORDNEY. No.

Mr. STERLING. Yes; he can. Everyone knows that a man can deduct the taxes that he pays, as a part of his expenses.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Where is there anything in this bill which provides that?

Mr. STERLING. The original income-tax law provides that, and this bill follows that.

Mr. BACHARACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. BACHARACH. I want to find out whether you are going to levy the 5 per cent automobile tax on the list price or the manufacturer's price?

Mr. FORDNEY. Whatever price he sells the machine for.

Mr. BACHARACH. Certain automobile manufacturers have agencies and others do not. It would seem to me to be an unfair way to tax them. Take, for instance, the Ford Co. They have their own agencies.

Mr. FORDNEY. The whole tax is unfair, my friend.

Mr. BACHARACH. I know, but this particular portion of it certainly is discriminatory.

Mr. FORDNEY. The 5 per cent is computed on whatever the machine sells for. The list price has nothing to do with it. Whatever the manufacturer sells the machine for, whether he cuts his list price or whether he raises his list price, whatever he has sold it for he must report to the Government and on that he must pay 5 per cent.

Mr. BACHARACH. A great many automobile companies have selling agencies.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BACHARACH. For which there is a deduction of 20 or 25 per cent.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. BACHARACH. In other words, they would be paying only $18.75 for a car which sells for $2,500.

Mr. FORDNEY. Whatever the manufacturer gets for it, that is his selling price, as I understand it.

Mr. BACHARACH. There is no way in which you can tax the agent.

Mr. FORDNEY. No.

Mr. BACHARACH. There are several automobile concerns that have their own agents and they sell to their subagents.

Mr. FORDNEY. If he sells to an agent at a sacrifice price to defraud the Government, I would leave it to the fellow down at the other end of the Avenue to catch him.

Mr. BACHARACH. I do not refer to any fraudulent sale. Take, for instance, the high-grade cars—the Packard, the Winton, and others—the manufacturers dispose of the cars to the subagent.

Mr. FORDNEY. It makes no difference what the method or cost of selling is. Whatever the manufacturer gets for that machine, no matter where it is sold or how it is sold or to whom it is sold, he pays the tax on what he gets.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It makes no difference what the agent gets, it is what the manufacturer gets.

Mr. FORDNEY. Exactly.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield to me 30 seconds to ask a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. CANNON. Judging from the number of telegrams I receive daily—and some in the nighttime—everybody whom it is proposed to tax, or, at least, the most of them, are sending these telegrams, and I do not see how in time or eternity we will ever be enabled to pass a revenue bill, because it is all the while an attempt to put the boil on the other fellow's face. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman from Illinois is right in his suggestion. Everybody wants the tax put on the other fellow.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. I want to ask this question: Suppose the gentleman from Michigan is an automobile manufacturer. It will be assumed, and I suppose admitted, that he has a right to charge off as a part of the expense everything that went into the cost of making automobiles.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. And if he paid 5 per cent tax on the gross sales of the machines, what I want to know is whether that 5 per cent on the gross sales would be added to the cost of making the machines as a part of the expense?

Mr. FORDNEY. I should assume, if I was a manufacturer of automobiles, and I would contend, that all the legitimate charges, whether direct or overhead expenses, whatever they might be, should be charged up to the cost of manufacturing the article.

Now, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], I have received telegrams in bundles. A messenger boy came into my office yesterday with 93 telegrams in one delivery. I said to him, "My son, the Western Union Telegraph Co. pays you 3 cents a telegram, does it not, for delivery?" He answered, "Yes; and I have made $21 so far to-day."

Now, the longer we can keep this up the more money the telegraph companies are going to make. Telegrams are coming by the hundreds and by the thousands. I received one telegram from a druggist in the city of Detroit, Mich., who is objecting to this proprietary medicine tax. He wound up his long telegram of complaint by saying, "Tax the well and not the sick." I answered him and said, "This tax levied by the Democratic Party makes everybody sick." [Laughter and applause.] But I must vote for the bill just the same.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. KNUTSON. In regard to the postal rates, there are very few periodicals in this country but that have been operating at a loss for the last few years. Is not that true?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know, I have no knowledge of that. I am not a publisher.

Mr. KNUTSON. I have been in the publishing business nearly all my life, or since I arrived at man's estate, and there are things that enter the making up of a newspaper that have increased 1,100 per cent since the war broke out. I am receiving letters from publishers saying that if the new postal rates go into effect they will be driven out of business. Is it the intention of the gentleman to drive the publishers out of business?

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me to answer the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The census of 1900, and I presume the census of 1909, shows that the publishers' industry was the second industry in the United States and that the profits going to the publishers was third in all the industries.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does the gentleman refer to the country press or the rural press?

Mr. CANNON. I refer to the whole thing as shown by the census.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me say that I have no desire, and never have had, to tax anybody out of existence or out of business. It is a wrong principle. It is a wrong thing for any intelligent man to do. But here we are, my good friends, facing a proposition to raise, in addition to existing laws, $2,000,000,000 cash out of the pockets of the people in the next 12 months. I have racked my brain night and day to find something on which I could suggest that our committee could raise a goodly sum of money without placing great burdens on any one class of our people. If there is any man on the floor of this House that can suggest something upon which we can put a tax that will raise the necessary money that will not be a burden on the people, or a less burden than the burden as provided in this bill if put into law, I want him to suggest it, and I will give earnest consideration to it and try to adopt it if in my power to see it as he does.

If there are any publishers in this country that this increased postage will put out of business without getting an increased price for his paper or advertising, I believe the patriotic public of this country will pay the additional sum for that periodical or paper and save the institution from ruin, provided that institution can show to its subscribers that it will be ruined unless they get an added price for their products. I believe subscribers will respond and help pay the tax.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does the gentleman know how much they expect to raise by the increase on second-class rates of postage?

Mr. FORDNEY. Second-class mail matter last year paid $11,385,000. It is expected that these increased rates—and the figures are furnished by the Post Office Department—will raise a little over $19,000,000 additional, or a total of $32,000,000 next year, from second-class mail matter.

Mr. STEENERSON. I think that is an overestimate in the increased estimate, because of the short average distance that newspapers and periodicals are carried. Newspapers are carried only an average of 258 miles.

Mr. FORDNEY. And 1 cent a pound did raise last year $11,385,000.

Mr. STEENERSON. Now, as to the increase of the advertising and subscriptions, they would be unable to get that. I am informed that nearly all newspapers, in order to circulate and have the benefit of the second-class rate, must be paid in advance, and that contracts for advertising are also made in advance, and that, therefore, it is impossible for nine-tenths of these periodicals and newspapers——

Mr. FORDNEY. Every institution in the country that is selling an article, which has made a contract for future delivery, is going to suffer, and there is no way that I know of to protect them in that contract.

Mr. STEENERSON. If the gentleman will excuse me a little further——

Mr. FORDNEY. I will ask the gentleman to be as brief as he can, because I am getting very tired.

Mr. STEENERSON. A proposition to increase the mail rates three or four or five or six hundred per cent will undoubtedly drive a large number out of business.

Mr. FORDNEY. I have said that a half a dozen times.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does not the gentleman think that instead of raising nineteen millions in this way—which I think is elusive, because if they go out of business they can not pay—it will be better to tax advertising, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MANN?

Mr. FORDNEY. Better to do what?

Mr. STEENERSON. To put a tax of 2 per cent on advertising instead of 5.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, you will catch them twice, then?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; you eliminate this. You will raise just as much money, and you will drive nobody out of business.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not believe that, because if you increase their outlay in any way they will get it out of the consumer, and will not pay it out of their own pocket; and the Outlook, in its little circular which it is sending around this morning, a copy of which I received, points out to you how much more you will have to pay for the Outlook. They do not propose to pay it—oh, no; they are going to put it on you, the subscriber, so they say.

Mr. STEENERSON. Two-thirds of the advertising escapes anything.

Mr. FORDNEY. It does not make any difference what it is. They are going to make you pay it. They do not propose to pay it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is estimated that we have got about 20,000,000 business men in this country, including farmers. Did the committee take into consideration the advisability of putting a business man's tax upon every business man?

Mr. FORDNEY. My good friend, I believe the business man is taxed now to the limit.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Here is the proposition. I presume it has been the effort of the committee to have everyone contribute something?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There are thousands of business men, small business men, who contribute nothing. If there are 20,000,000 business men in this country and each of them contribute $1 it would make $20,000,000, and, if they contributed $2, $40,000,000. That would be more equitable and everyone would contribute something.

Mr. FORDNEY. But $20,000,000 is but a drop in the bucket. One man came in the other day very much excited, and he said to the chairman, Mr. KITCHIN, "Why, I know where you can get $8,000,000." The chairman replied, "For Heaven's sake, go out there and talk to the porter about a sum of that kind; it is eighteen hundred million dollars that I want to raise." [Laughter.]

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman asked for suggestions of something else. I am not going to suggest anything, because I think the committee has already covered everything on the face of the earth; but one objection I see to the bill is that there is so much double taxation. Some people are going to be taxed twice and others not at all. Could not the committee remedy that? Could not the committee devise some way by which the tax could be imposed more equitably and so as to put less burden on those who can barely live now?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have worked industriously, and upon my word and honor I know there are many injustices in this tax, but let me repeat, as I have said 20 times since I have been on my feet, a tax upon the product, the gross sales of your product, is a wrong method of taxation, and yet there is a lot of it in this bill, but I know of no class of men that we are taxing anywhere nearly as much as we are taxing the business man and the corporation. We are taxing them the full limit, in my opinion, and when you take half of a man's profit you are taking a whole lot of the sweat of his brow. In the Civil War the first income tax imposed upon the people was 3 per cent upon all incomes over $800 and up to $5,000, and 10 per cent on all incomes above $5,000. That tax brought in $32,000,000 or $33,000,000 the first full taxing year. Congress met in 1862 in the midst of that great Civil War and lowered the exemption from $800 to $600 and increased the tax upon those lower incomes from 3 to 5 per cent but made no change on the incomes above $5,000, and immediately collected $72,000,000, or an additional $40,000,000 by an increase of 2 per cent on small incomes and lowering the exemption from $800 to $600. I have figures here and I will put them in my remarks showing the total amount. Three hundred and forty-six million dollars were collected from 1863 to 1873, inclusive, on the income tax upon that basis:

INCOME TAX DURING THE CIVIL WAR.

[From Dewey's Financial History of the United States, p. 305.]

First tax on incomes authorized August 5, 1861; rate, 3 per cent on all incomes above $800 per year and not above $5,000. Tax was increased in 1862 and again in 1863 until incomes between $600 and $5,000 were taxed at 5 per cent and above $5,000 at 10 per cent. As the immediate war necessities became less pressing the exemption was raised to $1,000 and in 1867 to $2,000. In 1872 the tax was abolished.

Year.	Number of persons.	Amount collected.
1863	.....	$2,741,000
1864	.....	20,294,000
1865	.....	32,050,000
1866	460,170	72,982,000
1867	208,135	66,014,000
1868	254,617	41,455,000
1869	272,843	34,791,000
1870	276,661	37,775,000
1871	74,775	19,162,000
1872	72,949	14,436,000
1873	.....	5,062,000
Total	.....	346,762,000

Total expenses growing out of the Civil War were $6,190,000,000.

And I believe that by lowering the exemption on single men and women from $3,000 to $1,000 and on married people from $4,000 to $2,000 it will bring in 4,000,000 people to pay a tax that do not pay under existing law, and that this will yield to this Government from $85,000,000 to $100,000,000.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I observe that by the report of the committee it is proposed to raise $118,750,000 by a tax of 5 per cent upon manufactures of automobiles, automobile tires, musical instruments, motion-picture films, jewelry, pleasure boats, athletic goods, proprietary medicines, perfumery and cosmetics, and chewing gum. The gentleman from Michigan has made this observation: That the levying of that tax will undoubtedly drive to the wall a great many manufacturers engaged in manufacturing articles of that kind.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is what they say.

Mr. GOOD. That will be an injustice and it ought to be avoided. What I want to ask the gentleman is this: Did the committee consider the question of increasing the excess-profits tax to manufacturers engaged in that kind of merchandise to an extent sufficient to yield an equal amount of money rather than by levying a tax upon those sales which will unquestionably drive many of these concerns to the wall?

Mr. FORDNEY. It was suggested by gentlemen on the committee that we increase the excess-profits tax to 20 per cent. That suggestion did not get a majority vote of the members of the committee. It was then suggested to increase the normal tax upon corporations, individuals, and so forth, but a majority of the members on the committee felt that we had taxed them to the limit.

Now let me tell you what this tax will do: Last year there were sold in the United States 1,303,400 automobiles; 1,227,533 of those sold at an average value of $746; the remainder of the 1,303,400 sold at an average value of $2,069 a car. One per cent on the total sales of that 1,303,400 automobiles would raise $10,000,000 in taxes. Every 1 per cent means $10,000,000. Five per cent would raise $50,000,000. In addition it is estimated that next year's sales will far exceed those of last year. I would like to see that tax reduced materially, because I think it is going to work a hardship upon some of the automobile companies and will consequently inure to the benefit of the automobile concerns that can afford that tax, for it will reduce their competition.

I see by the Ford Motor Co.'s annual report, dated July 31, 1916, that that company manufactured 508,000 cars, and their profits were $59,994,118, or $118.10 per car. That machine sells, I believe, for $400.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Three hundred and sixty dollars.

Mr. FORDNEY. Of course, that company can afford to pay on the $400 machine 5 per cent, or $20, and still survive; but how about other motor-car companies less fortunate? The annual statement of the Ford Motor Co. for the fiscal year ending July 31, 1916, shows their capital stock and surplus to be $113,960,000 and the profits to be $59,994,000; and Mr. Ford, so I am informed, owns 57 per cent of the stock of that company, therefore his income from that company's last year's business was, in round numbers, $34,000,000. Now, if this bill is put into law, Mr. Ford will pay an income tax of some $17,000,000 on this year's income. The fabulous earnings of the Ford Motor Co. and certain other automobile companies prompted the committee to put this provision in this bill; but I believe his individual profits are greater than those of any other automobile manufacturer.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, the statement of the gentleman is interesting and instructive, but it does not answer my question. I think the Members of the House are not opposed to taxing these automobile manufacturers to the limit, but when you drive a man out of business you tax him a little beyond the limit. Nobody is opposed to levying a tax——

Mr. FORDNEY. I am in favor of a tax, but I want it small enough so it will not put anyone out of business, thereby eliminating competition for the big manufacturer, who could afford to pay a high tax and still make money.

Mr. GOOD. What I was trying to secure is some information along this line as to whether or not the committee attempted to find some plan by which this $118,700,000 that is proposed to be collected from the manufacturers of luxuries could not be secured by an additional excess-profits tax on these same manufacturers so as to drive none out of business?

Mr. FORDNEY. You can not put an excess profits tax on them unless you put it on everybody.

Mr. GOOD. Why not?

Mr. FORDNEY. How can you pick me out and tax me and not tax the other fellow if we are both in the same business and avoid having it class legislation? Such taxation would, in my opinion, be wholly unconstitutional.

Mr. GOOD. You would not have class legislation if you placed a larger excess-profits tax on all manufacturers of automobiles than you place it, say, for instance, on the manufacturer of cereals.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me answer the gentleman. Why not follow the suggestions of Amos Pinchot: Take 98 per cent of incomes. He came before our subcommittee and wanted us to put into this bill a provision that would take 98 per cent of all incomes above a given amount.

Mr. GOOD. But the gentleman has gone Amos Pinchot better, and says take all of it and drive them to the point of bankruptcy——

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, you can not tax one man in the same line of business without taxing everybody in that line of business and not have class legislation. That is to say, you can not tax one corporation without putting the same ratio of taxes upon all corporations, and the same rule must apply to individuals. But, my friend, I would like to have somebody point out to me something on which we could place a tax that is not mentioned in this law on which a large sum of money can be raised without being a burden upon the people.

Mr. ROBBINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. ROBBINS. Did the gentleman's committee consider in this inheritance tax to be levied or taken one-half of 1 per cent of an inheritance up to $50,000 running on up to 15 per cent when the amount exceeds $15,000,000 any idea whether those inheriting were the descendants of American citizens or foreigners? There is a great amount of money passing out of the United States every year, and the gentleman was asking in reference to additional sources of taxing. Did the gentleman's committee take that into consideration?

Mr. FORDNEY. I know that we have taxed every person who dies, or at least we impose a tax on his estate. I have always been opposed to taxing dead men; by doing so the widow and orphans are taxed; better far to tax the living.

Every man on our committee is just as much dissatisfied with this bill as I am. No one man can have his own way. We are here in a great body of 435 men, and I have never yet found a man that could force his views on the whole Membership of this House. Every tariff law, every revenue measure framed since I have been a Member of this body has been equitable in the judgment of some men, but I have stood by the majority and I am going to do it now. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, I have talked entirely too long. I am quite tired. I have intended to be courteous to everybody. I wish I could explain more to your satisfaction the effect of this bill and the reasons for putting those rates into the proposed law.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. I understand that last year the Post Office establishment showed a profit of about $15,000,000. Is that true?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me tell my friend my information is that there is not a year but there is paid out through the Treasury Department some $20,000,000 to $30,000,000 for the expense of maintaining the Postal Department, and that money is not shown in the expenditures of that department. And that has always been the case. Let me say to the gentleman that 8 or 10 years ago I had occasion to look up the expenditures and the receipts of the Post Office Department for a term of years, 20 or 30 years back, and in not one single instance in all that time did the report show a profit. I do not believe there ever has been a time in many years when the postal receipts of the Government were equal to the expenditures.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Nevertheless, last year they reported, did they not, a $15,000,000 profit?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes; but they did not, as every other Postmaster General did not, show the expenditures through the Treasury Department that I am speaking of.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Be that as it may, assume that they left it on a paying basis, or that there was a postage that partly took care of the deficit that has been talked so much about, what class of postage took care of this ninety million and odd dollars of deficit that was created?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will tell you. I have not studied last year's report, although I have it on my desk, but previous statements of the Postmaster General, Mr. Hitchcock—and I remember one in particular in which I became very much interested—and during his last year as Postmaster General made a statement that was very interesting to me. He showed that in the handling of second-class mail matter that year the Government lost $64,000,000 and on first-class mail matter, which means postal cards and on all 2-cent letters, there was a profit, in round numbers, of $54,000,000, making up within $10,000,000 the total loss on second-class matter.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Now, from what is that made up? From what class is the deficit taken care of to the extent it is taken care of?

Mr. FORDNEY. By first-class mail matter; that class pays more than cost—very largely so. It is claimed now, but I think that is an error, that the parcel post more than pays its cost. As I said, I believe that is an error in estimating.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. It practically does.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Now, here is the point I wanted to get to: You stated a while ago in your argument that it had been demonstrated that the Government, on account of the politician and on account of red tape—I do not care anything about the politician part of it——

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not wish to be political; do not wish to be so understood——

Mr. WILSON of Texas. I know. It had proven itself incapable of that efficiency and economy and success in conducting a business that the individual is capable of.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. I believe that is right.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Will you permit me now to just make this statement in that connection?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. I think an injustice is done the Government irrespective of whether it is Hitchcock or Burleson. You are bound to admit that the Government is in the business of conducting the mails, and that is the only business that it, strictly speaking, is in, and if it was not conducting it, why, such organizations as express companies and others would be conducting it, and that the only revenue it does get with which it overcomes this deficit, which has been mentioned so much, is a matter of carrying, for instance, packages like that letter——

Mr. FORDNEY. Two-cent postage.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. For 2 cents they carry it across the United States, more than 2,000 miles, and if it is not delivered they will bring it back to you for the 2 cents, and yet they conduct that business so scientifically that it creates a fund by which they overcome the deficit in a great measure and show a profit. Now, are you willing to say——

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, do not make the question too long. I can not answer a whole speech.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. I know. Are you willing to say that when a Government renders that sort of service for that sort of pay, when, if you hire a boy to go over here and take a note you would not think of paying him less than 10 cents——

Mr. FORDNEY. Wait a minute. You should not bring that sort of an argument here. That is not reasonable.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Just a suggestion.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I am going to answer you now before I listen any more.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Now, is not the great trouble—

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I am going to answer. I have tried to be courteous, but you have got to wait a minute.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. All right.

Mr. FORDNEY. You are talking about carrying a letter for 2 cents from here to San Francisco and hiring a boy to deliver a message for 10 cents. There is no argument in that comparison. It is on the volume of business that is done on which a profit depends. Further, my friend, that 2 cents is also charged on a fraction of an ounce, not a pound; 2 cents per ounce or fraction thereof; whereas the newspapers and magazines are carried for 1 cent per pound to all points in the United States. For instance, I purchase in my home town a mineral water that flows out of the ground only 32 miles from my home, and the cost of that water for delivering it to my home, putting it in barrels, and transporting it 32 miles is small; yet I pay 10 cents a gallon for it. But I can buy kerosene that is pumped out of the ground a thousand miles from my home—crude petroleum, then refined—and because of the great volume of business which the Standard Oil Co. and other oil companies do in this country, they deliver that kerosene at my home at 9 cents a gallon—less than I can buy that mineral water which flows out of the ground only 32 miles from my home. It is the volume of business that enables them to do it for so small a sum.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. The express companies will carry that letter for you. Do you know what they will charge you?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I do not care, because I send it by mail so much more cheaply, and I do not go to the express companies with mail.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Does it not come to this question, not the inefficiency of the Government in conducting the business, but does it not come from the fact, as Mr. KITCHIN said yesterday, and as you said, the limitations that are put upon the department by the politicians here in not having the nerve to vote this tax on these periodicals and newspapers?

Mr. FORDNEY. Wait a minute. You have made quite a speech, my friend.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. It occasioned quite a speech. You were jumping on the Government administration as being quite inefficient and incapable.

Mr. FORDNEY. Listen to me a minute. I listened quite a long time to you, and I am getting quite fatigued. What you are trying to get at is to show by my statement I am saying it costs this Government more to do something than it costs an individual is wrong. I am not criticizing Mr. Burleson or any other man in particular. It has always been so, whether the Government is under a Democratic administration or under a Republican administration. The Government can not manage those institutions, because of the great volume of business and the great territory covered, as efficiently as an individual can. I gave you as an illustration this morning, my good friend, the freight cost of carrying a ton of freight per mile in a country where the Government owns the railroads as compared with the cost in our country, where the railroads are not owned by the Government; and, although the wages of railroad men in this country are almost double those of the wages of the railroad men in Germany, where the railroads are Government owned, our freight rates are half what the freight rates are in Germany per mile. That, I believe, illustrates the fact that a Government institution, under Government management, does not and can not do business as cheaply as an individual or a well-conducted corporation. It is not within their power to do it; too much red tape, generally.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. I know that the gentleman is tired, and I will make my question brief, and then I will not trouble the gentleman further.

Mr. FORDNEY. All right, sir.

Mr. LANGLEY. At the outset of the gentleman's address to-day I understood him to say, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, as to what this money is to be used for, that, among other things, it was for the raising and maintaining in the field of an army of 2,000,000 men. Do I correctly understand the gentleman's purpose to be to convey the idea that the committee has information such as that—that it is the plan of the administration to raise and put into the field an army of that size? Is that what part of the money is to be used for?

Mr. FORDNEY. The committee has no detailed information as to where this money is going to be spent. In a general way the Secretary of the Treasury came before our committee some time ago, and sent for the members of the committee to come to his office at different times, when they could, and pointed out that from the best estimate he could get they would need at least $1,800,000,000 in addition to the money that will now be raised under existing revenue laws and in addition to the amount of money they will receive from the proceeds of the sale of bonds. That is general information, and that is all that I have, my friend; and on that, having confidence and faith in the judgment and honesty of men, I believe the Secretary of the Treasury, when he came and asked our committee to raise this amount of money, conscientiously believed we would need that amount of money. And if we do raise that much money and the Government does not need it, I do not believe that the Secretary of the Treasury and the administration will throw it away.

Mr. LANGLEY. Nobody else believes that; but ought we not to keep the burden down as much as possible? Ought we not to know something about it? And ought we to raise more than we are certain we need?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, the other evening I had a very pleasant conversation with Mr. Balfour, and he was somewhat surprised to find that during the recesses of Congress, between sessions, such a long period of time went by without Congress throwing around the Treasury of the United States some greater safeguards than leave it to the Secretary of the Treasury. Over in England, he said, nothing of the kind is done. He said, "We suspicion"—that was not the word he used, but—"We doubt the wisdom of the man," the finance keeper—whatever his title is—the minister of finance over there, the chancellor of the exchequer. He said, "By the way, I was chancellor of the exchequer for a number of years, and they watched me like a hawk watches a chicken to see whether I spent that money judiciously, and every little while some one suspicioned that we were using the money in an extravagant manner." He was rather surprised to find that we left the use of this great volume of money to the Secretary of the Treasury and the administration without other safeguards being thrown around it when Congress was not in session.

Mr. LANGLEY. I think there are a great many taxpayers in the country who have the same feeling that the Englishman expressed. It is their money. They have the right to know what is going to be done with it. They have a right to be suspicious, too, under such circumstances.

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, until I find out to the contrary, I want to believe that my colleagues and my neighbors are honest. I want to look every man in the face and hope I am looking into the face of an honest man.

Mr. LANGLEY. I quite agree with the gentleman on that, but my point does not involve a reflection upon one's honesty. It is rather a question of good business methods. The gentleman has extensive business interests. If, for example, the superintendent of one of his lumber mills should ask him for $50,000 more than he had planned to put into it, saying merely the money was needed in the business, the gentleman would naturally ask where it was needed and why.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Did the committee give any consideration to the facts as to the rates of interest or the effect on the bond market?

Mr. FORDNEY. That was discussed. For instance, it was claimed by myself that if we taxed too extremely the capital of the country, and called upon this same capital to purchase Government bonds and furnish us money to carry on this war, but having taxed these same people unjustly, we might be killing the goose that lays the golden egg, because we have to go to the capital of the country to-day, to the financiers, to the people who have the money, and ask them to purchase these bonds.

Let me say to you that it was the most surprising thing to me to learn that, although France in her war with Germany in 1870 and 1871 paid Germany that great indemnity quickly, not one dollar of those bonds have been paid by the French Government. These bonds are all outstanding yet. The Government has kept up the interest on the bonds, but not one dollar of the principal has yet been paid.

Mr. Balfour said that he thought it a wise thing to keep the people of a government in debt. I do not know; he is a wiser man than I. He has been longer connected with these matters of great finance than I, but I differ with him. I know I have been in debt all my life and never expect to get out of debt, but I believe it is a good thing to get away from a bank once in a while; pay your debts and wind up the clock and clean matters up once in a while.

But I do believe, gentlemen, and I say it in all seriousness, that this great legislative body should be just in its taxation on the people, no matter in what class those people walk. [Applause.] I believe the people of this country should be treated fairly. I believe that any man who leads labor to believe that capital is its enemy, or vice versa, is an enemy to both capital and labor. I never entertained such sentiments. I would like to see the laboring men and the business men of this country in closer touch and in greater harmony than they are to-day. I believe, my good friends, that we must look to the great capitalists of this country right now to come forward and put up the money to finance the administration in fighting this great war, and, as I have said, let me repeat again, your son is going, my son is going. While it will be a great sacrifice to send my sons to Europe and see them fill a grave in a foreign land, it is your duty and it is my duty, no matter whose son goes there, my friends, to furnish them with food, ammunition, clothing, and every manner of equipment that will put them on an equal footing with their enemy, so that the enemy may have no advantage. [Applause.]

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I will yield briefly, and then I want to close.

Mr. PLATT. Does not the bill in a sense penalize the wife and children of the man who goes to war and is killed and leaves $25,000? Why should she be penalized when, if he stayed at home, he might have lived?

Mr. FORDNEY. I am now and always have been opposed to an inheritance tax on small incomes. I believe it is an injustice to the widow and children.

Mr. PLATT. But it penalizes the man who fights for his country.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield to the gentleman, and then I must close. I have tried to be courteous and answer all the questions that were asked me.

Mr. CRAMTON. My colleague has spoken of the amounts that he anticipated would be raised by this measure somewhat higher than that estimated by the committee.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Would it be agreeable to my colleague to insert in his remarks in the RECORD an extension of his statement giving his estimate in detail?

Mr. FORDNEY. I would like to do that. I may be wrong in my estimate, yet if we raise a little more than we need it will not matter. But what the Senate will do with the bill the Lord only knows. I do hope that they will put a little more justice in it in some particulars, in some things.

Now, I want to appeal to you, for I want to close. I have tried to answer all the questions asked. Let me appeal to you, both Republicans and Democrats. This is a matter of great seriousness. Your friends and my friends and our sons are going to war. They are going to fight in the greatest war the world ever experienced. Although there are some inequalities in this bill, there are no politics in it. I want to appeal to every man here to cast aside his little prejudices because of some injustice in this bill, and I appeal to you, my colleagues, my Republican friends, as intelligent as I am, as able to judge for yourself as I am for myself, to stand by the Congress of the United States in raising this money to be used in prosecuting this war. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] such time as he may desire.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I am ready now to close debate and proceed to read this bill under the five-minute rule. I guess we all feel about that way. I am only going to talk on that part of the bill which relates to the increase in postage rates on newspapers and magazines, second-class mail matter as we call it. That is the provision of this bill which is going to cause us to be abused from one end of the country to the other. About 30 years ago the newspapers clubbed Congress into agreeing to make Uncle Sam pay a great part of their bill for postage, and they have managed to scare us into continuing that policy down to the present day. As a matter of fact, when Congress first agreed to allow the newspapers to mail their output at less than cost there was a good deal more excuse for it than there is now. There were not so many newspapers and magazines, education was more difficult to obtain, newspapers were not to such an extent media for advertisements, there were no automobiles to be heralded to the public in competitive flamboyance, political advertising was as yet in its infancy, and corset pictures lacked their latter-day piquancy. Nowadays when you glance at the average magazine you find that it is made up largely of corset and automobile advertisements, with a few unimportant stories and a little solid reading matter thrown in. One of the members of the Committee on Ways and Means, Mr. HILL, said that he always tore off the automobile and other advertisements before he read the rest of a magazine. I am afraid that I am mighty apt to throw away the part which Mr. HILL keeps.

Uncle Sam has been subsidizing those newspapers and magazines to the extent of $89,000,000 a year. It costs us a hundred million dollars to carry and distribute them, and all we get back is a beggarly $11,000,000 in postage. In other words, we say to the publishers, "You go ahead and make your money and Uncle Sam will pay the bill." That is all very well in times of peace. In ordinary times we are glad to go ahead and help these folks out. It is always pleasant to be free with other people's money, and, besides, it is agreeable to have the newspapers and magazines back us up around election time. But the time has now come when Uncle Sam needs his money. If we have any money to spare to transport goods for our people free of charge or at less than cost, I confess that I should rather transport food for poor people at a reduced rate rather than tons of strictly educational corset advertisements. If Uncle Sam has got any money to spare for subsidizing, he had better use that money to subsidize something which really needs subsidizing. Well, the Ways and Means Committee started to make the newspapers and magazines pay a fair share of their cost of carriage and distribution, but we did not go so very far along that line. Uncle Sam loses eighty-nine millions a year on this second-class mail matter and we finally determined to reduce that amount by nineteen millions. In other words, if this bill passes in its present form the newspapers and magazines will pay thirty millions toward the cost of their carriage and distribution, while Uncle Sam will lose seventy millions in handling it.

Mr. Koons, the First Assistant Postmaster General, appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means and gave certain testimony, which I took down in writing. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DIXON] then read this testimony to Mr. Koons and that gentleman answered that I had correctly taken down his words. Following is the memorandum:

> At present the total cost of handling second-class mail matter is $100,000,000 per year.
> At present the revenue is $11,000,000 per year.
> Under the proposed rates, according to Mr. Stewart's estimate, the revenue from second-class mail matter will be $30,000,000 per year unless there is a falling off in the amount mailed. Accordingly under the proposed rates, if the present quantity holds up, there will be an annual loss of $70,000,000 in handling second-class mail matter.

Some of the newspapers and magazines appear to think that we are making them pay out of spite. Others say that we are revenging ourselves because the newspapers favored this war. Certainly that can not be my motive, for I believe that this is a just and holy war. A newspaper friend of mine came to me and said, "Congressman, how do you justify this increase in the postage on newspapers?" I said, "I can not justify it, I am sorry to say, because I know it ought to be twice as great, if not more." [Applause.] If I had my way, the postage on newspapers would be very much greater and even then Uncle Sam would be stuck for most of the bill.

Some magazine people came to see me yesterday. They said, "Do not you know that we have been knocking the administration, and now, instead of standing by us, you are going back on us? This is nothing but a set-up job and the Democrats are out to revenge themselves. This is nothing but just plain, ordinary revenge." I said, "I certainly am not out to knock you. You have been mighty good to me. Yet I voted for that increase in postage just the same." They said, "Did you not let the newspapers off cheaper than you did us?" I said, "Yes; but there was a reason for it, my friends. It is true that you are hit in this bill harder than newspapers are hit, but you have been reaping a great deal bigger comparative benefit than the newspapers hitherto. Up to the present time the newspapers have come nearer to paying their sect than you have. It is true that we have taken away from you more of your comparative advantage than the newspapers are forced to give up, nevertheless we have not yet restored the balance, so that you and the newspapers are on the same basis."

In other words, after we have passed this bill—and I hope that we shall pass it about as it stands—the magazines will still receive a subsidy from the Government larger in proportion than that which the newspapers will receive.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, after listening to the lengthy, illuminating, and exhaustive arguments made by both the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], who have covered the bill in all its details, I am not going to venture into all the details of this bill, but speak briefly on a few of the matters and schedules connected with the bill.

I do not suppose this measure in all of its particulars suited any member of the Ways and Means Committee. It certainly does not suit me, and there are some taxes imposed that I would like to see out of the bill. If I had had my way, those schedules would have been changed, and I have no doubt every member of the committee feels about this as I do. But, unfortunately for me and every other individual member of the committee, a large majority of the committee would, in the instances when the tax was believed by the individual member to be unwise and injudicious, overrule the individual objection. I do not feel that I am violating any confidence of the committee when I tell you that, as strenuously as I could, up to the last moment, I opposed with all my power the section of this bill relating to the customs duties. There are other sections equally distasteful to other members. I honestly believe that this is the very best bill that the 23 members of the Ways and Means Committee could frame. We are at war with perhaps the greatest military power upon the face of the earth. We need men and money to carry on this war to a successful conclusion. The administration has asked us to bring in a bill to provide, in addition to the bond bill of a few days ago, $1,800,000,000. It is contended by the Commander in Chief of our Army and our Navy and by the War Department and by the Secretary of the Treasury that this money is needed—that it must be raised at once. This was no time for us to delay because of personal views we may have in regard to the different items suggested to be taxed. It was no time for us to indulge in partisan politics nor to insist upon the adoption of those methods of taxation which the party to which we owe allegiance had made a practice to adopt. The representatives of three political parties were present at the deliberations of the committee. We have been for about 10 days earnestly considering this bill. Eighteen hundred millions of dollars is a large amount to raise by taxation in addition to the present taxes now imposed.

It is the largest tax bill ever presented to an American Congress. It is the best bill we could frame. It does not suit any of us in its entirety, and yet it suits all of us better than any other bill the committee could write.

There were many different opinions expressed, and freely expressed, during the consideration of this measure, but, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] have said, no partisanship ever crept into our deliberations. We all realized that it was far more important for us to present a bill and supply our country with the needed sinews of war than to insist upon the adoption or the rejection of certain kinds of taxation to which we may have held allegiance in the past. No war can be carried to a successful conclusion without the necessary funds to finance that war. This is the hour of our country's trial, this is the time of her need, and the bill we present to you for your consideration is the very best bill we could frame.

The revenue derived from this bill can be roughly estimated as coming from a dozen different sources of taxation. Owing to the present high prices of foodstuffs, the committee has for the most part kept away from consumption taxes, and the money to be derived from this bill comes from incomes, excess profits, beverages—vinous, spirituous, and alcoholic, as well as what are commonly called soft drinks—cigars, tobacco, and cigarettes; advertising, insurance, and facilities furnished by public utilities, manufacture, admissions to theaters and other places of amusement, and dues or membership fees of any social or athletic or sporting club or organizations; increase in postage and customs duties.

A great part of the amount sought to be collected by this bill comes from incomes and excess profits. Of the $1,810,420,000 estimated to be derived from the bill, $840,000,000 comes from these two sources alone.

The Underwood Act provided for a normal tax on incomes of 1 per cent with an exemption of $3,000 for a single man and $4,000 for a married man, and graduated to a maximum tax of 6 per cent upon the amount by which the total net income exceeded $500,000. The act approved September 8, 1916, considerably increased the income tax, doubling the normal tax, and graduated to a maximum tax of 13 per cent above total net incomes of $2,000,000, but the exemptions remained unchanged. This bill presents a still more drastic change in the income-tax law. The normal tax has again been doubled, the rate now being 4 per cent. In addition to this, the exemptions have been considerably lowered—$1,000 for a single man and $2,000 for a married man. The increase is still more marked in the graduations. The rates on incomes as fixed by this bill will be as follows:

Two per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $1,000 in the case of a single person and $2,000 in the case of a married person and does not exceed $4,000.

One per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $7,500; making a total tax of 5 per cent; 4 per cent being the normal rate and 1 per cent which is carried in the present bill.

Two per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $7,500 and does not exceed $10,000; making a total tax of 6 per cent; 4 per cent being the normal rate and 2 per cent carried in the present bill.

Three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $10,000 and does not exceed $12,500; making a total tax of 7 per cent; 4 per cent being the normal rate and 3 per cent carried in the present bill.

Four per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $12,500 and does not exceed $15,000; making a total tax of 8 per cent; 4 per cent being the normal rate and 4 per cent carried in the present bill.

Five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $15,000 and does not exceed $20,000; making a total tax of 9 per cent; 4 per cent being the normal rate and 5 per cent carried in the present bill.

Six per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $20,000 and does not exceed $40,000—making a total tax of 11 per cent—four per cent being the normal rate, 1 per cent by the revenue act of September 8, 1916, and 6 per cent carried by the present bill.

Eight per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $40,000 and does not exceed $60,000—making a total tax of 14 per cent—4 per cent being the normal rate, 2 per cent by the revenue act of September 8, 1916, and eight per cent carried by the present bill.

Eleven per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $60,000 and does not exceed $80,000—making a total tax of 18 per cent—4 per cent being the normal rate, 3 per cent by the revenue act of September 8, 1916, and 11 per cent carried by the present bill.

Fourteen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $80,000 and does not exceed $100,000—making a total tax of 22 per cent—4 per cent being the normal rate, 4 per cent by the revenue act of September 8, 1916, and 14 per cent carried by the present bill.

Seventeen per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $150,000—making a total tax of 26 per cent—4 per cent being the normal rate, 5 per cent by the revenue act of September 8, 1916, and 17 per cent carried by the present bill.

Twenty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $150,000 and does not exceed $200,000—making a total of 30 per cent—4 per cent being the normal rate, 6 per cent by the revenue act of September 8, 1916, and 20 per cent carried by the present bill.

Twenty-four per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $200,000 and does not exceed $250,000—making a total of 35 per cent—4 per cent being the normal rate, seven per cent by the revenue act of September 8, 1916, and 24 per cent carried by the present bill.

Twenty-seven per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $250,000 and does not exceed $300,000—making a total tax of 39 per cent—4 per cent being the normal rate, 8 per cent by the revenue act of September 8, 1916, and 27 per cent carried by the present bill.

Thirty per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $300,000 and does not exceed $500,000—making a total tax of 43 per cent—4 per cent being the normal rate, 9 per cent by the revenue act of September 8, 1916, and 30 per cent carried by the present bill.

Thirty-three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $500,000 and does not exceed $1,000,000, making a total tax of 47 per cent, 4 per cent being the normal rate, 10 per cent by the revenue act of September 8, 1916, and 33 per cent carried by the present bill.

Thirty-three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $1,000,000 and does not exceed $1,500,000, making a total tax of 48 per cent, 4 per cent being the normal rate, 11 per cent by the revenue act of September 8, 1916, and 33 per cent carried by the present bill.

Thirty-three per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $1,500,000 and does not exceed $2,000,000, making a total tax of 49 per cent, 4 per cent being the normal rate, 12 per cent by the revenue act of September 8, 1916, and 33 per cent carried by the present bill.

All incomes in excess of $2,000,000: The tax rate will be 50 per cent, 4 per cent being the normal rate, 13 per cent by the revenue act of September 8, 1916, and 33 per cent carried by the present bill.

In addition to these taxes on individual incomes there shall be collected from the incomes received from corporations an additional tax of 2 per cent, making a total tax of 4 per cent on the incomes from corporations. This tax is not graduated like the tax on individuals.

We expect to raise additional revenue from this tax on the incomes of individuals and corporations to the amount of $532,700,000, while the war tax on 1916 incomes will yield $108,000,000, making a total additional amount to be received from incomes for a 12-month period of $640,700,000.

We have increased the excess profits tax 100 per cent, making the tax 16 per cent on all profits in excess of 8 per cent, and leaving $5,000 exempt as provided for in the present bill—we expect to raise $200,000,000 by this tax.

The excess profits tax was first adopted by Congress on March 3, 1917, and provided for a tax of 8 per cent on all net profits after deducting an exemption of $5,000 and 8 per cent on the capital and all money invested. A corporation having a capital and undivided profits or surplus of $150,000 would be entitled to 8 per cent on the $150,000, which would be $12,000. To this would be added the $5,000 exemption, making $17,000; then, if, say, $3,000 were paid in salaries and other running expenses, the total exemption would then be $20,000. If the corporation declared a net profit of $25,000, then the tax would apply to the difference between the $20,000 exemption and the $25,000 profit, or $5,000, and the tax would only be $40.

It might be interesting at this time to note the amount of this tax Canada has imposed. The old Canadian tax has been changed and is now 25 per cent on profits above 7 per cent and up to 15 per cent. On profits between 15 per cent and 20 per cent the tax is 50 per cent, and on all profits in excess of 20 per cent the tax is 75 per cent. The tax imposed in the bill is extremely moderate as compared with the tax in Canada.

We have raised the tax on whisky from $1.10 per gallon to $2.20 per gallon. While this increase may appear large, yet it is nothing like so much an increase as Canada or the United Kingdom has imposed. It is estimated that we will raise on this increase $107,500,000, but due regard should be had for the gradual decrease in consumption of intoxicating liquors by reason of recent prohibition laws which will curtail the consumption of this beverage.

The tax on beer has been raised from $1.50 per barrel to $2.75 per barrel and should bring in $37,500,000.

In addition to the tax on distilled and rectified spirits and fermented liquors there is an additional tax on wines which should yield $6,000,000, making a total additional revenue from these liquors of $151,000,000.

The committee met with considerable difficulty in framing a tax on those beverages commonly known as soft drinks. Many of these drinks are sold at the soda fountain, and it would be almost an impossibility to tax those sold in that manner, because the burden of keeping track of such drinks would be intolerable. The tax on sirups paid at the source by the manufacturer, producer, or importer would still permit much of these drinks to escape taxation. We placed a tax of 10 per cent of the price on sirups or extracts intended for use in the manufacture or production of these beverages. This tax is to be paid by the manufacturer, producer, or importer. And we also placed a tax of 8 cents per pound upon all carbonic-acid gas in drums or other containers intended for use in the production or manufacture of carbonated water or other drinks. The tax of 8 cents per pound upon the carbonic-acid gas will be paid at the source by the manufacturer, producer, or importer thereof, and they can make such terms as are satisfactory to the retailers and themselves. Carbonated water is the principal part of nearly all of these soft drinks which are sold in open glasses at the fountain. These beverages will not escape taxation but will bear their proportionate part of the burdens brought about by the war.

There is also a tax of 1 cent per gallon upon all natural mineral waters or table waters sold by the producer, bottler, or importer thereof, in bottles or other closed containers at over 10 cents per gallon, while 2 cents per gallon is imposed upon all grape juice, artificial mineral waters and fermented liquors containing less than one-half per cent alcohol sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, and also upon all ginger ale, root beer, sarsaparilla, pop, and other carbonated water or beverages.

We expect to derive $20,000,000 in revenue from these soft drinks.

This, however, is, in my opinion, an estimate based on conjecture. I believe that the revenue from this source will be nearly double the estimate we have made in the report on this bill.

The tax on tobacco, cigars, snuff, and cigarettes in this bill is practically twice as much as the present law. The higher grades of cigars, however, have been raised to a rate much more than 100 per cent. We expect to raise by these taxes $57,400,000, of which amount $11,000,000 will be received from cigars, $25,000,000 from cigarettes at $1.25 per thousand, $30,000,000 from tobacco at 8 cents per pound, $2,000,000 from snuff at 8 cents per pound, and $400,000 from cigarette papers and tubes at 1 or 2 cents per hundred.

Mr. HICKS Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield for a question?

Mr. COLLIER. I yield with great pleasure to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HICKS. Was any provision thought of for putting a tax on candy, a commodity which is a pure luxury, and which I imagine would produce a large revenue if there was only a small tax levied against it?

Mr. COLLIER. There was some talk about putting a tax on candy, but I think most of it went up in talk. I do not recall whether there was any serious suggestion made on that or not. I will say that candy might well have been included in this bill.

Mr. HICKS. Would it not produce a very large revenue, based on the consumption of candy in this country?

Mr. COLLIER. I have no doubt that the gentleman is absolutely right, and candy would have produced a great deal of revenue; but I will say to the gentleman from New York that the main reason why we did not put a tax on it was that we tried to keep away from consumption taxes so far as we could. We first decided that we would raise as much of this money as we could on the wealth of the country, and then we would tax those articles on which the tax would be least burdensome to the people, keeping away as far as we could from all kinds of consumption taxes. For instance, we did not put an excise tax on sugar, which would have raised a large revenue. There are a great many other articles which, if we had put an excise tax on them, would have raised considerable revenue. I want to say a word now about the tax upon insurance policies which will be good news to the insurance agents throughout the country. While the tax remains the same that it was during the Spanish-American War, yet there has been a change in the administrative features of that tax, which will be very grateful to the local insurance agents. Under the old law the local agent had to get the stamp and put it on the policy. In case, as happens very often in fire-insurance policies, the policy was canceled, then they had to go to the extra bookkeeping of canceling the stamp and making proper entry on the books. In order to obviate that we adopted this plan: The home office, which paid the tax before and pays it now, will make sworn monthly statements to the collector of the internal revenue in the district where the home office is domiciled, and every 30 days that money will be paid. I want to say for myself that we are very much indebted to the gentleman from California [Mr. KETTNER] who happens to be in the insurance business, who gave me in particular some very valuable information about this, and also I would like to refer in this connection to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN].

Mr. EAGAN. The gentleman is now speaking of fire insurance policies?

Mr. COLLIER. Yes; but this refers to fire, life, marine, inland, and casualty insurance. I was speaking particularly of fire insurance when I spoke of the cancellation. I understand it frequently happens that the renewal of a policy is not continued because that policy was placed through some other agent. Of course, the agent who took the first policy naturally renewed it and forwarded it to the party whom he had insured, and if the policy was returned all of this cancellation had to be made, which took a great deal of time and extra booking.

We have levied a tax of 8 cents upon each hundred dollars or fractional part thereof on each life insurance policy except those issued by fraternal beneficiary societies or orders, or farmers' purely local cooperative companies or associations, or employees' relief associations operated on the lodge system or local cooperative plan and conducted solely for the exclusive benefit of its members and not for profit.

On marine, inland, casualty, and fire insurance there shall be collected 1 cent on each dollar or fractional part thereof on each insurance premium. We expect to collect $5,000,000 from these taxes.

The bill provides for a tax of 5 per cent on the amount paid for all advertising on billboards, street cars, and the like, but it does not refer to the newspapers and periodicals. We expect to receive $7,500,000 from these advertisements.

The bill provides for a tax of 3 per cent of the amount paid for the transportation by rail or water of freight consigned from one point in the United States to another. This tax is expected to raise $77,500,000. It is further provided that a tax of 10 per cent of the amount paid for transportation of persons by rail or water with certain exceptions where the fare does not exceed 25 cents and a commutation or season ticket is for trips of less than 30 miles, shall be collected. The amount estimated to be received from this tax, including seats and berths, is $75,750,000. A like tax of 10 per cent on the amount paid for the transportation of property is levied upon the express companies, and we expect to raise $15,000,000 from this source.

These taxes are all collected at the source by the companies from those using the service or facilities rendered, and the money so collected is turned over to the collector of the district in which the office of the company is located by the transportation or express companies upon monthly returns itemized and sworn to by the common carriers.

A tax of 5 per cent of the amount paid for the transportation of oil by pipe lines is also included in the present bill. It is estimated that we will receive $4,500,000 from this source. The question may be asked why is it that we lay a tax of 3 per cent on freight or oil carried by rail and a tax of 5 per cent on oil carried by pipe line. This charge is borne by the shippers of oil, and I understand the pipe lines will not receive shipments in quantities less than 100,000 barrels. Receiving such immense shipments permits these pipe-line companies to charge in some instances 50 per cent less than the railroads. For this reason these shippers can well afford to pay an additional tax of 2 per cent.

A tax of 5 per cent of the amount paid for electric power and gas for domestic use and telephone service other than that for personal use shall be collected. It is believed that this tax will amount to $30,000,000.

A tax of 5 cents each shall be imposed upon each telegraph message and telephone conversation or message for which a charge of 15 cents or more is made. We expect to raise $7,000,000 by this tax. This tax shall be paid at the source by the telephone and telegraph companies collecting the tax from the persons, corporations, or associations paying for the services and making returns similar to the transportation companies. The committee placed a tax of 5 per cent upon the selling price of all automobiles and automobile trucks, wagons, and motorcycles which is expected to bring in $68,000,000. This tax is to be paid by the manufacturer or importer of these vehicles. There is also a like tax on tires and tubes, which is estimated will yield $12,500,000. But this tax shall not be imposed on tires and tubes on auto vehicles upon which the tax has been paid and the value of the tires and tubes computed in the payment of the tax on such vehicles.

A like tax of 5 per cent shall be imposed upon the price of all musical instruments and records and phonographs sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer for more than $10 each. This tax is expected to yield $7,000,000 in revenue.

On moving-picture films a tax of one-half of 1 per cent per linear foot has been levied on those films which have not been exposed, and on those ready for projection a tax equivalent to 1 cent per linear foot. We except to raise $7,000,000 by this tax. On jewelry, sporting goods, pleasure boats, yachts, perfumes and cosmetics, proprietary medicines, and chewing gum a tax of 5 per cent has been imposed. We expect to raise $24,250,000 from these sources.

We have placed a tax of 5 per cent on the price sold of all cosmetics, drugs, proprietary medicines, oils, essences, and the like.

There is one feature of this tax on cosmetics, drugs, and like articles which will appeal to the retail druggists. Under the stamp-tax acts of the Spanish-American War and the act of October, 1914, the retail druggists were required to place a stamp on all medicines, cosmetics, chewing gum, and proprietary medicines which were sold over the counter. It was not only a source of much annoyance to the druggist as some of these taxes were in denominations as small as one-eighth of a cent, but it was impossible for this tax to be handed down to the consumer. I received, and I have no doubt all of you received, a great many protests from the retail druggists throughout the country saying they did not object to the amount of the tax, but that what they did object to was the way they had to put it on. For instance, if there was a tax of one-fourth of a cent on a dollar's worth of bay rum, and a customer asked for 50 cents' worth of bay rum, the druggist had to look up the tax and then get a one-eighth of a cent stamp and put it on. We have adopted the same plan that was pursued in reference to the tax on insurance policies. The manufacturer or the importer makes an invoice, a sworn statement, and pays the tax monthly, and they can make any arrangements they see fit with the retail druggists.

Mr. MASON. And no stamps at all?

Mr. COLLIER. No stamps at all; nor are there any stamps on insurance policies or freight bills. A tax equivalent to 1 cent for each 10 cents or fraction thereof shall be paid on the admission price to any place where admission is charged and a tax of 5 cents on all persons who are admitted free. No tax shall be charged where the admission price does not exceed 5 cents and children under 12 years of age are admitted upon the payment of 1 cent. Of course, this tax does not apply on admissions to those places where the proceeds go to religious, charitable, or eleemosynary institutions. Sixty million dollars is expected to be realized from this tax.

A tax of 10 per cent of the amount paid as dues or membership fees to any social, sporting, or athletic club or association shall be collected from the member paying such dues. One million five hundred thousand dollars is estimated by the report to be raised by this tax. Again, however, I believe that the amount received from this tax will be largely in excess of that amount.

We have substantially reenacted the stamp tax of the Spanish-American War and the act of October 22, 1914. There is no tax on checks. A tax on checks would raise considerable revenue, but it is such an annoying tax that the committee decided to leave it out of the bill.

The principal subjects of taxation and the rates imposed are as follows:

SOURCE OF REVENUE.	PROPOSED TAX.
1. Bonds of indebtedness	5 cents on each $100.
2. Bond, indemnity, and surety	50 cents each, or 1 per cent of premium.
3. Capital stock, issued	5 cents on each $100.
4. Capital stock, sales or transfers	2 cents on each $100.
5. Produce, sales of, on exchange	2 cents for each $100.
6. Promissory notes, including drafts or checks payable otherwise than at sight or on demand.	2 cents for each $100 or fraction thereof.
7. Conveyances	50 cents for each $500 or fraction thereof.
8. Entry of goods at customhouse for consumption or warehousing.	25 cents to $1, according to value.
9. Entry for withdrawal of goods from customs bonded warehouse.	50 cents.
10. Passage ticket	$1 to $5, according to cost.
11. Proxies	10 cents each.
12. Power of attorney	25 cents each.
13. Playing cards, in addition to existing duty.	8 cents per pack.

We have increased the estate or inheritance tax. The exemption of $50,000 has been reduced to $25,000.

I will insert a schedule showing the increased tax as proposed by this bill and the additions imposed by the act of March 3, 1917. One per cent of the amount of such net estate not in excess of $25,000.

One-half of 1 per cent of the amount of such net estate not in excess of $50,000, making a total tax of 2 per cent—1½ per cent by the act of March 3, 1917.

One per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $50,000 and does not exceed $150,000, making a total tax of 4 per cent—3 per cent by act of March 3, 1917.

One and one-half per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $150,000 and does not exceed $250,000, making a total tax of 6 per cent—4½ per cent by act of March 3, 1917.

Two per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $250,000 and does not exceed $450,000, making a total tax of 8 per cent—6 per cent by act of March 3, 1917.

Two and one-half per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $450,000 and does not exceed $1,000,000, making a total tax of 10 per cent—7½ per cent by act of March 3, 1917.

Three per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $1,000,000 and does not exceed $2,000,000, making a total tax of 12 per cent—9 per cent by act of March 3, 1917.

Three and one-half per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $2,000,000 and does not exceed $3,000,000, making a total tax of 14 per cent—10½ per cent by act of March 3, 1917.

Four per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $3,000,000 and does not exceed $4,000,000, making a total tax of 16 per cent—12 per cent by act of March 3, 1917.

Four and one-half per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $4,000,000 and does not exceed $5,000,000, making a total tax of 18 per cent—13½ per cent by the act of March 3, 1917.

Five per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $5,000,000 and does not exceed $8,000,000, making a total tax of 20 per cent—15 per cent by act of March 3, 1917.

Seven per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $8,000,000 and does not exceed $11,000,000, making a total tax of 22 per cent—15 per cent by act of March 3, 1917.

Ten per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $11,000,000 and does not exceed $15,000,000, making a total tax of 25 per cent—15 per cent by act of March 3, 1917.

Fifteen per cent of the amount by which such net estate exceeds $15,000,000, making a total tax of 30 per cent—15 per cent by act of March 3, 1917.

Perhaps the most vigorous protests the committee received during the consideration of this bill came from the publishing houses and the newspapers and periodicals which for years had been receiving a subsidy of about 90 per cent of the cost of the carriage and delivery of these publications. It costs the Government, in round numbers, $99,000,000 to handle and deliver the second-class mail. The rate is 1 cent per pound, and these publishers pay to the Government in postage about $11,000,000, making a net loss to the Government of $88,000,000. Some of these publications—newspapers and periodicals, periodicals especially—are composed of about 20 per cent reading or news matter and the balance, or 80 per cent, is in advertisements. It might be interesting to relate that some of these periodicals, 80 per cent of which are composed strictly of advertising matter, at a cost in some instances to the advertiser of $5,000 to $10,000 a page, that these periodicals and journals which have been receiving from the Government for years a subsidy amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, have been the most hysterical in denouncing as "pork-barrel" legislation any sort of much-needed improvements of rivers and harbors or the erection of a post-office building in a town where the facilities are such that the public interest demands the Government's ownership of such building.

The tax proposed in this bill, in so far as it refers to second-class mail matter, will secure only $19,000,000 of the $88,000,000 now lost to the Government; but the tax of 3 cents on first-class letter postage and 2 cents on postal cards will bring in $70,000,000 additional.

The rate on second-class mail matter has been changed from the flat rate of 1 cent a pound to a zone system, in which the rates of postage are as follows:

That on and after June 1, 1917, the zone system applicable to parcel post shall apply to mail matter of the second class, and the rates of postage shall be as follows: Two cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the first or second zones, 3 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the third zone, 4 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the fourth or fifth zones, 5 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the sixth or seventh zones, 6 cents a pound or fraction thereof when for delivery within the eighth zone: Provided, That the rate of postage on daily newspapers, when the same are deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by its carriers, shall be the same as now provided by law: Provided further, That nothing herein shall affect existing law as to free circulation and existing rates on second-class mail matter within the county of publication: Provided further, That the Postmaster General may hereafter require publishers to separate or make up to zones in such manner as he may direct all mail matter of the second class when offered for mailing: Provided further, That second-class mail matter mailed to subscribers from an office other than that of publication shall pay the same rate as if mailed from the office at the place of publication: And provided further, That in the case of newspapers and periodicals entitled to be entered as second-class matter and maintained by and in the interests of religious, educational, philanthropic, agricultural, labor, or fraternal organizations not organized for profit and none of the net income of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual, the second-class postage rate shall be 1½ cents a pound or fraction thereof, irrespective of the zone in which delivered, except when the same are deposited in a letter-carrier office for delivery by its carriers, in which case the rate shall be the same as now provided by law. The publisher of such newspapers or periodicals before being entitled to the foregoing rates shall furnish the Postmaster General, at such times and under such conditions as he may prescribe, satisfactory evidence that none of the net income of such organization inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual: And provided further, That the Postmaster General, on or before the 10th day of each month, shall pay into the general fund of the Treasury an amount equal to the difference between the estimated amount received during the preceding month for the transportation of first and second class matter through the mails under this title and the estimated amount which would have been received under the provisions of the law in force at the time of the passage of this act.

A tariff of 10 per cent on all articles on the free list and an additional tariff of 10 per cent on all dutiable articles is imposed by this bill. It is estimated that $200,000,000 will be raised from these duties. I am sure that it will be much nearer $300,000,000 than $200,000,000. The reason this tax was placed in the bill was solely because we needed the money. I regret that the revenue derived from this source could not have been secured in some other way.

As I stated a few moments ago, I do not believe I violate any confidence when I say that as strenuously as was in my power I opposed this feature of the bill which put a 10 per cent tax on dutiable articles and those upon the free list. I recall the many occasions upon this floor in attempting to answer my good friend from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] and in attempting to answer my good friend the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], and others who are wedded to protection. I have sworn that by my vote I would never permit certain articles ever to bear a tax. I remember how I have stood upon this floor and demanded that the great basic materials—coal, iron, lumber, and others—given us not by the ingenuity of man but through the goodness of God, should be free from taxation. I have sent out to my constituents free-list speeches in which I stated that lumber should be free and that I would forever stand between the tax gatherer and an American citizen who wanted to build a home for his family, a schoolhouse for his children, and a church for his God. I can see now that when I cast my vote for this bill sometimes chickens come home to roost. [Laughter.] But, my friends, the question with us now is above party politics. All legislation is more or less the result of compromise. I would never vote for this measure in times of peace. I opposed it in the committee, but I was overruled. The necessity for early action on this bill is great. The question confronting us now is how we can at this time best raise $1,800,000,000 in order to defray the expenses of this war and take care of our soldiers who are going to the front; and, though I am opposed to many schedules in this bill, yet I shall support the bill substantially without amendment. We have by a practically unanimous vote declared this war. We have by a large vote adopted the selective-draft plan whereby the young manhood of our country will be practically conscripted; and by this bill, my friends, we are going to conscript the dollars necessary to carry on this war. I believe when we send our young men to the front to bear the brunt of battle those who are beyond the fighting age and who will not fall within the selective draft should make no complaint when they are called upon to help defray the expenses of this war.

I have received more telegrams in the last two weeks than I ever received during the consideration of any other bill. I have received telegrams worded patriotically, that each and every person whom we intend to tax is willing to pay his share to carry on this war; but as has been stated by the gentleman preceding me [Mr. FORDNEY], they all think some other fellow ought to pay the tax.

This is a large tax bill we are presenting to the American people. It has followed other revenue measures larger than this, and there may be others yet to come. There is no need for us to appeal to the patriotism of our people in order to get them to support the enormous tax bills we are enacting to carry on this war. We did not bring on this war. We are engaged in no war for conquest. We are waging no war for territorial expansion, nor are we fighting for the aggrandizement of our country.

The American people are a peace-loving, liberty-seeking people, and we tried as best we could to keep out of this great conflict which now seems to have convulsed the entire universe. We did not draw the sword until patience had ceased to be a virtue and forebearance had become a repudiation of those principles of free government, the exercise of which has made our country the wonder and the admiration of the world. [Applause.] We have drawn the sword in defense of humanity and the inalienable rights of mankind. We have drawn the sword to perpetuate and to preserve those principles of free government so dear to the hearts of all lovers of human liberty. We have drawn the sword to maintain the freedom of the seas. The great highways of ocean traffic given to all by the goodness of God should be kept open to the argosies of the world, and as long as American ideals and American traditions endure they shall not be syndicated by any one country on the face of the earth. [Applause.]

Less than 10 days ago here in this historic Chamber we heard that gallant and eloquent Frenchman, M. Viviani, in impassioned tone call upon the immortal shades of Washington and Lafayette to again behold the spectacle of the two mightiest Republics on the face of the earth as they marched shoulder to shoulder, side by side, struggling against military despotism, and fighting for the rights, the happiness, the prosperity, and the liberties of all mankind.

We are now a great country, a united country, a rich and a powerful country. We can well afford to pay the tax bill that we are bringing in here to carry on this war to a speedy and victorious end, and I say to you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, that we do not have to appeal to the patriotism of the American people in order to get them to support the bill which we have brought in. Every day come thousands of letters, telegrams, and messages from these offering to dedicate their lives and their fortunes to the cause of our country; and if we have in the future to bring in more tax bills, I say to you again that we will never have to appeal to the patriotism of our people in order to get their support for these measures, because they are more than willing, not only to offer their lives to the cause of universal liberty, but they are willing to give of their means to carry on this war to a speedy and victorious conclusion. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, it is one of the most remarkable things that could have occurred in any popular assembly that a bill to levy a tax of this size upon people should be received with such unanimity or near unanimity as this bill is received. Certainly it is a compliment of the very highest order to the membership of the committee that framed the legislation.

Evidently while the burden of taxation has been heavy, because the need was imperative and the demands were heavy, the bill has been so framed as to distribute that burden of taxation with practical equality, not only upon every line of human activity which ought to respond for the protection of the Government, but upon every section of the country. Manifestly, if there were any great discrimination, either sectional or otherwise, more echo would have been heard in this House, because this is, after all, in the last analysis, an extremely representative body. I sometimes think it is more representative of kicks and complaints than it is representative of the great benefits of a free government. We are more apt to hear as representatives of our people of the complaints, the difficulties, the discriminations, or alleged discriminations, that occur in legislation than an appreciation of its good features. I have had, as every Member here has, an enormous number of complaints against specific items in this bill, and yet I have answered each one of those complaints with practically the same statement, that the burden of taxation caused by the present war unfortunately will be enormous upon every line of business, and that the committee would not permit any line of business to escape. Not only would the committee not permit any discrimination, but they would not overlook any possible and reasonable source of taxation for the raising of these imperatively needed funds. And that is the only reply that can justly be given to any of these complaints of specific industries against the tax which is levied against their industry. This is a huge bill, and yet it must be measured not by its own size, but by the demands that it is intended to meet.

In the opening speech in this debate the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] referred to the fact that this war must not be financed by putting the burden upon unborn generations. I thoroughly agree with him in that, yet I would go further and say that this war could not be financed by putting the burden upon unborn generations. However many bonds we may issue, if we issued the full limit that the reserve capital of this country would be able to absorb, we would still need for the proper conduct of this war an enormously increased supply of cash taxes, and they are represented by this bill. I undertake to say that the administration officials are correct in estimating that close to $2,000,000,000 of cash collections must be made to meet the cash needs of the Government, exclusive of the sale of bonds.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman pardon me?

Mr. BORLAND. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. May I inject right into the gentleman's remarks for the benefit of the other Members that I personally visited a high official of the administration before I went into the committee meeting to help frame this bill and had a full, frank talk with him, and when I came away the result was this: "I ought to have $2,000,000,000 in cash; I must have $1,800,000,000"? That was the inspiring motive of this committee from the start to finish in reaching the amount.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will be very glad to do so.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In the committee room.

Mr. HILL. In the committee room, and that did not include the supplementary proposition that has now come in for a billion dollars for building ships, and did not provide for the interest on the bonds we have got to meet, nor the additional pay of the Army which was adopted by this House on the Saturday night preceding. Gentlemen, if you offer any amendment to this bill, I beg of you as an American citizen do not offer an amendment reducing the revenue by one single penny unless you offer a substitute at the same time providing money to take its place. [Applause.]

Mr. BORLAND. I am very glad to yield to the distinguished member of the Ways and Means Committee, that framed this legislation, for that illuminating and interesting statement, and it inspires me to say that one of the most remarkable and one of the best signs in this whole legislation has been the nonpartisan, high-minded, and patriotic way in which members of the minority of that great committee have taken hold of this great national problem and have looked upon it as their problem as well as the problem of the administration. I compliment the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] and his associates on the minority for the splendid work they have done.

But I want to say, huge as is this bill, even measured into the demands that will be made upon it, we have another measure of comparison we must not lose sight of or the country must not lose sight of. This is a huge country. In the last few years, especially during the continuance of the European war, it has been growing in wealth by leaps and bounds. It not only has been growing in actual industrial operations, but it has been growing in invested capital, in accumulations of capital, and at such a rate that no other country under the sun has ever equaled it. When we come to measure this bill into the resources of the American people we find it is a smaller burden than we have frequently placed upon the people in the history of the Republic. Measured into the ability to pay, this is not such a tremendous burden after all. I am glad to see the committee have undertaken at the very outset to do what some of the excitable individuals have written me ought to be done, namely, to conscript wealth. Some critics seem to overlook the fact that we do conscript wealth, and that we propose to conscript wealth equally with human endeavor in this war. We propose to make wealth pay its just share of this war, and for that purpose there has been an increase in the inheritance tax and in the normal income tax and in the surtax on incomes.

In addition to that, the committee has turned, and very properly, to that great list of luxuries which, I am glad to say, adorns the life of the American people. A more luxurious people the world has never seen, indulging in all manner of luxuries, from the simple chewing gum up to the $10,000 automobile. Every form of luxury is susceptible of taxation, especially in an emergency of this kind, and the committee has very wisely placed a very large share of the burden upon that class of luxuries.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Something has been said on the floor here with reference to the extreme burdens placed on the manufacturers of these articles. Does the gentleman think the manufacturers will pay those taxes, or will they be passed on down to the consumers?

Mr. BORLAND. No. The gentleman and I agree in that principle of economics whereby it happens that if an article is in general demand the burden of the extra cost will be passed on to the consumer. If, however, the burden is so heavy as to check the demand, it reduces automatically the amount of the tax that we can collect. But as long as the article is in general demand the extra cost eventually goes on to the ultimate consumer or purchaser. I may say that we Democrats on this side have always contended for that principle in our discussions of the protective tariff, but we were never able to induce the gentleman from Iowa and his colleagues to agree with us. I congratulate the gentleman upon the fact that he has arrived at our position.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, we on this side wanted to pass the burden over to the party across the seas. That is what we were doing and what we were contending for.

Mr. BORLAND. When the gentleman from Iowa gets rid of that idea, that the foreigner pays the tax, he will make another advance in economic attainment.

Now, I want to say this, gentlemen, that these taxes will not be a serious burden if we place them on those who are able to bear them. The committee has so endeavored to do. Much has been said here in regard to taking up the "slack" in the Postal Service. That matter has been gone into so fully that I would not care to take the time to comment on it, except to say that in this crisis of our national history, when this burden is placed on our young men and on our business men, for any institution or activity to enjoy a special subsidy at the hands of the General Government is inexcusable and indefensible. No patriotic body in the country ought to insist that the Government should subsidize its business by doing for it special services that are not done for the rank and file of our citizens. It is but right to bring up the second-class mail rate somewhere near the cost of the actual service rendered in carrying that mail. In my judgment your committee was wise in doing so in this case.

If I were making up a bill on my own theories of economics, I would like to see all the burdens placed upon a direct tax, on an income tax. Not only do I believe that it is the fairest and best medium of taxation and the best barometer of the taxation powers of the country; I believe it not only distributes the tax more fairly than any other but I believe it has a remarkably fine influence on the expenditure of the money that it has raised. When a man sees directly in his tax bill how much he has paid for specific expenses or for the operation of a specific administration or activity of the Government, he is very apt to hold that administration or that particular activity accountable for his increase of taxes. I think one of the greatest difficulties we have contended with in this country has been that our sources of revenue were so long concealed from the ordinary taxpayer in the form of indirect taxes.

I am opposed to these stamp taxes in so far as we can get rid of them, and I am opposed to these special taxes except in cases of articles of luxury, where they can afford to pay it.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. In order to make the gentleman's argument good, would he not have to make his income tax reach everybody?

Mr. BORLAND. Scientifically and theoretically that is true. It ought to reach everybody. The only question involved, however, is the practical question of the cost of collection. There is no use in imposing a tax when the cost of collection exceeds, equals, or approaches the amount produced. I think when you put into operation a new system it is well to put the limit high in order that not too many people will have to be brought in at first while the system is in an experimental state, but after the system is in operation it is very easy to lower the limit until the burden falls upon practically all income producers. For after all the real source of Government revenue is the producing toil of its citizens. The real source of strength of the Government and its financial support is in the earnings of its citizens, and any other form of reaching those through indirect taxation is almost certain to produce lack of uniformity, discrimination, and injustice.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SLOAN. Would the gentleman at any time and under any circumstances reduce the exemption below the average living expense of the average family or the average individual in the country?

Mr. BORLAND. I will say to the gentleman that that question can not be answered, because no one can say what is an average living expense. I have heard that question debated, as to what was the average cost for a family. There is no such thing. You can not approach living conditions from that standpoint. All expenses are relative to the expenses of other mem-wage in one country or in one age would not be a living wage in another. No; it is not a question of that. It is a question of every man who is earning an income supporting his Government financially, as he is compelled also to support it by his military services in times of need. This burden ought to fall and will fall upon those members of the community who can not offer their bodies, their lives, their health, and their strength as a sacrifice for the redemption of their country. A certain number of citizens in war must go out and offer their lives as a sacrifice. Certain families must send their bread winners. Those people give their all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. I should like about three minutes more.

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield to the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. BORLAND. Those men give all they have. They lay upon the alter of their country a priceless sacrifice. The wife who stays at home, the infant children who stay at home, and see the breadwinner—the husband and father or the son—go to the trenches, baring his breast to the thrusts of the foe, make a sacrifice that can not be measured in money. They make a sacrifice upon the altar of patriotism which is sacred beyond the conception of mere man, which rises as an incense to heaven, as the great tribute of patriotism to the life and well-being and perpetuity of our institutions. When men are willing to do that, when they are willing to face the foe and say, "For this flag, for the free institutions of my country, for the land that gave me birth and gave me opportunity, I am willing to go to the front to fight, to die, to offer my life, my future, my prospects, and my career," the men who stay at home should be willing to sacrifice their money on the altar of their country's need. Possibly some are engaged in activities that are being accelerated and expanded by the very fact of war. Some are men whose property is being protected, whose invested wealth is being protected, and the only sacrifice that they can lay upon the altar of their country is the sacrifice of taxation to provide for the needs of that Government. No soft-fingered hand should be laid upon the sacrifice of the men who stay at home and are safely protected. We should make them respond in the full measure necessary to properly equip and care for those who go to the front. The capitalized wealth that is protected by the fleet and by the Army in the field should make its sacrifice. It is only a question of justice and of lack of discrimination between different forms of taxation. No man at this hour and in this crisis of our career should complain of a burden of taxation which protects him, his home, his life, his property, his institutions and future from the assaults which are being made upon the very existence of democracy. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to my colleague, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman begins, may I ask the gentleman from North Carolina how long he expects the debate to run to-day?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have no one except the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] who wishes to speak this afternoon.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have one 10-minute speech after this.

Mr. KITCHIN. All right.

Mr. FORDNEY. Then will you adjourn for the day?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in what I shall say I am not inclined to handicap the committee in its great work that they are to perform. I have no selfish motive. There is one thing, however, that I have heard a great deal about since I came to Congress and about which I think most Congressmen make a mistake. I think I have had some opportunity not afforded to every Congressman to make some observations in regard to a matter that is brought to our attention in this bill. I refer to the raise in postal rates on second-class mail matter.

I have no newspaper that will be seriously affected in my district, and so I can claim that I am only trying to set the committee right in whatever I say, but as a postmaster for some 12 or 13 years I have observed some things in regard to the handling of mail matter that is not given to the ordinary citizen. I have heard it charged and reiterated on the floor of this House, not only by this committee but by the great Post Office Committee, and I believe they are backed by the Post Office Department, that it costs anywhere from 4 to 9 cents, according to whatever investigating committee made the figures that you take, to handle second-class mail matter.

I want to say that whoever makes this assertion does not understand the situation that prevails in the Post Office Department. The plain, practical facts are that it does not cost the Post Office Department any such amount of money. The fact is that it does not cost as much as you get if you figure as any business man would.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. COX. Has the gentleman ever read the report of Postmaster General Hitchcock, made to Congress in 1909, and ex-President Taft's recommendation?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; I was in the post office at the time and know that the conclusions drawn from that report were absolutely inaccurate.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman know that Postmaster General Hitchcock, after one year's complete, thorough, and exhaustive investigation, said that it costs 9 cents a pound to carry and transport and deliver second-class mail matter?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes; and, as I say, he was absolutely wrong.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. HILL. I do not understand that the department claims any such thing. If I understand the statement made to our committee, the overhead charges were practically the same in all zones, but there was a difference in railroad transportation that made the necessity for the change.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, they say one thing in one place and another thing in another place, but you can never run it all down. As a matter of fact, I want to say to this committee that for the next fiscal year you would not handle one pound of second-class mail matter mailed by the publisher that you would lose money on. In other words, I challenge any Member of this House to point out the items in the statement of expenses as shown by the Auditor of the Post Office Department which can be reduced $11,000,000, provided no second-class mail is handled at publishers' rate. I want to introduce those figures now. If we lose $80,000,000 per year, it must be paid out in some of these items, and I want some of these gentlemen who are so sure of this to tell us where it goes. Here are the figures:

Mr. RANDALL. How much per pound does the first-class mail matter yield to the Government?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It is pretty hard to say.

Mr. RANDALL. As a matter of fact, the first-class mail matter, with 40 letters to a pound, pays 80 cents. The second-class mail matter pays 1 cent a pound. Now, either 1 cent is too low or 80 cents is too high, and there ought to be an average that would be the actual cost.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. The trouble with the gentleman's logic is the trouble with all that I have heard in regard to this matter. The Post Office Department was created to carry the correspondence of the people, and it was built up with that idea. The first and second class matter are not handled alike at all. For instance, your first-class matter is always given preference and your second-class practically is the last class considered. The first-class matter is always forwarded, and it may cost 30 or 50 cents to forward the letters, and you get nothing for it, but the second class is dead at the office of delivery. If it is returned or forwarded it costs the sender from 3 cents on up.

There is another thing, and this is the point I want to make. The first-class mail is picked up around the city. Take it in the city of Washington, you pick it up by carriers, and it costs a great deal of money to do that. Then it is carried to the post office and made up and billed. That costs money. How is the second-class matter handled? Take the Geographic Magazine. That is made up by the publishers, billed through, and nobody in the post office handles it. I presume it never goes into the post office to be handled at all. Take the Ladies Home Journal. They make that up in Philadelphia in packages of 150 pounds, take it to the train, put it on the train, and the Post Office Department pays nothing for it. That is billed clear through in the 150-pound package, say, to the city of Davenport, and no postal clerk drawing the higher salaries ever handles it. It is carried to the terminal, dumped out there, and then is put on a car to go to Davenport. It is carried to the Davenport post office, and there, if made up properly, it goes by the clerks in the post office to the carriers in an original package, say, to carrier No. 3; and no clerk has given any of his time, practically, to its distribution; he has passed it along as originally made up to the carrier who distributes it to his route when he is not busy handling first-class mail.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want to be personal, but I spent 15 years in a mail train. Davenport is an exception. It is a very large town. Packages of the Ladies Home Journal are made up as the gentleman states, but there are 50,000 other post offices for which they are not made up. Now, then, the letters mailed in Philadelphia are also tied up for Davenport and other large cities, and are not handled on the mail trains.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not by the man who mails them; they are collected by carriers all over the city, carried to the post office, and again rehandled by clerks.

Mr. RANDALL. Oh, no; but that is a small percentage.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It costs a great deal of money to collect this mail around the city of Washington and take it to the post office. To prove that, as I say, take out of the post office tomorrow, and run your post-office system for one year without the second-class mail matter, and you will have cut the receipts $11,000,000; and I want the gentleman—and I will put the figures into the RECORD—to take and pick out the last auditor's report where he is going to save $11,000,000 next year if you do not handle this second-class mail. That is the real acid test in this matter.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Do we not pay more than $11,000,000 to the railroads for the transportation of the second-class mail matter?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No.

Mr. MANN. How do you differentiate it?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. You are not paying anything by weight now. You are paying for mileage and space.

Mr. MANN. That is just it. The second-class matter takes up the space.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not a great deal.

Mr. MANN. Yes; it does. It takes a great deal more space. It is bulkier. I used to be in the Railway Mail Service indirectly myself, and I know something about it.

Mr. RANDALL. In a 60-foot car, 10 feet of the space is devoted to the letters and 50 feet of the space to the papers.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. You send a lady's hat from the city of Baltimore to the city of Washington, and it will take up as much space as 150 pounds of second-class mail matter, and you will get a dollar and a half for carrying the second-class mail matter and only 7 or 8 cents for carrying the lady's bonnet.

Mr. MANN. One cent for carrying the second-class mail matter.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Oh, no; a dollar and a half for carrying 150 pounds, and the hat will take up as much space as the 150 pounds.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman's statement was, and that is what interested me, that if you cut out the second-class mail matter the Post Office would not gain anything by it on the present expenses. I wanted to know if we do not now pay to the railroads in excess of actually $11,000,000 for the transportation of second-class mail matter, regardless of all other expenses?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Not as I understand it.

Mr. MANN. What percentage of the mail is second-class matter in weight?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. In size? It is the space that counts.

Mr. MANN. In weight.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. In space?

Mr. MANN. Nobody can tell what it is in space. You can tell what it is in weight.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is just the point that I am making.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know what it is? I do not.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I do not think anybody knows. Nobody could know.

Mr. MANN. They may not know, but they will figure it out down to the eighth of a pound in the Post Office Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think it is 80 per cent of the total mail carried.

Mr. MANN. Of the second-class mail?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman assumes it is less than one-quarter of the space. We pay the railroads over $44,000,000 a year for transportation.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. COX. It is $61,000,000 a year.

Mr. MANN. A part of that is for terminals.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It is about $52,000,000 a year.

Mr. COX. It is $61,000,000 a year.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is assuming that 80 per cent of the weight is only about one-fifth of the space; that 80 per cent of the weight occupies only about one-fifth of the space. The gentleman may be right. I do not know. I think he ought to go into it a little more fully.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I am sure of this, that you are not paying the railroads of this country any too much. You are really paying them for service in running the railroad trains and carrying the mail. It is really done for the first-class mail. The weight they carry for the Government is not now used as basis for pay. That is figured out on space in cars used, mileage, and terminal charges.

Mr. MANN. For instance, I do not thing I am in favor of the provision in this bill—I never have been in favor of increasing the second-class rates—but the gentleman knows that out of my city, for instance—and that is true of a number of other cities—trains are run for the express purpose of carrying second-class mail matter at a time when there would be no need to carry first-class mail or anything else.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. There are very few such trains; they most always carry mail and express, and many of the newspapers use the express to carry their papers, as it is cheaper than the Government's rate, now so low you claim it is losing money, and yet the same Government claims it can carry merchandise cheaper than the express companies, and have lowered its rates very materially.

Mr. MANN. And they carry papers to Davenport and sell them in competition there.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Then, as I understand it, both the Government and the railroads make a profit in running these trains.

Mr. MANN. I have always understood it was a dead loss and that there was no money received at all by the Government for it, but I do not know.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I never could understand why they ran them, unless they show a profit to the Government.

Mr. MANN. They run them because it is our business to carry second-class mail, and it is carried at the request of the newspapers for the additional purpose of giving enlightenment to the people of Iowa through the Chicago daily papers.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. That is a false assumption. The people of Chicago need enlightenment much more than those of Iowa.

Mr. MANN. No; I do not think so.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will.

Mr. HILL. I have my views on this question. I am in favor of making the newspapers and magazines pay every cent of cost to the Government for carrying their products. Is it fair to the American people that the publishers of this country should have the advertisements which they have sold carried practically free to the farmers who are compelled to pay freight on their products? Now, I will tell the gentleman where I stood on this matter and I do not believe I am revealing any of the secrets of the committee in doing so. I made the proposition to tax every one of the advertisements 10 per cent, which would have meant in the total volume of the advertising receipts of this country of $100,000,000, which would have paid this loss to the Government and let the postage alone. The papers could have passed that tax on to the advertisers. Now, that is where I stood, and I am in favor of it now. I do not believe it is the business of the people of this country to give to any one branch of industry the right to have their products carried free all over the United States at the expense of the rest of the people.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I am perfectly willing to yield, but I do wish a few minutes for myself.

Mr. REED. Do not they carry the farmer's congressional seeds free?

Mr. HILL. I have always voted against that for 20 years, and I shall as long as I stay here.

Mr. SLOAN. I hope the gentleman will. I would like to ask if, as a matter of fact, the newspapers carried 255 miles, as an average, can not be with as little trouble and effort distributed as ordinary packages of parcel post?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Why, they certainly can and they certainly are, and the fact is for the space they occupy they pay more to-day than the parcel post.

Mr. SLOAN. In the short zone. According to this bill they pay a great deal more than the parcel post in the short zone.

Mr. HILL. And in the long zones a great deal less.

Mr. SLOAN. Just the reverse, and I was wondering why.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I would not object to the gentleman's suggestion of there being a tax on advertising——

Mr. HILL. Let me suggest to the gentleman that if he will move to strike "except newspapers and periodicals" out of that section he will get it.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I am simply suggesting to the committee and to the gentlemen of Congress that there is an erroneous impression in regard to the cost, and outside of railroad transportation there is not an item in this list here of audited expenditures of the department for the last fiscal year that I can figure where they are going to save any money if they do not carry this second-class mail. And, as I look at it, the Post Office Department is created to carry first-class mail, and then it picks up the second, third, and fourth class mail, the same as a manufacturing institution picks up something to do when they have a light load. The whole post-office system is built on the principle of giving enough service to handle the first-class mail. It is on the same principle as an electric light company, which is probably as good illustration as I can find. An electric light company goes to work and builds an electric light plant in a city.

Now, it sells its light for 10 to 15 cents per kilowatt when the load is on in the evening. That same company sells the same electricity for 1 to 3 cents when the load is not on.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I would like a few minutes more—5 minutes or 10.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. For a question.

Mr. GORDON. What do you estimate it costs this Government a pound to carry second-class mail?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I am trying to get at that very thing.

Mr. GORDON. Have you any figures to show what it costs a pound?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I do not think it costs as much as they are getting. I will say that.

Mr. GORDON. What do you think it costs?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I think it costs about 70 or 75 per cent of what they are getting.

Mr. GORDON. I understand that, but they do not get down to the brass tacks of handling the mail. That is the trouble.

Mr. HILL. Let me repeat the statement that the Postmaster General said it was not a question of handling, but it was a question of railroad transportation.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. It is a question of railroad transportation, too, but you are not paying anything for the weight. You may be paying a little for space, but you are really paying for mileage.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I will.

Mr. PLATT. If it is a question of railroad transportation, why in the name of common sense did they put an item in the bill that the publishers should not pay railroad transportation? You give the whole thing away by putting that in there.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Please allow me to proceed. An electric-light company has built up a plant here, and it sells its electric light a certain time for 10 or 15 cents and at another time for from 1 to 3 cents. Why? Does it lose money? The average cost of electricity at the end of the year is probably 4 or 5 cents, and it has received 6 or 7 cents, and it is sold during the day at from 1 to 3 cents. Now, is it losing money on that electricity it sells at from 1 to 3 cents? Go and ask any electric-light man, and he will tell you if it was not for that business that goes on there at the time the load is not on they could not do business. And it is the same way with the post-office system.

Mr. GORDON. Explain the analogy, though.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. You carry the mail matter at the time the post-office clerks are not busy. That is the point. Every office handles second, third, and fourth class mail when it is not handling first class. The Railway Mail Service does the same thing. They handle only about 10 per cent, probably, of the second-class mail. They simply pile it up in the corner of the car, and it goes through to its destination.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Iowa. No; I can not. That is the real fact in regard to the distribution of second-class mail.

Now, I was in an office, and I have had a great deal to do with it, and I have seen 150 pounds of mail come into the post office there, and if you could not handle it you laid it aside. You pay a great deal of attention to your letters when you do not pay so much attention to your second-class mail matter. And if any of the gentlemen do not think that is correct, I ask them if they are getting any papers from their home district, and do they all come through? I am getting a great many papers, and I am losing about 25 per cent all the while. Why? Because the Post Office Department does not pay the same attention to the second class as it does to the first class. The post-office system is built upon this proposition, that it must take care of the first-class mail, the correspondence of the people.

Now, I want to say this—and I believe that it is true, and I think you will find it out—that when you increase the first-class mail rate you will decrease, or come very close to decreasing, the amount you will raise by the amount that you increase the rate. In other words, you will not have any more pennies in the till at the end of the year than you did before you increased that rate from 2 cents to 3 and from 1 cent to 2.

It is evident by the reading of this bill that the committee did not understand that there were two classes of second-class mail matter. One paid by the publisher and the rate paid by the general public. The committee will have to change the language or else they have materially increased the rate made to the general public, which has long been established, that of 1 cent for every 4 ounces or fraction thereof, which can be easily done, but I want to call to the attention of the committee that they will have to cut down the rates that they made to the fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth zones to the publishers or else they will be in the position of charging more to the publisher than they do to the general public. I do not think that they intended to charge more at wholesale than they did at retail. That would be the effect of the committee bill as it is at present.

There is another thing the committee should do, providing this bill should become a law. Some provision should be made to avoid the loss that newspapers will be compelled to face unless they are given time to adjust their existing contracts. Practically all newspaper contracts are for one year, and most of them are paid in advance. As the newspapers that are circulated to-day are compelled to carry out those contracts many of them will face bankruptcy the minute this law becomes operative.

Future liabilities will be in the excess of their assets. I sincerely hope the committee will see the justness of this suggestion and introduce an amendment to cover the same.

In this bill you strike at the very thing that has made us a great people and you defeat the very purpose of your bill, for the effect of this increase of postal rates, in my opinion, will be a net loss in revenue, and the people will be deprived of that which educates and benefits them in all ways.

There is another point that I want to make before I close, and that is in regard to the increase of this second-class mail matter and its effect on farm journals. I have but one farm journal in my district, but that is of minor importance. But I tell you that it is my judgment that you are making a great mistake in increasing the rate on these journals. I do not care any thing about the Saturday Evening Post or the Ladies' Home Journal, but I do know that in this country to-day there is a class of farm journals that are doing more to induce the farmers to produce food in this country than any other single agency. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me this bill is, generally speaking, perhaps as good a one as could be framed under the circumstances.

However, it is unscientific in many ways. The 10 per cent increase in the tariff on all imports is utterly unscientific, of course. The 5 per cent rate that runs through the bill, on automobiles, and so forth, is utterly unscientific. There is no more reason why you should take 5 per cent and run it through a whole lot of commodities than there would be for taking some other percentage, except that it is handy, I suppose. [Laughter.] But I do think that the zone increase on second-class mail matter is not only unscientific but unfair and not based on revenue principles. It is a working off of old grudges under the guise of a war measure, and it is not put in primarily for the purpose of raising revenue. Now, I think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] was very largely, if not entirely, right in the economics of the situation. It does not cost the Government anything like what the Post Office Department says it does to carry second-class mail matter, and you can use the same arguments that they use, for instance, about letters paying 80 cents a pound, and apply them to freight rates all the way through. You do not have the same freight rates on gravel and coal that you have on wheat. If you did, you would not carry any gravel or coal. You do not charge as much for the carrying of lumber as for the carrying of wheat. If you did, you would not carry any lumber. You do not charge the same for carrying wheat as you charge for carrying dry goods. If you did, you would not carry any wheat. If you put the first-class rates on the lower classes of freights, you would not carry any freights of the lower classes, and you can argue that all the profits come from the higher classes and that the lower are carried at a loss. Freight has to be carried according to what it will bear, and some of it is carried at a very slight advance above actual cost of hauling, without any allowance, to speak of, for overhead costs. The railroad is there. It has its tracks, and its locomotives, its overhead charges, and its rolling stock, and it is figured that some business can be done that does not make nearly as much profit as other lines of business, and that it will pay better to carry it than not to carry it.

Now, it is very much the same way with the postal business, and, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] said also, the publications that have second-class rates are all put up in the offices of the publishers and inclosed in sacks and tagged and delivered at the post offices, and they go right straight through and are not handled until they get to the end of the journey or to the particular railway post office where they are to be distributed to small local offices. If the cost of this class of postal business is a question of railroad transportation, as has been stated here, why has the Committee on Ways and Means put in the bill a provision saying that the publisher shall not pay the railroad transportation to the point of distribution? There are a good many funny things in the way the mail is carried. My town is located on the Hudson River, which is about a half mile wide. There is a ferry crossing it every 15 minutes, and there is a railroad bridge across it. On the other side of the river there is a town of a couple of thousand people. How do you suppose the Post Office Department carries the mail from my city to that town directly across the river? They send it to Albany, 75 miles away, and then send it down on the other side again, on the West Shore Railroad, another 75 miles. Now, if it is a question of railroad transportation, what in the name of common sense do they do that for? I publish a newspaper. We do not think that is the best way to send it. We send our paper across on the ferry and put it in the post office over on the other side of the river in order to get it out with the early morning mails and onto the rural delivery mail routes. The transportation on the railroad, when they have got the space and the men to handle the mail, does not seem to cut any figure at all. The Government itself sends mail 150 miles to get it 2 miles, and evidently they think it is cheaper than to send it direct. They used to carry it by ferry, and all the four years I have been here I have been trying to get them to restore that route across the river. There is a trolley road which comes down to the ferry on the other side of the river, which could take the mail up to the post office, but on account of a little extra handling that would be required they think it is better to send that mail to Albany and back again, 150 miles. So it is perfectly plain that it is not a question of railroad transportation in these things. It is chiefly the question of handling.

I think this bill has been reasonably fair to the newspapers. So far as the local newspapers are concerned, they have retained their free privilege in the counties of publication, and although I benefit by that privilege, I am not altogether sure that something could not be said in favor of charging the local papers something for that service, though probably there are a good many little weekly newspapers that are kept alive by that very privilege.

I do not know whether any of the men who have made estimates with regard to the losses on second-class mail have shown how much of it comes from handling a considerable part of the mail absolutely free and how much comes from transporting magazines, for instance, from New York to Chicago or New York to San Francisco. The great percentage of all the newspapers in the country, so far as numbers are concerned, are little papers of small circulation, circulating almost wholly in their own counties.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. COX. The total volume of second-class mail matter is 1,240,000,000 pounds. Of that total amount there was approximately 60,000,000 pounds handled in the counties of publication, of free circulation.

Mr. PLATT. That seems a rather small proportion. I am glad to have those figures. Can the gentleman tell me how large a proportion of the weight of mail is franked mail, that goes out from Government departments and congressional offices free?

Mr. COX. Do you mean about what per cent?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. COX. It is something like 3 per cent—between 3 and 5 per cent. At least, that is Mr. Hitchcock's estimate after an exhaustive study of it, and his figures have never been disputed.

Mr. PLATT. All these arguments are based on Mr. Hitchcock's figures?

Mr. COX. He started an investigation in 1908, and his figures have never been disputed. They have been revised and verified from time to time since he made those figures public.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me say that the free matter circulated in the county of publication is only hauled on an average of about 7 miles, whereas magazines on an average are hauled 922 miles.

Mr. PLATT. There is a point where I can apply my local illustration. My newspaper goes all over my county free. If it goes across the river it pays. But in order to get it across the river the department hauls it 150 miles, while I can get it across by hauling it 2 miles. The transportation of that matter is not an item in the Government consideration, it is the handling of it. In sending the paper through the county and putting it in the hands of the rural delivery carrier, they are handling it more than they are by going to Albany and back.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman avail himself of the post-office privilege of transporting the newspaper across the river, or private conveyance?

Mr. PLATT. Well, since the gentleman asked me, we avail ourselves of private conveyance across the river through a fiction of the Post Office Department, which they call a non-paying route. The trolley conductor on the other side is considered a mail carrier, but he gets no pay except that which he gets from us. We pay somebody, but the Government pays nobody.

Mr. COX. The gentleman sends it by the express company?

Mr. PLATT. No; we use the ferry and railroad trolley line.

Mr. COX. That is all right, there is no monopoly by the Government on carrying second-class matter.

Mr. PLATT. No; and it is perfectly well known that papers and magazines are sent by freight and by express at lower rates than the Government carries them. If the Government would put a monopoly on second-class matter as they have on first-class matter—nobody can carry letters except the Government——

Mr. COX. That is right, it is a complete monopoly.

Mr. PLATT. If it should apply to newspapers and magazines—the law that they have in relation to first-class matter—they would get back a considerable part of what is now lost in the handling of papers and magazines.

Mr. COX. There is no question about that.

Mr. PLATT. But there is still another argument connected with second-class matter and perhaps the strongest argument. It seems to me that we do not want to be doing things that will pull the country apart. We have too much sectionalism and provincialism now. We want to be a great Nation and live together in harmony. We want information from New York to go to San Francisco and from San Francisco to New York. In the East we want to take the magazines from the West and we do not want to have to pay an exorbitant charge.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. And this zone system would have that tendency?

Mr. PLATT. Yes. The newspapers and magazines are certainly educational. I think there are more magazines and newspapers than we really need, but I do not think in legislation of this kind we ought to try to drive them out of business. We are supposed to be seeking revenue. [Applause.]

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee. I intend to support this bill and every provision in it, because I think it is based on justice and equity. But I shall address myself this evening to the second-class postage increase. I feel like quoting the old familiar hymn:

> This is the day I long have sought,
> And mourned because I found it not.

I have been a member of the Post Office Committee for eight years, have attended the hearings, and have had something to do in framing all the legislation of that committee. Almost from the moment I became a member of that committee the question of second-class postage has been a burning issue in our committee.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has expressed many great truths on the floor of the House that will live long after he is dead and gone, but he made one statement yesterday that will pyramid every statement he ever made, and that is, that every Member of this House who had ever looked into the second-class postage question knew that the rate ought to be increased, but that we did not have the nerve to go up against it.

Now, that is the whole situation in a nutshell. We have simply been a bunch of cowards. Over our heads like the sword of Damocles has hung the newspapers and magazines in the country to prevent Congress from coming to the front as it ought to have done, lo, these many years, and increase the rate of postage on second-class matter. I undertake to say that we have worse than squandered $500,000 in investigating the question of second-class postage in the last 20 years. It began about 20 years ago when Congress had to go up against it. The graft was so severe, it was so nauseating that it had to do something, and, just as Congress always does when it gets hard pressed on a proposition, it pleads in confession and avoidance and appoints a commission to investigate it; and nine times out of ten that is the end of the matter. The commission either chloroforms it or Congress fails to follow its recommendations.

The Loud Commission, appointed 20 years ago, when there were not many of these second-class newspapers and magazines as compared with what there are now, recommended an increase, but it got nowhere. I do not know how many commissions have been appointed since, but a large number of them. In 1908, shortly after Mr. Hitchcock was appointed Postmaster General—and by the way he was a great Postmaster General—he began the inauguration of great reforms in the Postal Service. He did not serve long enough to see them all consummated, but he started them, and this was one of them.

After one year of careful, painstaking, industrious work, looked after by the most skilled employees that the Government has, and they are the postal experts, they arrived at a positive, definite conclusion that it cost the Government of the United States 9 cents a pound to transport and deliver second-class mail matter, and that has never been denied except by the newspapers and the magazines themselves. It has been confirmed and reaffirmed time and time again by practically the same set of postal experts under the present administration, and with these facts confronting us Congress never down until this good hour has had the nerve to go up against the proposition. It has been graft, pure and simple, and everybody who has ever looked into the question knows that it is graft. It has been a subsidy, pure and simple, and I have wondered why the Democratic Party has stood for it. I have challenged the Democrats in our committee for standing for this subsidy when we as a party have opposed a high protective tariff upon the ground that we say that it is a subsidy. I have attended these hearings in my committee until I finally announced three years ago that never again would I sit in another Post Office Committee room and hear evidence upon this question of second-class mail matter, because we did not have the nerve to report the thing out. I am in favor of talking plain to you.

My Republican friends, how in the world are you going to go back on this increase? How are you going to side-step what is known as the Hughes Commission report—headed by a great lawyer and a great man, your nominee for the Presidency last year, a man of vast and varied experience in all the walks of life. Justice Hughes was the chairman of a commission that sat for three months and heard testimony. He was not guessing at it. He heard testimony and he took the evidence that Congress had taken for the last 20 years and analyzed it as only a judge can analyze a proposition, and as a result of his keen, analytical mind he recommended to Congress that the rates be doubled; that is, made 2 cents a pound instead of 1 cent per pound. He got nowhere with that, and the proposition died aborning.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. PLATT. Is not that just what ought to be done now?

Mr. COX. Never on your life. I want to compliment the Ways and Means Committee, and I undertake to say that they would not have had the nerve to do it if necessity had not driven them to it. But I also want to call upon the Ways and Means Committee to help us out, for there are bills pending before our committee now to increase the salaries of the post-office employees to such an extent that it will absorb every dollar of the $19,000,000 that you propose to raise here, and unless you are on the floor helping some of us fight that increase of salary you are liable to lose every dollar that you save in this way.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. In the committee there was a suggestion, and I understand every member agreed to it, that there would be an amendment providing that none of this money shall go for salaries.

Mr. COX. I thank the gentleman. There is one bill pending before our committee, and judging by the large number of Members who appeared in favor of it, it must be very popular. A great many Members had their names registered in favor of it, and I am sure not one-half of them had ever read it. If enacted into a law this one bill will increase salaries in the Post Office Department upward of $16,000,000 per year. There are several bills pending before our committee proposing to increase salaries. The total increase of salaries carried by the bills now pending before it would increase the appropriation for the Post Office Department $18,000,000 per year, and between $70,000,000 and $75,000,000 in the next four years. I would especially call upon and urge the Ways and Means Committee to be on the floor of the House next winter to oppose those bills increasing salaries. Judging by the number of Members who appeared before our committee in behalf of these measures, and knowing the composition of the House Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, it would not surprise me to see them reported out and placed on the calendar. They will never come out of the committee by my vote.

The only criticism I have of the Ways and Means Committee in reporting this increase of postage on second-class matter is that it did not make it high enough. Prior to 1875 the rate of postage on second-class matter was 3 cents per pound. Between 1875 and 1885 it was 2 cents per pound, and from 1885 to the present it has been 1 cent per pound.

The total number of second-class publications, as shown by the following figures furnished me by the Post Office Department May 12, 1917, is 29,638, of the following frequency of issue:

Daily	2,625
Triweekly	77
Semiweekly	632
Weekly	17,236
Semimonthly	647
Monthly	5,632
Bimonthly	325
Quarterly	2,069
Others	395
Total	29,638

I listened with a great deal of interest to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], who always both illuminates and elucidates any proposition he discusses. His idea is both intelligent and defendable, and that is, the true theory on which to increase the postage is to charge a certain per cent upon straight advertising. He said that if a straight 10 per cent is charged upon straight advertising this would yield $100,000,000 in revenue per year to the Government, and if a straight 5 per cent was charged on advertising it would yield fifty millions of revenue per year. I take it that his figures are correct. How much the public annually pays newspapers, magazines, and periodicals for advertisement I do not know, nor do I have any means of knowing; but this much has been ascertained by the Post Office Department, that during the fiscal year 1916 the Government transported 1,240,000,000 pounds of second-class mail matter. Of this amount upward of 400,000,000 pounds was straight advertising matter.

Mr. Chairman, it would not be my purpose, wish, or will to ruthlessly destroy any valuable publication which tended to educate or enlighted the people, but many hundreds, yes, thousands, of these second-class publications can not defend their position to-day.

They are in a position of grafting on the Post Office Department, accepting subsidy from the people, and compelling them to pay it. Many of these second-class publications constitute the greatest trust ever foisted upon the American people. Nothing like it has ever made its appearance in the Halls of Congress. There is no reason why the Government should be required to haul, carry, deliver, and distribute these second-class publications at such an enormous loss. Publishers of literature should stand upon the same ground, have the same rights as any other man, company, or corporation who produces things. These publications have the same rights that private individuals have. If it is right to subsidize a publisher of second-class matter, it is equally right to subsidize a private individual, company, or corporation. If it is wrong to subsidize men and corporations in pursuits other than in the publishing business, then it is equally wrong to subsidize men and companies engaged in the publishing business. If it is wrong to take the earnings of one man and give it to another without due compensation in private life, it is equally wrong to take from many men in private life and give to men engaged in the publishing business. Second-class newspaper publishers have no more right, legal or moral, to ask that their goods and wares be hauled at a loss to the Government than has the farmer engaged in raising foodstuffs to ask that his wheat, corn, barley, and live stock be carried by common carriers at a loss to the Government. Equality of opportunity should be the watchword. This should be the guiding principle to govern Congress in the enactment of all laws, and this principle is openly and brazenly defeated when the Government subsidizes second-class publishers by hauling their goods and wares at a tremendous loss. Many hundreds, yes, thousands, of these concerns or corporations are hooked and bound together by legal bands of steel that make it almost impossible for the Government to tear them apart.

In 1916 the actual loss to the Government in the handling of second-class matter was nearly eighty-five millions, as shown by the following figures furnished me by the Post Office Department:

SECOND-CLASS MAIL INCREASE BY DECADES.

Under subsidy of $0.07 per pound:
Pays	$0.01
Costs	.08
	Pounds.
Total volume in 1875	40,000,000
Total volume in 1880	61,000,000
Total volume in 1890	204,000,000
Total volume in 1900	450,000,000
Total volume in 1910	873,000,000
Total volume in 1916	1,202,000,000

Unless law is changed amount will be 2,000,000,000 pounds per annum within 10 years, all handled at enormous loss.

OCULAR DEMONSTRATION—FIRST AND SECOND CLASS MAIL REVENUE AND WEIGHT COMPARED.

Revenue, first class: About 70 per cent of total revenue.
Revenue, second class: Under $12,000,000; less than 4 per cent of expense.
Weight, first class: About 225,000,000 pounds; about 13 per cent of volume.
Weight, second class: Over 1,200,000,000 pounds; about 63 per cent of volume.

PERTINENT POSTAL FACTS, 1916.

Total revenue	$315,000,000
Total expense	306,000,000
First-class mail is one-eighth of volume:
Paid, about	190,000,000
Cost, about	100,000,000
Profit, about	90,000,000
Second-class mail is nearly five-eighths of volume:
Paid, about	11,383,500
Cost, about	95,000,000
Loss, nearly	85,000,000

First-class mail costs four times as much per pound.
First-class mail pays eighty-four times as much per pound.

No guesswork about these figures. They are accurate. They have been tested. They have stood the test. They have been verified and reverified time and time again and never disputed, except by the bold, bald, audacious statement of newspapers and magazines when confronted with these figures say "they are not true."

Take the Curtis Publishing Co. in the city of Philadelphia as an illustration. They publish three publications. Their two headliners are the Saturday Evening Post and the Ladies' Home Journal. Fully half of the Saturday Evening Post is advertising.

A. MEMBER. More.

Mr. COX. I would be conservative and put it at half. The cost of advertising per page is $4,500, except the last page, for which they charge $7,000.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Does the gentleman mean $500 or $5,000?

Mr. COX. Four thousand five hundred dollars. The Ladies' Home Journal is fully one-half devoted to advertising. It charges $6,000 a page for advertising, except the last page, and for this it charges $11,000.

Mr. Chairman, I forgot the superintendent of these publications, who testified before our committee——

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Curtis.

Mr. COX. No; it was Mr. Collins, the advertising manager, who testified before our committee a couple of years ago, said that the Ladies' Home Journal was earning net for the Curtis Publishing Co. $500,000 per year. Between 1908 and 1914 these two publications, the Saturday Evening Post and Ladies' Home Journal, doubled the cost of their advertising. The Saturday Evening Post jumped from $2,500 per page to $5,000 per page, and the Ladies' Home Journal jumped from $3,000 per page to $6,000 per page, and for its last page jumped from $5,500 to $11,000. Yet they had the nerve, the audacity, the cunningness, to appear before our committee in 1914 to oppose a little insignificant increase of postage from 1 to 2 cents per pound, which the Hughes Commission recommended after weeks and months of toil and study.

What do these two papers pay the Government in the way of postage? As shown by the hearings before our committee the Ladies' Home Journal paid to the Government in the way of postage $174,201.22. This, mark you, is the same publication which Mr. Collins admitted before our committee that a few years ago netted the company $500,000 per year. The Ladies' Home Journal has a paid subscription of 1,600,000 subscribers, and the Saturday Evening Post has a subscription of 2,225,000. The Saturday Evening Post, with its two million and a quarter subscribers, with its millions upon millions of income by virtue of its subscribers and chiefly through its advertising, last year paid to the Government in the way of postage $442,271.79. Mr. Curtis, the head of the great Curtis Publishing House, and its manager, Mr. Collins, both appeared before our committee three years ago, and both benevolently told our committee that if the rate of postage was increased from 1 to 2 cents per pound they would pass this increase on to their subscribers. Oh, patriotism, you are a jewel, indeed you are!

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] mentioned a newspaper, a periodical that was published in his district. I do not know whether he had reference to a paper published in Des Moines, Iowa, by the name of Successful Farming or not. If he did, I want to quote some statements made before our committee three years ago by Mr. Meridith, the sole owner of this publication.

I cross-questioned Mr. Meridith myself. He admitted his paper was incorporated for $75,000 in capital stock. About two-thirds of his paper is devoted to advertising purposes, and when asked the question if he could absorb the extra 1 cent per pound without increasing the price to his subscribers and still make money, he said of course he could do it but he would not do it. He would shove it on the shoulders of the readers of his paper.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. I would like to have about three minutes more.

Mr. RAINEY. I yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. COX. There are many of these papers. I would like to take them up in logical order. For instance, there is a great string of these strictly advertising journals. They carry no reading matter; exclusively advertising; weighty and bulky; going through the mails at the rate of 1 cent per pound—many of them, weighing 1, 2, 3, 4, and even 5 pounds per piece.

The following are the names of some of these advertising papers:

The Dry Goods Economist, New York; The Dry Goods Reporter, Chicago; The Drygoodsman, of St. Louis; The Boot and Shoe Recorder, of Boston; The Motor Age, of Chicago; The Automobile and the Motor World, of New York; and the Iron Age, the Hardware Age, the Metal Worker and Building Age, of New York.

I think there are 11 of them all told. Every one of these 11 advertising periodicals are corporations. I "corkscrewed" it out of Mr. Root, the president of these concerns, when he appeared before our committee that every one of these 11 corporations made a large per cent upon the capitalization, in some instances reaching as high as 110 per cent on the capital stock. Each one of these 11 corporations is held by a holding company, or corporation called the Newspaper Publishers' Association, located in the city of New York, capitalized for $5,000,000, with Mr. Root (not ex-Senator Root) as president of the holding company and incidentally of the subsidiary companies. In addition to the earnings of the subsidiary companies, the holding, or parent, company made approximately 50 per cent on its total capitalization of $5,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, here is a case to which the attention of the Department of Justice should be called. Here is a case, so far as trusts are concerned, which puts to shame the Standard Oil Trust, the Sugar Trust, Steel Trust, Tobacco Trust, Leather Trust, Packers' Trust, and every other trust which is to-day eating the vitals out of the American people, yet they have been permitted to go on unassailed by the Department of Justice and not even interfered with by Congress. They have been able and powerful enough to keep Congress from increasing the rate of postage from 1 cent to 2 cents per pound, yet Members of the House get up and defend such a system of graft and trustism, as beyond doubt is displayed in this particular instance.

It can only be put upon the ground of political cowardice. That is all there is to it. The man who undertakes to defend this graft and subsidy on the floor of the House is afraid of the influence of newspapers and magazines back home. Look at it in this way. It is the only way to look at it. It is the only way it can be accounted for.

Mr. PLATT. Do not the newspapers back home all circulate over the entire county free? How are they going to be taxed?

Mr. COX. I would tax them if I had my way about it. There are a few of the second-class publications that this proposed increase in rates may drive out of business. God knows some of them ought to be driven out of business. These publications have increased at the rate of 11 per day for the past 15 years. I have one of these publications called the Hartford Courant, a little paper published up in Vermont. It takes 101 of them to weigh a pound. The average haul of all publications, including this one, is 615 miles. The Government, on an average, must haul 101 pieces of this one publication 615 miles before it gets 1 cent, and yet each one of these publications, on an average, must be handled ten times before it reaches its final destination. This means that while the Government is hauling these 101 pieces of this publication and distributing them, they have been handled upward of one thousand times. Talk about such publications as this being educational! This is not an extreme case by any means. There are many hundreds—yes, thousands—of them. To contend that publications of this kind are educational is preposterous.

Sometimes the goodness of men's hearts compels them to do justice, and sometimes necessity drives them to. Justice will come. The day of judgment will overtake the man who is not doing right, and the day of judgment will overtake the business man, be he publisher or otherwise, who is not doing right in his business. While publishers of newspapers and magazines, through threats, intimidations, and bulldozing, have kept Congress from compelling them to pay at least a part of what they should pay, the time has come, at least I trust it has, when Congress will do justice to this class of publishers who have been doing an injustice to the Government for the past 25 years, and compel them to pay at least a part of the cost of transportation and delivery of their periodicals. We are face to face with a great war. We must have men and money, and it looks as though it was a much easier task to get men than to get money, although you can easily replace money by earning it; you can never replace a human life taken in war. It would be no task to prove by any special interest hit by this revenue bill that the measure is entirely wrong—that is, proceeds upon an erroneous basis; that the tax in the proposed bill on the other fellow is all right, but it is outrageous on the man protesting against it. This, in the main, holds good with the publishers of newspapers and magazines. With them the bill is all right, except where they are hit. The income tax, the inheritance tax, the increased tax on intoxicating liquors, amusements, and so forth, but that it is a most unholy, unrighteous, and unjust tax so far as the newspapers are concerned, from their viewpoint. Before this item in the bill is finally disposed of publishers of second-class matter will spend many thousands of dollars in telegrams to Members of Congress protesting against this increased rate of postage.

The mails will be laden with cunning, specious, and peculiar arguments tending to prove from their viewpoint that they should be relieved from doing their "bit" and contributing their part toward raising money for the support of the war. This item proposes to raise the postage on letters from 2 cents to 3 cents and on postal cards from 1 cent to 2 cents. It is estimated that by this increase in postage on first-class matter that the Government will receive $70,000,000 additional next year. This is approximately 80 cents per capita on each man, woman, and child in the United States. I have not received one protest from the great mass of people who will to some extent be burdened by this increase of postage in first-class mail, but I have received telegrams, letters, and circulars galore from various concerns in the United States protesting against the increase of postage on second-class matter. We can expect this scientifically organized trust to go to any extreme to defeat this measure. While our committee was giving hearings on second-class postage, attempting to follow out the Hughes Commission's recommendation to increase the rate of postage on second-class matter from 1 cent to 2 cents per pound, the following telegram was sent to the Hon. JOHN A. MOON, chairman of the House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads:

MADISON, WIS., February 8, 1917.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON,
Chairman House Post Office Committee, Washington, D. C.:

If you desire to bring the same fate upon your party which befell the Taft administration and caused its downfall, increase the second-class postage rates and you will successfully accomplish that result. The great Republican forces which helped to slug its own party for its many injustices in these matters, and beyond question this is the most unfair proposition imaginable, and second only (?) to the blunder of Hitchcock's freight-train order for transporting publications. You will hear Rome howl North and South (?) if you carry this policy into effect.

B. B. CLARK,
Editor of the American Threasherman.

We can expect similar telegrams from this highly organized newspaper and magazine trust before this item is finally written in this bill.

Mr. PLATT. It seems to me the gentleman is fortifying my argument that this is not primarily a revenue-raising bill.

Mr. COX. It is absolutely a revenue-raising measure, pure and simple.

The trouble is as I said a moment ago, it does not raise revenue enough from publishers of second-class matter.

Mr. PLATT. That makes it true.

Mr. COX. That is the trouble with it. There has been a fight going on many years between users of first-class mail matter and second-class mail matter. We have compelled doctors, lawyers, merchants, bankers, manufacturers, and all kinds of business men, together with the public at large who use first-class mail to pay a tribute to the publishers of second-class mail matter. We have compelled the public to make up a deficit of $85,000,000 lost by the Government in transportation and delivery of second-class matter. The reason is plain, easily understood. It requires no philosopher to analyze it and tell us why. It is because the people are disorganized on their side and the publishers of second-class matter are thoroughly organized on the other. People through lack of organization are unable to concentrate their power and energy upon a few men charged with the responsibility of righting these wrongs, while the newspapers and magazines are compactly organized, able within a few hours' notice to concentrate their tremendous power upon the man charged with the responsibility of administering the Government.

Yet men stand on the floor of the House and beg the question that we are hurting the newspapers and magazines, when it has been conclusively and scientifically proven and never disproven that the publishers of second-class matter are now getting a "rake-off" and "shakedown" at the public's expense.

Mr. Chairman, I make as a part of my remarks some statements made by certain newspaper and magazine publishers before our committee three years ago. These statements are startling; they are not my statements, but statements made by the men themselves. A large number of these publishers own no plant, no type; they exist only on paper. For instance, take the United Publishers Association and its 11 subsidiary corporations. Not one of them own their own factory, printing presses, or type. All their publications are farmed out.

All these men whose statements I put in the RECORD frankly admitted that they could take on an extra increase of 1 cent a pound for their publications and still do business, and still make money, but every one of them said they would shove it out on the shoulders of their readers. These publications which I have selected are in no way exceptional. Hundreds, yes, thousands, I may say, of similar publications can be found in the United States doing business at the old stand, and doing business at public expense, taxing every man, woman, and child in order that they might reap unbounded rewards in the way of dividends. I give this bill my hearty, undivided, loyal support in every paragraph of it, but I give the paragraph increasing the rate of postage my most hearty and enthusiastic support.

In February, 1914, one Charles R. Root, of New York, representing the joint postal committee of the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, Periodical Publishers' Association, and Federation of Trade Press Associations in the United States, while before our committee, stated that he was president of the Newspaper Associations of New York, which had to do with trade papers, papers in several lines—textile lines, furnishing goods, boots and shoes, and some lines like that—purely commercial papers; and while before our committee he made the following statements in response to the following questions:

Mr. STAFFORD. Are you, yourself, engaged in the publishing business?
Mr. ROOT. I am, sir.
Mr. STAFFORD. For how long have you been so engaged?
Mr. ROOT. Since 1877.
Mr. STAFFORD. How many papers or magazines or periodicals are you connected with the publication of?
Mr. ROOT. Twelve, I think.
Mr. STAFFORD. What position do you occupy toward them?
Mr. ROOT. I am the president of the company which is interested in all the different companies publishing these different papers.
Mr. STAFFORD. Will you kindly name them or give some general description of them?
Mr. ROOT. I will be glad to. In the dry-goods line, the Dry Goods Economist, of New York; the Dry Goods Reporter, of Chicago; the Drygoodsman, of St. Louis; in the boot and shoe line, the Boot and Shoe Recorder, of Boston; in the automobile line, the Motor Age, of Chicago; the Automobile and Motor World, of New York; and in the iron and steel line, the Iron Age, the Hardware Age, the Metal Worker and Building Age, of New York.
Mr. STAFFORD. How do you build up these papers or build up your subscription lists? They are all allied in a general way; they are akin; and they represent certain lines of industry or commerce?
Mr. ROOT. Yes, sir.
Mr. STAFFORD. Now, after you founded some of these magazines, or your company——
Mr. ROOT (interposing). The Dry Goods Economist is older than I am. It was founded in 1846 and is the oldest trade paper in the world.
Mr. STAFFORD. How did you go about getting subscribers to those magazines? What is the basis for it? Do you send them out to the trade, and do they pay a nominal subscription price?
Mr. ROOT. They pay $5 per year for the Dry Goods Economist.
Mr. STAFFORD. Does that include membership in any association?
Mr. ROOT. Not at all.
Mr. STAFFORD. What is your policy about getting advertising with reference to these business papers?
Mr. ROOT. We get all we can of a respectable and germane character. We do not carry general advertising.
Mr. STAFFORD. Do you have the same advertising man for each paper, or do they cover them all?
Mr. ROOT. They are as separate and independent as the Washington Star and the New York Herald.
Mr. STAFFORD. What is the percentage of advertising matter to reading matter?
Mr. ROOT. We endeavor to keep it about 2 to 1; that is, one-third reading matter and two-thirds advertising matter, and when we fail in doing that we do not make any money.
Mr. STAFFORD. What was the characteristic 10 years ago, as far as reading matter and advertising is concerned, with regard to these trade papers?
Mr. ROOT. I think it is almost the same. You may take that roughly throughout the publishing business. If they do not include one-third reading matter and two-thirds advertising there must be very peculiar conditions surrounding the paper to make money.
Mr. COX. Is your concern a corporation?
Mr. ROOT. Yes; it is a good many corporations. It is very important to the good will of a paper that it shall not be apparently controlled by or too closely connected with another.
Mr. COX. What do you mean by saying it is a good many corporations?
Mr. ROOT. For example, the Chicago Dry Goods Reporter Co. is one. That circulates among the Chicago dry goods merchants.
Mr. COX. That is a corporation?
Mr. ROOT. That is a corporation—one corporation.
Mr. COX. You are the president of that, too?
Mr. ROOT. I am not. I am president of the newspaper association. I am president of the United Publishers' Association, of New York, which is interested in all these trade papers, publishing these noncompeting papers.
Mr. COX. Do you know what the capitalization of the Chicago concern is?
Mr. ROOT. It is not large. I can not remember off-hand, but I should say, roughly, it was $100,000.
Mr. COX. Can you give the names of its directors?
Mr. ROOT. I think I can. Mr. McDonald, Mr. Fisk, Mr. Cowan. I think there is one more that I do not remember. It is a small board in each case.
Mr. COX. Can you tell us anything about how much profits they made last year?
Mr. ROOT. They did not make as much as they did in previous years, because the last two years have been very poor for all publications, but my impression is that they made a matter of $17,000 or $18,000.
Mr. COX. On a $100,000 investment?
Mr. ROOT. Well, yes; nominal capital. It does not make any difference what it is.
Mr. COX. You said, I believe, that you represented some automobile publication.
Mr. ROOT. Yes, sir.
Mr. COX. Who is president of that?
Mr. ROOT. Mr. H. M. Swetland.
Mr. COX. Where is that published?
Mr. ROOT. The automobile publication?
Mr. COX. Yes.
Mr. ROOT. The Class Journal Co., of New York City.
Mr. COX. What two papers does that corporation own?
Mr. ROOT. The Automobile, of New York, and Motor Age, of Chicago.
Mr. COX. What is the capitalization of the Automobile?
Mr. ROOT. That is the Class Journal Co. The Automobile is not capitalized separately.
Mr. COX. What is the capitalization, then, of the two papers combined?
Mr. ROOT. Thirty thousand dollars.
Mr. COX. Can you give me the names of the directors of that company?
Mr. ROOT. I do not know that I could remember them all. Mr. Swetland is the president; Mr. Roth is vice president; Mr. Charles D. Phillips is a director; and, I think, Mr. Taylor is a director; and there may be one or two others. It is a small directorate.
Mr. COX. Can you tell us anything about how much profit they made last year?
Mr. ROOT. I think the two papers made somewhere near $40,000.
Mr. COX. What was their capitalization?
Mr ROOT. It is nominal—$30,000. That is the way it was started and they never increased it.
Mr. COX. And they made about $40,000?
Mr. ROOT. That is my remembrance.
Mr. COX. Out of that $30,000 investment they made 110 per cent; yet you think they would have to go out of business if Congress increased the rate of postage from 1 cent to 2 cents per pound?
Mr. ROOT. I do not know. That would depend very largely upon how much of that we could pass along—how much we could pass along to the advertisers or how much we could pass along to the subscribers.
Mr. COX. You say, then, if Congress should make this raise from 1 cent to 2 cents a pound, a company making 133 per cent—as I have been prompted—on its investment would undertake to shove that out on its advertisers and subscribers?
Mr. ROOT. That does not represent the cost. The last time those two papers sold there was $1,000,000 paid for them.
Mr. COX. I asked you the capitalization.
Mr. ROOT. The capitalization is $30,000.
Mr. COX. You said to me, if I remember correctly—and I do not want to misquote you at all—your impression was last year they made about $40,000.
Mr. ROOT. Yes, sir.
Mr. COX. That would be showing a profit of 133 per cent.
Mr. ROOT. On what?
Mr. COX. On the $30,000 capitalization.
Mr. ROOT. But the capitalization does not represent its value. The capital stock sold for a million dollars, Mr. Cox.
Mr. COX. I do not care what it has been in the past. I repeat the question to you: If Congress should raise the rates from 1 cent to 2 cents a pound, do you believe that the corporation would undertake to shove that extra cost out to its subscribers?
Mr. ROOT. Unquestionably; either the subscribers or the advertisers. They have not any fund out of which to pay it.
Mr. COX. Let us go ahead and see about some more of these concerns. How many subscribers has the Automobile got?
Mr. ROOT. My impression is that it is 10,000.
Mr. COX. What class of people are subscribers to that paper?
Mr. ROOT. That is the most technical of all the automobile papers.
Mr. COX. That does not answer my question, quite. What class of people subscribe to it?
Mr. ROOT. If you will be patient for a moment I will tell you. I say that it is the most technical of all of them. Engineers, automobile manufacturers, and accessory manufacturers, and the more scientific motorists themselves. Of course, motorists vary very much in the amount of attention they give to the construction of their machines. The class of people who are interested in every detail of construction are the people who take that paper. After that comes the Motor Age. That is a different class. Again, when it comes to a commercial vehicle it is a different class again.

Mr. COX. What is the name of the company or paper you said was owned by the same corporation that also included this automobile paper?
Mr. ROOT. The Motor Age.
Mr. COX. The Motor Age. What is the subscription of that paper?
Mr. ROOT. The number of subscribers?
Mr. COX. Yes.
Mr. ROOT. I think it exceeds 25,000.
Mr. COX. What class of people usually subscribe to that paper?
Mr. ROOT. People who are motorists, but who are not the more technical kind. They do not care to know all the details of their construction. All they want to know is what the routes are, the rules of the road, and what the automobile laws of the different States are. They want to know the history of every contest or every race run or whatever it is; they want all the news of the trade.
Mr. COX. Then the class of people that usually subscribe to these two kinds of papers have automobiles?
Mr. ROOT. Yes, sir.
Mr. COX. Either manufacturers, owners, or buyers of automobiles. Is that correct?
Mr. ROOT. That is correct.
Mr. COX. And about the shoe paper you mentioned a moment ago. What do you have to do with that?
Mr. ROOT. Well, I am interested in it, though I am not the president of the company.
Mr. COX. In what way are you interested in it?
Mr. ROOT. I am interested in it as president of the New York Publishers' Corporation of the Root Securities Co. The Root Securities Co. owns nearly all the stock in that corporation.
Mr. COX. Is that a corporation?
Mr. ROOT. Yes, sir.
Mr. COX. What is its capitalization?
Mr. ROOT. I do not recall; I have forgotten.
Mr. COX. Can you approximate it?
Mr. ROOT. You know frequently in these days the capitalization has no relation to the value.
Mr. COX. I am not asking you about that. I am putting a simple question.
Mr. ROOT. I do not know what it is. If you want to know what the value is, I can tell you.
Mr. COX. I am asking you whether you can approximate the capital stock?
Mr. ROOT. I can not tell you what the capital stock is.
Mr. COX. You do not know whether it is a thousand or a hundred thousand?
Mr. ROOT. It is near $100,000, but I do not know.
Mr. COX. How much profit did you make out of that last year?
Mr. ROOT. I could not remember that for last year.
Mr. COX. Did you have anything to do with figuring up the profits?
Mr. ROOT. No, sir.
Mr. COX. Did you get any part of the profits?
Mr. ROOT. I presume I did.
Mr. COX. Do you remember how much your part of it was?
Mr. ROOT. No, sir.
Mr. COX. Who is president of that concern?
Mr. ROOT. Mr. Charles G. Phillips.
Mr. COX. Could we get him here?
Mr. ROOT. No; I think you would have difficulty in doing so.
Mr. COX. Why?
Mr. ROOT. I think he is in Florida.
Mr. COX. Where should the committee send in order to get the books of that concern so as to find out how much profit they did make last year?
Mr. ROOT. The books are in Boston.
Mr. COX. Who would be the proper man for us to send a subpœna to for those books; who is the custodian of them?
Mr. ROOT. I presume the manager of that company.
Mr. COX. Who is he?
Mr. ROOT. Mr. Terhune.
Mr. COX. What is his first name?
Mr. ROOT. E. B.
Mr. COX. E. B. Terhune; and he lives in Boston, does he?
Mr. ROOT. He lives in Boston.
Mr. COX. And he would be the proper person for us to subpœna here for the purpose of showing how much profit that concern made last year?
Mr. ROOT. Yes, sir.
Mr. COX. You do not know anything about it?
Mr. ROOT. I do not know anything about it. I do not come as close to that paper as I do to some of the others that you mentioned.
Mr. COX. How much profit has that Boot and Shoe Recorder?
Mr. ROOT. That is a small paper. I do not think that exceeds $9,000.
Mr. COX. And what class of people take that?
Mr. ROOT. Mostly the retailers and shoe people throughout the country; also the manufacturers, to a great extent.
Mr. COX. Is it not true that all of these seven or eight papers form practically one corporation?
Mr. ROOT. Yes; they all are jointly interested.
Mr. COX. What is the name of the holding company?
Mr. ROOT. The holding company is the United Publishers' Association.
Mr. COX. The United Publishers' Association?
Mr. ROOT. Yes, sir.
Mr. COX. How much stock has that in it? What is that capitalized at?
Mr. ROOT. I think that is about $5,000,000.
Mr. COX. Has that ever declared a dividend?
Mr. ROOT. Yes.
Mr. COX. What dividend did that corporation pay last year?
Mr. ROOT. I think it was about $160,000. There never has been any dividend on its common stock. I think its preferred stock paid perhaps $160,000 or $175,000.
Mr. COX. How much preferred stock does it have?
Mr. ROOT. It has about $2,500,000, I think, of preferred stock.
Mr. COX. And $2,500,000 of common stock?
Mr. ROOT. Yes.
Mr. COX. You think last year it paid something like $160,000 or $175,000 dividends on its preferred stock?
Mr. ROOT. In round numbers.
Mr. COX. How much did it pay year before last?
Mr. ROOT. About the same.
Mr. COX. And the third year back?
Mr. ROOT. It was not in existence then.
Mr. COX. Do you think you are safe in saying that in one year the profits were $160,000 or $170,000 on the $2,500,000 of preferred stock?
Mr. ROOT. I think so.
Mr. COX. Then there would be no necessity to subpœna the books here on that proposition?
Mr. ROOT. I should think not.
Mr. COX. How many stockholders are there who own that stock, do you know?
Mr. ROOT. Three hundred or four hundred.
Mr. COX. Is that stock divided up and held by these other various concerns, the names of which you have given to the committee here?
Mr. ROOT. No; no concern; only individuals.
Mr. COX. How is that?
Mr. ROOT. Only individuals. No concern owns any part of the stock.
Mr. COX. But the individuals who own the stock in the concern you have just mentioned—do they own the stock in the concern you have just mentioned, these other papers the names of which you have given us?
Mr. ROOT. No; they do not.
Mr. COX. They do not?
Mr. ROOT. Now, Mr. Chairman, what is the object of this? What has this got to do with the question of second-class matter?
Mr. COX. We will see later on what it has got to do with it. You are contending all the time that it would shove the extra cost on the publishers of your paper.
Mr. ROOT. It certainly would.
Mr. COX. And you made that contention utterly regardless of whatever dividends you are making. I would concede, so far as I am concerned, that you are entitled to a reasonable profit, and I think the country would back that up.
Mr. ROOT. I think so.
Mr. COX. But I do not think it would back you up in making 133⅓ per cent profit a year?
Mr. ROOT. How do you make it 133⅓ per cent a year?
Mr. COX. So far as my position is concerned, at any rate, I would not
Mr. ROOT. Taking $2,500,000 and making a profit of $165,000 or $170,000——
Mr. COX (interposing). Do you claim, then, that the $2,500,000 of preferred stock in the company you represent has $2,500,000 worth of tangible property behind it?
Mr. ROOT. No, sir.
Mr. COX. How much tangible property is behind the $2,500,000 preferred stock?
Mr. ROOT. I have not got the figures here.
Mr. COX. Well, what would be your judgment on it?
Mr. ROOT. Almost all its work is contracted out; its tangible property is comparatively small.
Mr. COX. Will you give this committee some idea about the tangible property that is actually represented by this $2,500,000 of preferred stock?
Mr. ROOT. Well, I would not venture to go into the bookkeeping without any preparation.
Mr. COX. I did not understand you.
Mr. ROOT. I say I would not venture to go into the bookkeeping or accounting without any preparation; I do not think it would be right.
Mr. COX. You could not tell whether it would represent $1,000 or $100,000?
Mr. ROOT. I suppose I could come closer than that to it.
Mr. COX. I am giving you any latitude that you want yourself.
Mr. ROOT. I prefer that any figures that are given——
Mr. COX (interposing). Will you write the chairman of the committee and tell him how much tangible property there is behind that $2,500,000 of preferred stock?
Mr. ROOT. Well, I do not know that I would.
Mr. COX. Why would you not?
Mr. ROOT. Because I do not think it is germane to this discussion.
Mr. COX. You do not?
Mr. ROOT. Of course, if the United States subpœnas me I will be obliged to do it. I am willing to do anything that is fair; but it looks to me as if that would be allunde, as the lawyers say.
Mr COX. It might be allunde, but it might be very important.
Mr. ROOT. I would not do it unless I was compelled to do it.
Mr. COX. Then you refuse to write the chairman that letter?
Mr. ROOT. I do.
The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Root, how much did this Boot and Shoe Recorder—that is one of your papers, is it not?
Mr. ROOT. Yes, sir.
The CHAIRMAN. How much did it save in 1912–13 by not having to pay 2 cents postage?
Mr. ROOT. I do not think it saved anything. I do not see how you can save what you never had.
The CHAIRMAN. I know. But suppose you had had to pay 2 cents postage, how much less would your receipts have been?
Mr. ROOT. Now, there is something I will find out if you want to know, because that comes right in here with this question.
The CHAIRMAN. There seems to be a sort of contest between the National One Cent Letter Postage Association, and your association. There is an article which the stenographer will put in the record. Will you look at it [handing paper to witness] and see what sort of an answer you have to make to it? You can do that before it is put in the record. That shows that you got a subsidy on that one paper of $20,000 during one year.
The statement referred to is as follows:

BOOT AND SHOE RECORDER.

In this periodical (June 4, 1913) its editor says:
"Some dishonest methods are used by a '1-cent postage' association, which is apparently obsessed with the idea that all that is needed to promote business prosperity is the chopping in two of the present very low letter rates."
We challenge the editor to prove that any dishonest methods have been used by this association or that we have made misleading statements.
Furthermore, the names of the gentlemen appearing on this letterhead warrant the assumption that they would not be connected with the movement if such methods were pursued.
Doesn't the Boot and Shoe Recorder fear that to reduce letter postage to 1 cent will mean a revision of postal rates so that each class shall pay cost of service, which would take away its subsidy?
In this connection the following information, based on copy of the Boot and Shoe Recorder for June 4, 1913, in which the editorial appeared, is interesting. That issue contained 123 pages, the proportions of advertising and reading being as follows:
Reading matter, 48 pages.
Advertising matter, 75 pages.

Circulation per week, 8,250 copies.
Weight of this number, per copy, 1 pound.
Advertising rates, one page, $60 each issue.
Advertising rates, one page one year (52 issues), $38.47 each issue.
While $38.47 is their minimum charge for a page of advertising, advertisers who take small space are charged as high as $105 per page, but our estimates are based on $38.47 per page per issue.
Figuring on this lowest rate of $38.47 per page, we have:

Income from advertising for one issue	$2,885.25
Income from advertising for one year	$150,033.00
Income from subscriptions for one year, at $2.50 per year (providing subscriptions are paid for)	$20,625.00
Total number of pounds mailed per year	429,000

They pay the Post Office Department about $4,290 per year.
It costs the Post Office Department about $25,740 per year.
The loss to the Post Office Department is about $21,450 per year.
The above figures are only approximate, as some of their issues are larger.
Is it not singular that a periodical which is receiving a subsidy from the Government of over $20,000 per annum should object to paying the department the cost of distributing its publication?

NATIONAL ONE CENT LETTER POSTAGE ASSOCIATION,
GEORGE T. MCINTOSH, Secretary-Treasurer.

Mr. COX. I want to ask this question also: Do I understand that you represent the Iron Age also here before the committee?
Mr. ROOT. Yes. I am willing to answer your questions, but I do not want you to think that I am here in the interest of any institution. I am here in behalf of second-class matter simply. We are all in the same boat.
Mr. COX. But we are entitled to the facts.
Mr. ROOT. You can have them as far as I have got them and as far as I think they are germane.
Mr. COX. Who are the directors of this Iron Age?
Mr. ROOT. Mr. Taylor, Mr. Robins, Mr. Griffith, Mr. Frank, and Mr. Finley.
Mr. COX. Where is that published?
Mr. ROOT. It is published in New York.
Mr. COX. What is its capitalization?
Mr. ROOT. I do not know.
Mr. COX. Can you not approximate; give us some idea about it?
Mr. ROOT. Yes; I know what it was, but I do not know what it is now; it has been reduced.
Mr. COX. What was it?
Mr. ROOT. I think it was $1,500,000.
Mr. COX. When was it reduced?
Mr. ROOT. Probably within a couple of years.
Mr. COX. And how much was it reduced?
Mr. ROOT. I do not know that it has been reduced. I think perhaps that has not been reduced; I think that still remains the same.
Mr. COX. Then, your judgment is that the capitalization of that concern is $1,500,000?
Mr. ROOT. Yes, sir.
Mr. COX. Have you any stock in it?
Mr. ROOT. No; not personally.
Mr. COX. What do you mean by "not personally"?
Mr. ROOT. I have an interest in it on behalf of the United Publishers' Association.
Mr. COX. How much stock does the United Publishers' Association hold of the Iron Age?
Mr. ROOT. Practically all of it.
Mr. COX. How much did your concern pay for it?
Mr. ROOT. My impression is that we paid $2,000,000.
Mr. COX. When did you buy it?
Mr. ROOT. In 1911.
Mr. COX. Your impression is now that you paid $2,000,000 for it?
Mr. ROOT. Yes.
Mr. COX. Did you pay that in cash or did you pay it in stock or in bonds?
Mr. ROOT. Partly in bonds and partly in cash and partly in stock.
Mr. COX. How much in bonds did you issue for it?
Mr. ROOT. Well, I do not think it is necessary for me to answer as to all of these details. I do not know that there is anything discreditable about it, but it does not seem to have anything to do with this question.
Mr. COX. How much profit did you make last year on the Iron Age?
Mr. ROOT. I make no estimate as to that.
Mr. COX. Did you make any profit?
Mr. ROOT. I make no estimate.
Mr. COX. Did you strike any dividends at all?
Mr. ROOT. I make no estimate.
Mr. COX. Do you recollect whether you received any dividends or not?
Mr. ROOT. Yes; I recollect.
Mr. COX. Then how much did you receive?
Mr. ROOT. I decline to make any answer to that.
Mr. COX. Why do you decline?
Mr. ROOT. Because I do not think it has anything to do with the question of rates.
Mr. COX. Would you write the chairman of this committee solely for the purpose of giving him and this committee information and state in your letter how much dividend, if any, was paid last year from the Iron Age?
Mr. ROOT. Not unless I am required to do so.
Mr. COX. Who has the books of this concern?
Mr. ROOT. The A. B. Williams Co., the publishers.
Mr. COX. If we wanted to send a subpœna for those books, who would be the proper man to subpœna?
Mr. ROOT. You could subpœna the president of the company.
Mr. COX. Who is he?
Mr. ROOT. Mr. William H. Taylor.
Mr. COX. And where is he located?
Mr. ROOT. No. 231 West Thirty-ninth Street, New York City.
Mr. COX. And he would be in possession of the facts that would give us that information?
Mr. ROOT. He would.
Mr. COX. Well, it was a money-making concern last year, was it not?
Mr. ROOT. Well, I do not think I will answer any questions along that line.
Mr. COX. You will refuse, then, to give the committee any information along that line at all?
Mr. ROOT. I will.
Mr. COX. That is all, then.

On the 10th of February, 1914, a Mr. E. T. Meridith, of Des Moines, Iowa, appeared before House Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads and made the following statement to the following questions, to wit:

The name of my paper is Successful Farming. It has a circulation of 700,000. It averages from 40 to 116 pages per issue. About 45 per cent of it is devoted to advertising. I make about $500,000 per year from advertising and about $150,000 per year from subscriptions. My subscription price is 25 cents per year.
Mr. COX. In that connection, I believe you said, in answer to a question by Mr. STAFFORD a moment ago, that you sold this paper to your subscribers for 25 cents per year?
Mr. MERIDITH. Yes; 2 cents a copy.
Mr. COX. Suppose this rate of postage was increased from 1 cent to 2 cents; what would be your rate of subscription?
Mr. MERIDITH. Fifty cents a year, three years for $1.
Mr. COX. Would you have to do that?
Mr. MERIDITH. I do not say that I would have to, but I would.
Mr. COX. Is your paper a corporation?
Mr. MERIDITH. Yes, sir.
Mr. COX. What is it capitalized at?
Mr. MERIDITH. Seventy-five thousand dollars.
Mr. COX. Who is its board of directors?
Mr. MERIDITH. I am the whole thing.
Mr. COX. You own all the stock, do you?
Mr. MERIDITH. I own all the stock; yes.
Mr. COX. Would you be willing to tell this committee how much you made last year from your paper?
Mr. MERIDITH. I do not see that that is essential. It is a paying proposition, and a very satisfactory one from my standpoint; and, as I say, I can absorb this increase of postage. But I do not think it is essential for me to give the amount of my profits.
Mr. COX. Can you pay the increase of postage from 1 cent to 2 cents a pound and still make a profit on your $75,000 investment?
Mr. MERIDITH. Let me ask you a question: Can you pay $100 for a $50 suit of clothes and still have something left out of your salary?
Mr. ALLEN. I will answer that, that I could not. [Laughter.]
Mr. MERIDITH. I can; yes; and still make a profit.
Mr. COX. You can pay the increase and still make a profit?
Mr. MERIDITH. Yes.
Mr. COX. And yet you are not willing to tell this committee how much profit you made last year?
Mr. MERIDITH. I do not see that that enters into the question. I am doing business with more than 600,000 people; and, say, I am making 10 cents per year off of each one of them; that is $60,000 a year.
Mr. COX. Will you write to the chairman of this committee and inform him how much profit you made last year?
Mr. MERIDITH. I do not object to that, but——
Mr. COX (interposing). I wish you would do so.
Mr. MERIDITH. I do not see the necessity for it. I am doing business with more than 600,000 farmers——
Mr. COX. Your farmers would not object to your giving that information.
Mr. MERIDITH. Say that I am making 10 cents per year out of each one of them; some other publisher is doing business with 5,000 farmers and making $1 per year out of them and still he is only making $5,000.
Mr. COX. Now, I hand you a copy of your paper and invite your attention to page 9 of it, and will ask you how much you get for that page [handing paper to witness].
Mr. MERIDITH. $1,350.
Mr. COX. For one issue?
Mr. MERIDITH. Yes; one issue.
Mr. COX. Yes. Then you get $1,350 for that issue of the advertisement on page 9?
Mr. MERIDITH. And the postage alone on that issue was $4,000.
Mr. COX. And that went out to 600,000 subscribers?
Mr. MERIDITH. Yes. That is the reason we charged so much.
The CHAIRMAN. For how many pages?
Mr. COX. For only one page.
Mr. MERIDITH. That is only one publication. If it was one of the Curtis publications, he would charge more; if it was a county paper, they would charge very much less.
Mr. COX. But you say you charged $1,350 for that one page?
Mr. MERIDITH. Yes; and I am paying about 200 salaries.
Mr. COX. Now, your total income from advertisements is $600,000?
Mr. MERIDITH. Between $550,000 and $600,000.
Mr. COX. What is your total income from subscriptions?
Mr. MERIDITH. $150,000.
Mr. COX. Your total income is between $700,000 and $800,000, is it?
Mr. MERIDITH. Yes, sir.
Mr. COX. Do you have your own plant?
Mr. MERIDITH. Yes.
Mr. COX. You have your own printing presses, type, etc.?
Mr. MERIDITH. Yes.
Mr. COX. And it is published by a corporation, and you own the stock?
Mr. MERIDITH. Yes, sir.
Mr. COX. And yet you think if this postage was increased from 1 to 2 cents per pound you would jump the price of your paper up to your subscribers to 50 cents per year—
Mr. MERIDITH. I know I would.
Mr. COX. You know you would. You would take the chances of their paying the increase?
Mr. MERIDITH. Yes; because there would be a lot of publishers who would go out of business, and I would go after that business that much harder; and that would be the excuse for raising the rate and laying it on the Post Office Department.
Mr. COX. You would say it was raised because the department had increased the cost of carrying the publication, would you?
Mr. MERIDITH. Absolutely so.
Mr. COX. And yet you admit you can carry that increase?
Mr. MERIDITH. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection?
There was no objection.
Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.
The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide for revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to print in the RECORD a letter from Gov. Harding, of the Federal Reserve Board, and other letters and telegrams relating to the action of the House on yesterday on the Federal reserve amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Reserving the right to object, what is the nature of these telegrams? In the way of criticism of the action of the House?

Mr. GLASS. Did I understand objection was made?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina reserved his objection.

Mr. GLASS. There is a letter from Gov. Harding pointing out to me that the action of the House on yesterday would very likely involve the Government itself in an expenditure of more than a million dollars for exchange in placing what is known as the "Liberty loan" of $2,000,000,000, and a telegram to the same effect from Mr. Long, of the Federal reserve bank of New York, and certain resolutions passed by the National Grange and by the Farmers' Union.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I object, then, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina objects.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 2106. To authorize the county of Cass, in the State of Indiana, to construct a bridge across the Wabash River east of the city of Logansport, at a point known as Cedar or Rock Island, in said Wabash River; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 1007. An act authorizing the city of Bemidji, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River at or near that place; and

S. 1006. An act authorizing the county of Morrison, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in said county.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House do now adjourn. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to the order previously made, until to-morrow, Saturday, May 12, 1917, at 10.30 o'clock a. m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. WEBB, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2316) to promote export trade, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 50), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ADAMSON: A bill (H. R. 4369) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909, as amended, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. EVANS: A bill (H. R. 4370) for the purchase of a site and erection thereon of a public building at Lewistown, Mont.; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. SCULLY: A bill (H. R. 4371) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate General William S. Truex Post, No. 57, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of New Jersey, South Amboy, N. J., two condemned cannon, with a suitable outfit of cannon balls; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HULBERT: A bill (H. R. 4372) to amend the act providing for the organization of the militia in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. HARDY: A bill (H. R. 4373) to authorize the President to suspend operation of section 4347, and other laws in whole or in part during an emergency, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. SULZER: A bill (H. R. 4374) to regulate the killing and sale of certain game animals in northern Alaska during the existing state of war, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. DILLON: A bill (H. R. 4375) to amend section 22 of the Federal farm loan act, approved July 17, 1916; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. PADGETT: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 84) relative to suspension of provision of section 355 of the Revised Statutes requiring cession of jurisdiction by a State over lands acquired therein by the United States, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BLANTON: A bill (H. R. 4376) to pay W. M. G. Mackechney the sum of $150.82, being the amount of post-office funds lost by him in a robbery of his safe on April 16, 1915, and which as postmaster he was forced to pay to the Government; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. COMSTOCK: A bill (H. R. 4377) granting a pension to Mary E. Beitzell; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4378) granting an increase of pension to Amos Huddleston; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DILLON: A bill (H. R. 4379) for the relief of William H. Gunsul; to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4380) for the relief of Fred N. Bunham; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. DYER: A bill (H. R. 4381) granting a pension to Joseph Glass; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FREEMAN: A bill (H. R. 4382) granting a pension to Francis H. Johnson; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4383) granting an increase of pension to William J. Gleason; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4384) to correct the military record of Charles H. Brown; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KNUTSON: A bill (H. R. 4385) granting an increase of pension to Robert Watson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MONDELL: A bill (H. R. 4386) granting a pension to Samuel M. Deets; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. POLK: A bill (H. R. 4387) granting an increase of pension to Miers B. Betts; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. POWERS: A bill (H. R. 4388) granting a pension to Thomas M. McDonald; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4389) granting a pension to John Storms; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4390) granting a pension to Wiley T. Cook; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4391) granting a pension to Susan Murphy; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4392) granting a pension to Robert Strong; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4393) granting a pension to William N. Frost; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4394) granting a pension to James Hubbard; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 4395) granting an increase of pension to Samuel D. Ballou; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ROSE: A bill (H. R. 4396) granting an increase of pension to Jacob Snook; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RUSSELL: A bill (H. R. 4397) granting an increase of pension to Mark T. Campbell; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STEELE: A bill (H. R. 4398) granting an increase of pension to Samuel Reinhart; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ZIHLMAN: A bill (H. R. 4399) granting an increase of pension to John T. Plummer; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By the SPEAKER (by request): Memorial of Division 37, Ancient Order of Hibernians, Fitchburg, Mass., pledging loyalty and support to the Government; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also (by request), memorial of sundry citizens of Mokane, Mo., and the Chicago Theosophical Association, asking legislation fixing food prices; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also (by request), memorial of National Association of State Universities, pledging support to the President and Government; to the Committee on Military Affairs.
